TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY Prince IAMES, by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland; Defendor of the Faith, &c.

IT may of ſome, and not without iuſt cauſe (moſt gracious and dread Soueraigne) be imputed vnto me for no ſmall preſumption, to preſent vnto your royall Majeſty (a Prince of ſo great learning and iudgement) theſe homely fruits of mine endeuors and paines, taken in the Generall Hiſtory of the Turks, and ſtrange ſucceſſe of their great and mighty Othoman Empire. Whereunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rare and wonderfull clemencie ioyned vnto many other the great and moſt reſplendent vertues of your heroicall minde; the leaſt whereof is ſufficient to haue cheared vp my weake and feeble ſpirits; but alſo by the encouragement of the right Worſhipfull my moſt eſpeciall good friend Sir Peter Manwood Knight of the Bath, the firſt mouer of me to take this great worke in hand, and my continuall and onely comfort, ſtay, and helper therein. Which to do, I was alſo the more deſirous, ſeeing diuers little volumes, and ſmall parts of the Hiſtory preſented vnto the greateſt Princes: as the little Treatiſe of Paulus Iou. de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mighty Emperour Charles the fifth; and the ſmall Hiſtory of Cœlius Secundus, de Bello Melitenſi, vnto her late ſacred Majeſty, of moſt happy and bleſſed memory, the rare Phœnix of her ſex, who now reſteth in glory: with diuers others of like ſort by the learned Authours thereof ſtill commended, ſome to one great Prince of their times, ſome to others: all filling me with good hope that this whole and continuate Hiſtory of that Northerne and warlike Nation (which in ſhort time by God his appointment hath brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon a great part of the World, as former times haue ſeldome or neuer ſeene) drawne euen from the firſt beginning therof (not together to my knowledge by any one before written) ſhould with your moſt noble Majeſty find no leſſe grace and fauour, than hath almoſt euery part thereof with other the aforeſaid and ſuch like moſt mighty and famous Princes: and the rather, for that your Majeſty hath not diſdained in your Lepanto or Heroicall Song, with your learned Muſe to adore and ſet forth the greateſt and moſt glorious victory that euer was by any the Chriſtian confederate Princes obtained againſt theſe the Othoman Kings or Emperors. Beſides this, the matter and argument of this Hiſtory and ſuch like (ſo much concerning the ſtate and good of the Chriſtian Commonweale in generall, neuer by any ſo much impugned or indangered, as by theſe the naturall and capitall enemies thereof) of right vnto none ſo properly belongeth, as vnto your moſt excellent Majeſty, with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, ſitting at the helme of your eſtates; who onely by your vnited forces) the barbarous enemies greateſt terror) are able to giue remedy thereunto: in the chiefeſt ranke of whom, your ſacred Majeſty, for glory, honour, ſtrength, and power (God long preſerue the ſame) is now ſecond vnto none. Thus perſuaded and encouraged, I in all humble and dutifull manner do preſent vnto your Majeſty theſe my weake endeauors, according to my ability and meanes continued for ſome few yeares more: which how vnworthy ſoeuer they be of ſo great and Princely fauour, as well for the meanneſſe of me the Author, as for the plainneſſe of the ſtile; yet if for the worthineſſe of the matter, or of your own great and infinit clemency, you vouchſafe them your Majeſties fauourable regard, they ſhall no doubt liue no leſſe fortunate, than if they had beene more happily borne or brought to light: ſeruing (if to no other vſe) yet as faire warnings vnto ſuch great ones as God hath here vpon earth exalted aboue the reſt vnto the higheſt degrees of power and of ſtate, for the good gouernment and defence of his church and people. Accept them, I beſeech you, moſt mighty Monarch, into your gratious protection, ſo ſhall I (if God ſpare life) be comforted and encouraged vnder ſo mighty a fauour to proceed to amend what ſhall be found amiſſe, and adde what future times and better helpe ſhall diſcouer and miniſter vnto me for the perfection of this Hiſtory: and according to my bounden duty inceſſantly in all humility pray vnto the great God of all might and power (by whom all Kings and Princes reigne) to his glory long to preſerue your moſt royall Majeſty in bleſſed health and peace, to rule and reigne ouer vs and theſe your great kingdomes, ſo happily by you vnited: and ſo likewiſe (his will ſo being) your moſt noble poſterity after you, euen to the worlds end.

Your Majeſties moſt

humble and obedient ſubject,

Richard Knolles.

The Authors induction to the Chriſtian Reader, vnto the Hiſtorie following.

THe long and ſtill declining ſtate of the Chriſtian Commonweale, with the vtter ruine and ſubuerſion of the Empire of the Eaſt, and many other moſt glorious Kingdomes and Prouinces of the Chriſtians, neuer to be ſufficiently lamented, might with the due conſideration thereof worthily mooue euen a right ſtony heart to ruth: but therwith alſo to call to remembrance the diſhonour done vnto the bleſſed name of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus, the deſolation of his Church here militant vpon earth, the dreadfull danger dayly threatned vnto the poore remainder thereof, the millions of ſoules caſt headlong into eternall deſtruction, the infinite number of wofull Chriſtians (whoſe grieuous groanings under the heauy yoke of infidelity no tongue is able to expreſſe) with the careleſneſſe of the Great for the redreſſe thereof, might giue juſt cauſe to any good Chriſtian to ſit downe, and with the heauy Prophet to ſay as he did of Ieruſalem: O how hath the Lord darkned the daughter of Sion in his wrath! and caſt downe from heauen vnto the earth the beauty of Iſrael, and remembred not his footſtoole in the day of his wrath! All which miſeries (with many others ſo great as greater can none be) the Prince of darkeneſſe and author of all miſchiefe hath by the perſecuting Princes of all ages, and antient hereticks his miniſters, labored from time to time to bring vpon the Church of God, to the obſcuring of his bleſſed name, and vtter ſubuerſion of his moſt ſacred word; but yet by none, no not by them all together ſo much preuailed, as by the falſe Prophet Mahomet, borne in an vnhappy houre, to the great deſtruction of mankind: whoſe moſt groſſe and blaſphemous doctrine firſt fantaſied by himſelfe in Arabia, and ſo by him obtruded vnto the World, and afterwards by the Saraſin Caliphes (his ſeduced ſucceſſors) with greater forces maintained, was by them, together with their Empire, diſperſed ouer a great part of the face of the earth, to the vnſpeakeable ruine and deſtruction of the Chriſtian Religion and State: eſpecially in Aſia and Africke, with ſome good part of Europe alſo. But the vnity of this great Mahometan Monarchy being once diſſolued, and it diuided into many Kingdomes, and ſo after the manner of worldly things drawing onto the fatall period of it ſelfe, in proceſſe of time became of farre leſſe force than before, and ſo leſſe dreadfull vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, by whom theſe Saraſins were againe expulſed out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spaine, which they yet held within the remembrance of our fathers, vntill that by their victorious forces, they were thence at length happily remoued alſo, after that they had poſſeſſed the ſame aboue the ſpace of 700 yeares. In this declination of the Saraſins, the firſt Champions of the Mahometan ſuperſtition (who though they had loſt much, yet held they many kingdomes both in Aſia and Africke, taken for the moſt part from the Chriſtians) ariſe the Turks, an obſcure and baſe people, before ſcarce knowne vnto the World, yet fierce and couragious, who by their valour firſt aſpired vnto the Kingdome of Perſia, with diuers other large prouinces: from whence they were about 170 yeares after againe expulſed by the Tartars, and enforced to retire themſelues into the leſſer Aſia: where taking the benefit of the diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes of the Eaſt, and the careleſneſſe of the Chriſtians in generall they in ſome good meaſure repaired their former loſſes againe, and maintained the ſtate of a kingdome at Iconium in Cilicia (now of them called Caramania) holding in their ſubiection the greateſt part of that fruitfull country, ſtill ſeeking to gaine from the Chriſtians what they had before loſt vnto the Tartars. But this kingdome of the Turks declining alſo, by the diſmembring of the ſame, there ſtept vp among the Turks in Bythinia, one Oſman or Othoman, of the Oguzian tribe or family, a man of great ſpirit and valor, who by little and little growing vp amongſt the reſt of his countrymen, and other the effeminat Chriſtians on that ſide of Aſia, at laſt like another Romulus, tooke vpon him the name of

of a Sultan or King, and is right worthily accounted the firſt founder of the mighty Empire of the Turks: which continued by many diſcents directly in the line of himſelfe, euen vnto Achmat, who now reigneth, is from a ſmall beginning become the greateſt terrour of the World; and holding in ſubiection many great and mighty Kingdomes in Aſia, Europe, and Africke, is growne to that height of pride, as that it threatneth deſtruction vnto the reſt of the Kingdomes of the earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it ſelfe. In the greatneſſe whereof is ſwallowed vp both the name and Empire of the Saraſins, the glorious Empire of the Greekes, the renowned Kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponeſus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Seruia, Boſna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Ægypt, Iudæa, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Meſopotamia, with a great part of Hungary, as alſo of the Perſian Kingdome, and all thoſe churches and places ſo much ſpoken of in holy Scripture (the Romans only excepted;) and in briefe ſo much of Chriſtendome as farre exceedeth that which is at this day left. So that at this preſent if you conſider the beginning, progreſſe and perpetuall felicity of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this World nothing more admirable and ſtrange; if the greatneſſe and luſtre thereof, nothing more magnificent or glorious, if the power and ſtrength thereof, nothing more dreadfull or dangerous: which wondering at nothing but at the beauty of it ſelfe, and drunke with the pleaſant wine of perpetuall felicity, holdeth all the reſt of the World in ſcorne, thundring out nothing but ſtill bloud and war, with a full perſuaſion in time to rule ouer all, prefining vnto it ſelfe no other limits than the vttermoſt bounds of the earth, from the riſing of the Sun vnto the going downe of the ſame. The cauſes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the moſt part ſo ſhut vp in the counſels of the great, as that for me to ſeeke after them, were great folly: yet amongſt the reſt, ſome others there be, ſo pregnant and manifeſt, as that the blinde World taketh thereof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wiſer ſort (as I hope) euen in theſe our nice daies be lightly touched. Whereof the firſt and greateſt, is the iuſt and ſecret iudgement of the Almighty, who in iuſtice deliuereth into the hands of theſe mercileſſe miſcreants, nation after nation, and Kingdome vpon Kingdome, as vnto the moſt terrible executioner of his dreadfull wrath, to be puniſhed for their ſins: others in the meane while, no leſſe ſinfull than they, in his mercy enioying the benefit of a longer time, calling them vnto repentance. Then, the vncertainety of Worldly things, which ſubiect to perpetuall change, cannot long ſtay in one ſtate, but as the ſea is with the wind, ſo are they in like ſort toſſed vp and downe with the continuall ſurges and waues of alteration and change; ſo that being once growne to their height, they there ſtay not long; but fall againe as faſt as euer they riſe, and ſo in time come to nothing: as we ſee the greateſt monarchies that euer yet were vpon earth haue done, their courſe being run; ouer whom Time now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it ſhall ouer this ſo great a Monarchy alſo, when it ſhall but then liue by fame, as the others now do. Next to theſe cauſes from aboue (without offence be it ſaid) is the ſmall care the Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially thoſe that dwelt further off, haue had of the common ſtate of the Chriſtian common weale, whereof euen the very greateſt are to account themſelues but as the principall members of one and the ſame body, and haue, or ought to haue, as ſharpe a feeling one of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done vnto the feet, or rather as if it were done vnto themſelues: in ſtead of which Chriſtian compaſsion and vnity, they haue euer, and euen yet at this time are ſo diuided among themſelues with endleſſe quarrels, partly for queſtions of Religion (neuer by the ſword to be determined) partly for matters touching their owne proper ſtate and ſoueraignty, and that with ſuch diſtruſt and implacable hatred, that they neuer could as yet (although it hath beene long wiſhed) ioyne their common forces againſt the common enemy: but turning their weapons one vpon another (the more to be lamented) haue from time to time weakned themſelues, and opened a way for him to deuoure them one after another: whereas with their combined forces (the greedy enemies greateſt terrour) they might long ſince not only haue repreſſed his fury, and abated his pride, but with ſmall danger, and much glory (God fauouring their ſo honourable attempts) haue againe recouered from him moſt of thoſe famous Chriſtian Kingdomes, which he by force againſt all right holdeth at this day in moſt miſerable ſubiection and thraldome: many millions of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in the meane time out of the furnace of tribulation, in the anguiſh of their ſoules crying in vaine vnto their Chriſtian brethren for reliefe. By ciuill diſcord the noble country of Græcia periſhed, when as the father riſing againſt the ſon, and the ſon againſt the father, and brother againſt brother, they to the mutuall deſtruction of themſelues called in the Turke, who like a greedy Lyon lurking in his den, lay in wait for them all. So periſhed the Kingdomes of Bulgaria, Seruia, Boſna, and Epyrus, with the famous Iſlands of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betraied as it were by the Chriſtian Princes their neighbours, by whom they might haue eaſily beene relieued. So the moſt flouriſhing and ſtrong Kingdome of Hungary (in the reliques whereof the fortune of the Turkiſh Empire hath longer ſtucke, than in the conqueſt of any other Kingdome, by it attempted whatſoeuer) diuided in it ſelfe by the ambition of Princes, and ciuile diſcord, the weaker ſtill calling vnto his aid the mighty power of the Turke, is long ſince for the moſt part become vnto him a prey; the poore remainders thereof being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Chriſtian Emperour, and of the Princes his Confederats, ſeldometimes meeting together with ſuch cheerfulneſſe or expedition as the neceſſitie of ſo great a matter requireth. Vnto which ſo great a cauſe of the Common decay, may bee added the euill choice of our ſoldiers employed in thoſe wars; who taken vp hand ouer head, out of the promiſcuous common people, are for moſt part vntrained men, ſeruing rather for ſhew and the filling vp of number, than for vſe; and in no reſpect to be compared with the Turks IaniZaries, and other his moſt expert ſouldiers, continually euen from their youth exerciſed in feats of Armes. Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the want of the antient Martiall diſcipline, the wholeſome preſeruation of moſt puiſſant Armies: which breedeth in the proud Enemy a contempt of the Chriſtian forces, with a full perſuaſion of himſelfe, That he is not by ſuch diſordered and weake means to be withſtood. But to come neerer vnto the cauſes of the Turks greatneſſe, and more proper vnto themſelues, as not depending of the improuident careleſneſſe, weakeneſſe, diſcord, and imperfections of others: Firſt, In them is to be noted an ardent and infinite deſire of ſoueraignty, wherewith they haue long ſince promiſed vnto themſelues the Monarchie of the whole world, a quicke motiue to their haughty deſignes. Then, ſuch a rare vnitie and agreement amongſt them, as well in the manner of their Religion (if it be ſo to bee called) as in matters concerning their State (eſpecially in all their enterpriſes to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that therof they call themſelues Iſlami, that is to ſay, Men of one minde, or at peace amongſt themſelues; ſo that it is not to bee marueiled, if thereby they grow ſtrong themſelues, and dreadfull vnto others. Ioyne vnto this their courage, conceiued by the wonderfull ſucceſſe of their perpetuall fortune; Their notable vigilancie, in taking the aduantage of euery occaſion for the inlarging of their Monarchie; Their frugalitie and temperateneſſe in their dyet and other manner of liuing; their carefull obſeruing of their antient Military Diſcipline, their cheerefull and almoſt incredible obedience vnto their Princes and Sultans; ſuch, as in that point no Nation in the world was to be worthily compared vnto them. All great cauſes why their Empire hath ſo mightily increaſed, and ſo long continued. Whereunto may bee added the two ſtrongeſt ſinewes of euery well gouerned Commonwealth; Reward propounded to the good, and Puniſhment threatned vnto the offender; where the prize is for vertue and valour ſet vp, and the way layd open for euery common perſon, be he neuer ſo meanly borne, to aſpire vnto the greateſt honours and preferments both of the Court and of the Field; yea euen vnto the neereſt affinitie of the great Sultan himſelfe, if his valor or other worth ſhall ſo deſerue: when as on the contrary part the diſloyall or cowardly is to expect from the ſame ſoueraign power nothing but diſgrace, death, and torture. And yet theſe great ones, not contented by ſuch commendable and lawfull means ſtill to extend or eſtabliſh their far ſpreading Empire, if that point once come in queſtion, they ſticke not in their deuilliſh policie to breake and infringe the Lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues, grounded vpon the Law of Nations, be they with neuer ſo ſtrong capitulations concluded, or ſolemnity of oath confirmed, haue with them no longer force than ſtandeth with their owne profit, ſeruing indeed but as ſnares to intangle other Princes in, until they haue ſingled out him whom they purpoſe to deuoure; the reſt faſt bound by their leagues, ſtill looking on, as if their owne turne ſhould neuer come, yet with no more aſſurance of their ſafety by their leagues, than had the other whom they ſee periſh before their faces. As for the kind law of nature, what can be thereunto more contrary, than for the father moſt vnnaturally to embrue his hands in the bloud of his own children? and the brother to become the bloudy executioner of his owne brother? a common matter among the Othoman Emperours. All which moſt execrable and inhumane murthers, they couer with the pretended ſafety of their State, as thereby freed from the feare of all aſpiring competitors (the greateſt torment of the mighty) and by the preſeruat[illegible] of the integritie of their Empire, which they thereby keep whole and entire vnto themſelues, and ſo [illegible]er it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part diſmembred or impaired. By theſe and ſuch like means is this barbarous Empire (of almoſt nothing) growne to that height of maieſty and power, as that it hath in contempt all the reſt, being it ſelfe not inferiour in greatneſſe and ſtrength vnto the greateſt Monarchies that euer yet were vpon the face of the earth, the Romane Empire only excepted. Which how farre it ſhall yet further ſpread none knoweth, but hee that holdeth in his hand all the Kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging of the ſea, ſo that it cannot further paſſe. Moued with the greatneſſe and glory of this ſo mighty and dreadfull an Empire, growne for the moſt part out of the ruine of the Chriſtian Commonweale, with the vtter ſubuerſion of many great and flouriſhing Kingdomes, and wofull fall of many mo right puiſſant and mighty Princes, not without griefe to be remembred; I long ſince (as many others haue) entred into the heauy conſideration thereof, purpoſing ſo to haue contented my ſelfe with a light view of that which might well bee for euer of all good Chriſtians lamented, but hardly or neuer remedied ; vntill that afterwards led with a more erneſt deſire to know the ſtrange and fatall mutations by this barbarous nation in former time brought vpon a great part of the world, as alſo ſo much as I might to ſee ſo great a terror of the preſent time, and in what terms it ſtandeth with the reſt, I had with long ſearch and much labor, mixt with ſome pleaſure and myne own reaſonable contentment, paſſed through the whole melancholy courſe of their tragicall hiſtory : yet without purpoſe euer to haue commended the ſame, or any part therof to the remembrance of poſteritie ; as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fitter for ſome more happy wit, better furniſhed with ſuch helps both of nature and art as are requiſit for the vndertaking of ſo great a charge, than was my ſelfe, of many thouſands the meaneſt. Being not vnmindefull alſo of that which the Poet (keeping Decorum) ſaith in the like caſe, though farre leſſe matter, of himſelfe, Beſides that, ſo many difficulties euen at the firſt preſented themſelues vnto my view, as to ouercome the ſame, if I ſhould take the labour in hand, ſeemed to mee almoſt impoſſible : for beſide the ſea and world of matter I was to paſſe through (requiring both great labor and time) full of the moſt rare example both of the better and worſe fortune in men of all ſort & condition, yeelding more pleaſure vnto the reader, than facilitie to the writer ; I ſaw not any, among ſo many as had had taken this argument in hand, whome I might as a ſure guid or Load ſtar long follow in the courſe of this ſo great an hiſtory (many right worthy and learned men (whoſe memory my ſoul honoureth) contenting themſelues to haue with their learned pens inrolled in the records of neuer-dying fame, ſome, one great expedition or action, ſome another, as in their time it fell out : yea, the Turkiſh hiſtories and Chronicles themſelues (from whom the greateſt light for the continuation of the Hiſtory was in reaſon to haue bin expected) being in the declaration of their own affairs (according to their barbarous maner) ſo ſparing and ſhort, that they may of right be accounted rather ſhort rude notes, than iuſt Hiſtories ; rather pointing things out, than declaring the ſame, and that with ſuch obſcuritie, by changing the antient and vſuall names, as well of whole Kingdoms, Countries and Prouinces, as of Cities, Townes, Riuers, Mountaines, and other places, yea and oftentimes Men themſelues into other ſtrange and barbarous names of their owne deuiſing ; in ſuch ſort as might well ſtay an intentiue Reader, and depriue him of the pleaſure, together with the profit he might otherwiſe expect by the reading therof ; whereunto to giue order, perſpicuitie, and light, would require no ſmall trauaile and paine : (Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the diuerſitie of reports in the courſe of the whole Hiſtory, ſuch as is oftentimes moſt hard, if not altogether impoſſible to reconcile.) Notwithſtanding all which difficulties, with many others more proper vnto my ſelfe, hauing with long labour and diligent ſearch paſſed through the courſe of the whole Hiſtory, and ſo in ſome reaſonable ſort ſatisfied my ſelfe therein, I thought it not amiſſe, as well for the worthineſſe of the matter, as for the zeale I beare vnto the Chriſtian Commonwealth, and for the ſatisfying alſo of ſome others my good Friends very deſirous of the ſame, to make proofe if out of the diſperſed Workes of [illegible] right worthy men, I could ſet downe one orderly and continuate Hiſtory of this ſo mighty an Emp[illegible] ; with the great and fatall mutation, or rather ſuberſion of many right ſtrong and flouriſhing Kingdomes and States (the proper worke of all mighty Empires, ſtill encreaſing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud Monarchy hath already daunted a great part of the world, being ſo many and ſo ſtrange, as that moe, or more wonderfull were not euer to be ſeene in any of the greateſt Monarchies of antient time or memory ; and ſo together, and as it were vnder one view, and at one ſhew, to lay open vnto the Chriſtian Reader what I was glad to ſeeke for out of the confuſed Labours of many. A Worke ſo long and laborious, as might well haue deterred a right reſolute and conſtant minde from the vndertaking thereof ; beeing as yet to my knowledge not vndergone or performed by any. Wherein, amongſt ſuch varietie, or more truly to ſay, contrarietie of Writers, I did not content my ſelfe (as a blinde man led by his Guide happely hauing no better ſight than himſelfe) to tread the ſteppes of this or that one man going for a while before mee, and by and by lea-

uing me againe ſtumbling in the darke: but out of the learned and faithfull works of many, according to my ſimple judgement to make choice of that was moſt probable, ſtill ſupplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defectiue in the weaker, propounding vnto my ſelfe no other marke to aime at, than the very truth of the Hiſtory; as that which is it ſelfe of power to giue life vnto the dead letter, and to couer the faults eſcaped in the homely penning or compiling thereof. Which the better to performe, I collected ſo much of the Hiſtory as poſſibly I could, out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues preſent, and as it were eie-witneſſes of the greateſt part of that they writ, and ſo as of all others beſt able, moſt like alſo to haue left vnto vs the very truth. Such is the greateſt part of ſo much of the Hiſtory of the Greeke Empire as I haue (for the better vnderſtanding of the riſing of the Turks in this Hiſtory) ſet downe, gathered out of the doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus, Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing ſuch things as they themſelues ſaw, or were for moſt part in their time, and neere vnto them done. Such are the wonderfull and almoſt incredible wars betwixt old Amurath the ſecond, and his foſter childe the fortunat Prince of Epirus, of the Turks commonly called Scanderbeg, and by that waiward tyrant at his death, together with his kingdome deliuered as it were by inheritance, vnto his ſon the great and cruell Sultan Mahomet: all written by Marinus Barletius, himſelfe an Epirot, and in all thoſe troubleſome times then liuing in Scodra, a city of the Venetians joyning vpon Epirus. Such is the wofull captiuity of the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, with the miſerable death of the Greek Emperour Conſtantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeke Empire, written by Leonardus Chienſis, Archbiſhop of Mytilene, being himſelfe then preſent, and there taken priſoner. Such is the lamentable Hiſtory of the Rhodes, taken for moſt part out of Ia. Fontanus his three bookes de bello Rhodio, a learned man then preſent, and in great credit with Villerius the Great Maſter, at ſuch time as that famous Iſland, after it had by him and the other worthy Knights of the Order, bin moſt wonderfully of long defended, was to the great ruth of Chriſtendome taken by the Great Sultan Solyman. Such is the moſt tragicall Hiſtory of Bajazet, Solymans youngeſt ſon, collected out of the notable Epiſtles of Augerius Busbequius, Legationis Turcicæ, he himſelfe then lying Embaſſador for the Emperour Ferdinand at Conſtantinople, and preſent in Solymans campe, at ſuch time as he himſelfe in perſon went ouer with his army into Aſia, to countenance his eldeſt ſon Selymus, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, againſt his valiant younger brother Bajazet, and beſide well acquainted with the great Baſſaes, Achmet, Ruſtan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the Hiſtory following. Such is alſo the Hiſtory of the taking of the antient city of Tripolis in Barbary from the Knights of Malta by Sinan the proud Baſſa, written by Nicholas Nicholay Lord of Arſeuile, preſent at the ſame time with the Lord of Aramont, then Embaſſador for the French King vnto Solyman. So might I ſay alſo of the miſerable ſpoile of the fruitfull and pleaſant Iſlands of the Mediterranian, made by Lutzis Baſſa, Solyman his brother in law, and great Admirall; with the ſubmitting of the Iſland of Naxos to the Turks obeiſance, written by Iohn Criſpe, at that time Duke of the ſame Iſland. And ſo likewiſe of diuers other parts of the Hiſtory, too long to rehearſe. But foraſmuch as euery great and famous action had not the fortune to haue in it a Cæſar, ſuch as both could and would commend vnto poſterity by writing that whereof they might truly ſay, They were themſelues a great part, many right excellent Generals contenting themſelues with the honour of the field, and their glory therewoon, leauing the honourable fame thereof to be by others reported, for lacke of ſuch moſt certaine Authors, or rather (as I before ſaid) eie witneſſes, I gathered ſo much as I could of that remained, out of the workes of ſuch, as being themſelues men of great place, and well acquainted with the great and worthy perſonages of their time, might from their mouthes, as from certaine Oracles, report the vndoubted truth of many moſt famous exploits done both by themſelues and others: as might Pau. Iouius from the mouth of Muleaſſes King of Tunes, from Vaſtius the great Generall, from Auria the Prince of M[illegible]phis, Charles the Emperour his Admirall, and ſuch others: or els out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues great trauellers into the Turks dominions, and withall, diligent obſeruers of their affaires and ſtate, as were the Phyſitions Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclauius (of all others a moſt curious ſearcher of their Antiquities and Hiſtories) vnto which great clerkes, and ſome others of that learned profeſſion, we may worthily attribute the greateſt light and certainty of that is reported of a great part of the Turkiſh affaires. But theſe in the courſe of ſo long an Hiſtory failing alſo (as by conferring that which is hereafter written, together with their Hiſtories, is eaſily to be perceiued) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge vnto the writings of ſuch other learned and credible Authors, as of whoſe integrity and faithfulneſſe the World hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted: yea, for theſe few late yeares I was glad out of the German and Italian Writers in their owne language in part to borrow the knowledge of theſe late affaires: as alſo from the credible and certaine report of ſome ſuch honourable minded gentlemen of our owne country, as haue either for their honors ſake ſerued in theſe late wars in Hungary, or vpon ſome other occaſion ſpent ſome good times in trauelling into the Turks dominions, but eſpecially vnto the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh Empire, and place of the Great Turks abode: amongſt whom I cannot but deſeruedly remember my kind friend and couſin Maſter Rog. Howe, vnto whoſe diſcreet and curious obſeruations during the time of his late abode at Conſtantinople, I iuſtly account my ſelfe for many things beholden. In which courſe of my proceeding, if the Reader find not himſelfe ſo fully ſatisfied as he could deſire, I would be glad by him my ſelfe to be better informed, as being no leſſe deſirous to learn the truth of that I know not, than willing to impart to others that little which I know.

Thus much I thought good to ſet downe, to perſuade the Chriſtian Reader of the truth of the Hiſtory following, wherein he ſhall find matter enough to wonder at, and no leſſe ſtrange than that, whatſoeuer it is that is written of the greateſt Monarchies of antient time, vnto whom for power and Majeſty it yeeldeth little: but ſo much the more worthy our conſideration than they, for that their periods already run, and ſo their fury ouer paſt, this in our time ſo flouriſheth, and at this preſent ſo mightily ſwelleth, as if it would ouerflow all, were it not for the mercy of God firſt, and then by the force of ſome few of the Chriſtian Princes neereſt vnto ſo great a danger, with their ſo great charge, to their immortall glory, and benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweale, mightily checked and kept within ſome bounds and compaſſe. This Hiſtory for the moſt part thus, as is aforeſaid paſſed through, and brought to ſome good perfection, was yet by me againe laied aſide, and like enough euen as an abortiue fruit to haue periſhed in the birth before it was growne to perfection, had I not, many times fainting in the long and painefull trauell therewith, by my eſpeciall good and honourable friend, Sir Peter Manwood of Saint Stephens in the County of Kent, Knight of the honourable Order of the Bath, a great louer and fauourer of learning (and in whoſe keeping it ſo for the moſt part many yeares in ſafety reſted) been ſtill comforted, and as it were againe reuiued, and finally encouraged to take it in hand, and as at firſt to perfect it; ſo now againe to continue it: vnto whom (being the only furtherer, ſtay, and helpe of thoſe my labours) thou art for ſuch pleaſure as thou findeſt therein in courteſie beholden, and I for euer bounden. Now, what I for my part haue in this my long trauell performed, I leaue it to thy good diſcretion to conſider, contenting my ſelfe in ſo great matter to haue been willing to haue done ſom thing; wiſhing no longer to liue, than in ſome meaſure to be profitable to the Chriſtian Commonweale, which long ſince in my nurſing mothers houſe Lincolne Colledge in Oxford, where I was ſometime fellow, I did purpoſe to performe, as it ſhould pleaſe God in time to giue me meanes and occaſion: in which minde I hope by the goodneſſe and mercy of Chriſt my Sauiour ſo long as I liue to continue. Only this fauour (to conclude with) I requeſt of thee, that if in this ſo long and perplexed an Hiſtory (by piece meale of ſo many diuerſly handled) written by me in a World of troubles and cares, in a place that offoorded no meanes of comfort to proceed in ſo great a worke, thou chance to light vpon ſome things otherwiſe reported than thou haſt elſewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maieſt) not therefore forthwith to condemne what thou here findeſt, being haply taken from a more certaine reporter than was that whereunto thou giueſt more credit, or at leaſtwiſe not written by me, as meaning in any thing to prejudice the better judgement, but to leaue it to thy good choice in ſuch diuerſity of reports to follow that which may ſeeme vnto thee moſt true. By which courteſie thou haſt already encouragad me to joyne vnto my former Hiſtory a Continuation for ſome few yeares, in this Edition, and yet maieſt (God giue me life and health) hereafter incourage me to performe ſome other Worke to thy no leſſe contentment. So wiſhing thee all happineſſe, I bid thee farewell. From Sandwich the laſt of March, 1610.

Thine in all dutifull kindeneſſe,

THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF THE TVRKES, BEFORE THE RISING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THEM.

THE glorious Empire of the Turkes, the preſent terrour of the world, hath amongſt other things nothing in it more wonderful C or ſtrange, than the poore beginning of it ſelfe, ſo ſmall and obſcure, as that it is not well known vnto themſelues, or agreed vpon euen among the beſt writers of their Hiſtories, from whence this barbarous nation, that now ſo triumpheth ouer the beſt part of the world, firſt crept out or tooke their beginning.
Some (after the manner of moſt nations) deriue them from the Trojans, led thereunto by the affinitie of the words Turci and Teucri, ſuppoſing (but with what probabilitie I know not) the word Turci or Turks to haue bin made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Trojans: as alſo for that D the Turks haue of long moſt inhabited the leſſer Aſia, wherein the ancient & moſt famous city of Troy ſomtime ſtood. No great reaſon in my deeming; yet giue the authors thereof leaue therwith to pleaſe themſelues, as well as ſome others, which dwelling much further off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probabilitie at al; and that with ſuch earneſtnes, as if they could not elſewhere haue found any ſo honorable anceſtors.
Other-ſome report them to haue firſt come out of Perſia, and of I wot not what city there to haue taken their name: neither want their ſome which affirme them to haue taken their beginning out of Arabia, yea and ſome out of Syria, with many other far fet deuices concerning the beginning and name of this people: all ſeruing to no better purpoſe, than to ſhew the vncertainty therof. Among others, Philip of Mornay the noble & learned Frenchman, E in his worthy work concerning the trunes of the Chriſtian religion, ſeemeth (and that not without good reaſon) to deriue the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Iewes, namely from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanaſer King of Aſſiria, in the time of Oſeas king of Iſrael, carried away into captiuitie, and by him confined into Media, and the other vnpeopled countries of the North, whoſe going thither is not vnaptly deſcribed by Eſdras, where among the great Lords of the Tartars, in the fartheſt part of the world Northward, euen at this day are found ſome, that ſtil retaine the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nepthaly, a certain argument of their diſcent: wherunto alſo the word Tartar or Tatar, ſignifying in the Syrian tongue, remnants or leauings, and the word Turke, a word of diſgrace, ſignifying in Hebrew, baniſhed men, ſeemeth right well to agree. Beſides that, in the Northern countries F of Ruſſia, Sarmatia, and Lythuania, are found greater ſtore of the Iewiſh nation, than elſewhere, & ſo neerer vnto the Tartarians ſtil the moe: wherunto Io. Leunclauius the moſt curious ſearcher out of the Turks antiquities and monuments, addeth as a farther conjecture of the diſcent of thoſe barbarous Northern people from the Iewes, That in his trauel through Liuonia, into Lythuania in the country neere vnto the metropolitan city of Riga, he found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in language from the G other country people of the Curons and Eſtons, no leſſe barbarous than themſelues; who had alwaies in their mouthes as a perpetuall lamentation, which they with dolefull moans dayly repeated abroad in the fields, Ieru, Ieru, Maſco Lon: whereby they were thought to lament ouer Ieruſalem and Damaſco, as forgetfull of all other things in their ancient country, after ſo many worlds of yeres, and in a deſolate place ſo far diſtant thence. And Mun- ſter in his deſcription of Liuonia, repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demanded what they meant by theſe words ſo often and ſo lamentably by them without cauſe vttered: anſwered, That they knew no more, than that they had been ſo of long taught by their anceſtors. But to leaue theſe opinions concerning their beginning, ſo diuers and vncertain, & to follow greater probabilities: as concerning the place from whence they H came, it is vpon better ground thought by diuers others, and thoſe of the beſt Hiſtorians, That this barbarous nation which hath of late brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon ſo great a part, not of Chriſtendome only, but euen of the whole world, tooke their firſt beginning out of the bare and cold country of Scythia: induced thereunto both by the authoritie of the greateſt Coſmographers, as by moſt apparant reaſons. Pomponius Mela the deſcriber of the world, reckning vp the people neere vnto the great riuer Tanais (the bounder of Europe from Aſia Eaſtward) amongſt others maketh mention of the Turks, in theſe words, Geloni vrbem ligneam habitant. Iuxta Thyrſagetæ Turceq; vaſtas ſyluas occupant alunturq; venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aſpera & deſerta regio ad Arympheos vſque permittitur: The Geloni inhabit a city of wood, and faſt by, the Thyrſagets and Turks poſſeſſe the vaſt forreſts, and liue I by hunting. Then, a rough and deſart country, with continuall rocks, is ſpaciouſly extended euen as far as vnto the Arympheians. Pliny alſo in like manner reckning vp the Nations about the fennes of Mæotis, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, ſaith, Deinde, Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, Tuſſagetæ, Turcæ, vſque ad ſolitudines ſaltuoſis conuallibus aſperas, vltra quos Arymphei qui ad Riphæos pertinent montes: Next vnto them, are the Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, the Thuſſagets and Turks, vnto the deſarts rough with wooddy valleys: beyond whom are the Arympheians, which border vpon the Riphean mountaines. And Ptolomie in the deſcription of Sarmatia Aſiatica, maketh mention of the Tuſci, whom many learned men ſuppoſe to haue bin the ſame nation with the Turks. Vnto which antient teſtimonies of reuerend an- K tiquitie, adde the maners & conditions of the Turks, their antient attire, their geſture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding and fight, their language and dialect, ſo wel agreeing with the Scythians; and a man ſhall find matter enough ſufficient to perſuade him in reaſon, that the Turks haue vndoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes: whom they in ſo many things reſemble, and with whom of all other nations they beſt agree.

The great agreement betwixt the Turks and Scythians.

Now it hath bin no leſſe doubted alſo, among the writers of the Turks hiſtories, at what time, and for what cauſes the Turks (to the trouble of the world) left their naturall ſeats in the cold country of Scythia, to ſeek themſelues others in more pleaſant & temperat countries more Southerly, than it had bin of their originall beginning. Blondus and Platina report them, enforced with a generall want, to haue forſaken their natiue Country, and followed L their better fortune, in the yere of our Lord 755: with whom alſo Segonius agrees in the cauſe of their departure, but not in the time or place when or wherby they departed: for they (as he ſaith) iſſued out of their dwelling places in the yere of Grace 844, by the ſtraits of the mountaine Caucaſus: whereas the other with greater probabilitie ſuppoſe them to haue come forth by the Caſpian ſtraits, which the Turks alſo (as ſaith Sabellicus) affirme of themſelues, their anceſtors, as they ſay, being by their neighbors driuen out of the Caſpian mountains. Some others there be that report them to haue forſaken their natiue country, neither inforced therto by neceſſity, or the power of others, but for their valor ſent for by the Sultan of Perſia, to aid him in his wars: vnaduiſedly ſuppoſing that to haue bin the cauſe of their firſt comming out, which indeed hapned long time after, as in the proces of this hiſtory ſhal M them vnto, a greater power no doubt it was that ſtir'd them vp, euen the hand of the Almigh-

A purpoſe ful of Diuine maieſty, to appeare in the ſtirring of them vp from right ſmal beginnings, in the increaſing and eſtabliſhing of their greatnes and power, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, and in the ruine and deſtruction of them again, the courſe of their appointed time once run. As for the difference of the time of their comming forth, before remembred, it may reaſonably be referd to the diuers emotions of that people, who being not vnder the command of any one, but of their diuers gouernors, as the maner of that people was, are not to be thought to haue come forth all at once, either for one cauſe; but at diuers times, ſome ſooner, ſome later, and that for diuers cauſes. This people thus ſtirred vp, and by the caſpian ports paſſing through the Georgian countrey, then called Iberia, neer vnto the Caſpian ſea, firſt ſeiſed vpon a part of the greater Armenia; and that with ſo ſtrong hand, that it is by B their poſterity yet holden at this day, and of them called Turcomania, of all other the moſt true progeny of the antient Turks. In which great countrey they of long vnder their diuers leaders, in the manner of their liuing moſt reſembling their anceſtors, roamed vp and down with their families and heards of cattell, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades their countrey men, without any certaine places of abode, yet at great vnitie among themſelues, as not hauing much to loſe or wherefore to ſtriue.

Armenia, now called Turcomania, the firſt ſeat of the Turks after their firſt comming out of Scythia.

The firſt kingdome of the Turks erected in PERSIA, by Tangrolipix, Chiefetaine of the Selzuccian Familie: with the ſucceſſe thereof.

THis wandring & vnregarded people, but now the terror of the world, thus firſt ſeated in Armenia, long time there liued in that wide country, after D their rude and wonted maner, (from which the Turcoman nation their poſterity in that place, euen at this day, as we ſaid, much differeth not) and not onely notably defended the countrey, thus by them at the firſt poſſeſſed, but ſtill incroching farther and farther, and gaining by other mens harms, became at length dreadfull vnto their neighbours, and of ſome fame alſo farther off: wherunto the effœminate cowardiſe of thoſe delicate people of Aſia, with whom they had to do, gaue no leſſe furtherance than their own valor, being neuertheleſſe an hardie rough people, though not much skilfull or trained vp in the feats of war.

The fame of theſe Turks, together with their fortune, thus daily increaſing, & the mighty empire of the Saraſins as faſt declining, which vnder their Chaliphs, the ſucceſſors of the E falſe Prophet Mahomet, hauing in leſſe than the ſpace of 200 yeres ouerſpread not only the greateſt part of Aſia & Africk, euen vnto Gades and the pillers of Hercules; but alſo paſſing ouer that ſtreit, had ouerwhelmed almoſt all Spain; & not there ſtaying, but paſſing the Pireni, had pierced euen into the heart of France, and diuers other parts of Chriſtendome, as namely Italy, Sicily, the famous Iſland of the Rhodes, with many others of the Mediterranean: now diuided in it ſelfe, and rent into many Kingdomes, turned their victorious arms from the Chriſtians, vpon one another, to the mutuall deſtruction of themſelues and their empire. Among other the Saraſin Sultans, which forgetting their obedience to their great Caliph, took vpon them the ſoueraignty of gouernment (which admits no partner) was one Mahomet Sultan of Perſia, a right great prince, who hardly beſet on the one ſide with the In- F dians, & on the other with the chaliph of Babylon his mortal enemy, pray'd aid of the turks his neighbors, who were now come euen to the ſide of Araxis, the bounds of his Empire: vnto which his requeſt the Turks eaſily granted, in hope thereby to finde a way for them afterwards to enter into Perſia, & ſo ſent him 3000 hardy men vnder the leading of one Tagra Mucalet, the ſonne of Mikael a valiant captain, and chiefe of the Selzuccian tribe or family; whom the Greekes commonly call Tangrolipix, and ſome others, Selduck, or Sadock, names (as I ſuppoſe) corrupted of the great familie whereof he was deſcended. By the aid of this Tangrolipix (for now we will ſo call him, as by the name moſt vſed) Mahomet the Perſian Sultan ouercame Piſaſiris the Caliph of Babylon, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of his Turkiſh archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turks deſiring to returne home, requeſted of the Sultan leaue to depart, and with a ſafe conuoy to be conducted vnto the riuer Araxis, and there to haue the paſſage of that ſwift riuer opened vnto them, which was by the Perſians ſtrongly kept by two Caſtles built vpon each end of the bridge, wherby the riuer was to be paſſed. But Mahomet loth to forgoe ſuch neceſſarie men, by whom he had obtained ſo great a victory, and purpoſing to imploy them further in his ſeruice againſt the Indians, would by no means hearken vnto their requeſt, but ſeeming therwith to be diſcontented, commanded them to ſpeake no more thereof, threatning them violence if they ſhould more preſume to talke of their departure. The Turks therfore doubtfull of their eſtate, and fearing further danger, ſecretly withdrew themſelues into the deſart of Carauonitis: and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field againſt ſo many millions of the Saraſins, liued as they might, by continuall incurſions and roads which they made out of the deſart forreſt into the countries adjoyning: wherwith Mahomet greatly inſenced, ſent out an army of 20000 men, vnder the conduct of ten of his beſt Captaines, againſt them: who for want of water & other neceſſaries, doubting to enter the deſart, encamped themſelues in the ſide of the forreſt, there to conſult what courſe to take. But Tangrolipix, who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountains, vnderſtanding of the comming of his enemies, and of the maner of their lying, thought it beſt vpon the ſudden by night to ſet vpon the Saraſins and Perſians, if ſo happily he might ouerthrow them by policie, whom he was not able to encounter in plain battel. Vpon which reſolution hauing trauelled 2 daies long march in the deſart, the third day at night he ſuddenly ſet vpon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, and by his vnexpected comming brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they without longer ſtay betooke themſelues to flight, euery man ſhifting for himſelf without regard of others. This victory ſo happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furniſhed with armor, horſes, and abundance of all things needful for the wars, kept the woods & forreſts no longer as a theef or out-law, but ſhewed himſelf in the open field, where dayly repaired vnto him numbers of rogues and vagabonds ſeeking after ſpoile; with many other deſperate villains, who for feare of puniſhment were glad of ſuch a refuge: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace his army was growne to be 50000 ſtrong; and ſo much the ſtronger, for that they had nothing to truſt vnto more than the valor of themſelues. Whileſt Tangrolipix thus increaſeth, Mahomet inraged with the ouerthrow of his army, in his fury cauſed all thoſe ten captains which had the leading therof, to haue their eies pluckt out; threatning alſo to attire al the ſoldiers that fled out of the battel, in womans apparel, and ſo diſgraced to carry them about as cowards; and withall raiſed a great army for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. All things being now in readineſſe, he ſet forward; when by the way the ſouldiers whom he had ſo threatned to diſgrace, ſuddenly fled to the enemy: with whoſe comming Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and ſtrengthned, reſolued to giue the Sultan battell. And ſo boldly comming on, met with him at Iſpahan a city of Perſia, where was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible battel, with wonderfull ſlaughter on both ſides. In the heat of which battell, Mahomet vnaduiſedly riding to and fro to encourage his ſoldiers, falling with his horſe, brake his necke: vpon which miſchance both the armies comming to agreement, by common conſent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his ſtead; and ſo made him King and Perſia, and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome belonging.

Tangrolipix by conſent of the ſouldiers made Sultan of Perſia.

This was the firſt kingdom of the Turks, begun by the good fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 yeres after their comming out of Scythia, in the yere alſo of our Lord, 1030; Conſtantinus Monomachus then reigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the raign of Romanus Argirus, Conſtantine his predeceſſor. Tangrolipix by rare fortune, thus of a meane captain become King of Perſia, forthwith commanded the garriſon which kept the bridge ouer the riuer Araxis, to be remoued, and ſo free paſſage to be giuen to the Turks his countrymen, at their pleaſure to come ouer: who in great multitudes repaired into Perſia, where they were by the new Sultan well prouided for, and by little and little promoted vnto the

A greateſt dignities of that kingdome; the Perſians and Saraſins, the antient inhabitants thereof being by theſe new come gueſts now kept vnder, and as it were troden vnder foot. Together with this kingdom, the Turks receiued the Mahometane ſuperſtition, from which they before not much abhorred, as men vſing circumciſion: So that hard it is to ſay whether Nation loſt more; the Perſians and Saraſins by the loſſe of ſo great a kingdome, or the Turks, imbracing ſo great a vanitie.

Tangrolipix with his Turkes thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Perſia, held not himſelfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbor princes, eſpecially againſt Biſaſiris the Caliph of Babylon, whom he in diuers battels ouerthrew; and hauing at length ſlaine him, ioyned his kingdome vnto his owne. After that, he ſent Cutlu-Muſes his couſin, with an B armie againſt the Arabians, by whom he was ouerthrowne and put to flight. But returning by Media, he requeſted of Stephan the Greeke Emperours Lieutenant, leaue to paſſe with his armie by the confines of his countrie: which his requeſt Stephan not onely reiected, but alſo by ſtrong hand ſought to ſtop his paſſage; but ioyning battell with him, was by the Turks eaſily ouerthrowne, & himſelfe taken. So Cutlu-Muſes returning to Tangrolipix, and recounting vnto him the ſucceſſe of his warres, perſuaded him to turne his forces into Media, as a moſt fruitfull country and eaſie to be ſubdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vno him, but raiſing a new armie in hope of better fortune, went againſt the Arabians in perſon himſelfe. Cutlu-Muſes in the meane time fearing the Sultans diſpleaſure, fled with his followers and fauorites; and taking for his refuge C Paſar a ſtrong citie of the Choraſmians, reuolted from him: which the Sultan ſeeming not to regard, held on his intended iourny againſt the Arabians, by whom he was alſo put to the worſt, and enforced with diſhonour to returne. After that, he with part of his army beſieged Cutlu-Muſes, who by the ſtrength of the place, and valour of the people, for a great whiſe notably defended himſelfe. in the meane time Tangrolipix, not vnmindefull what Cutlu-Muſes had before ſaid vnto him, concerning the eaſines of the conqueſt of Media (a countrey, as he ſayd, defended but by women) ſent Aſan his brothers ſon, ſirnamed the deafe, with a conuenient armie to inuade the ſame: who entring into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the Emperours lieutenant ouerthrown, & himſelfe with the greateſt part of his army ſlain: with which loſſe the Sultan rather inraged than diſcouraged, ſent Habramy Alim his brother D again, with an army of an hundred thouſand fighting men: with which ſo great a power the Emperours lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill hee had procured further ayd from the Emperour, eſpecially out of Iberia; and therefore kept himſelfe with ſuch power as he had, within his ſtrong and fenced places. Which Alim perceiuing, & out of hope to draw him vnto battel, roaming vp and downe the Country, at laſt beſieged Arzen, an open town, but ful of rich merchants, by whom it was (contrarie to his expectation) notably defended for the ſpace of ſix dayes; vntil that at length the Turks ſeeing no other way to win it, ſet fire vpon it in diuers places; by force whereof the inhabitans were enforced for ſafeguard of their liues to flie & to leaue the towne with an infinite wealth to the ſpoile of the enemy. By this time was Liparites Gouernor of Iberia, come with a great power to the ayd of the E Emperors Lieutenant in Media: whereof Alim hauing intelligence, without delay haſted with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them alittle before night, had with them a cruell fight; wherein the victorie fel vnto the Chriſtians, who had the Turks in chaſe a great part of the night: neuertheles Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battell, was there taken, & ſo carried away priſoner: for whoſe ranſome the Emperor ſent a great ſum of mony, with certain preſents to the Sultan: all which he ſent back againe, & frankly ſet Liparites at libertie, wiſhing him neuer to beare armes more againſt the Turks. And with him ſent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahumetans, his Embaſſador vnto the Emperour. Who comming to Conſtantinople, amongſt other things, proudly demanded of the Emperor, to become tributarie vnto the Sultan, and ſo to bee at peace with him for euer: F Which his vnreaſonable demaund was by the Emperor with no leſſe diſdaine ſcornefully reiected, & the Seriph ſo diſmiſſed. Which contempt of his Embaſſador the Sultan taking in euill part, as alſo not a little mooued with the death of his nephew, and loſſe of his armie, with all his power inuaded the Romane prouinces; but being come as far as Coime without any notable harme doing, for that the countrie people hearing before of his comming, had in time conueighed themſelues with their ſubſtance into their ſtrong houlds, whereof there was great ſtore in thoſe countries; and hearing alſo that the Greeke Emperour was raiſing a G great power to come againſt him at Cæſarea; not daring to proceed any further, leauing ſo many enemies behind him, he fretting in himſelfe, returned into Media, where finding the people all fled into their ſtrong townes, hee layd ſiege vnto Mantzichiert, a Citie ſtanding in a plaine champian Countrey, but ſtrongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches.

This Citie hee furiouſly aſſaulted by the ſpace of thirtie daies without intermiſſion, but all in vaine, the ſame being ſtill notably defended by Baſilius Gouernour thereof, and the other Chriſtians therein. The Sultan wearie of this ſiege, and about to haue riſen, was by Alcan one of his chiefe Captaines, perſuaded yet to ſtay one day, for him to make proofe in, what hee were able to doe for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelded, committing the whole charge of the aſſault vnto him. Alcan the next day diuiding the armie into two parts, H and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpoſe with the multitude of their ſhot to haue ouerwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the armie, furniſhed with all things needfull for the aſſault, approached to the walls: the Sultan in the meane time with certaine of the chiefe Turkes, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this ſo forward a Captaine in the middeſt of his endeauor loſt himſelfe, being ſlaine with a great number of his followers in approching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beauty of his armour, was by two valiant young men that ſallyed out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the Citie, and his head being forthwith cut off, was caſt ouer the wall among the Turkes: wherewith the Sultan diſcouraged, and out of hope of gaining the Citie, roſe with his army, pretending himſelfe with other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatning I withall, the next ſpring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great diſcord aroſe betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, inſomuch that the Sultan ſought by diuers means to haue taken him out of the way: which Habramy perceiuing, fled to his Nephew Cutlu-Muſes, and ioyning his forces with his, denounced war vnto the Sultan his brother; who meeting with them not far from Paſar, ouercame them in plain battell, wherein Habramie was taken, and preſently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu-Muſes, with his couſin Melech, and ſix thouſand Turks, fled into Armenia; and by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, requeſted of the Emperor Conſtantinus Monomachus, to be receiued into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heels, they for their more ſafetie were glad to flye into Arabia. The Sultan afterwards turning into Iberia, K did there great harme, ſpoyling the countrey before him: againſt whom the Emperour ſent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine. Of whoſe approch the Sultan hearing, and that hee would vndoubtedly ere long giue him battell, (deeming it no great honour vnto him to ouercome the Emperours ſeruant, but an eternall diſhonor to be of him ouerthrown) retired with his army back again to Tauris, leauing behind him one Samuch with three thouſand Turkes, to infeſt the frontiers of the Emperors territories: which both he and other the Turks Captaines afterward more eaſily did, for that Monomachus the Emperour hauing prodigally ſpent the treaſures of the Empire, to increaſe his reuenue, had impoſed a tribute vpon the frontier countries of his empire, which were wont before to be free from all exactions; in lieu whereof they were bound to defend the paſſages from all incurſions of the enemy: but now preſſed L with new impoſitions, had diſſolued their wonted garriſons, and left an eaſie entrance for the barbarous enemies into the prouinces confining vpon them. Beſides that, the Emperours immediately following, and eſpecially Conſtantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and giuen altogether to the hoording of treaſure, gaue little countenance, and leſſe maintenance, vnto men of ſeruice, which in ſhort time turned to the great weakening, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Conſtantinopolitan empire. At the ſame time alſo the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, by the death of Conſtantinus Ducas the late Emperor, came to his wife Eudocia with her three ſons, Michael, Andronicus and Conſtantinus, all very young: whoſe ſex and tender yeres the barbarous nations hauing in contempt, at their pleaſure grieuouſly ſpoyled the prouinces of the empire, namely Meſopotamia, Cilicia, Capadocia, yea and ſometimes as farre M as Cœleſiria. The report whereof much troubled the Empreſſe, and gaue occaſion for many that loued her not, to ſay, That ſo troubled an eſtate required the gouernment of ſome worthie man. Wherfore ſhe fearing leſt that the Senat making choice of ſome other, ſhe and her children ſhould be remoued from the gouernment, thought it beſt for the preſeruation of her ſtate and her childrens, to make choice of ſome notable and valiant man for her husband, that Couetouſneſſe and lacke of reward the decay of the Conſtantinopolitan empire.

Eudocia the Empreſſe contrary to her oath deſirous to marrie.

A for her and hers, ſhould take vpon him the managing of ſo weightie affaires. But to check this her purpoſe (the only remedy of her troubled thoughts) ſhe had at the death of the late Emperor Conſtantine her husband, at ſuch time as the Soueraignty was by the Senat confirmed to her and her ſons, ſolemnly ſworne neuer more to marry; which her oath was for the more aſſurance conceiued into writing, and ſo deliuered vnto the Patriarch to keepe. This troubled her more, than to find out the man whom ſhe could thinke worthy of her ſelfe, with ſo great honor. She held then in priſon one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renowne, and honorably diſcended; whoſe father hauing married the neece of the Emperor Romanus Argirus, and aſpiring to the empire, being conuicted thereof, ſlew himſelfe for feare to bee inforced by torments, to bewray his confederates. This Diogenes was by the late Emperor Conſtantine, for his B good ſeruice againſt the Scythes (who then much troubled the empire) highly promoted, with moſt honourable teſtimony in the charters of his promotions, That ſuch honours were beſtowed vpon him, not of the Emperors meere bounty, but as the due rewards of his worthy deſerts. Notwithſtanding after the death of the Emperor, he ſick of his fathers diſeaſe, and ſwelling with the pride of ambition, ſought by ſecret means to haue aſpired vnto the empire: wherof the empreſſe hauing intelligence, cauſed him to be apprehended & brought in bonds to Conſtantinople, where being found guilty of the foule treaſon, and ſo committed to ſafe keeping, was ſhortly after brought forth to the iudgement ſeat againe, to receiue the heauie ſentence of death. In which wofull plight, ſtanding as a man out of hope, and now vtterly forlorn, he mooued all the beholders with a ſorrowfull compaſſion: for beſide that he was a man C of exceeding ſtrength, ſo was he of incomparable feature & beauty, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues anſwerable thereunto: wherewith the Empreſſe mooued with the reſt, or pierced with ſome ſecret good liking, is hard to ſay, reuoked the ſentence of condemnation ready to haue bin pronounced vpon him, and giue him pardon. And ſhortly after hauing ſet him at libertie, ſent for him as he was going into Capadocia his natiue country, and made him Generall of all her forces, with a full reſolution in her ſelfe to marry him, and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarchs hand, wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe was compriſed. For the compaſſing whereof, ſhe entred into a deep deuice full of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches, whom ſhe purpoſed to vſe as her pander for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This crafty Eunuch inſtructed D by his miſtres, comming to the patriarch Ioannes Xiliphilines, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honored, told him in great ſecret, that the Empreſſe had ſo far ſet her good liking vpon a young gentleman, a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court) as that ſhe could be content to take him to her husband, and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by his holines be perſuaded, that ſhe might with with ſafe conſcience do it, and by him be diſcharged of the raſh oath ſhe had vnaduiſedly taken, neuer to marry again, wherof he had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwiſe a contemner of wordly honours, yet mooued with ſo great a preferment of his nephew, promiſed the eunuch to do therein whatſoeuer the Empreſſe had deſired, which he accordingly performed. And ſo ſending for the Senators one by one, in whoſe good liking the matter chiefly reſted, he with much grauity propounded to E them the dangerous eſtate of the common-weale, with the troubles daily increaſing, and the continual fear of forrein enemies, not to be repreſſed by the weak hand of a woman, or the authority of yong children, but requiring (as he ſaid) the valiant courage of ſome worthie man.
After that, he began to find great fault with the raſh oath which the Empreſſe had taken a little before the death of her husband, neuer to marry; and vtterly condemning the ſame, as contrary to the word of God, & vniuſtly exacted of her, rather to ſatiſfy the iealous humor of the Emperor her late husband, than for any good of the common-weale: he in fine perſuaded them, that the vnlawful oath might be reuoked, and the Empres ſet at libertie at her pleaſure, by their good liking to make choice of ſuch a man for her husband, as might better vndertake ſo weighty affaires of the empire, more fit for a man, than for ſo tender a Lady and 3 young F children. The greater part of the ſenat thus perſuaded by the Patriarch, and the reſt with gifts and promiſes ouercome by the Empreſſe, the patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing ſhe ſo much deſired, & diſcharged her of her oath: wherupon ſhe forthwith calling vnto her certain of her ſecret friends, married Diogenes, whom ſhe cauſed to be proclaimed Emperour. Now thought Eudocia after the manner of a woman, to haue had her husband (whom ſhe euen from

And for that the imperiall prouinces in the Eaſt, were in ſome part loſt, & the reſt in no ſmall danger; he, as well for the redreſſe therof, as for his owne honour, and to ſhew himſelfe an Emperour indeed, and not the ſeruant of the Empreſſe, left the court, and paſſed ouer into Aſia, although it were with a ſmal army and euill appointed: for why, it was no eaſie matter for him to furniſh out the army with al things neceſſarie, which by the ſloth and ſparing of the late Emperours, had, to the great danger and diſhonor of the empire, bin vtterly neglected. Neuertheleſſe the Turkiſh Sultan, who at the ſame time with a great power inuaded the prouinces of the empire, hearing of his comming, H and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting what power he might bring with him, retired himſelfe; and diuiding his army, ſent the one part thereof into the South part of Aſia, and the other into the North, which ſpoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and ſuddenly ſurpriſing the city of Neo-Cæſaria, ſacked it, and ſo laded with the ſpoile thereof departed. But the Emperor vnderſtanding thereof, and not a little grieued therwith, drawing out certain bands and companies of the beſt and moſt readieſt ſouldiers in his army, and with them coaſting the countrey to get betwixt the Turks and home, vſed therein ſuch expedition, that he was vpon them before they were aware, and ſo ſuddenly charging them, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they betook themſelues to their heeles, leauing behind them for haſt, their baggage and carriages, with all their priſoners & bootie they had before taken at Neo-Cæſaria, I and in their late expedition: yet was there no great number of them ſlaine, for that the Chriſtians fore-wearied with long trauell, were not able far to follow the chaſe. From thence tooke his way into Siria, he ſent part of his army to Melitena, and carried himſelfe from Aleppo a great booty both of men and cattel. At which time alſo the city of Hierapolis was yeelded to him, where ſhortly after he built a ſtrong caſtle. But whilſt he there ſtaid, news was brought to him, that the other part of his army which he had ſent away, was ouerthrown by the Turkes; for the reliefe of whom, he roſe with all haſt and marched towards them: but being in number far inferiour to his enemies, hee was by them as he lay encamped, incloſed round in ſuch ſort, as it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to haue eſcaped: at which time alſo the Gouernor of Aleppo traiterouſly reuolted from him, and ioined his forces with the K enemy, making now no other reckoning, but aſſuredly to haue taken him: but whilſt the turks thus dream of nothing, but of a moſt glorious victorie, and were in mind diuiding the ſpoile, the Emperor without ſo much as the ſounding of a trumpet, ſuddenly iſſuing out of his trenches, when they leaſt thought he durſt ſo haue done, and reſolutely charging them home, put them to flight, and had of them a notable victory, had he throughly proſecuted the ſame: after that, hauing taken diuers towns, he came to Alexandria, in Cilicia, and there all about in the country bilited his army, becauſe of the approch of winter, and ſo returned himſelfe to Conſtantinople. The next Spring the Turks, according to their vſuall manner inuading the frontiers of the empire, did much harme about Neo-Cæſaria: whereof the Emperor aduertiſed, L went thither with his army, and quickely repreſſing their fury, tooke his journey to the riuer Euphrates, where leauing part of his army with Philaretus for the keeping of thoſe frontiers, he himſelfe retired Northward into Capadocia. But after his departure, the Turkes ſetting vpon Philaretus, put him to flight with his garriſons: and taking the ſpoile of the frontiers, entred into Capadocia, waſting all as they went: and afterwards turning into Cilicia, ſacked Iconium, a rich populous city. Wherof the Emperor vnderſtanding at Sebaſtia, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranſackt the city, and were for feare of his comming already retired, he ſent Chatagurio gouernor of Antioch, with part of his army to Mopſipheſtia, to ſtop the Turks of their paſſage. But they in the plains of Tharſus were before diſtreſſed by the Armenians, and ſtript of al their rich prey: and hearing farther of the approch of the Emperours power, fled by night and ſo eſcaped: which the Emperor vnderſtanding, and M hauing now well quieted thoſe prouinces, and the yere far ſpent, returned again to Conſtantinople. But after his departure, the Turks again inuading the frontier prouinces, he ſent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant young man, Generall againſt them; who ſo preuailed, that the Emperor enuying at his honour, tooke from him a great part of his army, and ſent him with a ſmall

A power into Syria. But as he was vpon the way, he was by the Turks entrapped neere vnto Sebaſtia, and there taken, moſt part of his armie being at the ſame time ouerthrown and ſlaine: with which loſſe, the Emperour being troubled, made great preparation to go himſelfe in perſon againſt his enemies, who encouraged with the former victorie, ceaſed not to infeſt his territories. In the meane time by great fortune came Manuel Comnenus home, together with the Turke that tooke him; who being fallen into the diſpleaſure of the Sultan, fled vnto the Emperour with his priſoner, of whom he was honorably entertained. All things now in a rea-dines, for ſo great an expedition as the Emperour had in perſon purpoſed, he ſet forward, and after long trauell hauing paſſed Ceſarea, he incamped at a place called Cryapega: where for ſeuere execution done vpon certaine mutinous ſouldiers, one of the legions of his army roſe B in mutinie againſt him: whom (for all that) he quickly pacified with the terror of the reſt of his army, which he threatned to turne vpon them if they proceeded to forget their duty: after that, remouing to Theodoſopolis, he diuided his army, and ſent Raſelius one of his beſt captains, with one part thereof againſt Chliat, and another part he ſent to beſiege Mantzicierts, retaining with himſelfe the reſt, being of no ſtrength. The Turkes in Mantzicierts, finding themſelues not able long to hold out, fell to compoſition, and yeelded the citie. But ſhortly after, the ſouldiers left there in garriſon for the keeping thereof, going out to ſeek for forrage, were by the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed: which the Emperour vnderſtanding, ſent thither one Nicephorus Bryennius, with certaine companies to releeue the citie, who encountring with the Turks, and finding himſelfe too weak, ſent vnto the Emperour for aide: who not knowing the C ſtrength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardiſe, yet ſent vnto him Nicephorus Baſilacius with part of his armie, who ioining his forces with Briennius, and giuing the Turkes battell, put them to flight. But following too faſt vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great haſt after, he had his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and ſo on foot heauily laden with armour, and not able to ſhift for himſelfe, was there taken and brought to the Sultan: who honorably entreated him, and oftentimes queſtioned with him concerning the Emperour, and ſhewing him his owne power, examined him alſo of the Emperours.

Diogenes goeth with a great army againſt the Turks.

Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field againſt the Emperour, was Axan his ſon, a man of great wiſedome & diſcretion, who conſidering the doubtful euent of battel, ſent embaſſadors vnto the Emperor to intreat with him of peace. But hee (perſuaded by ſome of D his captains, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meere feare and diſtruſt he had in his own power, or els to gain time vntill ſome greater ſtrength came) had ſmall regard of the embaſſadors or their meſſage, but proudly willed them to tell their maſter, That if he were deſirous of peace, he ſhould get him farther off, and leaue the place wherin he lay incamped, for him to lodge in: and ſo without other anſwer, commanded them away. Now had the Emperor (as is before ſaid) ſent away part of his army by Ruſelius againſt Chliat, whom he ſent now for in haſte again: but he hearing of the approch of the Sultan, by the perſwaſion of Tarchoniates, one of his captains, was retired for his more ſafety back into the Romane frontiers, leauing the Emperor deſtitute of his help. At which time alſo a company of the Scythians which ſerued in the Emperors camp, reuolted to the Turks, not with-E out ſome ſuſpition, that the reſt of their fellows, which remained would ere long do the like: neuertheles the Emperor preſuming of ſuch ſtrength as he had, or carried headlong with his owne fortune, reſolued to giue the Turks battell, and therefore putting his men in order ſet vpon them. Who ſomwhat troubled with the Emperors ſo ſudden a reſolution, as being yet in ſome hope of peace, yet hauing put themſelues in order of battell, receiued the enemies charge, ſtill giuing a little ground, as men not greatly deſirous either to fight or flie. This fight continuing long, & the day now declining, the emperor doubting leſt the Sultan ſhould ſend part of his army to aſſault his camp (from which he was now drawne ſomewhat far, and had left the ſame but weakly manned) cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, & ſo began orderly to retire himſelf with them that were about him: which others a far off in the battell beholding, F and ſuppoſing him to haue fled, began themſelues to flie amain. Of which ſo ſhameful flight and ſudden feare Andronicus (the ſon of Iohn Ducas, the late emperor Conſtantine his brother, and by him created Cæſar, who with his ſonnes ſecretly enuied at the honour of Diogenes) was the cauſe: for he commanding a great part of the army, gaue it firſt out to ſuch as were about him, that the emperor fled: and to increaſe the feare, turning his horſe about, fled towards the camp as faſt as he could:after whom al the reſt moſt diſorderly followed:which the emperor G beholding,and therewith not a little troubled,made a ſtand,labouring in vaine to haue ſtaid the reſt:for now the turks incouraged with the ſudden flight of the Chriſtians,began hardly to purſue them,as men already ouerthrown by the hand of God;whom for all that the emperor with ſuch as yet ſtood with him, for a ſpace notably reſiſted. But being forſaken by the greater part of his army,& oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies,being wounded himſelfe, and his horſe ſlain vnder him,he was taken all imbrued with his own bloud,& the bloud of his enemies,of whom he had wounded & ſlain many. The Sultan aduertiſed of his taking, at the firſt beleeued it not, ſuppoſing it rather to haue been ſome other great man:vntil that he was both by them,whom he had but a little before ſent embaſſadour vnto him,& by Baſilacius one of his captaines then priſoner with him,aſſured that it was vndoubtedly he,which H Baſilacius brought before him,to ſee if he knew him,fell downe proſtrate at his feet,as before his dread Lord & Soueraigne. The Emperor brought before the Sultan,and humbling himſelfe in ſuch ſort as beſt beſeemed his heauy fortune, the Sultan preſently tooke him vp, and thus cheerefully ſpoke vnto him: Grieue not noble Emperour (ſaid he) at thy miſhap,for ſuch is the chance of war,ouerwhelming ſometimes one ſometimes another: neither feare thou any harme, for, I will vſe thee not as my priſoner,but as an Emperour: which he accordingly did,preſently appointing him a princely pauilion, with all things anſwerable to his eſtate, ſetting him oftentimes at his own boord,and for his ſake enlarging ſuch priſoners as he required. And after he had thus for certain daies honorably vſed him,and diſcourſed with him of many things,he concluded a perpetuall peace with him, vpon promiſe of a marriage to be made betwixt their children; I and ſo with a ſafe conuoy ſent him away with greater honor than was at an enemies hand to haue been expected. The Emperour in Turkiſh attire, which the Sultan had beſtowed vpon him,comming to Theodoſopolis,there ſtaid the curing of his wounds,& afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embaſſadors,ſet forward toward Conſtantinople. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuitie, Iohn the Cæſar with Pſellus one of the chiefe Senators,& others of the ſame faction,which alwaies enuied at the honor of Diogenes, preſently tooke the imperial gouernment from Eudocia the Empreſſe,and thruſting her into a monaſterie which ſhe had built neere to Propontis, ſet vp Michael Ducas her eldeſt ſonne, Emperour,in ſtead of Diogenes: whoſe ſimplicitie Cæſar his vncle abuſing with the reſt,did, now what they liſt. And hearing that Diogenes was now (contrary to their expectation) ſet K at libertie by the Sultan,and comming towards the emperiall city,ſent out letters euery way in the new Emperors name, to all the gouernours of the prouinces whereby he was to paſſe, not to receiue him as Emperour,or to do him any honour: which Diogenes vnderſtanding, ſtaid at the caſtle of Docia,whether ſome of his friends with ſuch power as they were able to make,reſorted vnto him. Againſt whom,Cæſar with the contrary faction firſt ſent his ſonne Conſtantine,and after that Andronicus his eldeſt ſon, both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great army: by whom Diogenes, with his friends and followers, were ouerthrowne and diſcomfited.

Diogenes himſelfe flying to the citie of Adana,was there hardly beſieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yeeld himſelfe,vpon condition,that he ſhould reſigne the empire, and ſo foreuer after to lead a priuate life. For whoſe ſafetie, certaine of the chiefe of the L clergie ſent of purpoſe from Michael the Emperor, gaue their faith: ſo Diogenes all attyred in black,yeelded himſelfe to Andronicus; by whom he was brought to Cotai, then the metropoliticall citie of Phrygia, there to expect what further order ſhould be taken for him from the court: during which time he fell ſicke,being (as many ſuppoſed) ſecretly poiſoned. But whilſt he there lay languiſhing,an heauier doome came from the young Emperour, That he ſhould haue his eies put out: which was forthwith in moſt cruell manner done, the clergie men that had before for his ſafety gaged their faith, crying out in vaine againſt ſo horrible a crueltie. Thus depriued of his ſight,he was conueyed into the Iſland of Prota, where his eies for lack of looking to,putryfying,and worms breeding in them,with ſuch an odious ſmell,as that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in ſhort time after died,when he had raigned M three yeares, eight moneths. All which miſerie was thought to haue happened vnto him through the malice of Cæſar, without the knowledge of the young Emperour his nephew.

The miſerable death of Diogenes the Emperor

Axan the Sultan ſeeketh to reuenge the death of Diogenes.

Axan hearing of the miſerable end of the late emperor Diogenes, was therwith much grieued and the more, for that the league which he had to his good content ſo lately made with him;

A was thereby come to nought: wherfore in reuenge thereof, he with great power inuaded the imperiall prouinces,not for ſpoile and booty only,as in former time,but now to conquer and to hold the ſame. Againſt whom,Michael the Emperor ſent Iſaac Comnenus his Lieutenant, with a great army:who meeting with the Turks,& joyning battell,was by them ouerthrown with all his army,and taken priſoner;and glad afterwards for a great ſumme of mony to redeeme himſelfe. After which ouerthrow,the Emperor ſent his vncle Cæſar with another army againſt them,who was by Ruſelius, that had before reuolted from the Emperour, ouerthrowne at the riuer Sangarius,and taken priſoner; whom he for all that ſhortly after ſet at libertie againe,and joyning with him againſt the Turks,were both together by them diſcomfited and taken priſoners,but afterwards redeemed,Cæſar by the Emperour,and Ruſelius liſt in the prouinces of the Empire in the leſſer Aſia:for the repreſſing of whom,the Emperor ſent Alexius Comnenus,a young man, but very politick and couragious;who ſecretly practiſing with the Turks that were great with Ruſelius, had him at laſt by them for a ſum of mony betraied into his power: who forthwith ſent him to Conſtantinople to the Emperor, by whom he was impriſoned,but afterwards ſet at liberty and imploied againſt Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion againſt the Emperour.

Cutlu-Muſes with his ſonnes and kinſmen take vp armes againſt Axan the Sultan.

But to come neerer to the Turkiſh affaires. Cutlu-Muſes,who with his couſin Melech and others,were for feare of Tangrolipix their couſin fled into Arabia, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the reigne of Axan,returned:and as the enuious competitors of his kingdom, C hauing raiſed a great power of their friends and partakers, were now ready to haue tried the matter with him by plain battel. Againſt whom alſo,the Sultan on the other ſide had brought into the field his whole forces,& was now likewiſe ready to haue incountred them neere vnto the city of Eres. But whilſt the Turks thus diuided,ſtood ready to deſtroy themſelues, the Caliph of Babilon (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporall ſoueraigntie, yet in matters of religion ſtil held him in great reuerence and eſteem,as their chiefe Biſhop,& the ſucceſſor of their great Prophet) conſidering that nothing could be more dangerous to his ſect and religion,than that ciuil diſcention,the late confuſion and vtter ruine of the Saraſin empire,and authority of the Caliphs;and fearing the like effect in theſe new Saraſins,now the chief ſtay of the Mahometan ſuperſtition:ſetting aſide all pontificall formality D wherby he was bound not to go out of his own houſe,came with all ſpeed euen as the armies were now ready to joyn battel, & thruſting himſelfe into the middeſt betwixt them, what with the reuerence of his perſon,what with his effectuall perſuaſion,wrought ſo much and preuailed ſo far with both parties,that they were content to lay down their weapons,and to ſtand to his order and judgment: which was,That Axan the Sultan ſhould ſtill injoy his kingdom and territories,whole and entire vnto himſelfe as he did:and that Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons, aided by him, and ſo inuading the prouinces of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, ſhould therof ſubdue ſo much as they could vnto themſelues,& to be thereof accounted the only Lords and gouernors:which order as it was vnto the Turks,and for the maintenance of the Mahometan ſuperſtition,very wholſome and commodious,ſo was it vnto the Chriſtian E commonweale and religion moſt dangerous and hurtfull,as in proceſſe of time by proofe it appeared. For by this mean in ſhort time after,Cutlu-Muſes with his couſins and ſons ſubdued all Media,with a great part of Armenia,Capadocia,Pontus, and Bythinia,and ſo a great part of the leſſer Aſia. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muſes,and the fauor of the ſoldiers,Nicephorus Botoniates aſpiring to the Empire of Conſtantinople,diſplaced his maſter the Emperor, Michael Ducas,after he had raigned ſix yeres & ſix moneths,and in the habit of a Monke thruſt him into an Abbey: which vſurper by the iuſt judgement of God, was at length requited euen with the ſame meaſure,and in like manner ſerued by Comnenus;who thruſting him out, ſucceeded himſelfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muſes,with his ſons and kinſmen did for the inlarging of the Turkiſh empire, by the helpe of the great Perſian Sultan: F whoſe forces together with their own, in diuers countries conducted by theſe worthy leaders his nigh kinſmen,and doing great matters, gaue occaſion for themſelues to be accounted Sultans,though indeed they were none,neither their names ſuch,as are by ſome antient writers,& others of later time alſo reported;but vnto the Turks themſelues by thoſe names, either for Sultans,vnknowne. Out of theſe great commanders,all borne of the Selzuccian familie,

A moſt hurtfull order for the Chriſtian common-weale.

The ground of the errour of diuers writers about the ſucceſſors of Tangrolipix,otherwiſe of them called Sadoch.

ſamily,hath Aithonus,and others ſollowing his report,deriued their Dogrisbeg,Aſpaſalemus,Meleclas, G and Belchiaroc, whom they ſuppoſe to haue orderly ſucceeded Zadoc, otherwiſe called Tangrolipix, in the Turkiſh empire,and to haue done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turks themſelues,and the relation of the Greeks,it appears plainly,Axan (more truly called Ax-han,that is to ſay,the White king) to haue bin the ſon of Tangrolipix,and to haue ſucceeded him in the empire:and that by him the emperor Diogenes was taken,and not by Aſpaſalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Aſpaſalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it ſeemeth to haue been a name corrupted of Aſpam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his ſonnes ſon,as they would haue it. In like manner Meleclas alſo ſeemeth to haue been forged of Melech the ſon of Habrami, Tangrolipix his brother,and not of Aſpaſalemus,as ſome without any good ground report. H Whom they finding to haue been all great men in the Selzuccian family,with ſome others alſo,haue both corrupted their names,and giuen vnto them an imaginarie ſoueraigntie and ſucceſſiion in the Turks firſt empire,ſuch as beſide that the Turks themſelues acknowledge not,is eaſile to be refelled out of the hiſtories of the Greeks,who had with them ſtill much to do. Wherefore leauing thoſe ſuppoſed princes of the Turks,with their imaginarie ſucceſſion, and doings,vnto the authors thereof,following more certainties, to return againe to the courſe of our hiſtory. Axan the Sultan at the ſame time that he had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his couſin Cutlu-Muſes; to increaſe the honour of his nation and the bounds of his empire, gaue vnto Ducat and Melech, two of his nigh kinſmen, the gouernement of Damaſco and Aleppo, with that part of Syria which I joyneth vnto them, of purpoſe that way to incroch vpon the Ægyptian Chaliph, who then had vnder his juriſdiction, all, as far as Laodicea in Syria; yet not with ſo large priuiledge as had Cutlu-Muſes, vnto whom and his poſteritie he had yeelded the abſolute honour of a Sultan or King, ouer ſuch countries and prouinces as he ſhould win from the Chriſtians: but vnto theſe others his kinſmen, he gaue the gouernement of the aforeſaid cities of Damaſco and Aleppo, in the frontiers of his dominion in Syria, conditionally, that they ſhould ſtill remaine his vaſſals,and hold of him as of their ſoueraigne,whatſoeuer they had, who neuertheleſſe in ſhort time mightily preuailed vpon the Ægyptian, ſtill increaſing the a Turkiſh territorie with the loſſe of the Saraſins, whoſe name together with their Empire, was now by the Turks almoſt quite driuen out of Aſia. K

But theſe proud branches of the Turkiſh Empire, thus ouerſpreading the leſſer Aſia, with the greateſt part of Syria, were in ſhort time after by the mercy of God, and the valour of the moſt Chriſtian and moſt religious princes of the Weſt,cut ſhorter,and brought againe into ſome better order. The full diſcourſe whereof, worthy eternall memory, by others inrolled in the antient records of fame,I purpoſe not at large to follow, but in briefe to touch, for the orderly continuation of the preſent hiſtorie, haſting to the doings of this victorious nation of latter times, wherein we are to make a longer ſtay, as more pertinent vnto the dangerous eſtate of the preſent time.

Peter a French Hermit goeth on pilgrimage to Ieruſalem.

It fortuned that whilſt Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons,ſupported by the Sultan Axan their kinſman, thus mightily preuailed againſt the Chriſtians in the leſſer Aſia on the one ſide,and L Melech with his couſin againſt the Egyptian Caliph in Syria on the other: that one Peter a French Hermite mooued with a deuout zeale,according to the manner of that time,went to viſit the ſepulchre of our Sauior,with the other holy places at Ieruſalem:who comming into Syria,then for the moſt part poſſeſſed by the Turks & Saraſins,diligently noted by the way as he trauelled, the maners and faſhions of theſe barbarous nations,their gouernment,their cities, their power and ſtrength;but aboue all,the grieuous miſeries of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians,that there liv'd in moſt miſerable thraldom among them,without hope of releas: al which,he in the habit of a poore pilgrim,at liberty ſafely viewed,in the midſt of theſe miſcreants, being withal a little low hard fauoured fellow,and therfore in ſhew more to be contemnd than feared:yet vnder ſuch ſimple & homly feature lay vnregarded a moſt ſubtil ſharp M and pearching wit,fraught with diſcretion & ſound judgment,ſtil applying to ſom good vſe what he had in his long and painful trauel moſt curiouſly obſerued. He commeth to Ieruſalem, and performing his deuotions there,ſaw the grieuous miſery of the poore deuout Chriſtians, ſo great and heauy, as that greater or more intollerable could none be:wherwith not

The deſcription of Peter the Hermit.

A little grieued, he entred into a deepe diſcourſe thereof with Simon the Patriarke and Abbot of the monaſterie of the Chriſtians (there before built by certaine Italian Merchants) and with the maſter of the Hoſpitalers, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatſoeuer elſe he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed vpon amongſt them, that the Patriarke and the grand Maſter, ſhould in their own, and the names of the other oppreſſed Chriſtians, write their letters vnto the Pope and the other Chriſtian Princes, concerning their miſeries, and to craue their aid for the recouery of thoſe holy places out of the hands of thoſe cruell Infidels: of which letters the deuout Hermit promiſed himſelfe to be the truſtie carrier, and of their petitions the moſt carefull ſoliciter. Whereupon the Patriarke and grand Maſter, in the name of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians wrote their letters vnto this effect:

We the citiſens of the holy Citie, and countreymen of Chriſt Ieſus, dayly ſuffer thoſe things which Chriſt our King ſuffered but once, in the laſt daies of his mortalitie. We are dayly buffeted, ſcourged, and pierced: euery day ſome of vs are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would flie from citie to citie, vnto the remoteſt parts of the earth, and remooue out of the middle of that land where Chriſt our Sauior wrought our redemption, to lead a poore exiled and vagrant life; were it not impietie to leaue the Land (ſacred with the birth, doctrine, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of our Sauiour) without inhabitants and Prieſts; and that there ſhould firſt lacke ſuch as would indure death and martyrdome, than ſuch as would inflict the ſame; and that there ſhould not be which would willingly die for Chriſt, as in battell, ſo long as there were any that would fight againſt them. Theſe things truly we moſt miſerably ſuffer:
C *yet was there a time when as our anceſtors feared no ſuch thing, either to themſelues or their poſteritie.
And now perhaps the Chriſtian kingdomes of the Weſt liue likewiſe without the leaſt ſuſpicion of feare: but let them be moued by our example and teſtimony. The ſtrength of the Turks is dayly increaſed and ours diminiſhed: The continuall gaining of new kingdomes giueth them courage: They haue already deuoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turks are fiercer and ſtronger than the forces of the Saraſins, their policies deeper, their attempts more deſperat, their endeauors greater, and their ſucceſſe fortunater. Yet haue the Saraſins attempted both Romes: they haue beſieged Conſtantinople, and haue waſted not onely the ſea coaſts of Italy, but euen the heart of the land alſo. Then why ſhould the kingdomes of the Weſt preſume themſelues to ſtand in ſafety and out of all perill, when as the chiefe fortreſſes of the world haue beene ſo indangered? what may the reſt of Chriſtendome promiſe vnto it ſelfe, ſeeing that* D Ieruſalem (the ſeat and ſpectacle of the Chriſtian Religion) hath beene beſieged, taken, ſacked, raſed, and triumphed vpon? ſeeing that of the Chriſtian profeſſion remaine but the poore and weake reliques, in compariſon of the antient whole entire body? This land, which is dayly beſprinkled with our bloud, yea the bloud it ſelfe cryeth out for reuenge. And we your moſt humble ſuppliants, proſtrate at your feet, call vpon the helpe, aid, mercie, faith, and religion, of you moſt bleſſed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates; Chriſtians not in name and profeſſion onely, but in heart, ſoule, and ſpirit. Before the tempeſt thunder, before the lightning fall vpon you, auert from you and your children the ſtorme hanging ouer your heads: defend vs your poore ſuppliants, deliuer your religion from moſt wicked and accurſed ſlauerie. You ſhall in ſo doing deſerue immortall fame, and God ſhall requite your ſo great valour in this world with terreſtriall kingdomes, and in the world to come with eternall bliſſe, whoſe ſacred inheritance E you ſhall haue defended from the rage of hell.

The Letters of Simon, Patriarke of Ieruſalem, and of the grand Maſter of the Hoſpitalers, vnto the Pope and other Chriſtian Princes, in the behalfe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians in Ieruſalem.

Rome and Conſtantinople, which was alſo called Noua Roma, or new Rome.

With theſe letters, and plenty of other ſecret inſtructions, the deuout hermit returning into Italie, and comming to Rome, deliuered his letters vnto Vrban the ſecond of that name, then Pope, with a ful diſcourſe of the miſeries of the Chriſtians vnder the Turkiſh thraldom, which he had ſeene at Ieruſalem and other places as he trauelled, requeſting his holy care for the redreſſe thereof: with whom he ſo preuailed, that ſhortly after, he calling a Councell at Claremont in France, among other things, propounded the miſerie of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians at Ieruſalem, as an eſpeciall matter to be conſidered of. And hauing cauſed the aforeſaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Chriſtian Princes, to be openly read in the F Councell, whereunto three hundred and ten Biſhops were then out of diuers parts of Chriſtendom aſſembled, with the Embaſſadors of all countries, much moued the whole aſſembly to compaſſion: at which time alſo the hermit (whoſe flowing eloquence fully counteruailed what wanted in his feature, ſtanding vp in the midſt of the Councell, deliuered his meſſage in the name of the afflicted Chriſtians, with their heauie groanings and teares: which as they could not be in letters expreſſed, ſo were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him G who hauing both lately ſeene both the miſerie of the men, and deſolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the griefe thereof) ſo liuely repreſented, as that it moued the whole aſſembly with the like ſimpathy of heauineſſe and griefe. Which the Pope perceiuing, tooke thereupon occaſion to enter into a large diſcourſe concerning that matter, with many effectuall reaſons perſuading the Fathers and Princes there preſent, of the neceſſitie of ſo religious a Warre to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppreſſed brethren out of the thraldome of the Infidels; and now as well as with their preſent Decree, as afterwards at their returne home into their Countries, by all meanes to further the ſame. Which notable perſuaſion, with the heauie complaint of the Hermit, and the equitie of the Cauſe, ſo much moued the whole Councell, and the reſt there preſent, that they all as men inſpired with one H Spirit, declared their conſent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth it, God willeth it: which words ſo then vttered by way of applauſe, were in the great and moſt ſacred expedition following, much vſed of the deuout Chriſtians, as the fortunate ſignall of their cheerefull forwardneſſe, euen in their moſt dangerous enterpriſes. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleeued (but that the antient Hiſtories beare witneſſe of the like) how farre in one daies ſpace the report of this religious decreed warre was by flying fame diſperſed.

An expedition agreed vpon by the Councel, for the reliefe of the Chriſtians oppreſſed in the Holy-Land.

The Councell diſſolued, and the reuerend Fathers returning euerie man home into his owne countrey, it pleaſed God by their effectuall perſuaſions ſo to worke with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and prouinces in Chriſtendom, I were ſhortly to be ſeene men of all ſorts in great number, with red Croſſes on their breſts (the cogniſance of that ſacred expedition) readie of themſelues to ſpend both life and goods for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion, and recouerie of the Holy-Land. The number of whom is of diuers diuerſly reported; but of moſt ſuppoſed to haue beene three hundred thouſand fighting men: Of whom the chiefe Commanders were, Godfrey Duke of Lorraine, with his two brethren, Euſtace and Baldwin, all of the honourable houſe of Buillon; Hugh ſyrnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymond and Robert Earles of Flanders; Robert Duke of Normandie, William the Conquerors ſonne; Stephen de Valoys Earle of Chartiers; Ademar Biſhop of Podie, the popes Legat; and Peter the Hermit, not to be numbred amongſt the leaſt, as chiefe author of this moſt famous expedition: vnto whom many K other honourable Princes joyned themſelues, as partakers of their trauels, though not with like charge.

The chiefe commanders of the Chriſtians in their expedition into the Holy-Land.

The firſt that ſet forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Senſauier a noble Gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom followed Peter the Hermit, with fortie thouſand moe; who both trauelling thorow Germany, Hungaria, and Bulgaria, were glad oftentimes, eſpecially in the further part of Hungarie and Bulgaria, to open themſelues a way with the ſword; and ſo with much labor, and no leſſe loſſe came at length to Conſtantinople: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the Emperour Alexius Comnenus; who guiltie vnto himſelfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the Empire from Nicephorus his predeceſſour, had that expedition of the Chriſtians into the Eaſt, in diſtruſt, as purpoſed L againſt himſelfe: vntill that fully reſolued to the contrarie, by the Hermit and others; and that a farre greater power was comming after, for the inuaſion of the Turks, and recouerie of the Holy-Land; he was content to relieue them now wearie of their long trauell: and afterward to make roome for them that were to come, ſhipped them ouer the ſtrait of Boſphorus into Aſia; who marching forward into Bithynia, encamped their Army in the countrey not farre from the Citie of Nice. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other Princes that had joyned themſelues vnto him, with the Germanes and Lorranois, and the greateſt part of the Armie, followed the ſame way that the Hermit had taken before him. At which time alſo Hugh the French Kings brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts (the one Duke of Normandie, and the other Earle of Flanders) and the reſt of the French M Commanders, paſſing ouer the Mountaines into Italie, came to Rome, with a wonderfull great Armie: where taking their leaue of the Pope, becauſe they would be leſſe troubleſome vnto the Cities and Countreys whereby they were to paſſe, they diuided their great Armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to Brunduſium, and the other to Bary, and the third

A third to Hydruntum, vnto whom alſo Bohemund one of the great Princes of Apulia, ioyned himſelfe with twelue thouſand good ſouldiers that followed him. From theſe three ports the Chriſtian army departing, and croſſing the Adriaticke, arriued in ſafety at Dirrachium, and nigh thereabout vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia: from whence they trauelled by land thorow Macedonia, to Conſtantinople; were they met with the Duke Godfrey and the reſt of the Armie: whom alſo at the firſt, Alexius the Emperour is reported to haue but coldly entertained, as iealous of his owne eſtate; vntill that better perſuaded of their deſignements and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich preſents ſent vnto him by theſe ſtrange Princes, he ioyned with them in league: wherein it was agreed, That the Emperor during the time of this expedition ſhould furniſh them with new ſupplies of men, armour, victuals, and B whatſoeuer elſe they ſhould want: in regard whereof, the Princes on the other ſide promiſed to reſtore again vnto the empire, what prouinces, countries, or cities they ſhould happily gain out of the hands of the Turks and Saraſins, the City of Ieruſalem only excepted: which agreement was afterward on the ſuſpicious Emperors part but ſlenderly performed. Neuertheleſſe, this league ſo made, hee granted them paſſage, and ſo tranſported them ouer the ſtrait into Aſia: only Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the Emperour Alexius and his father, would not come to Conſtantinople, but marching with his army thorow the vpper Myſia and Thracia, came ſooner than any man had thought, vnto the ſtrait of Helleſpontus, and ſo paſſed.

Godfrey duke of Buillon, and the other Christian Princes, meet together at Constantinople.

Now had Gualter, and the Hermit Peter, with their Army, lien two moneths in the countrey about Nice, expecting the comming of the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes: for why, they C thought it not good before their comming to attempt any thing againſt the enemie, whom they knew to lie not farre off very ſtrong. But the common ſouldiers wearie of ſo long lying, and nought doing, and pinched with ſome wants, and withall diſliking of Gualter their chiefe Commander, and the Hermit Peter, (of whoſe integritie and holineſſe they had a greater opinion, than of his proweſſe and direction) roſe vp in mutinie, and diſplacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymund a valiant Germane Captaine, for their Generall: by whoſe conduct they tooke Exorgum, a Towne of purpoſe forſaken of the Turks. For they long before vnderſtanding what a tempeſt of warre was growing vpon them out of Europe, ſought by all means to cut off theſe that were already come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater Army following; and therefore had left them this Towne, as a bait to traine them out of their trenches. And D after that the Chriſtians were thus poſſeſſed of the Towne, hauing layd certaine ſtrong ambuſhes, they droue out certaine heards of cattell the more to allure them: all which certaine companies of the Chriſtians brought in without any loſſe, the Turks ſtill winking thereat. With which bootie the Chriſtians encouraged, went out three thouſand of them to take in a little towne not farre off; who were by Turks cut off and ſlaine euery mothers ſonne, as they were about to haue diuided the ſpoile. Which ouerthrow reported into the Towne, diſcouraged euen the chiefe Commanders of the army, ſo that they reſolued no more to try the fortune of the field, before the comming of their friends. Neuertheleſſe the common ſouldiers condemning them of cowardiſe, choſe them a new Generall, one Godfrey Burel, whom they now requeſted not, but enforced to goe out to reuenge the death of their fellowes. Which E their raſhneſſe not long after turned to their own deſtruction: for ten thouſand of them going out of Exorgum, to forrage the countrey, were by the Turkes entrapped, and almoſt all ſlaine, except ſome few, which by ſpeedy flight eſcaped. The Turks proſecuting their victorie, layd hard ſiege to them in the Towne alſo, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the ſword conſumed the moſt part of them. The Hermit with the poore remainder of his army tooke his refuge to Cinite, a Towne not farre off, before abandoned by the Turks; where with much adoe he defended himſelfe vntill the comming of Duke Godfrey and the reſt of the Princes.

Cutlu-Muſes the Turke was now dead, hauing left vnto his ſon Sultan Solyman many large countries & prouinces, altogether gained from the Chriſtians in Aſia, whom he held in great F ſubiection and thraldome. This warre-like Prince hauing diſcomfited and almoſt brought to nought the hermits forces, was no leſſe carefull for the withſtanding of the great army following: which now being come into Bithynia, & lying before Nicomedia, remouing thence, laid ſiege to the city of Nice, called in antient time Antigonia, of Antigonus, the ſon of Philip that built it, and afterwards Nicea, of Nicea the wife of King Lyſimachus. In this city dwelt many deuout Greeks, Chriſtians;but in ſuch thraldome vnto the Turks, that they could not do any G thing for the deliuerie of themſelues. This ſiege indured longer than the Chriſtian Princes had at the firſt ſuppoſed : who although they to the vttermoſt of their power forced the citie on three ſides,yet was it ſtil notably defended,new ſupplies ſtill comming from the Turks by the lake of Aſcanius joyning vpon the other ſide of the Citie. But after that the Chriſtians, poſſeſſed of the lake, began on that ſide alſo to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turks diſcouraged, and ſeeing themſelues beſet round with their enemies,yeelded vp the city the fifth of Iuly, 1097 in the yeare 1097,after it had been fifty daies beſieged. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, the Turks aſſailed the quarter of the camp where the Legat lay ; by whom they were notably repulſed,and with great loſſe inforced to retyre vnto the mountains. In this city, amongſt the reſt of the Turks,was taken Solymans wife,with two of her children, whom the H Princes ſent priſoners to Conſtantinople. This City ſo woon, was according to the agreement before made, reſtored vnto Alexius the Emperour, whoſe fleet had in that ſiege done good ſeruice, by taking the lake from the Turks.

The city of Nice thus woon,the Chriſtian Princes remouing thence with their army, and marching thorow the country,came the fourth day after vnto a riuer which watred many rich paſtures:where as they were about to haue incamped, for the commodiouſneſſe of the place, and refreſhing of the army, ſuddenly news was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now buſie in caſting vp his trenches, That the Turks with a great Army were ready euen at hand to charge him. For Solyman hauing raiſed a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of Perſia his kinſman,was now come with an army of 60000 ſtrong to giue the Chri- I ſtians battell : of whoſe approch Bohemund aduertiſed,left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his ſoldiers in array,ſet forward to meet him;ſending word to the reſt of the Princes A cruell battell fought betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians. that lay a far off,to be ready as occaſion ſhould require,to relieue him. Theſe two armies conducted by their moſt reſolute chiefetains,meeting together,joyned a moſt fierce and terrible battell,where in a ſhort ſpace the Turks lay ſlain vpon heaps,in ſuch ſort that they ſerued the Chriſtians in ſtead of bulwarks.But whileſt Bohemund thus preuailed in the battell,certain of the Turks horſemen wheeling about,brake into Bohemunds camp(not as then altogether fortified, and but ſlenderly manned) where among the women,and other weake perſons there left, they raiſed a great tumult and outcry,to the great appaling of them that were fighting in the battel:which Bohemund perceiuing,withdrew himſelf with certain companies vnto the camp, K from whence he with great ſlaughter repulſed the enemy.But returning again into the battel, he found there a great alteration:for his ſoldiers whom before he had left as it were in poſſeſſion of a moſt glorious victory, were now ſo hardly laid vnto by the Turks,as that they were ready to haue turned their backes and fled.Neuertheleſſe,by his comming in,the battell was notably reſtored,and again made doubtful:when the enemy perceiuing how much the aſſaulting of the camp had troubled the Chriſtians in battell, ſent out certaine troups of horſemen again to aſſault the ſame;and had not failed vndoubtedly to haue taken it, being as aforeſaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings brother come in good time to the reſcue : who comming in with 30000 horſemen,after he had relieued the camp,entring directly into the battell, was notably encountred with a ſquadron of freſh ſouldiers of the Turks, by them L of purpoſe reſerued for ſuch euent. There began a battell more terrible than the firſt, with moſt doubtfull victorie : but at the length the Turks wearie of the long and cruell fight, and ſeeing moſt of their fellowes ſlaine,began by little and little to giue ground,and ſo retired into the mountains,which were not far off. In this battell, which continued a great part of the day,were ſlaine of the Turks 40000,and of the Chriſtians about 2000. The next morning Bohemund, with the French Kings brother, came againe into the field, in ſuch order as if they ſhould preſently haue giuen or receiued battell : where after they had ſtayd a great while,and ſaw no enemy to appear,they fell to the honeſt buriall of their dead;which were eaſily known from the Turks, by the red croſſes vpon their garments, the cogniſance of their ſacred warrefare.
Solyman flyeth. Solyman flying with the remainder of his army,notably diſſembled his loſſe,giuing it out M that he had gotten the victorie:yet by the way as he went he burnt vp the coutry villages,and deſtroied or carried away whatſoeuer els he thought might ſtand the Chriſtians in any ſtead, if they ſhould further follow after him, leauing nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victorie, Bohemund and the Chriſtian Princes, without reſiſtance marching

A through the hot and dry countries of the leſſer Aſia, came to Antiochia a Citie of Piſidia, which they took with ſmall labour:and ſo marching vnto Iconium the principall city of Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Taurus, were there alſo of the citiſens courteouſly receiued, where they ſtaied certaine daies for the refreſhing of the Armie. From thence they ſet forward toward Heraclea,where a great power of the Turks were reported to be aſſembled. But they, together with the garriſon ſouldiers, vpon the approch of the victorious Army of the Chriſtians,forſook the city and fled:the citiſens being Chriſtians(as they were yet generally in all the Prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, but in great ſubjection to the Turkes) and now rid of their cruel maſters the Turkiſh garriſons,came forth,and meeting the Princes,gladly yeelded themſelues with their city vnto them,as vnto their deliuerers. Here the Chriſtian Princes fully B inſtructed of the great feare and deſperation of the Turks, who now in no place durſt abide their comming; for the more ſpeedy taking in of thoſe countries but lately oppreſſed by the Turks, diuided their army into two parts, leauing the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full ſubduing thereof, (who in ſhort time tooke the cities of Tarſus, Edeſſa,and Manuſſa; with all the reſt of the country,the Turks daring not any where to abide their comming:)the other part of the army in the mean time entring into the leſſer Armenia; tooke the ſame from the Turks,which the Princes gaue to one Palmurus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great ſeruice. From thence they tooke their way into Capadocia,which they alſo ſubdued,driuing out the Turks in euery place, and tooke the Cities of Cæſarea and Socor, where they ſtaied a few daies for the refreſhing of the army : with C like ſucceſſe they paſſed thorow the reſt of the Prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, of late poſſeſſed by the Turks, ſtill chaſing them out before them, and ſetting at libertie the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians of thoſe countries. Whereof Solyman (crauing aid of Axan the Perſian Sultan his couſin)grieuouſly complained,by his letters to him directed in this ſort : *The famous Citie of Nice,with the country of Romania,which we by your aid and power haue gotten from the kingdome of the Antioch in Syria beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The deſcription of the famous citie of Antioch.

Shortly after, the Chriſtian Princes marching forward with their army, were encountred by the Turks at the riuer Orontes, who had there thought to haue ſtayd their further paſſage: with whom Robert Duke of Normandie, who had the leading of the vantgard, had a hard conflict, vntill that the Turks, diſcouraged with the ſight of the armie ſtill comming on, forſooke the bridge, and betook themſelues to flight. So the Chriſtians paſſing the riuer, came and incamped with their army before the famous City of Antioch, the one and twentieth day of October, in the yere 1097: the gouernor whereof vnder the Perſian Sultan was one Caſſianus, (of ſome alſo honoured with the name of a King) who at the comming of the Chriſtians, had with him in the city ſeuen thouſand horſemen, and twentie thouſand foot of the Turks, with H great ſtore of victuals, and all manner of other prouiſions neceſſary for the defence thereof. This citie, called in antient time Epidaphane, or Epiphane, and of the Hebrewes, Reblatha, ſometime the ſeat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the motropoliticall city of Syria, hauing vnder it an hundred and fifty Biſhops, (famous for many things, and amongſt others, for that it was the ſeat of the bleſſed Apoſtle S. Peter, and firſt place whereas the profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion tooke the name of Chriſtians) is ſcituate vpon the riuer Orontes, about twelue miles from the ſea, and was then ſtrongly fortified both by Nature and Art, being compaſſed about with a double wall; the vttermoſt wherof was of hard ſtone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towers in the ſame, and an impregnable caſtle at the Eaſt end thereof, whereunto was joyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great riuer, which watered the South ſide I of the citie. Round about this ſtrong citie (one of the moſt aſſured refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Chriſtian Princes encamped, except on that ſide which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be beſieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the citie, during the time of the ſiege made many a fierce and deſperat ſally, being ſtil by the Chriſtians moſt valiantly repulſed: eſpecially at the bridge which the Chriſtians had made of boats for their more commodious paſſage to and fro ouer the riuer. In this ſort was the ſiege continued vntill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloudy skirmiſh. At which time ſuch abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man find any place to lie dry in; and the ſcarcitie of victuall grew ſo great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to ſay) to aſſuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late ſlaine enemies. In K theſe extremities many died of hunger and cold; yea, their horſes alſo periſhed for want of meat, ſo that in the whole campe were ſcarely left two thouſand horſes fit for ſeruice, the reſt being either all dead, or brought ſo low, as that they were altogether vnſeruiceable. Theſe miſeries dayly increaſing, diuers men of great account, whom no terror of the enemie could haue diſmaid, began ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of the camp, with purpoſe to haue ſtolne home; among whom were Peter the hermit author of this war, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the reſt as fugitiues, were ſharply reprehended by Hugh the French Kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren and fellow ſoldiers, and ſo inforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perſeuerance. Bohemund in the meane time going to Arthuſia a towne not far off, by good fortune cut off a great L part of the Turks there in garriſon: who after their vſuall manner ſallying out to haue cut off the forragers of the Chriſtians, were now themſelues caught tardy: wherby the country for a time was more open for the diſtreſſed Chriſtian ſoldiers to ſeeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertie ſo lately gained laſted not long, when newes was brought vnto the campe, That the Turks in great number, out of the prouinces about Aleppo and Damaſco, were comming vnto the reliefe of their beſieged friends in Antioch. Neuertheleſſe, the Chriſtians truſting to their own ſtrength & the ſtrength of the place wherin they were incamped, lay ſtil, & at their comming ſo incountred them, that they ſlew 2000 of them, & put the reſt to flight. In which conflict the Chriſtians got great ſtore of prouiſion and victuals which the Turks had thought to haue put into the city. The heads of the ſlain Turks the Chriſtians ſet vpon ſtakes before the M city, to the more terror of the defendants. This ouerthrow of the Turks, wherein Caſſianus had loſt his eldeſt ſon, with others of his beſt captains, ſo daunted the beſieged, that they requeſted a truce for a time of the Chriſtian Princes: which granted, they of the city came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewiſe into the city: Caſſianus ſtil expecting re-

A liefe from the Perſian Sultan. Whileſt the Chriſtian Princes were thus buſie in Aſia, the Venetians with a great fleet of two hundred gallies ſcowring the ſeas, vnder the conduct of Henry Contarenus the Biſhop, and of Vitalis the Dukes ſon, meeting with the gallies of Piſa at the Rhodes, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherin the Venetians hauing the vpper hand, tooke eighteene of their gallies, and in them fiue thouſand ſouldiers: whom they ſeeing to be marked with the red croſſe, the cogniſance of the ſacred war, they preſently ſet at liberty, together with the gallies, detaining onely thirty of the better ſort as hoſtages. After that, the Venetians ſailing into Ionia, tooke the city of Smyrna, and ſpoiled all along the coaſts of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, before for feare abandoned by the Turks.

The truce before taken between the Turks and the Chriſtians at the ſiege of Antioch, being B in ſhort time after broken by the death of one Vollo a Frenchman, ſlaine by the Turks; the war was again begun, and the city more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernor, who in the time of this long ſiege, which had now continued nine moneths, had loſt moſt part of his beſt ſoldiers, was glad for the defence of ſo great a City, to vſe the ſeruice of diuers Chriſtians, then dwelling in the city. Among whom was one Pyrrhus, a citiſen of great reputation, vnto whom he had committed the guarding of a tower, called the two Siſters; but afterwards S. Georges tower. This Pirrhus had ſecret intelligence with Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, with whom he agreed to giue him there enterance into the city, vpon condition, that he ſhould of the other Chriſtian Princes procure the gouerment of the city to himſelf; and that he, with the reſt of the Chriſtian citiſens in the city, might be at his hands well vſed: C which thing being eaſily obtained, all things agreed vpon, Bohemund with his ſouldiers were by night by Pyrrhus let into the city, who made way for the reſt of the army to enter. The city thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the caſtle, the reſt were put to the ſword, man, woman and child; and among them alſo many of the Chriſtians, the furious ſouldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but ſmall ſtore of victuals. Caſſianus the late gouernor flying out of the city to ſaue himſelf, in wandring thorow the mountains, fel into the hands of the Chriſtian Armenians, who lately thruſt out of Ieruſalem, were fled thither for refuge, by whom he was there ſlaine. In the city were ſlaine about ten thouſand perſons. Thus was the famous city of Antioch, which the Turks had long before by famin taken from the Chriſtians, againe recouered the third day of Iune, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1098. D The poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in Ieruſalem hearing of this ſo notable a victory, gaue ſecret thanks vnto God therfore, and began to lift vp their heads, in hope that their deliuery was now at hand. Of this victory, the Princes of the army by ſpeedy meſſengers and letters, certified their friends in all countries, ſo that in ſhort time, the fame thereof had filled a great part of the world. Among others, Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, vnto whom the city was deliuered, ſent the ioyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother Prince of Apulia: whoſe letters as the moſt certain witneſſes of the hiſtory before reported, I thought it not amiſſe here to ſet down:

Antioch betraied to the Chriſtians.

Caſſianus gouernour of Antioch in flying ſlaine.

I ſuppoſe you to haue vnderſtood by the letters of your ſonne Tancred, both of the great feare of ſome of vs, and the battels which we haue of late with our great glory fought. But concerning the truce, and E the proceeding of the whole action, I had rather you ſhould be certified by my letters, than the letters of others. King Caſſianus had required a time of truce: during which, our ſouldiers had free recourſe into the Citie without danger, vntill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, ſlaine by the enemie, the truce was broken. But whileſt it yet ſeemed a hard matter to winne the Citie, one Pyrrhus a Citiſen of Antioch, of great authoritie and much deuoted vnto me, had conference with me concerning the yeelding vp of the Citie; yet vpon condition, that the gouernement thereof ſhould be committed to me, in whom he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great Commanders of the armie, and eaſily obtained that the gouernement of the Citie was by their generall conſent allotted vnto me. So our armie entring by a gate opened by Pyrrhus, tooke the citie. Within a few daies after, the towne Aretum was by vs aſſaulted, but not without ſome loſſe and danger to our per- F ſon, by reaſon of a wound I there receiued. I aſſure you much of the valor of your ſon Tancred, of whom I and the whole armie make ſuch account and reckoning, as is to be made of a moſt valiant and reſolute Generall. Farewell. From Antioch.

The letters of Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, to his brother Roger prince of Apulia, concerning the winning of Antioch.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Antioch, Corbanus (the Perſian Sultan his lieutenant)

lieutenant) with a great army beſieged Edeſſa, with purpoſe after the taking thereof, to haue relieued the citie of Antioch. But this being notably defended by Baldwin, left there of purpoſe with a ſtrong garriſon for the defence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to loſe Antioch, the ſafeſt refuge of the Turks in all thoſe parts, roſe with his armie, and ſet forward againſt the Chriſtians: where by the way, it was his fortune to meet with Sanſadolus, Ceſſianus his ſon, but lately fled from Antioch, by whom he vnderſtood of the loſſe of the city, and by what means the ſame was moſt like againe to be recouered: vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightie army kept on his way, with a full reſolution to ſet all vpon the fortune of a battell. Whoſe comming much troubled the Chriſtians: for that although they were poſſeſſed of the citie, yet was the Caſtle ſtill holden by the Turks. Neuertheleſſe leauing the Earle of Tholous in the city, with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the caſtle, they tooke the field with the whole ſtrength of the armie, and ſo in order of battell, expected the comming of their enemies: who couragiouſly comming on, as men before reſolued to fight, ioyned with them a moſt terrible and bloudie battell. Neither were they in the meane time idle; for that the Turks hauing in the caſtle receiued in vnto them certain ſupplies from Corbanas, ſallied out vpon them that were left for the ſafegard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without, was to be ſeen a moſt dreadful fight of reſolute men, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: yet after long fight and much effuſion of bloud, the fortune of the Chriſtians preuailing, the Turkes began to giue ground, and afterwards betook themſelues to plain flight, whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, made of them a wonderfull ſlaughter. In this battell were ſlaine of the Turkes aboue an hundred thouſand, and of the Chriſtians about foure thouſand two hundred. There was alſo taken a great prey; for beſides horſes & other beaſts for burden, were taken alſo fiue thouſand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of Iune, the caſtle was by the Turks (now diſpairing of releeſe) yeelded vp vnto the Chriſtians.

Corbanas the Sultans lieutenant, with a great army commeth to recouer againe the city of Antioch

Antioch thus taken, Hugh the French kings brother, ſirnamed the Great, was ſent from the reſt of the Princes to Conſtantinople, to haue deliuered the citie vnto Alexius the Emperor according to the agreement before made. But he, guilty in conſcience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had ſent no reliefe at all during the long and hard ſiege of Antioch; neither performed any thing of that he had further promiſed, and therefore knowing himſelfe hated of them; had in diſtruſt ſo great an offer of the princes, ſo euill deſerued, and therefore refuſed to accept thereof. Whereupon Bohemund by the generall conſent of the whole armie was choſen Prince, or (as ſome call him) King of Antioch.

Bohemund choſen Prince of Antioch.

The plague in the Chriſtian army.

Diſcord ariſing vpon emulation betwixt Bohemund and Raimund.

After this long ſiege and want of victuals, enſued a great plague in the armie of the Chriſtians, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fifty thouſand men to haue died, and among them many of great account. But the mortalitie ceaſing, the Chriſtians in Nouember following, by force tooke Rugia, and Albaria, two cities, about two daies iourney from Antioch: where diſſention aroſe betwixt Bohemund and Raimund, who of all others only enuied at his preferment vnto the principalitie of Antioch: Bohemund for the common cauſes ſake, gaue way vnto his aduerſarie, and retired with his ſouldiers backe againe to Antioch; after whom followed the Duke Godfrey, and the Earle of Flanders with their regiments. The reſt of the Princes wintred ſome at Rugia, ſome at Albaria, from whence Raimund made ſundrie light expeditions further into the enemies countrey: but the ſpring approching, the Chriſtian Princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from Antioch, beſieged Tortoſa. Raimund in the meane time with the reſt, beſieging the citie of Tripolis: who become much more inſolent than before, by reaſon of ſome fortunate roades he had made vpon the enemies the laſt winter, ceaſed not ſtill to maligne Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to haue diuided the whole power of the Chriſtians, and to haue turned their weapons vpon themſelues: which Bohemund well conſidering, roſe with his armie; and becauſe he would not with his preſence trouble the proceeding of the religious warre, retired himſelfe to Antioch. After whoſe departure, Godfrey and the Earle of Flanders, took Gabella, a citie about twelue miles from Laodicea, and from thence returned againe to the ſiege of Tortoſa, whither Raimund came alſo with his armie, hauing before driuen the Gouernour of Tripolis to ſuch compoſition as pleaſed himſelfe, and to furniſh him with ſuch things as he wanted. Thus was Tortoſa hardly on three ſides beſieged by

A by the Chriſtians, but ſo notably defended by the Turks,that after three months hard ſiege, the Chriſtians were glad to depart thence: and marching long the ſea ſide, ſpoiled the countrey about Sidon. But foraſmuch as that city was not eaſily to be won,they left it,and encamted before Ptolemais,which they alſo paſſed by:the gouernour thereof ſending them out victuals, with ſuch other things as they wanted; and vpon ſummons giuen,promiſing to yeeld the city after they had once won the city of Ieruſalem. From thence they came to Cæſarea in Paleſtine, where they ſolemnly kept the feaſt of VVhitſontide, and ſo to Rama, which they found for feare forſaken of the Infidels. Marching from Rama, and drawing neere to Ieruſalem, they in the vantgard of the army, vpon the firſt deſcrying of the Holy citiy, gaue for ioy diuers great ſhouts and outcries,which with the like applauſe of the whole army was ſo doubled B and redoubled, as if therewith they would haue rent the very mountaines, and pierced the higheſt heauens. There might a man haue ſeen the deuout paſſions of theſe moſt worthie and zealous Chriſtians,vttered in right diuers manners: ſome, with their eies and hands caſt vp towards heauen,called aloud vpon the name and help of Chriſt Ieſus; ſome,proſtrat vpon their faces,kiſſed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world ſometime walked: others,ioyfully ſaluted thoſe holy places which they had heard ſo much of,and then firſt beheld: in briefe,euery man in ſome ſort expreſſed the ioy he had conceiued of the ſight of the Holy city,as the end of their long trauell.

The exceeding ioy of the Chriſtians vpon the firſt deſcrying of the holy city.

This moſt antient and famous city,ſo much renowned in holy VVrit,is ſcituate in an hilly countrey; not watred with any riuer or freſh ſprings,as other famous cities for moſt part be;
C neither yet was it well ſeated for wood,or paſture ground:but what wanted in theſe,and ſuch other benefits of nature,was by the extraordinary bleſſings of the moſt Higheſt ſo ſupplied; as that the Iewes there dwelling,ſo long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of all other people in the world iuſtly accounted the moſt happy & fortunate. Yet in thoſe ſo bleſſed times,was this city for the ſin of the people oftentimes deliuered into the enemies hand, and the glory thereof defaced; as well appeareth by the whole courſe of the hiſtorie of holy ſcripture,as alſo by the antient and approued hiſtories, as well of the Iewes themſelues, as others.
Neuertheleſſe it ſtill roſe againe(though not in like glory as before in the time of king Dauid,Solomon, and the other next ſucceeding kings) and ſo was ſtill repeopled by the Iews, til that at laſt according to the foretelling of our Sauiour Chriſt,it was with a great and of all D others moſt lamentable deſtruction, vtterly raſed and deſtroied by the Romans,vnder the leading of Veſpaſian the emperor,and his noble ſon Titus, 40 yeres after our Sauior his precious death and paſſion. Since which time,it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired,or yet well inhabited by the Iews;but lying buried in the ruins of it ſelfe,all the reigne of Domitian, Nerua, and Trajan,untill the time of the great Emperour Ælius Adrianus, it was again by him reedified about the yeare 136, and after the name of him called Ælla; who together with the name changed alſo in ſome part the antient ſcituation of the city. For whereas before it was ſeated vpon the ſteep riſing of an hill, in ſuch ſort that towards the Eaſt and the South, it ouerlooked the whole ground, hauing only the Temple and the caſtle called Antonia, in the higheſt part of the city; Adrian tranſlated the whole city vnto the very top of the hill,ſo that the place where our bleſſed Sauior ſuffred his moſt bitter paſſion,with the Sepulchre wherin he was alſo laid,and from whence he in glory roſe againe, before without the city,were then incloſed within the wals thereof,as they are at this day to be ſeen. Yet for all that, the Emperor being dead, in proceſſe of time this new built city recouered again the antient name of Ieruſalem,wherby it hath euer ſince,and is at this day yet known. This city ſo re-edified, the Emperor firſt gaue to the Iews,whom he afterwards thruſt out againe for their rebellion,and gaue it to the Chriſtians to inhabit;ouer whom,one Marke firſt Biſhop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But foraſmuch as the Roman Emperours were at that time altogether Idolaters and perſecutors of the poore Chriſtians,the Church alſo at Ieruſalem,with others,endured ſundry and many grieuous perſecutions, vnder the Emperors Antonius,Commodus,Seuerus, Maximinus,Valerianus,Aurelianus,Diocleſianus, & Maxentius,till that at length Conſtantine the Great, conuerted vnto the faith of Chriſt about the yeare of Grace 320, ſuppreſſing the Pagan Idolatry,gaue generall peace to the afflicted Church: whereby the Chriſtian Church at Ieruſalem for the ſpace of three hundred yeres after,happily flouriſhed vnder the Greek emperors, vntill the time of the Emperor Phocas;who hauing moſt cruelly ſlain the good Emperour Ieruſalem reedified by the great Emperor Ælius Adrianus.

A briefe diſcourſe of the ſtate and fortune of the holy city of Ieruſalem,from the deſtruction thereof,vnder Veſpaſianus the Emperor, and Titus his ſonne,vntill it was now again recouered out of the hands of the Infidels by Godfry of Buillon and the other Chriſtian Princes of the weſt.

rour Maurice with his children, and ſo poſſeſſed himſelfe of the empire, gaue occaſion thereby G vnto Choſroe the Perſian King, in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law, with all his power to inuade Syria: who as a tempeſt bearing downe all before him, tooke alſo by force the city of Ieruſalem, hauing that yere, which was about the yere ſix hundred and ten, ſlain almoſt an hundred thouſand Chriſtians. But Phocas the vſurper beeing by them of his guard moſt cruelly ſlaine, and Heraclius ſucceeding in his ſtead, Choſroe was by him againe driuen out of Syria, and the holy city againe recouered, about the yere 624. In theſe great wars againſt the Perſians, Heraclius had vſed the help of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike people of Arabia Deſerta, altogether giuen to the ſpoile: who the wars now ended, expecting to haue receiued their pay, were contrary to their expectation, and without all reaſon rejected by them that ſhould haue paid them, with very foule and contumelious words; as, that there was H not mony enough to pay the Chriſtian ſoldiers of the Latines & the Greeks, much leſſe thoſe vile dogs (whom they ſo called, for that they had but a little before receiued the damnable doctrine of the falſe Prophet Mahomet, the great ſeducer of the world, who euen in that time flouriſhed.) Vpon which diſcontentment they at their returne reuolted from the Empire, and joined themſelues vnto their great Prophet, and ſo afterwards vnto the Caliphs his ſucceſſors, extending his doctrine, together with his ſoueraigntie, to the vtmoſt of their power: and that with ſo good ſucceſſe, that in ſhort time they had ouerrun all Ægypt, Syria, the land of Promiſe, and taken the holy city. With theſe (the diſciples of Mahomet and his ſucceſſors, the Saraſins, for ſo now they would be called) the Greeke Emperours inſuing had for certaine yeres diuers conflicts, with diuers fortune, for the poſſeſſion of Syria. But at length wearied I out, and by them ouercome, they left the aforeſaid countries wholly to their deuotion. Hereby it came to paſſe, that the Saraſins for the ſpace of 370 yeres following held theſe countries, with many others in great ſubjection, oppreſſing ſtill the poore Chriſtians in Ieruſalem with moſt grieuous tributes and exactions: vnto whom they yet left a third part of the city for them to dwell in, with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Sauior, and mount Sion; not for any deuotion, either vnto them, or thoſe places, but for that it yeelded them a great profit by the recourſe of deuout Chriſtians trauelling thither: reſeruing in the meane time vnto themſelues, the other two parts of the city, with the Temple of Solomon, before re-edified by the Chriſtians. Now whileſt the Saraſins thus triumph it in the Eaſt, and not in the Eaſt only, but ouer a great part of the Weſt alſo; contenting themſelues with ſuch tributes as they had impoſed K vpon the ſubdued nations and countries; vp ſtart the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruell people; who firſt breaking into Aſia (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aſpiring vnto the kingdome of Perſia, ſubdued the countries of Meſopotamia, Syria, with the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia and Iudæa, together with the Holy City: who both there and in all other places, held the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in ſuch ſubjection and thraldome, as that the former gouernment of the Saraſins ſeemed in compariſon of this to haue been but light and eaſie. Neither was there any end or releaſe of theſe ſo great miſeries to haue been expected, had not God in mercy by the weake meanes of a poore hermit, ſtirred vp theſe moſt worthy Princes of the Weſt to take vp arms in their defence, who hauing with their victorious armies recouered the leſſer Aſia, with a great part of Syria, were now come vnto this Holy City. L

The gouernor of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding by his eſpials, of the proceedings of the Chriſtians, had before their approch, got into the city a very ſtrong garriſon of right valiant ſouldiers, with good ſtore of all things neceſſarie for the holding out of a long ſiege. The Chriſtians with their army approching the city, encamped before it on the North; for that toward the Eaſt and the South, it was not wel to be beſieged, by reaſon of the broken rocks and mountaines. Next vnto the city lay Godfrey the Duke, with the Germains and Loranois: neere vnto him lay the Earle of Flanders, and Robert the Norman: before the Weſt gate lay Tancred and the Earle of Tholous: Bohemund and Baldwin were both abſent; the one at Antioch, the other at Edeſſa. The Chriſtians thus ſtrongly encamped, the fifth day after gaue vnto the city a fierce aſſault, with ſuch cheerefulneſſe, as that it was verily ſuppoſed, it might haue beene euen then woon, had they been ſufficiently furniſhed with ſcaling ladders: M for want whereof, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault and retire. But within a few daies after, hauing ſupplied that defect, and prouided all things neceſſarie, they came on againe afreſh, and with all their power gaue vnto the City a moſt terrible aſſault, wherein was on both ſides ſeene great valour, po-

A licie,and cunning,with much ſlaughter,vntill that at length the Chriſtians weary of the long fight,and in that hot countrey,and moſt feruent time of the yeare, fainting for lacke of water were glad againe to forſake the aſſault,and to retire into their trenches: only the well of Siloe yeelded them water, and that not ſufficient for the whole campe: the reſt of the wels which were but few,being before by the enemie either filled vp or elſe poyſoned.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ieruſalem,a fleet of the Genowaies arriued at Ioppa; at which time alſo a great fleet of the Ægyptian Sultans lay at Aſcalon, to haue brought reliefe to the beſieged Turkes in Ieruſalem, whereof the Genowaies vnderſtanding, and knowing themſelues to weake to encounter them at ſea,tooke all ſuch things out of their ſhips as they thought good,and ſo ſinking them,marched by land vnto the campe. There was B amongſt theſe Genowaies diuers engineers,men(after the manner of that time)cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the beſieging of cities: by whoſe deuice,a great mouing tower was framed of timber and thick plancks,couered ouer with raw hides, to ſaue the ſame from fire:out of which the Chriſtians might in ſafety greatly annoy the defendants.This tower being by night brought cloſe to the wall, ſerued the Chriſtians in ſtead of a moſt ſure fortres in the aſſault the next day:where whilſt they ſtriue with warlike valor & doubtful victory on both ſides,from morning vntil mid-day, by chance the wind fauoring the Chriſtians,caried the flame of the fire into the faces of the Turks,wherwith they had thought to haue burnt the Tower,with ſuch violence,that the Chriſtians taking the benefit therof,and holpen by the tower,gained the top of the wall:which was firſt footed by the Duke Godfrey, and his brother C Euſtace, with their followers, and the enſignes of the Duke there firſt ſet vp, to the great encouraging of the Chriſtians, who now preſſing in on euery ſide, like a violent riuer that had broken ouer the banks, bare downe all before them. All were ſlain that came to hand, men,women and children,without reſpect of age,ſex,or condition:the ſlaughter was great,& the ſight lamentable,all the ſtreets were filled with bloud,and the bodies of the dead,death triumphing in euery place. Yet in this confuſion, a wonderfull number of the better ſort of Turks, retiring to Solomons temple,there to do their laſt deuoire,made there a great and terrible fight, armed with deſpaire to endure any thing,& the victorious Chriſtians no leſſe diſdaining,after the winning of the city,to find there ſo great reſiſtance.In this deſperat conflict,fought with wonderful obſtinacie of mind,many fel on both ſides:but the Chriſtians came on ſo fiercely, D with deſire of bloud,that breaking into the temple,the formoſt of them were by the preſſe of them that followed after,violently thruſt vpon the weapons of their enemies,& ſo miſerably ſlaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppreſſed,giue it ouer,but as men reſolued to die,deſperatly fough[illegible] out with inuincible courage,not at the gates of the Temple only,but euen in the midſt thereof alſo,where was to be ſeene great heaps,both of the victors and the vanquiſhed; ſlaine indifferently together. All the pauement of the Temple ſwam with bloud,in ſuch ſort, that a man could not ſet his foot,but either vpon ſome dead man,or ouer the ſhooes in bloud.
Yet for all that, the obſtinate enemy ſtill held the vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkeneſſe of the night came ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians were glad to make an end of the ſlaughter,and to ſound a retreat. The next day(for that proclamation was made,for mercy to E be ſhewed vnto all ſuch as ſhould lay down their weapons) the Turks that yet held the vpper part of the Temple,came downe and yeelded themſelues. Thus was the famous City of Ieruſalem with great bloudſhed, but far greater honor, recouered by theſe worthy Chriſtians,in the yeare 1099, after it had beene in the hands of the Infidels aboue foure hundred yeares.

The next day after,hauing buried the dead,and cleanſed the city,they gaue thanks to God with publike praiers and great reioycing. The poore Chriſtians before oppreſſed,now ouercome with vnexpected ioy,welcommed their victorious brethren with great ioy & praiſe,and the ſoldiers embracing one another,ſparing to ſpeake of themſelues,freely commended each others valour. Eight daies after, the Princes of the army meeting together, began to conſult about the choice of their king:among whom was no ſuch difference,as might wel ſhew which F was to be preferred before the others. And although euery one of them for proweſſe & deſert, ſeemed worthy of ſo great an honor,yet by the generall conſent of all, it was giuen to Robert Duke of Normandie: who about the ſame time hearing of the death of the Conquerour his Father, and more in loue with his Fathers new gotten Kingdome in England,in hope thereof, refuſed the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found poſſeſſed by William Rufus his younger brother, and ſo in hope of a better, refuſing the worſe, vpon the matter loſt both.

Godfrey Duke of Buillon by the generall conſent of the Chriſtian army choſen firſt king of Ieruſalem.

After whoſe departure, Godfrey of Buillon Duke of Loraine (whoſe enſigne was firſt diſplaid vpon the walls) was by the generall conſent both of the Princes and the armie, ſaluted King. He was a great ſoldier, and endued with many heroicall vertues, brought vp in the court of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, and by him much emploied. At the time of his inauguration, he refuſed to be crowned with a crowne of gold: ſaying, That it became not a Chriſtian man there to weare a crowne of gold, where Chriſt the Sonne of God had for the ſaluation of mankind, ſometime worne a crowne of thorne. Of the greateſt part of theſe proceedings of the Chriſtians, from the time of their departure from Antioch, vntill the winning of the Holy Citie, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth:

After long trauell, hauing firſt taken certaine townes, we came to Ieruſalem: which Citie is enuironed with high hils, without riuers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Solomons, and that a very little one. In it are many Ciſternes, wherein water is kept, both in the Citie and the Country thereabout. On the Eaſt, are the Arabians, the Moabits and Ammonits. On the South, the Idumæans, Ægyptians and Philiſtians: Weſtward alongſt the ſea coaſt, lie the Cities of Ptolemais, Tyrus, and Tripolis: and Northward, Tiberias, Ceſaræa Philippi, with the countrey Decapolis and Damaſco. In the aſſault of the Citie, I firſt gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to aſſaile, and commanded Baldwin to enter the Citie: who hauing ſlaine certaine companies of the enemies, broke open one of the gates for the Chriſtians to enter. Raymond had the Citie of Dauid, with much rich ſpoile yeelded vnto him. But when we came vnto the Temple of Solomon, there we had a great conflict, with ſo great ſlaughter of the enemy, that our men ſtood in bloud aboue the ancles: The night approching, wee could not take the vpper part of the Temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turkes pittifully crying out for mercie: and ſo the Citie of Ieruſalem was by vs taken, the fifteenth of Iuly, in the yeare of our redemption 1099, thirtie nine daies after the beginning of the ſiege, foure hundred and nine yeares after it fell into the hands of the Saraſins in the time of Heraclius the Emperour. Beſides this, the Princes with one conſent ſaluted mee (againſt my will) King of Ieruſalem: who although I feare to take vpon me ſo great a Kingdome, yet I will doe my deuoire, that they ſhall eaſily know me for a Chriſtian King, and well deſeruing of the vniuerſall Faith; but loue you me as you do, and ſo farewell. From Ieruſalem.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing at Ieruſalem, ſuch a multitude of the Turks, and Saraſins their confederates (now in their common calamitie all as one) were aſſembled at Aſcalon (a citie about fiue and twentie miles from Ieruſalem) to reuenge the injuries they had before receiued, as had not before met together in al the time of this ſacred war. Againſt whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) aſſembled the whole forces of the Chriſtians in thoſe countries, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon in the new woon citie, ſet forward: and meeting with them, joyned a moſt dreadfull and cruell battell; wherein (as moſt report) were ſlain of the Infidels, an hundred thouſand men, & the reſt put to flight. The ſpoile there taken, far exceeded all that the Chriſtians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after ſo great a victorie, returning to Ieruſalem, gaue vnto God moſt humble thanks. The reſt of the Princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to Edeſſa, Tancred into Galiley, whereof hee was created Prince; or elſe hauing now performed the vttermoſt of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the moſt honourable expedition that euer the Chriſtians tooke in hand againſt the Infidels, and with the greateſt reſolution performed; for the moſt part, by ſuch voluntarie men, as moued with a deuout zeale, to their immortal praiſe, ſpared neither life nor liuing in defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion; all men worthy eternall fame and memory. Not long after, enſued a great peſtilence (the ready attendant of long war and want) wherof infinit numbers of people died, and among the reſt Godfrey, the firſt Chriſtian King of Ieruſalem, neuer to be ſufficiently commended: who with the generall lamentation of all good Chriſtians, was honourably buried Godfrey of Buillon firſt Chriſtian King of Ieruſalem, dieth of the plague.

A ried in the Church of the Sepulchre of our Sauior on the mount Calvary, where our Savior ſuffered his paſſion; in which the Chriſtian Kings ſucceeding him were alſo afterwards buried.
He departed this life the eighteenth of Iuly, in the yeare of our Lord 1100, when hee 1100 had yet ſcarce reigned a full yeare. Whoſe tombe is yet at this day there to be ſeen, with an honorable inſcription thereupon.

After the death of Godfrey, the Chriſtians made choice of Baldwin his brother, Countie of Edeſſa; who leauing his former gouernment to Baldwin ſyrnamed Burgenſis, his neer kinſman, came to Ieruſalem honorably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Chriſtmaſſe day with all ſolemnitie crowned King, Anno 1101. He, aided by the Venetians and Genoa's at ſea, and by Bohemund King of Antioch by land, took from the Infidels the city of Cæſaria 1101 B Stratonis, ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide, and ouerthrew certain companies of the Egyptian Sultans at Rama. But vnderſtanding that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were comming to his aid with a new power, hee glad thereof went to meet them, and ſafely conducted them to Ieruſalem alongſt the ſea coaſt, by the cities of Berythus, Sydon, Tyre and Ptolemais, all yet holden by the Enemy. At which time the Turks at Aſcalon hauing receiued great ayd from the Arabians and Egyptians, inuaded the country about Rama, where betwixt them and the Chriſtians was fought a moſt cruell battell, wherein the Chriſtians receiued a moſt notable ouerthrow, many of their great Commanders being there ſlain; and amongſt the reſt, Stephen Earle of Charters (but lately returned home from the former expedition, and now come back againe) and Stephen Earle of Burgondy and Tholous; yea the King himſelfe hardly eſcaped C the Enemies hand, and after many daies came at length to Ioppa, after it had bin conſtantly before reported him to haue been in that battell alſo ſlain. Who hauing there in haſt repaired his army, came again ſpeedly vpon his enemies, fearing as then nothing leſſe, and overthrew them with ſuch a ſlaughter, as that they had ſmall cauſe to rejoice of their former victorie.
Neither were the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes in the other parts of Syria and Paleſtine in the mean time idle, but ſought by all means to inlarge their territories. Tancred prince of Galile hauing raiſed a great power, tooke Apamea the metropoliticall city of Cœloſyria, and after much toile won alſo the city of Laodicea. Baldwin alſo the Gouernor of Edeſſa, beſieging the city of Carras, had brought the beſieged Turks to ſuch extremity, that they were about to haue yeelded the city; when ſuddenly he was ſet vpon by a great army of the Turks D ſent from the Perſian Sultan for the reliefe of the beſieged; and being there ouerthrowne, was himſelfe there taken, with Benedict the Biſhop, and one Ioſceline his kinſman: Who after fiue yeares impriſonment, found means with the Turk that had taken them, to redeem themſelues, to the great offence of the Perſian Sultan, and of the Sultan Solyman.

Baldwin* County of Edeſſa, & brother vnto Godfrey, ſecond K. of Ieruſalem.

King Baldwin after the late victory liued for a ſeaſon at ſome good reſt in Ieruſalem, vnmoleſted of his enemies: but knowing his greateſt ſafety among ſuch warlike people, to conſiſt in arms, he vpon the ſudden raiſed the whole ſtrength of his kingdom, and laid ſiege to Ptolemais, otherwiſe called Acon, a city of Phœnicia, ſtanding vpon the riuage of the ſea; where he found ſuch reſiſtance, that he was glad to raiſe his ſiege and depart, having done nothing more than ſpoiled the pleaſant places about the city. By the way in his return backe again it E fortuned him to meet with certain companies of the enemies adventurers, by whom he was in a skirmiſh mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the wound was by his ſurgeons healed vp, yet was the griefe thereof ſo great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithſtanding the former repulſe, the next yeare encouraged by the comming of the Genoa fleet, laid hard ſiege again to Ptolemais both by ſea and land, which after twenty daies ſiege was by compoſition yeelded vnto him.

K. Baldwin mortally wounded.

Ptolemais won by K. Baldwin.

Shortly after, the Gouernor of Aleppo, with certain other of the Turks great Captains in thoſe quarters, hauing joined their forces together, and ſo inuaded the countrey about Antioch, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into Italy had left Gouernor of that city) notably encountred and put to flight. At which time alſo the Caliph of Egypt, ſending F great forces both by ſea and land againſt the King of Ieruſalem, was in both places diſcomfited, at land by the Chriſtians, and at ſea by tempeſt.

Bohemund in the mean time with a great army of voluntary men and others (wherein hee is reported to haue had fiue thouſand horſe and forty thouſand foot) returning towards the holy Land, in reuenge of many injuries done by Alexius the Emperour, vnto the Souldiers of G this ſacred war, contrary to his faith and promiſe to them before giuen; by the way landed his men in Epirus,and grieuouſly ſpoiled the countrey about Dirrachium part of the Emperors dominion. Neither made he an end of ſpoiling,vntill he had inforced the Emperour for redreſſe of ſo great harms,to make peace with him,and again by ſolemne oath to promiſe all ſecuritie and kindneſſe vnto all ſuch Chriſtian ſouldiers as ſhould haue occaſion to trauel to or fro thorow his countries during the time of this religious war. After which agreement hee put to ſea again,and ſo returned for Ieruſalem. But whilſt he ſtaid at Antioch,he ſhortly after there died in the yeare 1108, leauing the principalitie thereof unto his yong ſon Bohemund a child,vnder the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Bohemund dies at Antioch.

H Yet were the cities of Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre, alongſt the ſea coaſt, in the enemies poſſeſſion: for the gaining wherof Baldwin the King raiſed a great army,and ſo came & laid ſiege to Berytus,which after many ſharp aſſaults he at length won the 23 day of Aprill,in the yere 1111,and put to ſword moſt part of them that he found therein. The ſame yeare alſo he,aſſiſted by a fleet ſent vnto him out of Norway, beſieged the city of Sydon; which the Citiſens (ſeeing themſelues now beſet both by ſea and land) at length yeelded vnto him by compoſition the 19 day of December. After which victorie he diſmiſſed the fleet,and returned himſelfe in triumph to Ieruſalem. Now of all the famous cities alongſt the ſea coaſt of Phœnicia and Paleſtine,from Laodicea to Aſcalon, was only the city of Tyre that remained in the enemies hand: which City Baldwin alſo hardly beſieged; neuertheleſſe it was ſo well defended by the Turks,that after he had all in vain lien before it the ſpace of 4 months,he was glad to riſe with his army and depart.

Sidon won.

I It fortuned that within two yeares after, the Turks with a mighty army ſent from the Perſian Sultan,inuaded the country of Cœliſyria, where ſpoiling all before them as they went, they came and incamped vpon the ſea coaſt neere vnto Tyberias. Againſt whom Baldwin gathered the whole ſtrength of his kingdom;with whom alſo Tancred (who now reigned in Antioch,the yong Bohemund being dead) with the County of Tripolis,and the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, joined their forces: who all together marching forward, came and incamped not far from the enemy,being in number far more than they. Mendus Generall of the Turkes army (for ſo I find him called)vnderſtanding of their approch,ſent out certain companies of his men to skirmiſh with them; againſt whom the Chriſtians alſo ſent out others, who incountring them, eaſily put them to flight, K beeing before commanded ſo to do, of purpoſe to draw the Chriſtians into the danger of a great ſtrength lying in ambuſh to intrap them: which according to the Turks deſire fell out; for the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing the flying enemy,fel into the ambuſh,and ſo before they were well aware,were beſet on all ſides by their enemies: to whoſe reſcue other companies of Chriſtians comming in, and others alſo from the Turks,both the great armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joined a moſt fierce and terrible battell, with great ſlaughter on both ſides; but at length the multitude of the Turks preuailing,the Chriſtians were put to the worſe,and ſo glad to fly:after whom the fierce enemy hardly followed,not without great ſlaughter: in which flight the King himſelfe hardly eſcaped,with Arnolphus the Patriark. Whilſt Baldwin was thus buſied abroad,the Turkes and Saraſins from Aſcalon came and beſieged Ieruſalem, L beeing then but weakly manned: but hearing of the kings comming,and that the army of the Chriſtians daily increaſed with new ſupplies out of the Weſt by ſea,they retyred home again,hauing burnt certain ſtore-houſes full of corn,and ſpoiled ſuch things as were ſubject to their fury.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this king had with the Saraſins and Turks,which for breuitie I paſſe ouer,contented to haue briefly touched the greateſt. In the laſt yeare of his reign,hauing for certain yeares before liued in ſome reaſonable peace, he made an expedition into Egypt, where he with much difficultie won Pharamia a ſtrong city vpon the ſea coaſt,which he joined vnto his own Kingdome. After that,he went to the mouth of the riuer Nilus,and with great admiration learned the nature of that ſtrange riuer: and hauing therin taken abundance of fiſh,he returned into the city,and there with the ſame feaſted M himſelfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feel the griefe of his old wound, and growing therof ſicker and ſicker,returned with his army toward Ieruſalem, where by the way neere vnto a City called Laris he died (to the great griefe of all the Chriſtians) in the yeare 1118. His dead body being brought backe vnto Ieruſalem, was there royally buried, 1118

A neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had reigned eighteen yeares: whoſe ſepulchre is yet there alſo to be ſeen, faſt by the ſepulchre of his brother.

Baldwin Brũgenſis choſen King of Ieruſalem.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Chriſtians with one conſent made choice of his couſin Baldwin, ſirnamed Brugenſis, gouernor of Edeſſa, who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond was the ſecond of Aprill, in the yeare 1118, ſolemnly crowned King of Ieruſalem. He was of 1118 ſtature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gratious, hauing his hair thin and yellow, his beard mingled with ſome gray haires, hanging downe to his breſt; his colour freſh and liuely for one of his yeares. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no leſſe redoubted of his enemies, than beloued of his ſubjects, who had in him repoſed great hope both for the defence and inlarging of that new gained kingdome. Againſt him the ſame B ſummer the Caliph of Egypt, aided by the king of Damaſco and the Turks, in reuenge of the loſſe he had in the expedition the yere before receiued, raiſed a great power to inuade him both by ſea and land. Againſt whom Baldwin alſo oppoſed himſelfe with his whole ſtrength, and ſo came and incamped within the ſight of his enemies. In which ſort when both armies had lien the one facing the other by the ſpace of three months, they both roſe; the Chriſtians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valor of the Chriſtians, and ſo retyred without any notable thing done.

This yeare died Alexius the Greeke Emperor, who euen from the beginning of this ſacred War, ſecretly repined at the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in Syria, although his Empire were thereby greatly inlarged: after whom ſucceeded Calo Ioannes his ſonne, who all the time C of his reign right worthily defended his territories in the leſſer Aſia, againſt the inuaſion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greateſt Princes of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, with the King of Damaſco, and Debeis King of Arabia, joining their forces together, with a great army inuading the country about Antioch, came & incamped not far from Aleppo: againſt whom Roger Prince of Antioch, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Chriſtian princes his confederats, but preſuming of his own ſtrength, went forth with greater courage than diſcretion, whereunto his ſucceſſe was anſwerable; for encountring with them at too much odds, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrown, where himſelfe was ſlain, with moſt part of his army. Of which ſo great a ſlaughter, the place wherein this battel was fought was after- D ward called the field of bloud. But whilſt the Turks after ſo great a victorie careleſly and at pleaſure rome vp and down the country, Baldwin ſetting vpon them ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and ſo put them to flight. After this victory gained by the Chriſtians the 1120 fourteenth of Auguſt, in the yeare 1120, King Baldwin in great triumph entred into Antioch, and ſo joined that principalitie vnto his owne kingdome.

The yeare following, the Turks with another army inuaded the ſame countrey againe: for repreſſing of whom, whilſt Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great Commander ſuddenly died of an Apoplexy; vpon 1122 whoſe death they retyred without any further harm doing. Neuertheleſſe the next ſpring, the King of Damaſco aided by the Arabians, entered againe with a great army into the countrey E about Antioch, and there did ſome harme: for the Antiochians now deſtitute of their owne Prince, and Baldwin (who had taken vpon him their protection) beeing far off, and otherwiſe buſied at Ieruſalem, were much more ſubject vnto the inrodes of their enemies (ſtil at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their own ſtil preſent among them. But Baldwin aduertiſed therof, was making toward them with a puiſſant army, ſooner than they had thought it could haue bin poſſible. Of whoſe approch the Turks vnderſtanding, retyred again out of the Country: after whom the King thinking it not good to make further purſuit, turned a little out of the way, and took by force Garaze, one of the ſtrongeſt caſtles of the kings of Damaſco, built but the yeare before; which becauſe it was not without great charge and danger to be den, he raſed down to the ground.

F Baldwin notwithſtanding that he had many times thus honorably repulſed his enemies, wiſely conſidering how he was on the one ſide beſet with the Turks, and on the other ſide with the Saraſins which yet reigned in Ægypt (the Kingdome of Ieruſalem lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to craue aid of the Chriſtian Princes of Europe; and to that purpoſe had ſent diuers his Embaſſadors vnto diuers of them, but eſpecially vnto the Venetians, whom of all others hee thought fitteſt at his need to yeeld him reliefe by G ſea. It fortuned in the mean time, that Balac the Perſian Sultan with a great army of the Turks inuaded the country about Antioch; whereof Baldwin vnderſtanding (although he certainly knew he ſhould ere long receiue aid from the other Chriſtian Princes his friends, but eſpecially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reaſon haue protracted the war vntil their comming; yet being therwith much moued, or elſe his deſtiny ſo requiring, raiſed ſuch forces as he had of his owne, and without longer ſtaying for his friends, with greater courage than good ſpeed ſet forward; and ſo joining battell with the enemy, was therein ouerthrown, with the greateſt part of his army, and himſelfe taken priſoner in the fight, with certain other of his beſt commanders, who all together were carried away captiues vnto Carras.

Ioppa beſieged by the Saraſins

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the King, the Caliph of Egypt on the H other ſide took occaſion with all his power to inuade the kingdom of Ieruſalem; and hauing in himſelfe purpoſed the vtter ruine thereof, beſide the great army which hee ſent thither by land (which lay incamped not far from Aſcalon) he put to ſea a huge fleet alſo of 700 ſail, for the diſtreſſing of the ſea towns, which he well knew were not otherwiſe to be won. This fleet of the Saraſin Kings (for Egypt with the kingdomes of Tunes and Morocco were yet in poſſeſſion of the Saraſins) ariuing at Ioppa, there put aſhore their land forces, and hardly beſieged the town both by ſea and land. But whileſt they thus lay in great hope to haue won the town, Dominicus Michael duke of Venice, ſtirred vp by Calixtus then Biſhop of Rome, came to Cyprus with a fleet of two hundred ſail for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in Syria and the holy land; and hearing of the diſtreſſe of Ioppa, nothing diſmaid with the number of the Ene- I mies fleet, haſted thither, and came ſo ſuddenly vpon them, that he had (as ſome report) ouerthrowne them before they could put themſelues in order or be in readineſſe to fight: or as ſome others ſay, after a great and doubtfull fight, hauing ſunk or taken many of them, and put the reſt to flight, he obtained of them a moſt glorious victorie. With like good fortune alſo were the Saraſins ouerthrowne in a fortunate battell at land neere vnto Aſcalon, by the Lord Euſtace, vnto whom the defence of the kingdom was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after ſo great a victory died.

Ioppa relieued as is aforeſaid, the Duke of Venice trauelled by land to Ieruſalem, where he was honorably receiued by Guarimund the Patriark, and the confederation before made betwixt King Baldwin and the Venetians, vpon the ſame conditions ſolemnly again renued. K

The Saraſins thus notably diſcomfited both by ſea and land, and the Chriſtians therby not a little encouraged, and joining their forces together with the Venetians, came and the firſt of March laid ſiege vnto the antient and ſtrong city of Tyre: which they hauing beſet both by ſea and land, gaue therunto many a ſharp aſſault, which the Turks as men fighting for their liues and wiues right valiantly repulſed. In which ſort the ſiege was continued longer than the Chriſtians had at the firſt thought ſhould haue needed: yet at length after four moneths ſiege, the Turks ſore weakened with often aſſaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their ſtore being ſpent, yeelded the city by compoſition. Thus was the city of Tyre (the moſt famous port of Phœnicia) yeelded vnto the Chriſtians the twenty ninth of Iune, Anno 1124 1124 The third part of this city was giuen to the Venetians, according to the compoſition made L betwixt them and the Kings of Ieruſalem, That of all ſuch cities as were by their helpe won from the Infidels in Syria, they ſhould haue a third part, with one ſtreet, and free traffick in all the reſt of the cities of the kingdom of Ieruſalem. Shortly after was King Baldwin ſet at libertie for the ranſom of an hundred thouſand ducats, after he had bin eighteen months priſoner among the Turks.

The Duke of Venice hauing now ſpent almoſt three yeares in this ſacred expedition, and well confirmed the ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, returning home, by the way tooke the Iſlands of Chios, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the city of Modon in Peloponeſſus; all places belonging to the Greeke Emperour. Which he did in reuenge of the injuries done by the Emperor in the time of his abſence: who enuying at the ſucceſſe of the Chriſti- M ans in Syria, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the abſence of the Duke infeſted the territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now juſtly requited with the loſſe of a good part of his own.

Baldwin alſo not vnmindfull of the injuries vnto him before done by the Turks, in requitall thereof, inuaded the country about Damaſco, and there in three notable battels ouerthrew the King, and ſpoiled the country; wherein hee took ſo great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hoſtage with the Turks for the paiment of his ranſome. He alſo ouerthrew the Saraſins at Aſcalon, who aided by the Caliph of Egypt, had ſundry times inuaded the country about Ieruſalem. And ſo hauing wel repreſſed his enemies, for a ſpace liued in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus firſt Maſter of the Templers (an Order of Knights firſt begun in the reign of this Baldwin) before ſent to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt againſt the Turks and Saraſins, returned with a great number of zealous Chriſtians, ready to lay down their liues for defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes of Syria joining their forces, ſet forward and beſieged Damaſco, the regal city of the Turks in thoſe quarters. But ſuch was the ſtrength of this city, with the valor of the defendants, and contagiouſneſſe of the aire, that the Chriſtians (the heauens as it were then fighting againſt them) were glad to raiſe their ſiege, in vain begun, and ſo to retire.

Whilſt things thus paſſed in Siria, Fulk County of Turin, Mayn, and Anjou, a man almoſt of ſixty yeares, hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of his things at home, had for deuotions ſake taken vpon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations Embaſſadors came vnto him from king Baldwin, offering him in mariage Meliſenda (or as ſome cal her Margaret) his eldeſt daughter, with ſucceſſion into the kingdom of Ieruſalem in dowry, if he ſhould ſuruiue the King; and in the mean time to content himſelfe with the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais. Of which offer he accepted, and ſo held on his journy before intended. It fortuned about three yeares after, that the King fell dangerouſly ſick, and feeling his death drawing on, hauing laid aſide all regal dignitie, cauſed himſelfe to be remoued out of his own palace, into the Patriarks houſe, which was neerer vnto the Temple of the Sepulchre, & there calling vnto him Fulk the County his ſon in law, with his daughter, and his ſon Baldwin, then but two yeares old, in the preſence of the Patriarke and diuers other Princes and great Commanders, commended vnto them the gouernment and defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulk to ſucceed him: and taking vnto himſelfe the habit and profeſſion of a Monke, if hee ſhould haue longer liued, preſently after gaue vp the ghoſt the two and twentieth day of Auguſt, Anno 1131; whereof he reigned with much trouble thirteene yeares, and was ſolemnly buried in the temple vpon mount Calvary, with the other two Kings Godfrey and Baldwin his predeceſſors.

The death of Baldwin the ſecond, the third King of Ieruſalem.

The Kings funerall ended, the Princes of the kingdome with one accord made choice of Fulk the old County, Earle of Anjou, for their King: who the ſixt of September was with all ſolemnitie by William the Patriark crowned in Ieruſalem. This man in the beginning of his reign, beſide his troubles abroad, was alſo vext with domeſticall and inteſtine diſcord; Pontius County of Tripolis ſeeking by force of arms to haue rent the dukedom of Antioch from the kingdom. And Hugh County of Ioppa, for feare of due puniſhment for his treaſon, joining himſelf with the Saraſins of Aſcalon, and ſo with them infeſting the territories of Ieruſalem, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian State, and aduantage of the Infidels. Which troubleſome broiles were yet afterward by the King, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriark and other princes (who ſeeing the danger thereof like to enſue, had interpoſed themſelues) well appeaſed. Vengeance yet neuertheleſſe ſtill following both the aforeſaid traitors; Pontius being ſhortly after ſlain by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Beſides theſe domeſticall troubles, the Turkes alſo inuaded the countrey about Antioch, where they were by the ſudden comming of the King ouerthrown, with the loſſe of their tents and exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the diſquieting of the ſtate of that new erected kingdom, not long after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor (together with the empire, inheritor alſo of his fathers malice againſt the proceedings of the Chriſtians in Syria) with a puiſſant army paſſing thorow the leſſer Aſia, and by the way taking by force Tarſus, the metropoliticall city of Cilicia, with the whole prouince thereunto belonging, came and beſieged Antioch, which Fulk but a little before had, together with Conſtance the daughter and Heire of the late Duke of Antioch, giuen in marriage to Raimund County of Poyton, for that purpoſe ſent out of France. But in this ſo dangerous a ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdom, the other zealous Chriſtian Princes interpoſed themſelues as mediators diators betwixt the Emperor (pretending the ſame to belong vnto his Empire) and Raimund G that was in poſſeſſion thereof: and in fine brought it to this end, That Raimund for the preſent ſubmitting himſelfe vnto the Emperor, ſhould from thenceforth hold his dukedome of him, as of his Lord and Soueraign. Vpon which agreement the Emperour returned vnto Tarſus, where he wintered, and ſo afterwards to Conſtantinople.

Much about the ſame time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes inuading the Countrey about Tripolis, beſieged the caſtle of Mont-Ferrand; vnto the reliefe wherof Fulk comming with his army, was by the Turks ouerthrowne, and for the ſafegard of his life glad to take the refuge of the caſtle, the County himſelfe beeing in that battell taken priſoner. After which victorie, the Turkes laid harder ſiege vnto the Caſtle than before; the beſieged in the meane time being no leſſe pinched within with famin, than pinched without by the enemy. In this H the Kings hard diſtreſſe, the other Princes hauing raiſed the whole power of the kingdome, were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turk hearing, offered of himſelfe to giue them all leaue freely to depart, and to ſet the County at libertie, ſo that they would deliuer vnto him the Caſtle. Of which his offer they gladly accepting, yeelded vp the ſtrong Hold and ſo departed. The King by the way meeting with the army, thanked his friends for their forwardneſſe, and ſo returned to Ieruſalem.

Calo Ioannes the Greek Emperour ſeekes in vaine to haue ſurpriſed the city of Antioch

About foure yeares after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan Emperour with a great army came again into Syria, with purpoſe to haue vnited the famous City of Antioch vnto his empire, and ſo to haue made a way into the kingdome of Ieruſalem, whereafter hee had now a good while longed. But comming thither in hope to haue found the Cilicians and Syrians ready I to haue receiued him, he was deceiued of his expectation, being ſhut out of the Latines, and not ſuffered to enter but vpon his oath, and that with ſome few of his followers; and ſo after due reuerence done vnto him, quietly to depart, without any ſtir or innouation in the city. In reuenge of which diſgrace, at his departure hee gaue the ſuburbs of the City as a prey to his greedy ſoldiers, pretending the ſame to be done for want of victuals: who made hauock of all that came to hand, not ſparing the very fruit trees, but cutting them down to dreſſe their meat withall. Hauing thus vnder colour of neceſſitie reuenged the diſgrace receiued, he returned into Cilicia and there wintred: where one day for his diſport hunting of the wild boar, and hauing wounded him with his boar-ſpear, the wild beaſt therwith inraged, and with all his force bearing forward vpon the weapon, forced the Emperours hand backward vpon the point of a K poiſoned arrow that was hanging in a quiuer at his back, and ſo was therewith lightly wounded. Neuertheleſſe as light as the wound was, ſuch was the ſtrength of the poiſon, that the griefe thereof ſtill increaſing, and his hand and arm more and more ſwelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arm muſt be cut off: which deſperat and vncertain cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his pain oftentimes ſaying, That the Greek Empire was not to be gouerned with one hand, ouercome with the ſtrength of the poiſon, died. In whoſe place ſucceeded his yongeſt ſon Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two elder ſons being both dead at his ſetting forth vnto this ſo vnhappy an expedition.

The death of Calo Ioannes the Greeke Emperor.

It fortuned about this time alſo, that the kingdome of Ieruſalem beeing now at peace, that Fulk the King with the queen his wife lying at the city of Ptolemais in the time of Autumn, L it pleaſed the Queen for her diſport to walk out of the city, vnto certaine pleaſant fountaines there by in the country; for whoſe companie the King would needs go alſo, with certaine of his Courtiers: where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was ſitting in a furrow; after which all the Courtiers on horſeback gallopped amain, with notable outcries and hollowing. Among the reſt, the King to be partaker of the ſport, forcing his horſe to the vttermoſt of his power, in the midſt of his courſe fell, together with his horſe foundring vnder him, and in falling chanced to fall his head vnder the horſe; with whoſe weight and the hardnes of the ſaddle he was ſo cruſhed, that the braines came out both at his noſe and ears. In this pittifull caſe being taken vp for dead, and with great heauineſſe being carried back, he yet breathing lay ſpeechleſſe three daies, and ſo died the thirteen M of November, Anno 1142. His dead body afterwards brought to Ieruſalem, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his ſubiects, buried with the other Kings his predeceſſors.

The miſerable death of Fulk fourth king of Ieruſalem.

Now had the late King left behind him two ſons, Baldwin about the age of thirteen years, and and Almerick about the age of ſeuen. Of the elder of theſe two the Chriſtian Princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwin the third, was (together with Meleſinda his mother, partner with him in the kingdome) vpon Chriſtmas day with great ſolemnitie crowned King of Ieruſalem, in the yeare 1142. About which time Sanguin the Turk, taking hold of the diſcord betwixt Raimund Prince of Antioch, and Ioſcelin county of Edeſſa, came & with a great power beſieged Edeſſa, the County being at the ſame time abſent; and did ſo much, that at length he took the city by vndermining it, where the bloudy Turk exerciſed all manner of crueltie vpon the poore Chriſtians in the city. By the loſſe of this famous city, ſo large a territory fel again into the hands of the Turks, as that three Archbiſhopricks were thereby drawne from the Church of Antioch. The Turke encouraged by this victory, ſtraitwaies after beſieged Cologenbar, another ſtrong town of the Chriſtians. One night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkenneſſe ſtabbed, and ſo ſlain, and the ſiege raiſed. In whoſe ſtead Noradin his ſon ſucceeded.

Baldwin in the firſt yeare of his reign recouered from the Turks the caſtle of Sobal, a ſtrong Hold beyond Iordan, which he notably fortified for the defence of that ſide of his kingdom againſt the incurſions of the Turks. But the next yeare vndertaking an expedition againſt the King of Damaſco, he was by Noradin the Turke, the Kings ſonne in law, ſo hardly beſet in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his army eſcaped his hands.

Conrade 3. Emperor of Germany, takes vpon him an Expedition into the holy land.

The report of the loſſe of Edeſſa, with the miſeries there endured by the Chriſtians, being bruted thorow all parts of Chriſtendom, greatly mooued the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt. Whom Eugenius the third then Biſhop of Rome, ceaſed not both by himſelfe and by his Legats, to ſtir vp to take that ſacred war in hand. And therein wrought ſo effectually, that almoſt in euery prouince of Chriſtendom preparation was made for the relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syrians. Of all others, Conrade the third, then Emperour of Germany was moſt forward, who aided by the German Princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie men out of all parts of Chriſtendom had raiſed a moſt puiſſant Army, and therewith ſet forward on this ſacred expedition. Of this his deuout purpoſe he had before certified Emanuel the Greek Emperour, thorow whoſe countries hee was to paſſe, crauing that hee might by his good fauor ſo do, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other ſuch things as hee ſhould haue need of for himſelfe or his people, promiſing in moſt quiet and peaceable maner to paſſe, without any harm doing vnto his territories or ſubjects. All which the Greek Emperor, commending his zeale, ſeemed in moſt large terms willingly to condeſcend vnto. Neuertheleſſe he inwardly repined therat, wiſhing indeed no better ſucceſſe vnto the Chriſtians in this ſo honorable an expedition, than did the Infidels themſelues, as by the ſequell of his doings well appeared. For Conrade with his populous army, indeed a terror vnto the Greekes, entring into the confines of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, found all things in ſhew friendly (for why, Emanuel had before giuen out ſtreit command, that good ſtore of victuals & all other neceſſaries ſhould be ready at all places to be ſold as the army was to paſſe) but they were not far come into the country, but that in the tail of the army ſtill followed certaine ſtrong companies of the Greeks, to keep the ſouldiers from ſtragling from their enſignes, roaming about in the country, now and then cutting them ſhort as they took them at aduantage. And ſtil the further they trauelled, the more it was to be ſeene in the countenances of the diſcontented Greeks, how vnwelcome gueſts they were. Yet ſtill on they went thorow the countries of their diſſembling friends, little differing from open enemies, vntil they came to Philippopolis; in departing from whence, ſuch diſcord roſe betwixt them that were in the rereward of the army & the Greeks that followed them, that it was like to haue come to plain battel, had not thoſe broils by the diſcretion of ſome of the wiſer ſort bin in good time appeaſed. So marching on they came to Adrianople, & in few daies after to the plain called Cherobachi, thorow which the riuer Melas hath his courſe; which in ſummer being almoſt dry, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right ſuddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and ſo drowneth the whole countrey, that then it ſeemeth no more a riuer but a ſea, and ſwelling with the wind, is not to be paſſed ouer but by great boats. This riuer then ſuddenly riſing by night, by reaſon of the great rain that then fell in ſuch abundance as if the floud-gates of heauen had bin opened, ſo ouerflowed the place wherein the army lay incamped vpon the ſide thereof, that with the violence of the water were carried away not only many weapons, ſaddles, garments, and ſuch G other the ſoldiors neceſſaries, but euen the horſes and mules, with their burthens, yea & great numbers of armed men themſelues alſo, a moſt miſerable & lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fell without fight, and died, no man killing them: to be tall helped not, neither did valor ſtand them in any ſtead; they periſhed like hay, and were carried away like chaf, with ſuch outcries and lamentation, that they which ſaw it verily ſaid that the wrath of God was broke into the camp: ſuch a ſudden inundation had ouerwhelmed all, that happy was he could make ſhift for himſelfe, without regarding one another. This misfortune ſore troubled the Emperor with his whole army: neuertheleſſe the water being again fallen, & all put in ſo good order as in ſuch a confuſion was poſſible, he marched on to the imperiall City, which the ſuſpitious and malitious Greek had before notably fortified, and ſtrongly manned H with armed men gliſtring vpon the walls, as if it ſhould haue bin preſently aſſaulted.

Conrade the Emperor not ſuffred to enter into Conſtantinople.

Conrade approching the city, was not ſuffered to enter, but perſuaded by the Greek Emperour, forthwith to tranſport his army ouer the ſtreight, with promiſe to ſupply his wants with whatſoeuer he ſhould require. Which was done in ſuch haſt, as if nothing had bin further to haue bin regarded, but only to haue them ſhipped ouer. In which ſeruice the Greekes ſpared no labor or kind of veſſell that might ſerue to tranſport them. The Greeke Emperour in the mean time, by men ſecretly appointed for that purpoſe, keeping account of the number that paſſed, vntill that wearied with the multitude, they ceaſed further to number them. But when they were once ſhipt ouer, then began the couert malice of the Greek Emperor forthwith to appeare. For, beſides that they truſting to his promiſes, had brought little or no prouiſion I ouer with them, the country people by his appointment brought nothing vnto them to ſell, as before: and they of the towns and cities ſhut their gates againſt them as they marched, not affording them any thing but at an extreme rate, for which they would firſt receiue their mony by ropes caſt down from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleaſed therefore, yea and oftentimes nought at all. Among many other vile practiſes not beſeeming Chriſtians, the miſchieuous Greeks to poiſon the ſoldiers, mingled lime with the meal which they ſold vnto the army, whereof many of the hungry ſoldiers greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke Emperor were priuy therto or no, is not certainly known; but certain it is he cauſed counterfeit mony to be coined, of purpoſe to deceiue them: and in brief, there was no kind of miſchief to be practiſed againſt them, which either he himſelfe deuiſed not, or ſet not others to deuiſe; K to the intent that their poſteritie, terrified by this ſo vnfortunat expedition, might for euer be afraid to take the like again in hand. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could deuiſe, he had ſecret intelligence with the Turks themſelues concerning the ſtrength of the army, plotting vnto them the means how the ſame might beſt be defeated: whereby it came to paſſe that ſome part thereof was by Pamplano a captain of the Turks, ouerthrown neere Bathis, and many ſlain. But attempting to haue done the like vnto that part of the army that paſſed thorow Phrygia, they were themſelues ouertaken in their owne deuice, and ouerthrowne with a great ſlaughter. After which, the Turks in great number, to ſtay the Chriſtians further paſſage, kept the riuer Mœander, incamping vpon the further banke of that winding Riuer with a moſt huge army. There theſe worthy Chriſtians right well declared, that it was but L their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before ſo long followed them, with their countries and cities they had paſſed by, were not to them become a prey. For the Emperour comming to the riuer ſide, where was neither bridge nor boat to paſſe ouer, and finding the great army of the Turks on the other ſide ready to giue him battel if he ſhould aduenture the riuer, with their archers ſtanding vpon the very bank ſide; he retyred a little out of the danger of the ſhot, and there incamping, commanded his ſouldiers to refreſh themſelues and their horſes that night, and to be ready againſt the next morning to join battell with their enemies they were ſo far come to ſeek for. Little reſt ſerued him that night: early in the morning before day he aroſe, and arming himſelfe, put his whole army in order of battell, as did alſo the enemy on the other ſide of the riuer, with their battalions orderly placed, and their archers vpon M the bank ſide, ready to giue the firſt charge on the Chriſtians, if they ſhould aduenture to come ouer. Both armies thus ſtanding in readineſſe, the one in ſight of the other, and nothing but the winding riuer betwixt them; the Emperour before reſolued to fight, with cheerfull countenance and ſpeech encouraged his men as followeth.

The Turks with a great Army ſeeke to ſtay Conrades further paſſage at the riuer Mæander.

A notable ſpeech of Conrade the Emperor to encourage his ſoldiers to aduenture the Riuer Mæander.

That this Expedition was of vs taken in hand for Chriſt his ſake, and for the glory of God, and not of man, you know right well, fellow Souldiors. For, for this Cauſe, hauing contemned a pleaſant life at home, voluntarily ſeparated from our neereſt and deareſt Friends, we endure miſeries in forrein Countries, wee are expoſed vnto dangers, wee pine with hunger, wee quake with cold, we languiſh with heate; we haue the Earth our bed, the Heauen our couering. And although wee be noble, famous, renowned, rich, ruling ouer Nations; yet weare we alwaies our Gorgets as neceſſary bonds, and are with them and our Armour loden, as was the greateſt Seruant of Chriſt (Peter) ſurcharged with two Chaines, and kept with foure Quaternions of Souldiers. But theſe Barbarians (diuided from vs by this Riuer, to be the enemies of the Croſſe of Chriſt) whom we of long haue deſired to encounter withall, in whoſe bloud (as Dauid ſaith) we haue vowed to waſh our ſelues: Who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockiſh, and will not with open eyes ſee, nor with open eares heare? If we wiſh to aſcend ſtraight way into heauen (for neither is God vniuſt, that he knoweth not the cauſe of this our iourney, or will not in recompence giue vnto vs the immortall fields, and ſhady dwellings of Paradiſe, which hauing forſaken our owne dwellings, haue choſe rather for his ſake to die than to liue) if we call to remembrance what things theſe men of vncircumciſed hearts do commit againſt our Friends and Countreymen, if wee remember what grieuous tortures they inflict vpon them, or if we be any thing touched with the compaſſion of their innocent bloud vnworthily ſpilt; ſtand now couragiouſly, and fight valiantly, and let not any feare or terror daunt vs. Let theſe Barbarians know, That by how much Chriſt our Maſter and Inſtructer doth excell their falſe Prophet and Seducer, Author of their vaine impietie; ſo much are we Superiors vnto them in all things. Seeing therefore we are an holy Campe, and an Army gathered by the power of God, let vs not cowardly loſe our ſelues, or feare for Chriſt his ſake honorably to aduenture our liues. For if Chriſt died for vs, how much more right is it that we for him ſhould die alſo? Vnto this ſo honourable an Expedition let vs alſo giue an honourable end: let vs fight in Chriſts name with a moſt aſſured hope of an eaſie victorie. For none of them (I truſt) ſhall be able to able to abide our force, but ſhall all giue way euen to our firſt charge. But if we ſhall die (which God forbid) there ſhall be an honorable place of our buriall, whereſoeuer we ſhall for Chriſt fall. Let the Perſian Archer for Chriſt his ſake ſtrike mee, I will die with aſſured hope, and with that arrow, as with a Chariot, I will come vnto that reſt which ſhall be to me dearer, than if I ſhould with a baſe ordinary kind of death in my ſins end my dayes in a bed. Now at length let vs take reuenge of them, with whoſe impure feet our Kinſmen and Chriſtian brethren trodden downe, are gone into that common Sanctuarie, in which Chriſt our Sauiour, equall and aſſociate to his Father, is become a Companion of the Dead. Wee are thoſe mighty men, we all haue drawne our ſwords, which ſtand about the liuely and Diuine Sepulchre, as about Solomons Bed. Wherefore we that be free borne, let vs take out of the way theſe Agarens, the children of the Bondwoman; and let vs remoue them as ſtones of offence out of the way of Chriſt: whom (I know not why) the Grecians feed vp as greedy Wolues to their owne deſtruction, and with ſhame fat them with their bloud; when as with couragious mindes and thoughts beſeeming wiſe men, they ought ſo to haue been driuen from their Prouinces and Cities, as rauening wilde beaſts from their Flockes. Now foraſmuch as this Riuer (as it ſeemeth) is not but by ſome aduenture to be paſſed ouer, I my ſelfe will ſhew you the way, and be the firſt that ſhall take it. Let vs, ſerred together, forcibly breake into the Riuer, and wee ſhall well enough ride thorow it. I know that the water beaten backe by our force will be at a ſtand, and breake the courſe, returning as it were backward. By not vnlike meanes the Iſraelites in antient times on foot paſſed ouer Iordan, the courſe of the Riuer being ſtaid. This attempt ſhall be ſpoken of in all poſterities, it ſhall by no tract of time be worne out or forgotten, but ſtill remaine in freſh remembrance, to the great diſhonour of the Turkes, whoſe dead bodies ouerthrowne at this Riuer, ſhall lie like a mountaine, and be ſeen as trophey of our victorie vnto the worlds end, and our immortal praiſe and glory.

Hauing thus ſaid, and the ſignal of battel giuen, euery man hauing before by deuout praier commended himſelfe vnto almighty God, he was the firſt that put ſpurs to his horſe and took the riuer; after whom followed the reſt, ſo cloſe and forcibly, with ſuch a terrible outcry, that the courſe of the water being by the force of their horſes ſtaid, and as it were beaten back toward the fountain, the whole army paſſed ouer with leſſe trouble than was feared. And then charging the Turks, already diſcouraged to ſee them ſo deſperatly, and contrary to their expectation, to haue paſſed the riuer; after ſome ſmal reſiſtance put them to flight, wherin ſuch infinit numbers of them fel, the Chriſtians like fierce lions purſuing the chaſe, that al the vallies lies ran with bloud, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the G Italians were wounded with the Turks arrowes, and but few or none ſlain: but what a multitude of the enemies there fell, the ſundry and huge heaps of bones, to be compared vnto great hils, did long time after well declare; whereat euery man that trauelled that way did worthily wonder, as did I my ſelfe, ſaith Nicetas Choniates in reporting this hiſtory. Not much vnlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, ſlain by Marius in ſuch number, that of their bones the country people about Marcellis where the field was fought, long time after made walls for the defence of their vineyards.

Iconium in vain beſieged by the Chriſtians.

After this ſo great a victorie, the Chriſtians without reſiſtance came to Iconium the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in the leſſer Aſia, which they hardly beſieged. Neuertheleſſe ſuch was the ſtrength of the city, being ſtrongly fortified both by nature and art, together with the H valor of the defendants, that lying there long they little preuailed, preſſed in the meane time with greater extremities and wants in the camp, than were the beſieged in the city: wherupon enſued ſuch a mortality (people daily without number dying in the army) that the Emperor was glad to raiſe his ſiege and to return into his own country. The chiefe cauſe as wel of this ſo great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of ſo notable an action, moſt men aſcribe vnto the malice of the Greekes, who not without the priuitie of their Emperour (as it was commonly bruted) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to ſell into the army, whereof the hungry ſouldiers deſirouſly feeding, were therewith poiſoned, and ſo miſerably died. Of the certain time of this journey of the Emperors into Aſia, Authors agree not; howbeit wee muſt I 1146 refer it vnto the yeare 1146.

This expedition, though not ſo fortunat as it was at the firſt well hoped of, yet profited the Chriſtian commonweal in this, that the Turkes therewith throughly buſied, and doubtfull of the euent thereof, Baldwin in the mean time fortified Gaza (ſometimes a famous city of the Philiſtims, but as then ruinous) which ſerued as a moſt ſure bulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome towards Egypt; and alſo for the diſtreſſing of Aſcalon, the only refuge of the Egyptians left in that country: which ſtrong city ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide, hee with all the power of his kingdome afterward beſieged both by ſea and land: vnto the reliefe whereof the Caliph of Egypt (after he had beene fiue moneths by the Chriſtians beſieged) ſent a ſtrong fleet of ſeuenty gallies. At which time alſo on the other ſide Noradin the Turke (who K had now got into his hand all the kingdome of Damaſco) to withdraw the Chriſtians from the ſiege of Aſcalon, beſieged Paneada, from whence he was by the valour of the Citiſens repulſed, as was alſo the Caliphs fleet at ſea, and the ſiege at Aſcalon continued. Where at length the Chriſtians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall; but giuing thereunto an aſſault, they were with great loſſe of their men repulſed, and the breach again by the enemie repaired; who to the greater deſpight of the Chriſtians, hanged ouer the wals in ropes the dead bodies of their ſlain: with which ſpectacle the chiefe commanders of the army were ſo moued, that they with all their power returned againe to the aſſault, with a full reſolution to ingage thereon their whole forces; which they ſo couragiouſly performed, that the beſieged diſcouraged with the great ſlaughter of their men, and now with true valor ouercome, craued parley, and ſo couenanting that they might with their liues in ſafety depart, agreed to yeeld L vp the city, which they accordingly performed. The ſpoile of the city was giuen to the ſoldiers, and the gouernment thereof vnto Almerick the Kings brother, Earle of Ioppa. By this victory great ſecuritie was gained vnto that ſide of the kingdome, the enemy hauing now no place left in thoſe parts whereon to ſet his foot.

The honorable expedition of Lewis King of France, by the malice of the Greeks, and enuy of other Chriſtian princes of Syria, fruſtrated and brought to nothing.

About the ſame time alſo (or as ſome write, euen at the ſame time together with the Emperor) Lewis the French King the eighth of that name, took vpon him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Holy land: who ſetting forward with all the Chiualrie of France, and accompanied with diuers other great Princes, with a right puiſſant army came to Conſtantinople, where he was by Emanuel the Emperour honorably receiued with all the outward ſhews of feigned curteſie that could be deuiſed: but hauing paſſed the ſtreit, and landed M in Aſia, he found nothing anſwerable to that the diſſembling Greek had before moſt largely promiſed. And to diſtres him the more, he was by falſe guides before corrupted by the emperor, conducted thorow the moſt deſolate and barren countries, where by the way a wonderfull number of his Souldiors periſhed of hunger and thirſt: many of them alſo being cut off in the ſtreit and difficult paſſages,or as they ſtrayed from the army by the Turks themſelues,appointed by the malicious Emperor for that purpoſe. Yet after many dangers paſſed, and his army ſore waſted,he came at length into Syria, and laid ſiege vnto Damaſco the royal ſeat of Noradin the Turkiſh King ; which he ſo notably impugned, that the defendants were almoſt out of hope to be able for any long time to hold out. Neither had it otherwiſe hapned, had not Envy,the inſeparable attendant of all honourable actions,fruſtrated ſo great a hope: for the beſieged Turks beeing brought to great extremitie, and now euen at the point to haue yeelded the city,certain of the Chriſtian princes of that country,vnderſtanding that the king had promiſed the gouernment of that ſo famous a City vnto Philip Earle of Flanders, if it ſhould be won,and ſecretly grudging to haue a ſtranger preferred before themſelues, corrupted alſo(as ſome ſay)with the Turkes gold, fraudulently perſuaded the King to remoue from that part of the city where he lay, and might in fine haue taken the ſame, to another far ſtronger; where after he had lien a great while,ſtriuing with no ſmall extremities, he was inforced for want of victuals,to raiſe his ſiege and depart. And ſo without any thing done worth the remembrance,returned again into France, deteſting the very name of Emanuel the Greeke Emperor,by whoſe ſiniſter dealing ſo notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great diſcouraging of all other Chriſtian Princes for taking the like again in hand. 1147

Damaſco in vain beſieged by Lewis the French king.

Now had the ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria,for certain years after the aforeſaid expeditions,reſted in good peace:when Noradin the Turk,moued with ſome injuries done by the Chriſtians vnto the Turks and Arabians who by the leaue of K. Baldwin dwelt in the forreſt of Libanus,came and ſtreitly beſieged Paneade a city of the Chriſtians there by : vpon whom the Chriſtians in the city,now brought vnto great extremity,made a moſt deſperat ſally,and had with the Turks a ſharp and cruel fight ; but oppreſſed with the multitude,and inforced to retyre,they were ſo hardly purſued,that the Turks together with them entred the city, and put to ſword all that came in their way. Neuertheleſſe the greater part of the Citiſens (by good fortune) had in good time before retyred themſelves into the Caſtle, which was of great ſtrength,and there ſtood vpon their gard. Of whoſe diſtreſſe,with the taking of the city,Baldwin hearing,raiſed a great army,and ſo ſet forward to relieue them. But Noradin hearing of his comming,and doubtful of his own ſtrength,after he had taken the ſpoil of what he could, ſet fire on the city and ſo departed. The citiſens thus deliuered,repaired again the wals of the city,the Kings power ſtill defending them : Noradin with his power all the while lying cloſe in the woods not far off, ſtill awaiting the offer of ſome good opportunitie to take the Chriſtians at aduantage: which ſhortly after fell out according to his owne deſire ; for the King doubting no ſuch matter,but ſuppoſing him to haue bin quite gon,hauing at his returne ſent away all his footmen,followed after himſelfe, accompanied only with his horſemen,and they alſo not very ſtrong ; but as he was paſſing the riuer Iordan,he was ſuddenly ſet vpon by Noradin & the Turks,and after a ſharp conflict ouerthrown. The king himſelf with ſome few hardly eſcaped to Saphet, a town there by ; moſt of his nobility being there either ſlain or taken priſoners:among the reſt,Bertrand of Blanquefort maſter of the Templers, with diuers others of great name fel at that time into the enemies hands,and ſo were caried away priſoners.

Paneade taken and ſacked by the Turks.

Paneade again repaired by the Chriſtians.

After this victory,Noradin ſtrengthned with new ſupplies from Damaſco,came againe and beſieged Paneade,in good hope that the Citiſens,diſcouraged with ſo great an ouerthrow of the King,and out of hope to be by them relieued,would now either yeeld the city,or elſe not be able long to hold it out.But the King contrary to his expectation,had in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible,raiſed a great power,and aided by the prince of Antioch and the Countie of Tripolis,was marching to the reliefe of the city. Of which approch Noradin vnderſtanding,although he had made diuers breaches in the walls, and brought the citiſens almoſt to vtter deſpair,roſe with his army and departed. And ſo Baldwin hauing now twice relieued the beſieged city,returned alſo to Ieruſalem.

Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this yong King afterwards, during the fortunat time of his reign,wherein that troubleſome Kingdome happily flouriſhed amidſt the miſcreants ; all which to recount were long and tedious. Yet among other things it is worth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turke, then King of Damaſco, beſieging Sueta a Caſtle belonging to the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, was in a ſet battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his Army. King Baldwin had before married Emanuel the Greek Emperors neece: and now the ſame Emperor, by Guido Stephanus and Triſtllus his Embaſſadors, requeſted to haue giuen him again in mariage one of the Kings nigh kinſwomen. Vnto whom the King, after mature deliberation had concerning the matter, offered him Matilde, an honorable Lady, the ſiſter of the County of Tripolis; whom the Emperor refuſed: and afterward by the conſent of the King made choice of Mary the daughter of Raimund Prince of Antioch, lately dead. Which the County of Tripolis taking in euill part, in reuenge thereof, by certain men of war whom he put to ſea, grieuouſly infeſted the frontiers of the Emperours Dominions. Now during the time that the mariage was in ſolemniſing, the King made his abode at Antioch, at which time he fortified the caſtle of Pontiſfer vpon the riuer Orantes, againſt the incurſions of the enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to preuent ſickneſſe, vpon the approch of Winter tooke phyſicke of Barac a Iew, the Countie of Tripolis his Phyſitian. After the taking whereof he fell preſently into the bloudy flix, and afterward into a conſumption: whereby it was verily ſuppoſed that hee was poyſoned by the Iew; and the rather, for that ſome little part of the ſame medicine that was left, being giuen to a Dog, he thereof in ſhort time died. The King thus languiſhing in pain, to change the aire, remoued firſt to Tripolis, and afterward to Berytus, where he departed this troubleſome life, to liue with his Sauiour Chriſt in bliſſe for euer. His dead body was afterwards with generall mourning of his Subiects conueyed to Ieruſalem, and there ſolemnly interred by the body of his father. He departed the thirteenth of February, in the yeare of Grace 1163, when he had reigned 21 yeares. He was a man ſo gratious, that not only his friends, but euen the Infidels themſelues (as it is reported) lamented his death. Inſomuch that Noradin King of Damaſco, his antient enemy, beeing incited by ſome of his Captaines to inuade his Kingdome at ſuch time as his funeralls were in ſolemniſing, refuſed ſo to do; anſwering, That compaſſion and regard was to be had of the juſt ſorrow of the Chriſtians his ſubiects, for that they had loſt ſuch a King, the like was hardly againe to be found in the world.

But leauing the Kingdome of Ieruſalem with the greater part of Syria thus victoriouſly gained from the Infidels; let vs for the orderly continuation of our Hiſtory againe returne to ſee the proceedings of the Turks at the ſame time in the leſſer Aſia alſo: wherein they yet held the ſtate of a kingdome, though not ſo great as before the comming of the Princes of the Weſt into thoſe countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke Godfrey and the other Chriſtian Princes had much to do as they paſſed into Syria) as is aforeſaid, one Mahomet ſucceeded him: betwixt whom and Maſut Sultan of Iconium great diſcord aroſe, which at length broke forth into open war, to the further weakning of that late ſhaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his ſtate, Iohn Comnenus the Greeke Emperour gaue ayd to Maſut againſt his enemy Mahomet. Neuertheleſſe in ſhort time the two Infidels (profeſſing both one ſuperſtition) became friends, and joining their forces, ouerthrew the Emperour with his whole Army as hee lay at the ſiege of Iconium; at which time he himſelfe with much ado eſcaped by flight. Maſut afterwards hauing got into his hands the whole kingdome of the Turks, at the time of his death diuided the ſame among his three ſons: Vnto Clizaſthlan his eldeſt ſon he gaue Iconium his chiefe city, with the towns and prouinces ſubiect thereunto. Vnto Iagupaſan his other ſon (or rather as ſome will haue it, his ſon in law) he allotted Amaſia and Ancyra, with the fruitfull country of Cappadocia, and the places adjoining. But vnto Dadune his other ſon or ſon in law, he gaue the great cities of Cæſaria and Sebaſtia, with the large countries thereabouts, all ſometime a part of the Greek Empire, but then a portion of the Turks. Long it was not after this diuiſion of the kingdom, but that theſe brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetfull of the bonds both of loue and nature, fell at diſcord among themſelues: the Sultan ſeeking the deſtruction of Iagupaſan, and he likewiſe of him, and that not by ſecret means, but euen by open force of armes. Emanuel the Greeke Emperor in the mean time wiſhing the deſtruction of them both, heartily rejoiced thereat, and by Embaſſadors ſecretly animating the one againſt the other, yet in open ſhew more fauouring the part of Iagupaſan than of the Sultan, by whoſe aid he obtained againſt him many notable and bloudy victories: inſomuch that the Sultan beeing weary of the quarrell, was glad not onely by his Embaſſadors to ſeeke the Emperors fauor, but euen in perſon himſelfe to goe and meet him, as he came with his army out of Syria, and ſo to accompanie him vnto Conſtantinople, where he was together with the Emperour moſt honorably receiued, with all the ſignes of ioy and triumph that could poſſibly be deuiſed. The Emperor no leſſe reioycing to be ſued vnto by ſo great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his ſo honorable entertainment.

Nicetas Choniates, rerum ab imper. Manuele Comneno, geſt. li. 3. fol. 143.

Among other queint deuiſes of many, for the ſolemniſing of ſo great a triumph, there was an actiue Turke who had openly giuen it out, That againſt an appointed time he would from the top of an high tower in the tilt-yard flie by the ſpace of a furlong: the report whereof had filled the city with a wonderfull expectation of ſo ſtrange a noueltie. The time prefixed being come, and the people without number aſſembled, the Turke according to his promiſe, vpon the top of an high tower ſhewed himſelfe, girt in a long and large white garment, gathered into many pleits and foldings, made of purpoſe for the gathering of the wind: wherwith the fooliſh man had vainely perſuaded himſelfe to haue houered in the aire, as do birds vpon their wings, or to haue guided himſelfe as are ſhips with their ſailes. Standing thus houering a great while, as ready to take his flight; the beholders ſtill laughing, and crying out, Flie Turke, flie, how long ſhall we expect thy flight? the Emperor in the meane time ſtill diſſuading him from ſo deſperate an attempt; and the Sultan betwixt feare and hope hanging in doubtfull ſuſpence what might happen to his countryman. The Turke, after he had a great while houered with his armes abroad, (the better to haue gathered the wind, as birds do with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders, at length finding the winde fit, as he thought, for his purpoſe, committed himſelfe with his vaine hope vnto the aire: but in ſtead of mounting aloft, this fooliſh Icarus came tumbling downe with ſuch violence, that he brake his necke, his arms, his legs, with almoſt all the bones of his body. This fooliſh flight of the Turke gaue ſuch occaſion of ſport and laughter vnto the vulgar people (alwaies ready to ſcoffe and ieaſt at ſuch ridiculous matters) that the Turks attending vpon the Sultan could not walke in the ſtreets vnderided; the artificers in their ſhops ſhaking their arms, with their tooles in their hands as did the Turke, and ſtill crying out, Flie Turke, flie: whereof the Emperor hearing, although he could not chooſe but therat ſmile himſelfe, as not ignorant of the ſcoffes and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieued therewith, he commanded ſuch their inſolencie to be reſtrained.

The ſolemnitie of the triumph ouerpaſſed (which by an ominous earthquake at the ſame time hapning, was ſomwhat obſcured) the Emperor to ſhew his wealth, & to gratifie the Sultan, gaue vnto him many rich & royall preſents, with ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as that he much wondred thereat. In requitall wherof, and in token of his thankefulneſſe, he again honored the Emperor with the name of his father, and terming himſelfe by the name of his ſon, promiſed to reſtore vnto him the city of Sebaſtia, with the territory thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance. Neuertheleſſe, all this was nothing elſe but meere diſſimulation, as afterward by proofe appeared: for returning home, hee thruſt Dadune indeed out of Sebaſtia, which he ſpoyled, with the country thereabout; and forgetfull of his promiſe, kept it wholly to himſelfe; and by force tooke alſo from him the city of Cæſarea, with the country of Amaſia, by him before but lately poſſeſſed. In like manner he bent his forces alſo vpon Iagupaſan his other brother, who in the very preparation of thoſe wars died: by whoſe vntimely death the city of Ancyra, with all his dominions in Capadocia, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now poſſeſſed of all his fathers kingdome, and ſwelling with pride, forgetting all former curteſies, inuaded the Emperors territories, and took from him the city of Laodicea in Phrygia; where he did great harme, as alſo in the country therabouts, killing the people as he went, or elſe carrying them away with him captiues. For the repreſſing of which outrages, the Emperor with a ſtrong army paſſed ouer into Aſia, and there in the frontiers of his territories fortified Dorileum againſt the incurſions of the Turks. In performing whereof, he, to the example and ſtirring vp of others, carried the firſt basket of ſtones himſelfe vpon his ſhoulders; and vſed ſuch further diligence, that in ſhort time the city was compaſſed about with ſtrong wals, and deepe ditches, maugre the Turks, who ceaſed not with continuall alarmes and skirmiſhes to haue hindred the worke. With like care, and for like purpoſe he alſo fortified Subleum, another ſtrong Hold; and leauing in either place a ſtrong garriſon, returned againe to Conſtantinople. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ceaſed not with continuall inrodes to doe what harmes they might vpon the frontiers of the Empire, although not altogether with ſo good ſucceſſe as before, being many times cut off by the garriſons of the late fortified towns : which grieuances ſtill increaſing, cauſed the Emperor to expoſtulate with the Sultan, as with an vnthankful man, and forgetfull of ſo great kindnes before done vnto him, as the eſtabliſhment of him in his kingdome came vnto : who with no leſſe vehemencie vpbraided him againe with inconſtancy & breach of promiſe, as wel for fortifying the aforeſaid places contrarie to the league betwixt them, as for that hauing promiſed much more, hee had thereof performed nothing. Thus vnkindnes daily growing vpon euery trifle (as it commonly falleth out among men of great ſpirit, and jealous of their owne honors) it was daily expected, when the matter ſhould fall out into open and bloody war; both of them being men of great valor, and apt to reuenge the leaſt iniurie to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner, warily to mannage his warres by his politique and expert captaines ; whereas the Emperour being of an hotter nature, and couragious aboue meaſure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his owne perſon, without reſpect what danger might thereof inſue vnto himſelfe or his ſtate. Long it was not but that the Emperour, fully reſolued to be reuenged of ſo many wrongs done to him and his ſubiects by the Turks, raiſed the whole power of his empire, both in Europe and Aſia, in ſuch ſort as if he had therewith purpoſed, not onely to haue raſed to the ground Iconium the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultan, but euen vtterly to haue deſtroied the whole Nation of the Turks. Thus with a moſt puiſſant and populous armie, wel appointed of all things neceſſarie, he paſſed ouer into Aſia, and ſo in good order marching through Phrygia, Laodicea, Chonas, (called in antient time Paſſas) S. Archangel, Lampis, Cælænas, (where the head of the great and famous riuer Mœander riſeth, whereinto the riuer Marſyas falleth) and from thence to Chonia, he with euill lucke, and worſe ſpeed, paſſed by Myriocephalon, an old ruinous caſtle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the euent in ſhort time after it prooued. And albeit that he marched very circumſpectly, ſtill intrenching his armie in euery place where he lodged ; yet could he make but ſmall ſpeed, by reaſon of the multitude of his cariages, and of the baſe people that attended the ſame. The Turks in the mean while oftentimes ſhewing themſelues in troupes, and in places of aduantage ſkirmiſhing ſometime with one part of the armie, and ſomtime with another, but neuer daring to aduenture the fortune of a iuſt battell: yet by ſuch meanes were the victuallers of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the paſſages for the Emperor made very dangerous. And the more to diſtreſſe the Chriſtians in their long trauell, they found the countrey before them of purpoſe deſtroied by the Turkes, and the water in many places poiſoned, whereof the Chriſtians vnaduiſedly drinking, fell into many grieuous diſeaſes, eſpecially the flix, & therof died in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readineſſe a right puiſſant armie of his owne, and had procured great aid from the Perſian Sultan his kinſman and chiefe ſupporter; yet fearing the doubtfull euent of war, and loth to aduenture his whole eſtate vpon the fortune of a battell, ſought by his Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, to grow to ſome peace with the Emperour, and that vpon ſuch honorable conditions, as by the wiſer ſort were thought not to be at any hand refuſed : which large offers, the Sultan as deſirous of peace, made vnto him not once, but again and againe : which the Emperor neuertheleſſe (repoſing great confidence in his owne power, and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace, than the hard wars of the Turks) proudly reiected, and ſo diſmiſſing the Embaſſadors, ſcornfully willed them to tell their Maſter, That he would giue him anſwer to his requeſts, vnder the wals of Iconium. Which cauſed the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperour and him, with all his power to take the ſtraits of Zibrica, whereby the armie of the Chriſtians, departing from Myriocephalon, muſt of neceſſitie paſſe. The entrance into theſe ſtraits was by a long valley, on either ſide incloſed with high mountains, which towards the North riſing and falling according as the hils gaue leaue, opened into diuers large vallies, which by little and little growing againe ſtraiter and ſtraiter, with high and craggie rockes hanging ouer on either ſide, and almoſt touching one another, gaue vnto the painfull traueller a moſt hard and difficult paſſage.

Into this ſo daungerous a valley the Emperor, not fearing the enemies force, deſperatly entred with his armie, hauing neither prouided for the clearing of the paſſages, or ſafetie of his carriages, in no other order than as if he had marched through the plain and champain countrey, although it were before told him (that which he ſhortly after, but too late ſaw) that the enemie had ſtrongly poſſeſſed both the ſtraits and mountaines to hinder his further paſſage. The vauward of his armie was conducted by Iohn and Andronicus the ſons of Angelus Conſtantine, accompanied with Macroducas Conſtantine, and Lapardas Andronicus: in the right wing was Baldwin the Emperors brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: after them followed the drudges and ſcullions, with an infinite number of carters and other baſe people, attending vpon the carriages, with the baggage of the whole armie: next vnto theſe came the Emperor with the main battell, conſiſting for the moſt part of right valiant and worthy ſoldiers: the rereward was ſhut vp by Andronicus Contoſtephanus, with a number of moſt reſolute men. They were not far entred into theſe ſtraits, but that the Turks from the mountaines and broken cliffes, ſhewed themſelues on euery ſide, deliuering their deadly ſhot from the vpper ground, vpon the Chriſtians below, as thicke as haile: neuertheleſſe the ſons of Angelus with Macroducas & Lapardas, and the vantgard, caſting themſelues into a three ſquare battel in form of a wedge, with their targuets in manner of a penthouſe caſt cloſe together ouer their heads, and their archers on euery ſide luſtily beſtowing their ſhot amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies, by plain force droue them out of the ſtraits they had before poſſeſſed, and cauſed them to retire farther off into the mountains, and ſo hauing made themſelues way, with little or no loſſe paſſed thoſe dangerous ſtraits; till that at length hauing recouered the top of a hill very very commodious for their purpoſe, as the caſe ſtood, they there ſtaid, & preſently incamped themſelues. And happily with like good fortune might the reſt of the army haue paſſed alſo, had they in like order, & with like courage preſently followed after: but failing ſo to do, and troubled with the multitude of their carriages, which could not poſſibly make any way throgh thoſe ſtrait & rough paſſages, (but troubled themſelues one another, as alſo the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miſerably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh archers, whoſe arrowes fell as thick vpon them from the mountains, as if it had bin a perpetual tempeſt or ſhoure of haile, to the great diſordering and diſmaying of the whole armie: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith incouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountains, where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Chriſtians, and forcibly entring the plain ground, & comming to handy blows, firſt ouerthrew the right wing; where Baldwin himſelf ſeeking to reſtore his diſordered companies, and to ſtay the furie of the enemie (now raging in the bloud of the Chriſtians) with a troupe of valiant horſemen breaking into the thickeſt of them, as became a worthie captaine, was there compaſſed in with the multitude of his enemies, and ſlaine, together with all his followers, and the greateſt part of the whole wing by him commanded: with this victorie the Turks were ſo incouraged, that comming down with all their power, they ſtopped all the waies whereby the Chriſtians were to paſſe, who as men couped vp in thoſe dangerous ſtraits, were not able either to defend themſelues, or to help one another: but incloſed as deer in a toile, and one troubling another, were the cauſe both of the deſtruction of themſelues and others: for by reaſon of the ſtraitnes of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behinde in the rereward come forward to relieue the one the other, as need required: the carriages alſo, which were many, and in the midſt of the army, ſeruing them to no other purpoſe, than to the hurt of themſelues. There were the beaſts that ſerued for burden, together with the ſoldiers, ouerwhelmed with the Turks ſhot, the vallies lay full of dead bodies, the riuers ran mingled with the bloud of men and beaſts, in ſuch terrible manner as is not by pen to be expreſſed. For the Chriſtians not able either to go forward or retire, were there in thoſe ſtraits ſlain like ſheep: if any courage or ſparke of valour were by any ſhewed againſt the enemy, fighting at ſo great aduantage, it was but loſt, ſeruing to little or no purpoſe. And to increaſe their miſeries, the Turks in ſcorne ſhewed vpon the point of a lance the head of Andronicus Bataza, the emperors nephew, who comming with an army out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, againſt the Turks of Amaſia, was now by the way by them ouerthrowne and ſlaine. The report whereof, confirmed by the ſight of his head, and the conſideration of the deſperat danger wherein the whole army preſently ſtood, ſo troubled the Emperour, that he was at his wits end; and with drie teares (if it may be ſo ſaid) diſſembling his inward griefe, as one out of comfort, ſtood doubtfull which way to turne himſelfe. For the Turks hauing ſuffered the vantgard to paſſe, with all their power charged the Emperors main battell, as his chief ſtrength, nothing doubting, but that hauing once ouerthrown it, they ſhould eaſily & at pleaſure ouerthrow the reſt.

Baldwin ſlain.

The miſerie of the Chriſtians, by the Turks incloſed in the ſtraits.

The Emperor in great perplexitie.

The deſperat reſolution of the Emperor.

Almoſt miſerable ſpectacle.

Oftentimes had the Emperour attempted to haue driuen the enemy out of thoſe ſtraits, and ſo to haue opened a way for his army to haue paſſed, but all in vaine, the power of the Turkes ſtil increaſing, and they at great aduantage notably maintaining the paſſages before by them taken: neuertheleſſe ſeeing no leſſe danger in ſtaying ſtil, than in going forward, he with a few of his beſt ſoldiers, armed with deſpaire, and reſolued to die, (to which kind of men nothing is terrible) ſet forward directly vpon his enemies, willing the reſt with like reſolution euery man to make for himſelſe the beſt ſhift he could. And ſo with many wounds & ſturdy blows both giuen and receiued, he by plaine force and might of hand brake through the thickeſt of his enemies, and ſo eſcaped out of thoſe ſtraits as out of a trap: but yet not without many wounds receiued in his perſon, and himſelfe ſo wearied, as that hee was not able to lift vp his helmet, being beaten cloſe to his head, and in his target were found ſticking 30 of the Turks arrows, or therabouts, the manifeſt tokens of his danger. The other legions ſeeking to follow the Emperor, (for other way they had none) were on euery ſide hardly aſſailed by the Turks, and infinit numbers of them ſlain, beſide many others that periſhed in thoſe ſtraits, ouerborn and trodden to death by their owne fellows. Yea ſuch as had the fortune to eſcape out of one of theſe perillous ſtraits, were forthwith ſlaine in the next: for this ſo daungerous a paſſage through the mountains, was diuided (as is aforeſaid into ſeuen vallies, which giuing fair and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew ſtil ſtraiter & ſtraiter, al which ſtraits the Turks had before ſtrongly poſſeſſed. At which time alſo, the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the light ſand raiſed with the feet of the men and horſes, was by the violence of a moſt tempeſtuous wind which then blew, carried ſo forcibly and thicke, that both the armies grapling together, as if it had bin in the darknes of the night, killed whomſoeuer they met with, without reſpect of friend or foe; by which errour many were euen of their owne friends ſlaine. In euery place lay great heaps of Turks ſlain together with the Chriſtians, and with them great numbers of horſes & other beaſts for cariage; ſo that thoſe vallies where this bloudy conflict was, ſeemed to be nothing elſe but a large burying place of the Turks & Chriſtians with their horſes: but the greateſt number was of the Chriſtians that periſhed, and they not altogether of the common ſort, but euen of the braueſt captaines, and the Emperors neereſt kinſmen: the violence of the wind ceaſing, and the day cleering vp, there was of all others to be ſeen (a moſt wofull ſpectacle) men yet aliue, ſome wounded, ſome whole, couered ſome to the middle, ſome to the neck, with dead carkaiſes, in ſuch ſort, as that they were not able with any ſtrugling to get out: who with their hands caſt vp towards heauen, with ruthfull voices cried out for help to ſuch as paſſed by; but all in vaine, for euery man poſſeſſed with the common feare, and by their danger meaſuring their owne, paſſed by them without compaſſion, as more carefull of their owne ſafety, leauing them yet liuing, as men to be numbred among the dead.

The Emperour himſelfe, as a man almoſt now ſpent, being got out of the danger, ſtood a while to breath himſelf vnder the ſhadow of a wild peare tree, without any page or man to attend him; whom a poore common ſoldier eſpying, and moued with compaſſion, came to him, and offering him the beſt ſeruice he could, helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his armor, which before hung dangling here & there about him: when in the mean while a Turke comming in vpon him, had taken his horſe by the bridle, in hope to haue led him away priſoner: whom for all that, the Emperor as weary as he was, with the trunchion of his broken lance which he had yet in his hand, ſtruck down to the ground, and ſo cleered himſelfe of him. Preſently after came alſo another ſort of the ſtragling Turks, ready alſo to haue ſeiſed vpon him, and to haue taken him priſoner; of whom he ſlew one with the aforeſaid horſemans ſtaffe, and with his ſword ſtruck off the head of another of them, and ſo kept them off, vntill that by the comming in of ten of his owne ſouldiers he was relieued. Departing thence with purpoſe to haue ioyned himſelfe vnto the legions that were gon before in the vauward, he had not gone farre, but that he was much troubled by other Turks that he met, and the heapes of the dead bodies that lay in his way: yet at laſt, hauing with much labour and more danger paſſed the ſtraits, and a riuer running thereby, being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of his own people, and ſome other of his owne ſoldiers now reſorting vnto him, he there ſaw Iohn Catacuzene, a noble and right valiant gentleman that maried his neece, fighting alone againſt a great number of the Turks, to be compaſſed in and ſlaine; whom he was no way able to relieue. Which Turks alſo ſeeing him paſſe by, followed after him, as after a moſt rich prey, in hope to haue either preſently taken or ſlaine him: whom neuertheleſſe he (encouraging the ſmall company he had about him) notably repulſed; and ſo ſomtime marching forward, and again as occaſion required making a ſtand, came at length long looked for, but moſt welcom, vnto the legions that were gon before, not ſo ſorry for their owne hard eſtate, as carefull of his danger.

But before he could come to thoſe his legions, he ready to faint for thirſt, commanded water to be brought him out of the riuer that ran faſt by; which after he had taſted, & by the vnpleaſant taſt therof perceiued the ſame to be infected, he fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid, O how vnfortunately haue I taſted Chriſtian bloud! whereunto an audacious and malapert ſouldier there preſent, and more bitter than the cruell time it ſelfe, replyed, Emperour, thou didſt not now, thou didſt not now I ſay, firſt, but long ſince, and oftentimes drinke the bloud of the Chriſtians, euen vntil thou waſt drunke againe, at ſuch time as thou didſt with moſt grieuous exactions vexe and deuoure thy poore ſubjects. Which reproachfull ſpeech the Emperour put vp in ſilence, making as if he had not heard it. With like patience he alſo forbare the ſame railing companion, at ſuch time as hee ſeeing his treaſures hardly beſet, and in danger to be taken by the Turkes, to animate his ſoldiers, willed them to do what they could to reſcue the ſame, and to take it for their labor: This treaſure (ſaid this impudent fellow) ſhould before haue bin giuen vnto thy ſoldiers, rather than now, when as it cannot be recouered but with great danger and bloudſhed: and therefore if thou be a man of valor, as thou wouldſt be accounted, and as the preſent caſe requireth, valiantly charge the Turks (now ready to carry it away) thy ſelfe, and ſo recouer thine euill gotten goods. Whereunto the Emperor anſwered no more but, Good words ſouldier, and ſo put it vp, as did Dauid the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the comming of the Emperor vnto thoſe legions of his vauntgard (the only remainder of his army that was left whole and vnbroken) came alſo Andronicus Contoſtephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with diuers other of great place, who had by good fortune eſcaped the fury of the Turks. The miſeries of that day (not well to be expreſſed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Chriſtians ſate in the camp, oppreſſed with a generall heauineſſe, leaning their heads vpon their elbows, and conſidering the preſent danger wherein they were, ſcarcely accounted themſelues among the liuing: the Turks in the meane time to increaſe their feare, all the night running about the camp, and crying aloud vnto ſuch of their countreymen in the camp, as had abiured their religion, or for other reſpects had taken part with the Imperials, that they ſhould that night get them out of the camp, whereas otherwiſe if they ſtaid vnto the morning, they ſhould be al but loſt men. In this ſo great an extremity the Emperour knowing not what to do, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the deſperat danger they were in, together with his reſolution; which was, ſecretly himſelfe to flie, and to leaue the reſt, euery man to make what ſhift he could for himſelfe. Which his baſe determination, ſo foule as fouler could not be, they all wondring at, as proceeding from a diſtraughted mind, and by chance ouerheard by one of the common ſoldiers that ſtood without the tent, the ſame ſouldier fetching a deep ſigh, in deteſtation thereof cryed out with a loud voice, What means the Emperor? And ſo turning himſelf vnto him, ſaid, Art not thou he that haſt thruſt vs into this deſolate and ſtrait way, and caſt vs headlong into deſtruction? and haſt as it were in a morter incloſed vs in theſe rocks and mountains, ready as it were to ouerwhelme vs. What had we to do with this vaile of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came we into theſe miſchieuous and rough ſtraits? What can we particularly complaine of the Barbarians, which in theſe inextricable windings and ſtraits haue thus intangled and beſet vs? Was it not thou that broughtſt vs hither? And wilt thou now, as ſheep appointed to the ſlaughter, thy ſelfe betray vs? With which ſo ſharp a reprehenſion the Emperor throughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, reſoluing now to ſtand by it, whatſoeuer hapned. But what ſhould he now do, beſet with his enemies ſtill ready to deuoure him? Help he ſaw none, either in himſelf, or to be expected from others, nought remained but death and deſpaire. In this extremity, al mans help now failing, it pleaſed the moſt mighty (which chaſtiſeth & healeth again, which ſtriketh, & yet giueth life, and ſuffereth not the ſtaffe of the ſinners always to rage into the portion of the iuſt) with mercifull eye to looke down vpon theſe diſtreſſed men, and with an vnwonted kind of clemency to touch the Sultans heart, in ſuch ſort, as that he which but the other day ſtood in dread of the Emperour, and now hauing him as it were in his power, was ouercome with his miſery: or as in times paſt he by Huſai ouerthrew the counſell of Achitophel, and changed the mind of Abſalon to follow ſuch aduice as ſhould bring him to deſtruction: ſo then alſo he turned the minde of the Turkiſh Sultan, that (perſuaded by certaine of the chieſe men about him, who in time of peace had vſed to receiue great gifts and Preſents from the Emperor) he of his owne accord by his Embaſſadors offered peace vnto the Emperour, before that he in ſo great diſtreſſe ſued vnto him for any; and that vpon the ſelfe ſame conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turks in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans reſolution, early in the morning were ready to aſſault the emperors camp, in hope at once to haue ouerthrown his whole power; and with a barbarous outcry ſtill riding about it, came ſo nigh, that with their arrows they ſlew diuers of the Chriſtians within their own trenches: againſt whom the Emperor ſent out Iohn the ſon of Conſtantinus Angelus, and after him, Macroducas Conſtantinus, but to little or no purpoſe. In the mean time came one Gabras, a man of greateſt reputation among the Turks, Embaſſador from the Sultan; by whoſe commandement the Turkes ceaſed further to aſſault the camp. This Gabras comming vnto the Emperor, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honoring him with reuerence done euen down to the ground; firſt preſented him with a goodly horſe, whoſe furniture was all of ſiluer, as if it had bin for a triumph, and a rare two edged ſword: afterwards falling into a large diſcourſe concerning a peace to be made and with many kind words as with an inchantment appeaſing the Emperors heauineſſe conceiued of his late loſſe; he among other pleaſant conceits then vttered, ſeeing the Emperor in a rich robe of yellow ouer his armor, told him, that the colour was not fit for war, as ominous, and portending euil luck: whereat the Emperor a little ſmiling, gaue it him, with the fortune thereof; and receiuing the horſe and ſword ſent him from the Sultan, ſigned the peace. Amongſt other conditions of the peace (which the daungerouſnes of the time ſuffered not the Emperor curiouſly to examine) one was, That Dorileum and Subleum, before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunat war, ſhould be again raſed.

The Emperor returneth.

Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the Emperor deliuered of a great feare, purpoſed another way to return home, to auoid the ſight of the ſlaine: yet was he by his guides, euen of purpoſe as it was thought, led backe the ſame way, to behold with his eyes thoſe miſerable ſpectacles of the ſlain, which could not with any tears be ſufficiently lamented: for the ſtraits were made plain, the vallies were raiſed into hils, and the forreſts lay couered with the carkaſſes of the ſlaine: no man paſſed by, but with heauines and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there loſt. Hauing againe paſſed thoſe dolefull ſtreits, the Turks were again in the taile of the army: for it was reported, That the Sultan repenting himſelfe to haue ſuffered his enemies ſo to ſcape out of his hands, had giuen leaue to ſuch as would, to purſue them, but followed not himſelf with his whole power, as before; for moſt of the better ſort of his ſoldiers loaded with the ſpoile, were now returned home. Yet theſe that followed after the army, ſlew many, eſpecially ſuch as were weak or wounded, and ſo vnable to follow the reſt: although the Emperor to help the matter, had for the repreſſing of them placed the beſt of his captains and ſoldiers in the rereward. Being come to Chonas, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto euery one of his hurt ſoldiers money to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their countries; and comming to Philadelphia, there ſtaid for the refreſhing of himſelf after ſo great miſeries.

The Emperor altogether performs not what he had promiſed to the Sultan.

In his return he raſed Subleum, according to his promiſe, but not Dorileum: whereof the Sultan by his Embaſſadors complaining, he anſwered, That what he had, inforced thereto by neceſſity, promiſed, he greatly forced not to performe: in reuenge whereof, the Sultan ſent out one of his moſt valiant captains, called Atapac, with 24000 good ſoldiers choſen out of his whole army, with ſtreit charge to waſt and deſtroy all the emperors prouinces & towns euen vnto the ſea ſide, without ſparing man, woman, or child; and in token thereof, to bring with him ſome of the ſea water, an oare, and ſome of the ſea ſand: who according to his charge ſpoiled Phrygia, with the cities along the riuer Mæander, euen to the ſea ſide: and ſo returning with a rich prey, by the way ſpoiled what before he had left vntouched.

But in paſſing the riuer Mæander, when he feared leaſt, he fell into the hands of Iohn Bataza the Emperors nephew, and of Ducas Conſtantine a moſt valiant captain; of purpoſe ſent againſt him by the Emperour with a great power: where he was by them ſlain, together with all his army, and the rich booty he had taken, all again recouered. Many other hard conflicts paſſed after this, betwixt the Imperials & the Turks, the one continually ſeeking to annoy the other; all which, for that therein nothing fell out much worth the remembrance, I for breuitie willingly paſſe ouer. In theſe endles troubles did Emanuel the Greek Emperor, whom he had by the ſpace of eight and thirty yeares worthily gouerned that great empire, hauing in the time of his ſickneſſe but a little before his death taken vpon him the habit of a Monk, in token he had forſaken the world. All the time of his reigne he was no leſſe jealous of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, than of the Turks in the Eaſt; and therfore euer dealt with them vnkindly. In time of war he was ſo laborious, as if he had neuer taken felicity but in pain; and againe in peace ſo giuen ouer to his pleaſure, as if he had neuer thought of any thing els: after whoſe death the Turkiſh Sultan, without reſiſtance inuading the frontiers of the empire, tooke Sozopolis, with diuers towns thereabout in Phrygia, and long beſieged the famous city of Atalia, and ſo daily encroched more and more vpon the prouinces of the empire, ioining the ſame vnto his owne; which was no great matter for him to do, the Greek empire being then no better gouerned then was the chariot of the Sun (as the poets feigne) by Phaeton, far vnfit for ſo great a charge: for Alexius Comnenus, otherwiſe called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a childe of about 12 yeares old, ſucceeding his graue father in the empire, after the maner of children altogether following his pleaſure; his mother with his fathers kinſmen and friends, who aboue all things ought to haue had an eſpeciall care of his education, neglecting the old Emperors truſt in them repoſed, followed alſo their own delights, without the regard of the ruine of the common-weale. Some enamored with the beauty of the young Empreſſe, gaue themſelues al to brauery, and the courting of her, otherſome in great authority, with no leſſe deſire in the mean time, with the common treaſures filled their empty coffers: and a third ſort there was (of all the reſt moſt dangerous) who neither reſpecting their ſenſual pleaſure, nor the heaping vp of wealth, looked not ſo low, aiming at the very empire it ſelfe. As for the common good, that was of all other things of them all leaſt regarded. Among theſe third ſort of the ambitious, was old Andronicus, the couſin of the late Emperor Emanuel, a man of an haughtie and troubleſome ſpirit, whom he the ſaid Emperor Emanuel had for his aſpiring, moſt part of the time of his reigne kept in priſon, or elſe in exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for fear of raiſing new troubles, confin'd to liue far off from the court at Oenum: who now hearing of the death of the Emperor Emanuel, of the factions in court, of the childiſhneſſe of the young emperor Alexius, giuen wholly to his ſports; and the great men put in truſt to haue ſeene to his bringing vp, and to the gouernment of the empire, ſome like Bees to fly abroad into the country, ſeeking after mony as the Bees do after hony; ſome others in the mean time like hogs, lying ſtill and fatting themſelues with great and gainfull offices, wallowing in all exceſſe and pleaſure, to haue no regard of the honor or profit of the common-weale: thought it now a fit time (in ſuch diſorder of the ſtate) for him to aſpire vnto the empire after which he had all his life time longed. That he was generally beloued of the Conſtantinopolitans, yea and of ſome of the nobilitie alſo, he doubted not: for them he had long before by his popular behauior gained, together with the diſtruſt of the late Emperor, jealous of his eſtate; which as it coſt him his liberty, ſo miſſed it not much but that it had coſt him his life alſo: but now that he was dead, wanted nothing more than ſome faire colour for the ſhadowing of his foule purpoſe. Among many and right diuers things by him thought vpon, was a clauſe in the oath of obedience which he had giuen to the Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his ſon, (which oath he had deliuered vnto him in writing) That if he ſhould ſee, heare, or vnderſtand of any thing dangerous or hurtfull to their honor, empire, or perſons, he ſhould forthwith bewray it, and to the vttermoſt of his power withſtand it: which words (not ſo to haue been wreſted) as beſt ſeruing for his purpoſe he took firſt occaſion for to work vpon. And as he was a ſtout and imperious man, therupon writ diuers letters vnto the young emperor his couſin, to Theodoſius the Patriarch, and other ſuch as he knew well affected vnto the late emperor Emanuel: wherin among other things which he wiſhed to be amended in the preſent gouernment, he ſeemed moſt to complaine of the immoderate power and authoritie of Alexius, then preſident of the Councell, who in great fauor with the young emperour, and more inward with the empreſſe his mother than was ſuppoſed to ſtand with her honour, ruled all things at his pleaſure, inſomuch, as that nothing don by any the great officers of the empire, or by the emperor himſelfe, was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was growne to ſuch an exceſſiue pride, hauing all things in his power as that no man could without danger, as vpon the venomous Baſiliſke, look vpon him. Of which his ſo exceſſiue and inſolent power Andronicus by his letters now greatly complained, moued thereunto (as he would haue it beleeued) with the care he had of the yong Emperors ſafety, which could not (as he ſaid) long ſtand with the others ſo great power, which he therfore (as in duty bound) wiſhed to be abridged: aggrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiarity with the empreſſe; which firſt muttered in court, afterwards flew (as he ſaid) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the perſon of the Emperor, and diſhonor of the ſtate, he forſooth as one in conſcience bound, with great grauity and eloquence (beeing a very learned man) both in open ſpeech and writing moſt earneſtly deſired: and thereby ſo wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithful counſellor to the ſtate, a thing much to haue bin wiſhed. Wherefore leauing Oenum, the place whereto he was by the Emperour Emanuel in a ſort baniſhed, trauelling towards Conſtantinople, hee gaue it out in euery place where he came, what he had ſworne, and what he would for his oaths ſake do: vnto whom men deſirous of the change of the ſtate, and ſuch as gaue credit vnto the report long before giuen out, That he ſhould at length become Emperor; flockt in great numbers, as birds about an owle, to ſee him, and with vain praiſes to chatter about him. In this ſort he came as far as Paphlagonia; in euery place honorably receiued, as if he had bin a deliuer of his countrey ſent from God. And in the imperiall city he was not longed for of the vulgar people only, as their light and load ſtar, but diuers of the nobility alſo by ſecret meſſengers and letters, perſuaded him to haſten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernment; aſſuring him, that there would be none to reſiſt him, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt his ſhadow, but all ready to receiue him: eſpecially Mary the yong Emperors ſiſter by the fathers ſide, with her husband Caſar; who being a woman of great ſpirit, and grieuing much to ſee her Fathers Empire made a prey vnto Alexius the preſident, & the Empreſſe her ſtep mother, whom ſhe naturally hated, had raiſed a great and dangerous tumult in the city againſt them both, which was not without much bloudſhed appeaſed: and now ceaſed not by often and moſt earneſt letters (to her own deſtruction, and her husbands, as afterwards it fel out) to prick forward Andronicus and to haſten his comming: who by letters and meſſengers daily comming vnto him from the court ſtil more and more incouraged, leauing behind him the country of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclea in Pontus, and ſtil on towards the imperiall city, with great cunning and diſſimulation winning the hearts of the people as he went. For who was ſo ſtony hearted; whom his ſweet words and abundant teares flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentifull fountaines down by his hoary cheeks, might not haue moued? All that he did or deſired, was (as he ſaid) for the common good and liberty of the Emperor. By which means he had drawne vnto him a wonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as he came. But comming into Bythinia, he was by Iohn Ducas gouernour of the great city of Nice, ſhut out as an enemy to the ſtate, and ſo at Nicomedia alſo. Neuertheleſſe, paſſing by thoſe cities, he held ſtill on his way, vntil at length he was neer to a caſtle called Charace, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, ſent with a great power againſt him, by the great preſident Alexius; who otherwiſe as an effeminat man, giuen ouer to his pleaſure, ſpending the greateſt part of the night in royoting by candle light, and moſt part of the day in his bed, with curtains cloſe drawn, as if it had been night: yet doubtfull now of the comming of his enemy, left nothing vndon which he thought might help for the aſſuring of his ſtate. Many of the nobility of whom he ſtood in doubt, he gained vnto him by means of the Emperors mother; who by her rare beauty, ſweet words, and gracious behauiour, as with a line drew all men to her. Other ſome hee ouercame with gifts and great ſummes of money, whereof he now made no ſpare: And ſo wrought the matter, that no man of any acount or marke went ouer to Andronicus. Who neuertheleſſe with ſuch followers as hee had, ioyning battell with Angelus (ſent againſt him, as is before ſaid) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great diſpleaſure and without reaſon, called Angelus (now fled to Conſtantinople) to an account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defraying of the charges of that vnfortunate warre: who ſeeing his misfortune to be ſo taken as if he had framed it himſelf and of purpoſe betraid the army committed to his charge; by the counſell of his ſix ſons, being all men of great valor and wiſedome, firſt tooke the refuge of his owne houſe: but finding himſelfe there in no ſafetie, with his wife and his ſaid ſonnes (two of which came afterwards to be Emperours) preſently fled ouer the ſtrait to Andronicus: who ſeeing of him comming towards him, is reported to haue vſed this text of Scripture, Behold I will ſend mine Angell before thy face to prepare thy wayes: alluding to his name of Angelus, as the preſage of his good ſucceſſe. Wherefore incouraged with the comming of theſe noblemen his kinſmen, he without longer ſtay marched directly vnto the ſea ſide, and there a little aboue Chalcedon encamped almoſt right ouer againſt Conſtantinople: cauſing many great fires (moe than needed) to be made in his army, to make it ſeeme vnto them of the city greater than indeed it was; and with the ſight thereof to keep the citizens in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of ſome great matter to enſue. Wherein he was no whit deceiued; for they hauing him now as it were in ſight, leauing their worke, ran ſome to the ſea ſide, ſome vp to the hils and high towers to behold his army a far off, willing with their friendly looks, if it had bin poſſible, to haue drawne him ouer the ſtreit into the city. Alexius knowing himſelfe not able by land to encounter with ſo ſtrong an enemy, (for now ſome which on foot could not go ouer to Andronicus, were ſecretly in heart already with him; otherſome thought themſelues ſufficiently to ſhew their fidelity to the Emperor, if ſitting ſtill at home, they ſhould take part with neither: for ſo haue ſubtill heads and aſpiring mindes, for the furtherance of their deſires, taught the common people both to ſay and think) thought it beſt by ſea to auert the preſent danger: and therfore commanded all the emperors gallies (being before rigged vp and ready) to be ſtrongly manned and put to ſea, for the keeping of Propontis and the ſtreit of Boſphorus, that Andronicus ſhould not that way paſſe: now had he determined to haue made eſpeciall choice of ſome aſſured friend of his own to be General of this fleet, as he had done of the captains and maſters, being all his own kinſmen or domeſticall ſeruants: but as he was about to haue ſo done, Contoſtephanus (ſirnamed the great captain) oppoſed himſelf againſt it, challinging that place as due vnto himſelfe, before al others: ſo that ouercome by his authority (which it was no time for Alexius now to diſpute) he was glad to commit the charge and truſt of the whole fleet vnto him, as Generall. Thus hauing (as he thought) made the ſea ſure, he ſent ouer vnto Andronicus, as from the Emperor, (for al was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other inſtructions, whereof the effect was, to command him forthwith in peace to returne to the place from whence hee came, & not farther to trouble the ſtate: promiſing him in ſo doing, the Emperors fauor, with many great honours and preferments to be afterward beſtowed vpon him; which otherwiſe might turn to his vtter deſtruction. Which letters Xiphilinus hauing deliuered, and done his meſſage, is reported to haue ſecretly aduiſed Andronicus to proceed in his purpoſe, and not in any caſe to yeeld to that which was of him required: wherwith Andronicus encouraged, proudly reiected the graces offred, and willed the meſſenger to tel them that ſent him, that if they would haue him to returne to the place from whence he came, they ſhould firſt diſplace the proud preſident Alexius, and call him to an account for the villanies he had done; then the Emperors mother they ſhould depriue of her honors, & ſhut her vp as a Nun into ſome cloyſter, there to learn to amend her life; and laſt of all, that the Emperor according to his fathers will, ſhould take vpon himſelfe the gouernment, and not be ouertopt by others, by whoſe too much authority, his maieſty and honor was (as he ſaid) too much impaired. But within a few days after, Contoſtephanus, the great captain & General, caried ouer al the gallies to Andronicus leauing nothing but their names for the preſident in his rols to look vpon: whoſe reuolt aboue all other things incouraged Andronicus, & caſt Alexius euen into the bottome of diſpaire. For now Andronicus his friends flocked together in the city, not ſecretly as before, but openly in all places: and ſuch as wiſht a change in the ſtate, impudently ſcoffing at Alexius, paſſed ouer the ſtreit to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where hauing filled their eys with beholding of his goodly perſon, his cheerfull countenance, & reuerent age; and their eares with his ſweet words & great promiſes, returned home merry & ioyfull, as if they had bin in ſome terreſtriall paradiſe, filling the city with his praiſes. After that, Andronicus his 2 ſons, Iohn & Manuel, with diuers others, whom the preſident had caſt in priſon, were ſet at liberty, & other of his chief fauorits laid faſt in their rooms. As for Alexius the preſident himſelf, with all his friends & faction in the court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the guard: a right ſtrange alteration: but about midnight, Alexius himſelf was ſecretly conueied out of the court to the Patriarchs houſe, & there kept with a ſtronger guard than before. A wonderfull change & worth marking, a man ſo honorably born, but yeſterday in greateſt honor, attended vpon vpon with many thouſands, all at his command, hauing the power to ſpill or ſaue: to day in G bonds, in diſgrace, in miſery and diſpaire, and not ſo much as a page to wait vpon him: which he taking very grieuouſly, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not ſuffer him to ſleep or take any reſt. Of whoſe miſery, the Patriarch taking pity (although he had of him very euil deſerued) yet cheered him vp with comfortable words, perſuading him with patience to eudure his hard fortune, and not with ſuch ſpeeches as fitted not his preſent ſtate, to prouoke his keepers to vſe him euill: within a few daies after, early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs houſe, and ſet vpon a very little bad Iade, and ſo with a ragged clout vpon the top of a reed, in maner of an enſigne, caried before him in deriſion, was broght to the ſea ſide, and there caſt into a little boat, was ſo brought to Andronicus, by whoſe command, with the generall conſent of the nobility, he for his euill H gouernment ſhortly after had his eies put out. This was the miſerable end of the immoderat power, or rather of the inſolent ſoueraignty of Alexius: who, had he with more moderation and vigilancie gouerned, might both haue kept Andronicus out of the city, and himſelfe from ſo great miſery; hauing at his command all the Emperors treaſure, his gallies, with moſt part of the ſtrength of the empire. Now came the noblemen ouer apace to Andronicus: the laſt that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodoſius, with the chiefe of the clergy: of whoſe approch, Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horſes feet, and in a while after ariſing again, kiſſed the patriarchs foot, calling him, the Emperors Sauior, the louer of vertue, the defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous father Iohn Chryſoſtome, omitted not any honorable title he could poſſibly deuiſe I to giue him. But the deuout patriarch, that had neuer ſeen Andronicus before, hauing now well viewed him, and marked his ſtern countenance, his ſubtile nature, his crafty and diſſembling manners, his exceeding ſtature, being almoſt ten foot high, his ſtately gate, his proud looke, his continual ſeuerity, and melancholy ſilence; as it were pittying them that to their owne deſtruction had called ſuch a man in, ſaid, Hitherto I haue heard, but now I haue alſo ſeen, and plainly knowne: and fetching a deep ſigh, adioyning thereunto that ſaying of the Prophet Dauid: As we haue heard ſo haue we alſo ſeen: in which words, he couertly quipped the diſſembling meeting and ſubmiſſion of Andronicus: and withall called to remembrance the words of the Emperor Emanuel, wherewith he had many times ſo painted forth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if he would moſt liuely haue repreſented him vnto his view. The meeting of the Patriarch & Andronicus.

All things in the city and in the palace ſet in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two ſons, and leaue giuen vnto the Emperors friends to come ouer vnto him, and to be acquainted with him, at length Andronicus himſelfe departing from Damalum, in a gally croſſed the ſtrait, oftentimes by the way merily ſinging that ſaying of the heauenly Pſalmiſt: Returne my ſoule into thy reſt, becauſe the Lord hath done well vnto thee, hauing deliuered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The Emperor with his mother Xene, then lay not in the palace at Conſtantinople, but at another princely houſe of his in the country neer vnto Philopatium, as Andronicus had appointed: whither Andronicus firſt went, and comming vnto his preſence, moſt humbly proſtrat before him, with ſobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kiſſed his feet. As for the Empreſſe his mother, he lightly ſaluted her, and as it L were but for faſhion ſake, not diſſembling in his countenance the old grudge hee bare againſt her. And ſo without longer ſtay went vnto his tent prouided for him not far off; round about which all the great noblemen had pitched their tents alſo, flocking vnto him as chickens ſeeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Hauing there ſtaid with the Emperor a good while, he was deſirous to go vnto the imperiall city, and to ſee the late Emperour Emanuel his couſins graue. Where entring into the monaſterie of our Lady, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, he wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainely out. So that diuers of the ſtanders by, ignorant of his diſſembling nature, by way of admiration ſaid; O what a wonderfull thing is this! O how hee loued the Emperour, his couſin, although his fierce and cruell perſecutor! And when one of his kinſemen would haue pulled him from the tombe, ſaying that hee had M ſorrowed for him enough; he would not be remoued, but requeſted them to ſuffer him yet a little to tarrie by the tombe, for that he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay vnto the dead: and ſo with his hands caſt vp, and cloſe together, as if he had prayed, and his eies faſt fixed vpon the tomb, he mooued his lips, and ſecretly ſaid ſomething, but what, no man could tell. Some ſaid it was ſome charme or incantation. But others more pleaſantly conceited, ſaid, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph ouer the dead Emperor Emanuel, and reuell with his ghoſt, with theſe or like words: I haue thee now faſt, my cruell perſecutor, by whom I haue bin driuen to many great extremities: and hauing wandred almoſt all the world ouer, haue thereunto bin made by thee a common by-word. But now this tombe riſing vp with ſeuen tops, & priſon, out of which thou canſt not ſtart, holdeth thee oppreſſed with a dead ſleep, out of which thou ſhalt not be awaked, but by the ſounding of the laſt trumpe. And now will I be reuenged of thy poſteritie, and ſatisfie my ſelfe as a lyon with a fat prey; and take ſharpe reuenge of all the wrongs thou haſt done me, when I haue once poſſeſſed my ſelfe of this royall citie.

After that, viſiting all the Emperors ſtately houſes, but ſtaying in no place long, he diſpoſed of all matters of ſtate, according to his owne pleaſure. To the young Emperor he allowed hunting, and other his vain delights, with keepers ioined to him, to watch not only his going in and out, but alſo that no man ſhould talk with him of any matter of importance: for all the gouernment of the ſtate he took vnto himſelf: not for that he wiſhed ſo well thereunto aboue others, but ſo to driue from the court all them of the contrarie faction to himſelfe, that were able to do any thing, and had before borne ſome ſway. The ſoldiers, whoſe help he had vſed in aſpiring to the gouernment, he rewarded with great bounty; all their offices & preferments he beſtowed either vpon his own children, or other his great fauorits; diuers of the nobilitie of whom he liked not, were by him in ſhort time driuen into exile: ſome were by him depriued of their ſight, and ſome others caſt in priſon, not knowing any cauſe why, more than that they were by him ſecretly condemned, for that they were of the nobilitie, or had done ſome good ſeruice for the ſtate, or exiled for their perſonage, or ſome other thing that grieued Androvicus; or els for the ſpark of ſome old diſpleaſure which yet lay hid as fire raked vp in the aſhes: ſo that the ſtate of that time began to grow moſt miſerable: & the trechery euen of men neereſt in bloud, ſeeking the deſtruction one of another, for to ſerue their owne turns, or to gratifie Andronicus, moſt horrible: not only one brother betraid another, but euen the father his ſon, and the ſon his father, if Andronicus would haue it ſo. Some accuſed their neereſt kinſmen, that they derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more fauoured Alexius the yong emperor, then a great offence. Yet ſuch was the miſchief of the time, that many in accuſing others, were themſelues accuſed; and charging others of treaſon againſt Andronicus, were themſelues charged by them whom they accuſed, and ſo clapt vp both together in one priſon: neither were they of the nobility onely (enemies to Andronicus) thus hardly dealt withall, but euen ſome of his great fauorits and followers alſo: for ſome whom but yeſterday he had vſed moſt kindly, and enrolled among his beſt friends, vpon them to day he frowned & tyrannized moſt cruelly: ſo that you might haue ſeen the ſame man the ſame day (as it is reported of Xerxes his admirall) to be crowned and beheaded, to be graced and diſgraced: inſomuch that the wiſet ſort deemed Andronicus his praiſings, the beginning of a mans diſgrace; his bounty, his vndoing; & his kindnes, his death. The firſt that taſted of his tyranny, was Mary the daughter of Emanuel the emperor, who for the hate ſhe bare to Alexius the late preſident, & the empres her mother in law, had (as is aforeſaid) aboue all other, wiſht for his comming; but was now by one Pterigionites (ſomtime an Eunuch of her fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, hauing in his aſpiring mind purpoſed the vtter deſtruction of all Emanuels poſterity) cunningly poiſoned; as was her husband Cæſar, who liued not long after her, poiſoned alſo (as was ſuppoſed) with the ſame cup that his wife was. Now among others of the late emperors houſe, none had euer ſtood more in his light, than had the fair empres Xene, the yong emperors mother, whom now he ceaſed not moſt bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuſe, as an vtter enemie both to the emperor & the ſtate, making as if he would leaue all, & again depart, if ſhe were not remoued from the emperor her ſon: & by his cunning ſo inſenced the giddie headed vulgar people againſt her, that they came flocking to Theodoſius the good patriarch, ready to tear him out of his cloths, if he conſented not to the remouing of the empres, as Andronicus had deſired: ſo a dounſel being called of ſuch his fauorits & others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cauſe, but aſſuredly to condemne her; the guiltles empreſſe after many things falſly laid to her charge, was accuſed of treſon: as that ſhe ſhould by her letters haue ſolicited Bela K. of Hungary, her brother in law, to inuade Brantizoba & Belligrade, two ſtrong places belonging to the empire: whereupon ſhe was condemned, and ſhamefully Dangerous to ſpeak the truth to a tyrant.

A wicked counſell.

The miſerable death of the Empreſſe.

caſt into a moſt filthy priſon neere vr to the monaſtery of S. Diomede. Amongſt other noblemen called vnto this wicked counſell, were Leo Monaſteriotes, Demetrius, Tornicius and Conſtantius Petrenus: who not yet altogether deuoted to Andronicus, being asked their opinions concerning the Empreſſe, ſaid, They would be glad firſt to know, Whether that counſell againſt his mother, were called by the Emperours conſent or not? With which ſpeech, Andronicus pierced to the heart as with a ſword, in great rage ſtart vp and ſaid, Theſe are they which encouraged the wicked Preſident to all his villanies, lay hands vpon them. Whereupon they of his guard in threatning manner ſhooke their weapons and ſwords at them, as if they would euen preſently haue ſlain them: and the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them ſome one way, ſome another, were ſo fierce vpon them, as that they had much ado to eſcape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire Empreſſe (but the other day one of the greateſt princes of the Eaſt, and honored of all her ſubiects) in great miſerie & deſpaire, ſcorned euen of her baſe keepers, euery houre expecting the deadly blow of the hangman. Yet was not the crueltie of Andronicus againſt her, ſo any thing aſſwaged, but grieuing that ſhe yet breathed, ſhortly after aſſembled the former counſell, the miniſters of his wrath, demanding of them, What puniſhment was by law appointed for ſuch as betraied any towne or prouince of the Empire? whereunto anſwer being giuen in writing, That it was by the law, death; he could no longer hold, but that he muſt in great choler break forth againſt the poore Empreſſe, as if it had bin ſhe that had done it: and thereupon the wicked counſellors crying out with one voice, That ſhe was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed; by and by without longer ſtay, a damned writing was ſubſcribed by the young Emperour her ſon, as if it had bin with the bloud of his owne mother, wherby ſhe was (I abhor to write it) moſt vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to ſee this moſt horrible and cruell execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldeſt ſon, and Georgius Auguſtus, his neer kinſman; who both diſmaid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the Emperours command, ſaid plainely, that they neuer before conſented to the death of the Empreſſe, but had clean hands of ſo hainous offence, and therefore would now much leſſe ſee her innocent body diſmembred in their ſight. At which vnexpected anſwer Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himſelfe by the hoarie head, and with burning eies caſting ſometime vp his head, and ſometime downe, ſighed at his owne moſt miſerable tyrannical eſtate, fretting inwardly, that they which were neereſt vnto him, whom he thought he might euen with a beck haue commanded to haue don any miſchief, abhorring his crueltie, ſhould refuſe to do the thing he ſo much deſired to haue don: yet repreſſing his anger for a while, within a few daies after, he againe commanded her to be ſtrangled; which was accordingly done by Conſtantinus Tripſicus, and Pterigionites the vngracious eunuch, by whoſe help he had before poiſoned Mary the Emperors daughter, with Cæſar her husband, as is before declared. Thus periſhed this great Empreſſe, cruelly ſtrangled in priſon, by theſe two wicked men, the mercileſſe executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead body lately adorned with all the graces of nature, euen to the admiration to the beholders, was without more adoe ſecretly raked vp in the ſand faſt by the ſea ſide: a poore ſepulchre for ſo great a perſon.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durſt thus cruelly to deale with the yong Emperors owne mother, and neereſt friends? yet was all couered vnder the pretence of the common good & ſafety of the ſtate and empire. And the more to ſhadow Andronicus his ſecret purpoſes, as not proceeding of any priuate or hidden malice, or aſpiring humor, from which he of all men would ſeem moſt free; and the more to manifeſt his deuotion & loyaltie to the yong Emperor his couſin, he was the only perſuader to the reſt of the nobility, to haue him ſolemnly crowned (which as yet by reaſon of his tender age he was not;) and at the time of his coronation, with his own ſhoulders ſupported him vp, as he was (after the manner of that ſolemnitie) carried vnto the great Church, and ſo back again; the Crocodiles tears ſtill plenteouſly running down his aged face, as if it had bin for exceeding ioy: which many of the meaner ſort beholding, & deeming thereof the beſt, highly commended his kindnes, accounting the young Emperor thrice happy, in ſo graue a gouernour, and faithfull counſellor; who in loue and kind affection towards him, ſeemed not inferior to his natural father: ſo cunningly had he vnder the vaile of pietie, ſhadowed his moſt execrable treacherie; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted moſt louing and kinde. But hidden treaſon, be it neuer ſo well diſſembled, muſt at length ſhew it ſelfe. So Andronicus hauing got into his power both the Emperor and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or els driuen into exile, thought it now high time for himſelfe to aſpire vnto that high ſoueraigntie, after which he had ſo many yeres longed. Wherefore calling together a councell of his flatterers and fauorits, whom he had for ſuch purpoſe promoted vnto the higheſt places of ſtate (al or moſt part of the graue counſellors & friends of the late emperor Emanuel being now diſplaced, or otherwiſe taken out of the way) he as a man only carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous ſtate of the Empire, by reaſon of a rebellion raiſed in Bythinia at Nice, by Iſaac Angelus, and Theodorus Catacuzenus; and another at Pruſa, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their graue aduice for the ſuppreſſing thereof: who not ignorant of their lords purpoſe (as thereof before ſufficiently inſtructed) anſwered with one conſent, That of ſuch great miſchiefes there would be no end, except hee were joyned in fellowſhip of the Empire together with Alexius, by his grauitie and deepe wiſedome to ſupply what wanted for the good gouernment of the State in the young Emperor his couſin. At which ſpeech the by-ſtanders (being in number many, and for the moſt part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great ſhout, as if it had beene already granted, with one applauſe crying out, Long liue Alexius and Andronicus the Greeke Emperors; and that with ſuch a vehemencie, as if they would therewith haue rent the very heauens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the city, forthwith you might haue ſeene euery ſtreet and corner of the city full of the vulgar people, with ſome alſo of better ſort, ſwarming together like Bees, and ſounding the praiſes of Andronicus (who now was come out his houſe into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long liue the Empeorors Alexius and Andronicus. With which loud acclamation, mixt with the heauy ſighings of many good men, (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the yong Emperor awaked, and ſeeing the court full of people, and Andronicus by them ſaluted his fellow in the Empire; knowing now no other remedy, thought it beſt to yeeld vnto the time, and ſo with the reſt flattering the old tyrant, welcommed him full ſore againſt his will, by the name of his friend and companion in the empire: which he now in diſſembling manner ſeeming vnwilling to take vpon him, and refuſing the place offred, was by the rout of his flattering fauorits enforced to his own great contentment, to yeeld to their requeſt: ſome of them with both their hands carrying him vp, vntill they had as it were againſt his will placed him in the imperiall ſeat, prepared for him faſt by the yong Emperor: others in the meane time no leſſe buſied in pulling off his priuat attire, and putting vpon him the imperiall robes.

The next day, when this participation of the empire ſhould be publiſhed, & they both proclaimed emperors, the name of Andronicus was ſet before the name of Alexius: whereof his fauorits (though ſome others interpreted it otherwiſe) gaue this reaſon, that it fitted not with the majeſty of the empire, that the name of a boy ſhould be ſet before the name of ſo reuerend graue, wiſe, and excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great temple to be crowned, then firſt began to ſhew to the people a cheerfull countenance, and ſetting aſide his ſterne look, after his long deuotion done, filled the vain peoples heads with many large promiſes of a more happy form of gouernment than before. All which proued nothing but meere diſſimulation and deep deceit, that cheerefulnes of countenance & ſpeech ſeruing but for a while to couer his inward, ſecret, & moſt inhuman cruelty. And the more to deceiue the world, the ceremonies of his coronation paſt, at ſuch time as he ſhould for conſummation & confirmation of al, receiue the ſacred & dreadful myſterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerence to be named, much leſſe with impure hands touched: after he had receiued the bread, and taken the cup in his hand, he with a moſt deuout countenance framed of purpoſe to deceiue, & his eies caſt vp to heauen, as if his ſoule had there already bin (the faireſt maſke of hypocriſie) ſwore by thoſe dreadful myſteries, & moſt deeply proteſted in the hearing of the people ſtanding by, that he had taken vpon him the fellowſhip of the empire for no other end or purpoſe but to aſſiſt Alexius his coſin in the gouernment, and to ſtrengthen his power: whereas his ſecret meaning was nothing leſſe, as ſhortly after appeared. For after a few daies ſpent in feigned deuotions for the proſperous beginning of his Empire, he forthwith turned his mind vnto other his more ſecret, but moſt wicked and execrable deſignes. And hauing aboue all things purpoſed the death of the yong

Emperor, he called together them of the Councell, his owne creatures and corrupt miniſters G of his wickedneſſe, who had now oftentimes in their mouthes that ſaying of the Poet,

Eſt mala res multos dominarier : vnicus eſto and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Larke. So by the generall conſent of that wicked aſſembly (vnworthy the name of a graue councel) a decree was made, That Alexius ſhould (as a man vnfit to gouern the State) be depriued of all imperiall dignitie, and H commanded to liue a priuat life. Which diſloyall decree of the conſpirators was yet ſcarcely publiſhed, but that another more cruell came out of the ſame forge, That he ſhould forthwith be put to death, as one vnworthy longer to liue. For the execution of which ſo horrible a ſentence Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites (one of the chiefe miniſters of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted euen vnto the higheſt degrees of the honours of the court) with Conſtantinus Trypſicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captain of the tormentors) were ſent out; who entring his chamber by night, without compaſſion of his tender age, or regard of his honour or innocency, cruelly ſtrangled him with a bow ſtring: which deteſtable murther ſo performed, Andronicus ſhortly after comming in, ſpurned the dead body with his foot, railing at his father the late Emperor Emanuel, as a forſworne and injurious man; and at his mother, as a common I whore. The head was forthwith ſtrooke off from this miſerable carkaſſe (the mirror of honors vnſtabilitie) and left for the monſtrous tyrant to feed his eies vpon: the body wrapped vp in lead, was in a boat carried to ſea by Io. Camaterius, and Theodoſius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauorits; who with great joy and glee returned with the ſame boat to the Court, as if they had done ſome notable exployt. But long continueth not the joy of the miſchieuous, vengeance ſtill following them at the heeles; as it did theſe two, who not long after, with the reſt that conſpired the innocent Emperors death, all or moſt part of them came to ſhamefull or miſerable ends. Thus periſhed Alexius the Emperor, not yet ful fifteene yeres old, in the third yeare of his raigne: which time he liued more like a ſeruant than an Emperor, firſt vnder the command of his mother, and afterwards of the tyrant which brought him to his end. K

An vnequall marriage.
Andronicus ſeeketh by tyranny to eſtabliſh his eſtate.

Who joyeth now but old Andronicus, made yong again, as ſhould ſeem, by his new gained honors? for ſhortly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French Kings daughter (as ſome report) before betrothed to yong Alexius; a tender & moſt beautiful lady, not yet full 11 yeres old, an vnfit match for threeſcore and ten. And in ſome ſort as it were to purge himſelf & his partakers of the ſhameful murther by them committed, and to ſtop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery & large promiſes procured of the biſhops a general abſolution for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before giuen vnto the Emperor Emanuel, and Alexius his ſon. Which obtained he for a while had the ſame Biſhops in great honor, & ſhortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. After that, he gaue himſelfe wholly vnto the eſtabliſhing of his eſtate, neuer reckning himſelf thereof L aſſured, ſo long as he ſaw any of the nobility or famous captains aliue, that fauored Emanuel the late Emperor, or Alexius his ſon: of whom ſome he ſecretly poyſoned, as Mary the Emperor Emanuels daughter, with her husband Cæſar; ſome for light occaſions hee depriued of their ſight, as he did Emanuel and Alexius the ſons of that noble captaine Iohn Comnenus, Andronicus Lapardus, whoſe good ſeruice he had oftentimes vſed; Theodorus Angelus, Alexius Comnenus the Emperor Emanuels baſe ſon: ſome he hanged, as Leo Syneſius, Manuel Lachanas, with diuers others: ſome he burnt, as Mamalus one of the Emperor Alexius his chiefe Secretaries; all men of great honor and place. For colour whereof he pretended himſelfe to be ſorrie for them, deeply proteſting that they died by the ſeueritie of the law, not by his will, and by the juſt doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himſelfe (as he ſaid) to giue place; and that M with tears plentifully running down his aged cheekes, as if he had been the moſt ſorrowfull man aliue. O deepe diſſimulation, and Crocodiles teares, by nature ordained to expreſſe the heauineſſe of the heart, flowing from the eies as ſhowers of raine out of the Clouds: in good men the moſt certaine ſignes of greateſt griefe, and ſureſt teſtimonies of inward torment:

but in Andronicus you are not ſo, you are far of another nature, you proceed of joy, you promiſe not vnto the diſtreſſed pittie or compaſſion, but death and deſtruction! how many mens eies haue you put out? how many haue you drowned? how many haue you deuoured? Moſt of the nobilitie that fauored the late Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his ſon, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, ſtrooke ſuch a feare into the reſt, that for ſafegard of their liues they betooke themſelues to flight, ſome one way, ſome another, neuer thinking themſelues in ſafety ſo long as they were within the greedy Tyrants reach; whereof ſhortly after enſued no ſmall troubles, to the ſhaking of the ſtate of the whole Empire. Iſaac Comnenus the Emperor Emanuels nigh kinſman, took his refuge into Cyprus, and kept that Iſland to himſelf. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuels brothers ſon, fled into Sicilia, and there ſtir'd vp William king of that Iſland againſt Andronicus, who with a great army landed at Dyrrachium, tooke the city, and ſo from thence without reſiſtance paſſing thorow the heart of Macedonia, ſpoiling the country before him as he went, met his fleet at Theſſalonica, which famous city he alſo took by force, & moſt miſerably ſpoiled it, with all the country thereabout, ſo that he brought a great feare vpon the imperiall city it ſelfe. Vnto which ſo great euils Andronicus (intangled with domeſtick troubles, and not knowing whom to truſt) was not able to giue remedy, although for ſhew he had (to no purpoſe) ſent out certain of his moſt truſty miniſters with ſuch forces as he could well ſpare. For the majeſty of his authority growing ſtil leſſe & leſſe, and the number of his enemies both at home & abroad daily increaſing, and the fauor of the vnconſtant people (who now began to ſpeake hardly of him) declining; he vncertain which way to turn himſelfe, reſted wholly vpon tyranny, proſcribing in his feare, not only the friends of ſuch as were fled, and whom he diſtruſted, but ſomtimes whole families together, yea and that for light occaſions, ſometime thoſe who were his beſt fauorits, whoſe ſeruice he had many times vſed in the execution of his crueltie; ſo that now no day paſſed wherein he did not put to death, impriſon, or torture one great man or other. Wherby it hapned that the imperiall city was filled with ſorrow and heauines, euery man hanging the head, & with ſilence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to haue bin then vttered. Among many others appointed to this ſlaughter, was one Iſaac Angelus a man of great nobility, whom Hagiochriſtopherites (the chiefe miniſter of Andronicus his tirannie, and for the ſame by him highly promoted) ſuſpecting, as one that bare no good wil to the emperor (cauſe enough of death) came to his houſe to apprehend him; & finding him at home, after a few hot words commanded him to follow him: whereat the noble man making ſome ſtay, and abhorring the very ſight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous & fatal, Hagiochriſtophorites himſelfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his houſe by the haire of his head, vnto the priſon by him appointed. For they, touched with the honor of the man, & moued with pitty, forced him not, but ſtood ſtil as beholders. Iſaac ſeeing himſelfe thus beſet, and no way now left for him to eſcape, reſoluing rather there preſently to die, than ſhortly after to be murdred in priſon, drew his ſword as the reſt were laying hands vpon him, and at the firſt blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochriſtophorites down to his ſhoulders; and ſo leauing him wallowing in his own bloud, and like a deſperate man laying about him amongſt the reſt, made himſelfe way through the midſt of them. And ſo embrued with bloud, with his bloudy ſword yet in his hand, running thorow the midſt of the city, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for help in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great temple, there to take the refuge of the ſanctuarie: where he had not long ſit (in the place where the guilty flying thither for refuge vſed to ſit, & confeſſing their offence, craue pardon of ſuch as go in & out) but that the temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of al parts of the city, ſome to ſee the nobleman, ſome to behold what ſhould become of him: for all men thought that he would before Sun-ſet (notwithſtanding the reuerence of the place) be drawn thence by Andronicus, & put to ſome ſhamefull death. Thither came alſo Iohn Ducas, Iſaacs vncle, and his ſon Iſaac, to increaſe the tumult; not for that they were any thing guilty of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, but for that they had before become ſureties vnto the ſuſpitious tyrant, for their kinſman Iſaac, and he likewiſe for them; by whoſe treſpas they well knew themſelues now brought into no leſſe danger than if they had bin abettors therunto. And beſide them alſo, many other there were, which doubting of their owne eſtate, and fearing the like might happen to themſelues, pricked forward with hard ſpeeches, the common people flocking thither, inſtantly requeſted them to ſtay

there, and to ſtand by them now at their need, being ſo injuriouſly wronged; whoſe pittifull G complaints moued many to take part with them. At which time alſo, no man yet comming from the Emperor (being as then out of the city) to repreſſe the ſedition, nor any of the Nobilitie opposing themſelues, no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloudy miniſters or officers ſhewing themſelues, nor any that did ſo much as ſpeake a good word in his behalfe, or in diſlike of the tumult, the boldnes of the ſeditious people increaſed, euery man in ſo great liberty ſaying what he liſt, and after their rude maner one incouraging another. So ſpent Iſaac that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an Empire, but ſtil expecting the deadly ſtroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating ſo preuailed, that diuers of the aſſembly ſhutting the church doores, and bringing lights into the church, ſtaied there with him all night, and by their example cauſed ſome others to ſtay alſo. The next morning by breake of day were all H the citizens flockt againe to the temple, curſing the tyrant to the deuil, as the common enemy of mankind, wiſhing vnto him a ſhameful death, & the honor of the empire vnto Iſaac. At that time by fortune, or rather God ſo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the city at his palace of Meludinum, on the Eaſt ſide of Propontis, where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagiochriſtuphorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night ſtirred he not, neither did any thing more, but by ſhort letters aduiſed the people to pacifie themſelues, and not by fooliſh rebellion to caſt themſelues into further danger. In the morning Andronicus his fauorits began to ſhew themſelues, and to doe what they might to haue appeaſed the tumultuous multitude; yea, and preſently after came Andronicus himſelfe, and landed with his imperiall galley at the great pallace in the city. But with the inraged people nought preuailed I either the perſuaſions of the one, or report of the preſence of the other: for they all, as vpon a ſignall giuen, and as men inſpired with one ſpirit, or ſtirred vp with the ſame fury, flocked together into the temple of S. Sophia, one incouraging another, and ſcoffing at ſuch as ſtood by as idle lookers on, without weapons in their hands, reuiling them and calling them rotten lymmes that had no feeling of the common harme. After that, they broke open the priſons, and ſet at liberty the priſoners, as fitteſt inſtruments to increaſe the tumult, who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people, but many of them borne of good houſes, and for ſome light fault, or inconſiderate word (whereof euery man was in thoſe times bound to giue an account) or for ſome friends offence againſt Andronicus, there laid faſt. Theſe of all others moſt animated the people, in ſuch ſort, as they which before for feare of the danger did but K ſoftly murmur to themſelues againſt Andronicus, did now openly joyne with the reſt of the baſe ſeditious. Then might you haue ſeen ſome with their ſwords & targets, ſome alſo in their armour, but the greateſt part armed but with clubs and ſtaues, and other ſuch like rude weapons, armes of fury, haſtily taken vp in their ſhops as by chance they came firſt to hand, running forth in euery place. By this aſſembly of the moſt furious and promiſcuous people was Iſaac hoyſed vp, and with a generall applauſe ſaluted Emperor. At which time one of the Sextons of the church, with a ladder tooke downe Conſtantine the great his crowne of gold, (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar, and ſet it on Iſaacs head: which he at the firſt ſeemed ſo doing, the more to exaſperate Andronicus. Which his vncle Iohn Ducas (as is ſaid before ſtanding by him) perceiuing, plucking off his own cap, and ſhewing his old bald head, requeſted the people, That if his nephew did refuſe it they would ſet it vpon his: whereunto they with a great outcry anſwered, That they would no more yeeld their obedience to an old bald man, as hauing receiued many harmes from the hoary haires of old Andronicus; and therefore for his ſake hated euery old man, more fit for Charons boat, and his coffin, than for an Empire, and eſpecially if he had a forken beard and bald head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Iſaac by the tumultuous multitude inueſted in the Empire; and ſo royally mounted vpon one of the Emperors horſes, richly furniſhed with a ſaddle and trappings of gold, which they M had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the temple to the court; Baſilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting vpon him, whom the headſtrong people had inforced againſt his will to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the eſtabliſhing of Iſaac in the Empire.

multuous multitude, and afterward by that which he ſaw with his eies, how the world went; calling vpon his old friends and flattering fauorits, thought firſt by their help to haue repreſſed the fury of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himſelfe, were now for the moſt part ſhrunk from him, and thoſe that were left ſo faintly comming on, as if in his quarrell they had had no mind to ſpend their liues: with which heartleſſe company Andronicus fearing to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the fury of the multitude, with his bow and arrows in his hand got him vp into the higheſt tower of the palace, called Centenaria, and from thence beſtowed certaine ſhot among the people. But ſeeing that to be to no purpoſe, and better perſuaded to do more with them by faire words, than ſuch vain force, he from the top of the tower cryed aloud vnto them, That if they would be quiet and depart, he would by their conſent reſigne the Empire vnto his ſon Manuel: wherat the people more inraged, ſpared not to poure forth moſt reprochfull words in contempt both of himſelf and his ſon, and ſo furiouſly brake into the court by one of the gates called Carea. Which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, caſting from him all his habiliments of honor, and diſguiſing himſelf fled againe to his gally, accompanied only with Anna his wife, and Maruptica his minion, and ſo returned to Meludium, his place from whence he came. Iſaac but yeſterday in the bottom of diſpaire, & ſhadowed as it were with the hand of death, by the ſtrange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the higheſt type of worldly honour, entering the palace, was there againe with the greateſt applauſe of the people that might be, ſaluted Emperor. From whence he forthwith ſent out certaine companies of his moſt aſſured friends and followers, to apprehend Andronicus; who now as a man at once forſaken both of his friends and of his better fortune, ſecretly fled with his wife and his paragon, before remembred, to Chele, attended vpon only with a few of his truſty ſeruants, which had a long time ſerued him before he was Emperor. There taking ſhip, with purpoſe to haue fled vnto the Tauroſcythes (as not thinking himſelfe ſafe in any Prouince of the Empire) he was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe againe, the wrought ſea abhorring (as it ſeemed) to carry him that had ſo polluted it with the dead bodies of the innocent by him ſlain, and ſtil threatning (as it were) to deuoure him. Thus ſtrangely ſtaied by foule weather, or more truly to ſay, by the reuenging hand of the Higheſt, he was found by ſuch as were ſent to ſeek but after him, & being by them apprehended, was with two great yron chains faſt locked about his proud necke, and heauy gyues vpon his legs, caſt into the caſtle of Amena, and in that miſerable habit ſhortly after preſented to the Emperor Iſaac, yet buſied in appeaſing and reforming the diſordred city: where by the way as hee went, he was by the people moſt ſhamefully reuiled, and iniuriouſly vſed; ſome plucking him by the beard, ſome by the haire of the head, ſome other in the meane time playing with his noſe, and bobbing him in the face, with a thouſand other deſpights done vnto him; eſpecially by ſuch women, as whoſe husbands he had before murdred or depriued of their ſight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull fury of the people, he had his right hand cut off, and was again committed to the ſame caſtle, without meat, drinke, or other comfort: where after he had lien a few daies, hauing one of his eies put out, he was ſet vpon a foule leane cammel, with his face toward the taile thereof, and ſo (as it were in triumph) led through the Market place, his bald head all bare, as if it had been a dead mans ſkull taken out of a charnell houſe; in a ſhort old coat, ſo miſerable a ſpectacle, as might haue expreſſed a fountaine of teares out of the eies of a right hard hearted man. But the bedlam and moſt inſolent citiſens, eſpecially they of the baſer ſort, as cookes, coblers, curriers, and ſuch like, flocking about him like Bees (without regard that he had but the other day worne vpon his head the imperiall crowne, then honored by them as a god, and extolled vnto the heauens; that they had not long before ſolemnly ſworne vnto him obedience and loyaltie) ran now as men out of their wits, omitting no kinde of villanie they could deuiſe to do vnto him: ſome thruſt nailes into his head, ſome caſt durt in his face, ſome the dung both of men and beaſts, ſome prickt him in the ſides with ſpits, ſome caſt ſtones at him as at a mad dog, and other-ſome opprobious and deſpightfull words, no leſſe grieuous vnto him than the reſt: amongſt others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchen, caſt a pot full of ſcalding water in his face; and in briefe, their outrage ſo exceeded, as if they had ſtriuen among themſelues, who ſhould doe him the greateſt villanie. Hauing thus ſhamefully, as in a ridiculous triumph, brought him into the Theatre, they there betwixt two pillars hanged him vp by the heeles: where hauing ſuffered all theſe deſpightfull indignities, with with many moe, not without offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet ſtill held G his patience, not giuing one euill word, but ſometimes ſaying, Lord haue mercy vpon me; and otherwhiles, Why do you breake a bruiſed reed? Yet the furious people nothing moued with the calamity of ſo great a man, (of al others now the moſt miſerable) ſtript him of his bad clothes as he hung, and cut off his priuities. One among the reſt, to make an end of him, thruſt his ſword in at his throat vp to the twiſt as he hung: other two with their long ſwords proued their ſtrength, who could ſtrike furtheſt into his buttocks. Thus miſerably periſhed this famous Emperor, after he had reigned two yeares. That which was left of his body (for many had carried away ſome pieces thereof) being taken downe from the place where he hung, was caſt into a baſe vault in the Theatre, where it for a ſpace lay, as the loathſome carkaſſe of ſome wilde beaſt, and the miſerable ſpectacle of mans fragilitie; for Iſaac the Emperor would not ſuffer H it to be buried. Howbeit afterwards (the fury of the people ouerpaſſed) it was by ſome more charitable men remooued thence, and layd in a low vault neere vnto the monaſterie of the Ephori: which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this hiſtory, ſpeaking of the time wherein he liued) ſaith, is yet there vndiſſolued to be ſeene. Hee was a man moſt honorably diſcended, of ſtature tall, and well proportioned; in his countenance ſate a certaine reuerend majeſtie, adorned with ſuch notable vertues, as might haue made him worthily to haue bin compared vnto the greateſt Emperors of his ſtocke and familie, had he not obſcured the ſame with too much ambition and cruelty; whereof the one cauſed him to lead the greateſt part of his life in priſon or exile; the other brought vnto him a moſt ſhamefull end.

Iſaac Angelus his ſucceſſor, by the fauor of the people thus exalted vnto the Empire, at the I firſt gouerned the ſame with great lenitie and moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the effuſion of his ſubjects bloud; but afterwards not a little troubled both with forrein enemies, and domeſticall rebellion, beſieged in the Imperiall City by ſuch of the Nobilitie as thought themſelues no leſſe worthy of the Empire than himſelfe: for repreſſing of which inſolencies, and the aſſuring of his State, he became ſo ſeuere in chaſtiſing the offendors, and ſuch others as he had in diſtruſt, that he was counted of moſt men not inferiour in crueltie to Andronicus his predeceſſor; few daies paſſing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, beſides them of the meaner ſort, of whom hee ſeemed to make no great reckoning: whereby he in few yeares loſt the loue and fauour of his Subjects, who before had him in great honour; and became vnto them no leſſe odious than was before Andronicus. K Vpon which generall diſlike of the people, his ingratefull younger brother Alexius (by him before for a great ſum of mony redeemed from the Turks) tooke occaſion to riſe vp againſt him, and by the fauour of the ſouldiers depriued him together both of the Empire and his ſight: and hauing put out his eies, thruſt him into a Monaſtery, there to liue as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darkeneſſe, after he had raigned nine yeres and eight moneths, being not yet full forty yeares old. Whether it were the reuenging hand of God, for the hard meaſure vſed to Andronicus, or not, I leaue it to the wiſer to conſider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith he beſt gouerneth all things, would haue a moderation vſed in puniſhment of our moſt capitall enemies, as hauing alwaies before our eies the ſlippery ſtate of power and authoritie: and that as all worldly things are ſubject to change, ſo by the juſt L judgement of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we doe vnto others, the ſame wee may receiue againe from others. In theſe ſo great and ſtrange mutations of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire (which I haue ſomewhat more at large proſecuted, not ſo much for the nouelty of the matter, although it were right ſtrange, as for that out of the loſſes and ruine thereof, the greatnes of the Turks for the moſt part grew) Clizaſthlan Sultan of Iconium, after the death of the Emperor Emanuel, found meanes to take from the Empire diuers ſtrong Townes and caſtles in the leſſer Aſia, together with a great part of the country of Phrygia: Alexius, Andronicus, and Iſaac the ſucceeding Emperours, troubled with dangers neerer home, hauing nothing to oppoſe againſt him, but faire intreatie and rich preſents; ſo redeeming for a while an vnſure peace, with no leſſe charge in ſhort time to be renewed againe. This victorious Sultan (for ſo he may of right be called) M holding in his ſubjection a great part of the leſſer Aſia, now a man of great yeares, dying, left behind him foure ſonnes, Maſut, Coppatine, Reucratine, and Caichoſroes, all men growne. Amongſt whom he diuided his Kingdome: Vnto Muſat he bequeathed Amaſia, Ancyra, Doryleum, with diuers other pleaſant Cities of Pontus:

vnto Coppatine he aſſigned Melytene, Cæſarea, and the colonie now called Taxara: vnto Reucratine he allotted Aminſum, Docea, with ſome other Cities vpon the ſea coaſt: but vnto Caichoſroes, he left Iconium his regall ſeat, and with it Lycaonia, Pamphilia, and all the countries thereabouts as farre as Cottianyum. Of theſe foure, Coppatine long liued not after his father; for whoſe inheritance Reucratine Prince of Docea, and Maſut Prince of Ancyra (his two brethren) fell at variance, and ſo at laſt into open warre. But Maſut finding himſelfe too weake for his warlike brother Reucratine, yeelded vnto him the territories which hee ſaw he muſt needs forgoe; and glad now to keepe his owne, ſo made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtie ſpirit, with his forces thus doubled, denounced war vnto his brother Caichoſroes; who doubting his owne ſtrength, fled vnto the Emperour Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his father done before him the vnto Emperour Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the Emperour but of late hauing obtained the Empire, by the depoſing of his brother, and altogether giuen to pleaſure, reputing alſo thoſe domeſticall warres of the Turks, ſome part of his owne ſafety; ſent him home without comfort, as one ſtrong enough of himſelfe to defend his owne quarrell againſt his brother.

Howbeit, he was ſcarcely come to Iconium, but he was by Reucratine expulſed thence, and driuen to fly into Armenia, where he was by Zebune King of that countrey, a Turke alſo, honourably receiued and courteouſly vſed, but yet denied of the aid he requeſted: the King pretending that hee was already in league with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or as ſome thought, fearing the dangerouſneſſe of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly diſcouraged, returned againe to Conſtantinople, and there in poore eſtate, as a man forlorne, paſſed out the reſt of his daies.

Now hauing thus paſſed through the Turkiſh affaires in the leſſer Aſia, together with the troubled eſtate of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, no ſmall cauſe of the Turks greatnes; the courſe of time calleth vs backe againe before we paſſe any further, to remember their proceedings alſo at the ſame time, and ſhortly after, in Syria, Iudæa, Ægypt, and thoſe more Southerly countries, where theſe reſtleſſe people ceaſed not by all meanes to enlarge their Empire, vntill they had brought all thoſe great kingdomes vnder their obeyſance.

After the death of Baldwin King of Ieruſalem, of whom we haue before ſpoken, Almericus his younger brother, Earle of Ioppa and Aſcalon, beeing then about ſeuen and twentie yeares old, was by the better good liking of the clergie and people, than of the nobilitie, elected King: not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a kingdom, but for that ſome of them enuied vnto him ſo great an honour. Neuertheleſſe he was (as we ſaid) by the generall conſent of the people, elected, proclaimed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with all ſolemnitie crowned, the 17 day of February, in the yeare of Grace, 1163. To begin whoſe troubled reigne, the Ægyptians firſt of all denied to pay vnto him their wonted tribute. In reuenge whereof, he in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant army entred into Ægypt; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to ſtay the further purſuit and paſſage of the Chriſtians, cut the bankes of the riuer Nilus, and ſo drowned the country, that the King was glad to content himſelfe with the victory he had already gotten, and ſo to returne to Ieruſalem.

The next yeare Almericus was againe drawne downe with his power into Ægypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him againſt Saracon; whom Noradin the Turke, King of Damaſco, had ſent as Generall with an army, to reſtore Sanar the Sultan before expulſed, and to depoſe Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being ſlaine, and Saracon hauing won certaine Townes, kept them to himſelfe: Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, ioyned his forces with Almericus, and by his helpe expulſed Saracon out of Ægypt. But whilſt Almericus was thus buſied in Ægypt, Noradin the Turk making an inrod into the frontiers of the Chriſtians neere vnto Tripolis, was by Gilbert Lacy, maſter of the Templars in thoſe quarters, and the other Chriſtians, when he leaſt feared, ſo ſuddenly ſet vpon, that he had much adoe by flight to ſaue himſelfe, halfe naked for haſte, moſt of his followers being at the ſame time ſlain. In reuenge of which diſgrace, he not long after with a great power came and beſieged Arethuſa: for reliefe wherof, Bohemund Prince of Antioch, Raymond the younger, Earle of Tripolis, Calamon gouernour of Cilicia, and Toros Prince of Armenia, came with their power. Of whoſe comming the Turk hearing, raiſed his ſiege and departed. After whom theſe Chriſtian Princes eagerly following, were by the Turkes ſhut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto they had vnaduiſedly to far entred) and there with a great ſlaughter ouerthrowne. In which conflict all the chiefe commanders of the army were taken, except the Prince of Armenia, who forecaſting the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine diſſuaded the reſt from the further purſuit of the flying enemy. The Prince of Antioch there taken, was about a yeare after for a great ſum of mony redeemed; but the Countie of Tripolis was after eight yeres ſtraight captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victory returning againe to the ſiege of Arethuſa, in few daies won the towne: and encouraged with ſuch good ſucceſſe, and the abſence of the King, laid ſiege to the city of Paneade, which was alſo deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citiſens might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart.

At the ſame time Saracon Generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Chriſtians two caſtles; the one in the country of Sidon, the other beyond Iordan vpon the borders of Arabia, both in the cuſtody of the Templars: twelue of whom the King at his returne hanged vp for treaſon.

Shortly after Saracon, King Noradin his great man of war, with all the power of the Turks, came downe againe into Ægypt, with purpoſe to haue fully ſubdued all that notable kingdome vnto his Lord and Maſter. Of whoſe power, Sauar the Sultan ſtanding in dread, praied aid of Almericus, promiſing vnto him beſide his yerely tribute, the ſumme of forty thouſand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readineſſe, Almericus ſet forward with his army, and encountring with Saracon and his Turks at the riuer Nilus, ouerthrew him in a great battell: yet not without ſome loſſe, for the Turkes in their flight lighting vpon the Kings cariages with the whole baggage of the army, & ouer-running them that had the charge thereof, carried away with them a moſt rich prey, wherby it came to paſſe that as the Chriſtians had the victory, ſo the Turks injoyed the ſpoile.

Saracon after this ouerthrow hauing againe gathered together his diſperſed ſoldiers, tooke his way to Alexandria, where he was by the citiſens receiued: after whom the King following, gaue no attempt vnto the city, for that he knew to be but vaine, but incamped cloſe by the ſide of the ruer Nilus, from whence the city was chiefly to be victualled. Whoſe purpoſe Saracon perceiuing, and betime foreſeeing the diſtreſſe of his whole army for want of victuals, if he ſhould there long ſtay: leauing there his ſon Saladin (or as ſome call him his nephew) with a thouſand horſmen for the keeping of the city, ſecretly by night departed thence himſelfe with the reſt of his army: and paſſing through the deſarts, did great harme in the vpper parts of Ægypt. Of whoſe departure Almericus vnderſtanding, was about to haue followed him, but that he was otherwaies perſuaded by the Ægyptian captains to continue his former purpoſe for the gaining of the city: wherefore now after the departure of Saracon he began to approch the wals, and with diuers engines of war to diſturbe the defendants: wherewith the citiſens (better acquainted with the trade of merchandiſe, than the feats of war) diſcouraged, began now to conſult amongſt themſelues for the turning out of thoſe troubleſome gueſts whom they had ſo lately receiued: which Saladin perceiuing, certified Saracon his vncle thereof, requeſting his ſpeedy reliefe in that his ſo dangerous eſtate, & with much intreaty perſuaded the citiſens for a while to hold it out, vntil he might from him receiue anſwer: of al which the Chriſtians and Ægyptians without, hauing intelligence, laid ſo much the harder vnto the city. Gladly would Saracon haue done what he was by his nephew requeſted: but perceiuing it to be a matter of no leſſe danger than difficultie, he by the means of Hugh, County of Caſarea, and one Arnolphus another noble Chriſtian, both then priſoners with him, concluded a peace with the King: whereupon the city was forthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turks ſuffred in ſafety to depart. At which time alſo all priſoners were on both ſides freely and without ranſome ſet at liberty. Thus Saracon for this time diſappointed of this his purpoſe for the conqueſt of Ægypt, returned backe againe to Damaſco: and Almericus with great glory to Aſcalon, where he arriued with his army the 21 of September in the yeere 1167.

In this late expedition, Almericus on the one ſide enflamed with the wealth of Ægypt, and on the other encouraged with the weaknes of that effeminat people, reſting for the moſt part vpon forraine ſtrength; had purpoſed himſelfe to inuade the kingdome, and ſo if poſſible he might, to joine it to his own. For color whereof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before giuen, had ſecretly ſought to joine in league and amity with Noradin the Turke, King of Damaſco. The chiefe ſtirrer vp of the King vnto this war, was one Gerbert, maſter of the Templars; who in reſpect of the aid by them of his order to be giuen, had obtained of the King, after the victory gained, to haue the city of Peluſium with all the rich countrey about the ſame, giuen vnto him and his brethren the Knights of the order for euer: vpon which hope, he contrary to the mind of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that war, gaged his whole wealth and credit, with all the treaſure of his houſe. So all things now in readineſſe for ſo great an enterpriſe, Almericus with his army ſet forward in October, and hauing in ten daies paſſed the ſandy deſart, came to Peluſium; which City he (after three daies ſiege) tooke by force, and put to ſword all them that were therein, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: which city, he according to his promiſe before made, gaue vnto the Templars. After that, he began alſo to beſiege Caire, at which time his fleet ſacked the city of Tapium. In the meane time, Sanar the Ægiptian Sultan, conſidering the danger he was in, to ſatisfie Almericus his greedy deſire, offred to pay him twentie hundred thouſand ducats to withdraw his forces: and forthwith ſent him one hundred thouſand, for the ranſome of his ſon and his nephew taken priſoners at Peluſium: and for the reſt to be paid within fiue daies after, hee gaue two of his nephewes hoſtages. Neuertheleſſe the payment he deferred from day to day, of purpoſe in the meane time to raiſe the whole power of Ægypt, as alſo to receiue aid from the Turks by Saracon, which he daily expected: of whoſe ſpeedy comming, Almericus vnderſtanding, left part of his army at Peluſium, and with the reſt went to haue met him: but miſſing him by the way, Saracon with his Turks came in ſafety to Caire vnto the Sultan, as he had deſired. Wherfore Almericus diſmaid with the multitude of two ſo great armies now joyned together, retired backe againe to Peluſium, and there taking with him the garriſon before left, returned home to Ieruſalem: hauing in that expedition (begun with the breach of faith) laid the foundation of the ruine of his kingdome, as in few yeres after, it by proofe appeared, by the euill neighbourhood of the Turks, by that meanes brought downe into Ægypt.

Peluſium taken by Almericus.

Saracon the Turke after the departure of Almericus, eaſily perceiuing a moſt fit time and opportunitie to be offered for him now to obtain that, which he had in vaine before both ſought and fought for, encamped with his army neere vnto Caire, and notably counterfeited himſelfe of all others the moſt deuoted friend of the Sultans: ſo that betwixt them two paſſed all the kind tokens of loue and friendſhip, that could poſſibly be deuiſed; the Sultan oftentimes feaſting the Turke, and in kindneſſe likewiſe being feaſted of him: but at length going as his manner was, vnto the campe to viſit him, he was by the Turks ſlaine. So Saracon hauing brought to paſſe what he deſired, and entring the city with his army, was by the great Caliph (from whom the Ægyptian Sultans, as from their ſuperiors, the true ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet, tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the firſt of the Turks that euer enjoyed the ſame: which royall dignitie he had not poſſeſſed fully a yeare, but that he was taken away by death. In whoſe ſtead Saladin his brothers ſon, by and by ſtept vp: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the reuerend Majeſty of the Caliph (as had his vncle Saracon, and all the Ægyptian Sultans before him) with his horſemans maſe ſtruck out his brains; and not ſo contented, vtterly rooted out all his poſteritie, the better to aſſure himſelfe and his ſucceſſors the Turks in the poſſeſſion of his new begotten kingdome; and after that diuided the great treaſures of the Ægyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres againſt the Chriſtians.

The Sultan of Ægypt vnder the colour of friendſhip ſlain by Saracon.

This glorious kingdome ſo much ſpoken of in holy Scripture, and renowned of the learned hiſtoriographers of all ages, after the ruine of the Roman Empire, was ſometime part of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, and a notable member of the Chriſtian commonweale; vntill that about the yeare of our Lord 704, the Ægyptians weary of the pride and couetuouſnes of the Grecians, reuolted from them to the Saraſins, whoſe ſuperſtition they alſo receiued: and ſo vnder the gouernment of the Saraſin Caliphs, the ſucceſſors of the falſe prophet Mahomet, liued about 464 yeres, vntill that now being inuaded by Almericus, they praied aid of Noradin the Turke, Sultan of Damaſco: who to their reliefe ſending Saracon with an army, repulſed indeed the Chriſtians, but oppreſſing their libertie, took to himſelfe the kingdom, which he left vnto his nephew Saladin, in whoſe poſterity it remained vntill it was from them again taken by the Circaſſian ſlaues the Mamalukes: vnder whoſe ſeruile gouernment it was holden of long time, till that by the great Emperor of the Turks, Selymus the firſt, it was again conquered, and the Mamalukes vtterly deſtroied: In the gouernement of whoſe proſperitie, the mighty Emperours of the Turks, it hath euer ſince remained as part of their Empire, vntill this day, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory God willing ſhall appeare.

1170 Saladin thus poſſeſſed of the great kingdome of Ægypt, and all things ſet in ſuch order as he thought beſt for the newneſſe of his eſtate, with a great army entred into the land of Paleſtine, in the yere 1170, and there beſieged Daron; which towne he woon, and ouerthrew ſuch as were ſent by King Almericus to haue relieued the ſame: with which ſmall victory contenting himſelfe, as with the good beginning of his riſing fortune, he returned backe againe into his kingdome: yet was his army ſo great and populous, as that the like army of the Turks had neuer before bin ſeen in the Holy-Land. Wherfore Almericus conſidering in what great danger he ſtood, his kingdome now being on both ſides beſet by the Turks, ſent out his Embaſſadors vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdom which their fathers had woon: and for the ſame purpoſe went himſelfe in perſon vnto the Emperor of Conſtantinople, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterward ſent backe loded with the promiſes of great matters, as were alſo his Embaſſadors from the Princes of the Weſt. All which for all that ſorted vnto nothing, but vaniſhed into ſmoake.

1171 The yere following, viz. 1171, Saladin beſieged Petrea, the Metropoliticall City of Arabia: but hearing that Almericus with a great power was comming to the reliefe thereof, hee raiſed his ſiege and retired: as he did alſo the next yere after, hauing in vaine attempted the ſtrong caſtle of Mont-Royall, on the further ſide of Iordan. In like manner alſo the third yere he came againe into the Holy-Land, and ſpoiled the countrey beyond Iordan: but hearing of the Kings comming againſt him, he forthwith returned againe into Ægypt. All theſe light expeditions, this politique Prince made not ſo much for hope of victory, or to proue his enemies ſtrength, as to traine his ſouldiers, eſpecially the effeminate Ægyptians, and to make them fitter to ſerue him in his greater deſignes.

1173 Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of Damaſco, and in his time a moſt notable champion of the Turks, after he had raigned nine and twenty yeres. Vpon whoſe death Almericus forthwith beſieged the city of Pancade, in hope to haue againe recouered the ſame: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great ſum of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble priſoners, intreated to raiſe his ſiege and depart. So hauing ſent away his army, and trauelling with his ordinary retinue to Tiberias, where he had the Summer before been ſicke of the flix, feeling himſelfe not well, he returned on horſe backe by Nazareth and Neapolis to Ieruſalem, where his old diſeaſe increaſing vpon him, he was alſo taken with a feuer: wherewith after he had beene ſome few daies grieuouſly tormented, hee requeſted his Phyſitians, with ſome gentle potion to looſe his belly, which was now ſomewhat ſtaied: which they refuſing to doe, he commanded the potion to be giuen him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap ſhould: which being giuen him, and his belly againe looſed, he ſeemed therewith to haue beene at the firſt well eaſed; but his wonted feauer with great vehemencie returning, before his weake and ſpent body could be with conuenient meats refreſhed, he ſuddenly died, the tenth of Iuly, in the yeare 1173, when he had raigned about ten yeares. His dead body was with the great lamentation of all his ſubiects, ſolemnly buried by his brothers. He was a moſt wiſe Prince, and withall right valiant, amongſt many moſt fit for the gouernement and defence of that troubleſome kingdom, ſo hardly beſet with the Infidels, if it had pleaſed God to haue giuen him longer life.

Baldwin the fourth of that name, ſeuenth King of Ieruſalem.

Foure daies after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his ſonne, then a youth about thirteene yeares old, by the generall conſent of the Nobilitie choſen King, and by Almericus the Patriarch, in the Temple with great ſolemnitie crowned in the yeare 1173: vnto whom as not yet by reaſon of his tender age, fit himſelfe to manage the weightie affaires of the kingdom, Raymond Countie of Tripolis, was by the whole conſent of the Nobilitie appointed Tutor to ſupply what was wanting in the young King.

Noradin Sultan of Damaſco (dead as is aforeſaid) left behind him Melechſala his ſonne, yet but a youth, to ſucceed him in his kingdome. Whoſe gouernment the Nobilitie diſdaining ſent ſecretly for Saladin Sultan of Ægypt, vnto whom at his comming they betraied the city of Damaſco, the regall ſeat of the Turks in Syria. Whereof Saladin poſſeſſed, and entring into Celeſiria without reſiſtance, tooke Heliopolis, Emiſſa, with the great Citie of

Ceſarea; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of Damaſco, the city of Arethuſa onely excepted. But thus to ſuffer Melechſala the young Prince to be wronged, and the kingdome of Damaſco to be ioyned to the kingdome of Ægypt, was of the wiſer ſort thought not to ſtand with the ſafety of the kingdom of Ieruſalem, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherfore the County of Tripolis, gouernor of that kingdom, made out certain forces to haue hindred his proceedings. At which time alſo, Cotobed Prince of Parthia, and Melechſalas vncle, ſent certaine Troups of Parthian horſemen to haue aided his diſtreſſed Nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almoſt all ſlaine, neere vnto Aleppo where Melechſala lay. As for the County of Tripolis and the other Chriſtian Princes, with whom Saladin in the newneſſe of his kingdome had no deſire to fall out; hee appeaſed them with faire intreaty, and rewards: vnto the County he ſent freely the hoſtages, which yet lay for his ranſome at Emiſſa: vnto the other Princes he ſent rich preſents; and therewith ſo contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing againſt him. After which time, three or foure yeres paſſed in great quietneſſe, to the great ſtrengthning of him in thoſe new gotten kingdomes. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip Earle of Flanders, the Chriſtian Princes of Syria encouraged, conſulted of an expedition to be made into Ægypt, whereof Saladin hauing intelligence, drew downe into that country the greateſt part of his ſtrength. But Philip diſliking of that expedition, and the rather for that hee ſaw no great cheerfulneſſe in the County of Tripolis and the reſt thereunto; they with one conſent changed their purpoſe for Ægypt, and turning their forces a quite contrary way, miſerably and without reſiſtance waſted the country about Emiſſa and Ceſarea.

Saladin ouerthrown by king Baldwin.

Whileſt the Chriſtians was thus buſied in Cæliſiria, Saladin on the other ſide tooke occaſion out of Ægypt to inuade the kingdome of Ieruſalem: of whoſe comming, King Baldwin hauing intelligence, with ſuch ſmall forces as he had left, haſtened himſelfe to Aſcalon. In the meane time Saladin with a great army was entred into the Holy-Land, where burning the countrey before him, and raging in the bloud of the poore Chriſtians, he came and encamped not far from Aſcalon: and ſtrucke ſuch a feare vpon the whole country, that they which dwelt in Ieruſalem, were about to haue forſaken the City: as for the King himſelfe, hee lay cloſe within the City of Aſcalon, not daring to aduenture vpon ſo ſtrong an enemy. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, diſperſed his army, ſome one way, ſome another, to forrage the country. Which the King perceiuing, ſecretly with all his power iſſued out of the City, if happily ſo he might ouertake the Sultan vnawares; neither was he deceiued in his expectation: for comming ſuddenly vpon him, and ſecretly charging him, he had with him for a good ſpace an hard and doubtfull battell, vntill that the victory by the power of God, at length inclining to the Chriſtians, Saladin with his Turks fled, ouerthrowne with a great ſlaughter, moſt part of his great army being either there ſlain, or loſt afterward with hunger and cold. This victory fell vnto the Chriſtians the 25 day of Nouember, in the yere 1177, not without the Almighty hand of God, the Turke hauing in his army aboue twenty ſix thouſand horſemen, and the King not paſt foure hundred horſe with ſome few footmen. After which victory, Baldwin in great triumph returned to Ieruſalem, and there ſhortly after with great care and diligence repaired the decayed wals of the City. 1177

The Chriſtians diuiding the ſpoile, ouerthrowne by the Turkes.

Saladin in reuenge of this ouerthrow, made diuers incurſians into the frontiers of the Chriſtians, and did great harme, eſpecially in the country about Sidon. For the repreſſing whereof, the king put himſelfe in armes, and going againſt him ouerthrew part of his army, as they were carrying away a great booty. Of which ouerthrow Saladin vnderſtanding, came in ſuch haſte with the reſt of his army as if it had bin a ſudden tempeſt, vpon the Chriſtians, then in great ſecuritie diuiding the ſpoile; of whom they ſlew a great number, and put the reſt to flight: In which ſo ſudden a confuſion, Otto, grand maſter of the Templars, and Hugh the Earle of Tripolis his ſon in law, were both taken priſoners. The Earle himſelfe with a few fled to Tire: the King alſo at the ſame time, was glad to ſhift for himſelfe, and by flight to ſaue himſelfe as he might: after which victory, Saladin beſieged a ſtrong caſtle which the king but the yere before had built vpon the banke of the riuer Iordan, and giuen it to the Templars, with the country round about, which caſtle Saladin took by force, and put to ſword, all that were therein, except ſome few whom he carried away priſoners. By this victory Saladin became dreadfull vnto the Chriſtians in Syria, which cauſed them, eſpecially ſuch as had any charge, with more vigilancie to looke about them. Yet ſhortly after, a peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan G and the King: whereby their troubled eſtates breathed themſelues almoſt the ſpace of two yeares.

But this ſo welcome a calme was by domeſticall troubles againe by the Kings friends ſuddenly troubled: for the Countie of Tripolis, to whom the gouernment of the kingdome was committed, comming towards Ieruſalem, being by the ſuggeſtion of his enemies brought into ſuſpition with the King, as if he had affected the Kingdome, was to his great diſgrace by the way commanded to ſtay. The chiefe authors of which diſcontentment, were the Kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the Kings Steward; who in the abſence of the Earle, had wrought the Kings ſicke mind according to their owne appetites. But the reſt of the nobilitie wiſely foreſeeing vnto what great danger that diſcord might tend; in diſpight H of them, with much labor, cauſed him to be ſent for againe, and ſo reconciled vnto the King: by which meanes that dangerous fire of diſſention was for that time appeaſed, which afterwards brake out againe to the vtter ruine of that kingdome.

Saladin goeth out of Ægypt to Damaſco.

Saladin now weary of the league he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer ſtanding with his haughty deſignes, renounced the ſame, and raiſing a great power in Ægypt, ſet forward toward Damaſco. Of whoſe comming King Baldwin hauing knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to haue met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called Petra. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings territorie, came and encamped before Mount-Roiall, a caſtle which Baldwin had giuen vnto the Templars, about three daies march from the place where the King lay. I Galiley ſpoiled and the caſtle of Burie taken by the Turks.

There Saladin with the ſpoile of the country refreſhing his army, now weary of long trauel, ſet forward againe, and ſo without reſiſtance arriued with his army at Damaſco. At the ſame time, the Turks Captaines about Damaſco, Boſtrum, and Emiſſa, perceiuing the frontiers of the Chriſtians thereabout to be kept with ſmall ſtrength, paſſed ouer Iordan, and ſpoiling a great part of Galiley, beſieged the caſtle of Burie, at the foot of Mount Tabor, not farre from the citie of Naim; which caſtle they in few daies tooke, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them about fiue hundred priſoners. Saladin being come to Damaſco, called together all the garriſons of that Kingdome, and joyning them vnto the forces hee brought out of Ægypt, entred into the Holy-Land: at which time the Countie of Tripolis, Gouernour of the Kingdome, lay ſicke of burning feauer. Neuertheleſſe the King encouraged K by the Knights of the order, went out with his army againſt him; and encountring with him neere vnto a village called Frobolet, ouerthrew him in a great battell; wherein, and afterward in the flight, moſt part of the Sultans armie periſhed: Saladin himſelfe being glad by ſpeedie flight to eſcape the danger, and ſo by long marches to get him againe to Damaſco.

Beritus in vain beſieged by the Turkes.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin hauing repaired his Army, and ſent for his fleet out of Ægypt, came and beſieged Beritus both by ſea and land: at which time alſo his brother, whom he had left gouernour in Ægypt, beſieged Darum, a ſtrong Towne in the vttermoſt bounds of the Kingdome of Ieruſalem towards Ægypt: both whoſe forces Baldwin being not able at once to repreſſe, by the counſell of the nobilitie, thought it beſt firſt to relieue Beritus, L as the place of greateſt importance. And for that purpoſe ſet forward with his armie by land, hauing alſo rigged vp three and thirtie gallies at Tyre, for the reliefe thereof by ſea. Of which preparation Saladin vnderſtanding, as alſo of the Kings comming (by letters intercepted by his ſcouts, directed to the beſieged, for the holding out of the ſiege, with promiſe of ſpeedy reliefe) he preſently roſe with his army, and departed: whereof the King being aduerſed, retired to Sephor.

Saladin inuading Meſopotamia, is himſelfe inuaded by the King of Ieruſalem.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, deſirous aboue meaſure to extend the bounds of his Kingdome, and ſeeing the ſucceſſe of his attempts againſt the King of Ieruſalem not anſwerable to his deſire, conuerted his forces vnto the Countries more Eaſtward; and paſſing the riuer Euphrates, and entring into Meſopotamia, partly M by force, partly by corruption, got into his hands the Cities of Edeſſa, Carras, and diuers others. In which time the King of Ieruſalem tooke occaſion firſt to ſpoile the Countrey about Damaſco, and after that diuers other places of the Sultans Kingdome, making hauocke of whatſoeuer came in his way, and ſo laded with the ſpoile of the Turks, retired to Ieruſalem.

Saladin

Aleppo betrayd to the Turks.

Saladin with victorie returning out of Meſpotamia, in reuenge of the injuries done vnto him in his abſence, marched directly to Aleppo, the ſtrongeſt city of the Chriſtians in that part of Syria, which aboue all other he longed after: where hee had not long lien, but that it was by the treaſon of the Gouernour deliuered into his hands, with all the Countrie thereabouts; wherewith the Chriſtian Princes were ſo diſcouraged, that they euen then began to fear greater matters to enſue. The Prince of Antioch ſold Tarſus the metropolitical city of Cilicia, to Rupinus Prince of Armenia, for that he ſaw it was not without great charge & danger to be by him defended, being ſo far from him, and Saladin as it were now ſtept in betwixt him and it.

At the ſame time King Baldwin at Nazareth fell ſicke of a feuer, the leproſie alſo his old diſeaſe growing daily more and more vpon him: inſomuch as diſpairing of his life, he called vnto him Guy Luſignan County of Ioppa and Aſcalon, vnto whom he had before eſpouſed Sybel his eldeſt ſiſter, and in the preſence of his mother, the Patriark, and all the chief commanders of the ſoldiers of the ſacred war, appointed him Gouernor of the kingdom, reſeruing vnto himſelfe onely the title of a King, with the City of Ieruſalem, and a yearely penſion of ten thouſand ducats: all which was done to the great diſgrace and diſcontentment of the County of Tripolis the old gouernor.

It was not long, but that Saladin hauing breathed himſelfe a little, after ſo great labours, came again into the Holy land, where he took many caſtles, and did infinit harm; inſomuch that the country people were glad for fear, to forſake their houſes, & fly into cities: the Chriſtian army in the mean time lying faſt by at Sephor, not once mouing, although many a faire occaſion were offered. For the chiefe commanders affectionated vnto the County of Tripolis, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernour, were vnwilling to fight, but finding one excuſe or other, ſuffered the enemy at his pleaſure to ſpoil the country, and ſo in ſafety to depart; which he had neuer before done in thoſe quarters.

Petra in vaine beſieged by the Turks.

Within leſſe than a month after, Saladin with a great army well appointed with all the habiliments of war needful for the beſieging of a city or ſtrong caſtle, came again into the land of Paleſtine, and paſſing thorow the country beyond Iordan, ſate down at laſt before Petra, in hope by the taking thereof to haue made his paſſage betwixt Egypt and Damaſco more ſafe. Of which his purpoſe king Baldwin hauing knowledge, and taught by the euil ſucceſſe of late, to what ſmall purpoſe it was to commit the managing of his wars vnto a Generall ſo euil beloued, and leſſe regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; ſent againſt him with his army Raymund the County of Tripolis the old gouernor, whom he had again reſtored vnto the gouernment, and diſplaced Guy. Of whoſe comming Saladin hearing, raiſed his ſiege after he had lien there a moneth, and ſo departed.

Diſſention in the Court of Ieruſalem.

A little before this expedition, the King ſtill growing ſicker and ſicker, his foul diſeaſe ſtil increaſing, by the common conſent of the nobilitie, he appointed Baldwin his nephew by his ſiſter Sybel, a child but of fiue years old, to ſucceed him in the kingdome; and the County of Tripolis to haue the gouernment of the State during the time of his minoritie. This Sybella the Kings ſiſter was firſt maried to William the yonger, Marquis of Mount-Ferrat, who dying within three moneths after, left her with child of this his poſthumus ſon Baldwin, now by his vncle deputed vnto the hope of the Kingdome. After whoſe death ſhe was maried vnto Guy Luſignan County of Ioppa and Aſcalon the late Gouernor: who taking in euill part this the Kings deſinement, eſpecially for the gouernment of the Kingdome by the County of Tripolis, departed from the Court as a man diſcontented, vnto his City of Aſcalon. Whereof the Patriark and the Princes of the ſacred war fearing (and not without cauſe) great danger to inſue, came to the king, then holding a Parliament in the city of Acon, moſt humbly requeſting him, for auoiding of further danger, and the ſafety of his kingdom, to receiue againe into his fauour the County Guy his brother in law, and to make an attonement between him and the County of Tripolis. But this their requeſt ſorted to no purpoſe: ſo that the Parliament at that time was diſſolued without any thing for the good of the Commonweale in that point concluded.

After that time the kingdom of Ieruſalem began ſtill more and more to decline. In the old King Baldwin (ſick both in body and minde) was almoſt no hope: in the young King (yet vnfit for ſo great a burthen) much leſſe: and the diſſention betwixt the two Counties Guy and Raymund with their fauorites, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the State. Beſides G that, the County of Tripolis ſearing the power of Guy his enemy, was thought to haue ſecret intelligence with Saladin the Turk: inſomuch as the King was almoſt in purpoſe to haue proclaimed him traitor. Wherfore the King now reſted only vpon the counſel of William Archbiſhop of Tyre, and the Maſters of the Knights of the ſacred war: by whoſe aduice hee ſent King Baldwin ſends Embaſſadors vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the West for aid.

Heraclius Patriark of Ieruſalem, Roger Molins Maſter of the Knights of S. Iohns, and Arnold maſter of the Knights Templers vnto Lucius the third then Pope, vnto Fredericke the Emperour, Philip the French King, and Henry the ſecond, King of England, to declare vnto them the dangerous eſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, and to craue their aid againſt the Infidels. Theſe Embaſſadors comming vnto the Councell then holden at Verona, with great grauitie and diligence, in the preſence of the Pope and of the Emperor, declared the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians H of the Eaſt, with their humble petition vnto them for aid; in ſuch ſort that they moued them, with all the Princes there preſent, to compaſſion. From thence they were by the Pope directed vnto Philip the French King, with whom hauing diſpatched their affaires, they from him paſſed ouer into England, and afterward into Germany: and had at length brought their negotiation to ſo good paſſe, that in euery place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be made againſt the Turkes, for reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt. With which good newes the Embaſſadors returning to Ieruſalem, filled the ſicke King with hope of great matters. But greater quarrels ſhortly after ariſing betwixt the Pope and the Emperour, and ſharp war likewiſe betwixt the French King and the King of England, and the other Chriſtian Princes alſo being at no better quiet; the notable expedition that had with the expectation I thereof ſo filled the whole world, was again laid aſide and quite daſhed. Wherof K. Baldwin vnderſtanding, both by meſſengers and letters from his friends, oppreſſed with griefe and heauineſſe more than with the force of his diſeaſe (a man for his proweſſe and painfulnes not 1185 inferior to any his predeceſſors) died without iſſue the 16 day of May, Anno 1185, being but 25 yeares old, wherof he had reigned twelue. His body was afterward with the general mourning of his ſubjects, ſolemnly buried in the Temple neer vnto mount Calvary, together with his predeceſſors the Kings of Ieruſalem.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned King.
But then began the ſparks which had of long lien raked vp and hidden in the aſhes, to breake out into a great fire: for Raymund County of Tripolis pretended the whole gouernment of the K kingdom and the tuition of the king to be due vnto him, by appointment of the late king, and conſent of the nobilitie: and did ſo much, that he had almoſt obtained it to haue bin confirmed vnto him in open parliament. But Sybella a woman of a moſt haughty ſpirit (ſiſter to the late King, and mother vnto the yong King yet liuing) prickt forward her husband Guy, in no caſe to giue place vnto his competitor Raymund; and ſo animated him, that by the help of his own fauorits, and the countenance of Boniface Marquis of Mount-Ferrat (who euen then was come with a great power into Syria) he extorted from the Nobilitie whatſoeuer hee deſired, But ſeuen moneths were ſcarſe well paſſed, but that this yong King Baldwin was dead and buried, poiſoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the deſire ſhe had of the kingdom her ſelfe.

princes of the kingdom, that Guy her husband might be proclaimed King. So by her means it was ſo wrought, that vpon one and the ſelfe ſame day, the yong King Baldwin was buried by his vncle, and Guy the County crowned. This yong King Baldwin, by reaſon of his tender yeres and ſhort reign, is of ſome not reckoned amongſt the Kings of Ieruſalem: howbeit, ſeeing he was by his vncle and the princes of that time thought worthy of the kingdome, let him alſo haue his place amongſt the reſt, as the eighth King of Ieruſalem.

When Guy was thus poſſeſſed of the kingdom, the County of Tripolis ſeeing himſelfe out of all hope of the gouernment, and highly therewith diſcontented, did what hee might by all means to croſſe the doings of the King: whoſe ſicke and aſpiring minde Saladin prickt dayly more and more forward, promiſing him his helping hand whenſoeuer he ſhould need; which M curteſie the County deſirouſly embraced. For now the fatall period of the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, grew faſt on, and all things tended to deſtruction, diſcord reigning in euery place: which Saladin well perceiuing (after he had compacted with the County) by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, inuited the Turkes, Saraſins, and Egyptians, as men agreeing in the ſame Religion, gion,generally to take vp arms in ſo fit an opportunitie of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, aſſuring them of great prey and ſpoil,beſides the honor of the conqueſt. The city of Ptolemais was the place by him appointed,where all this power ſhould meet:whither ſuch a multitude of the barbarous Mahometans (partly for the hatred of the Chriſtian Religion,partly for the hope of the rich ſpoile which Saladin had promiſed them) came flocking out of all places, that in ſhort time there was met together about fifty thouſand horſemen, beſides an infinite number of foot: and vnto ſuch as could not ſafely paſſe by the borders of Ieruſalem, to them the falſe County gaue ſafe conduct by the countries of Tyberias,Nazareth and Galile.

Saladin vpon the diſcord of the Chriſtians, taketh occaſion to inuade the Holy land.

All the power of the Infidels thus aſſembled, Saladin laid ſiege vnto the city of Ptolemais; which the Templers and Knights Hoſpitalers had notably fortified and ſtrongly manned (as before vnto them giuen by the King of Ieruſalem to defend againſt the Infidels) and therein now were both the Maſters of both thoſe honorable Orders, with the whole floure of Knights of their profeſſion. Vnto this City Saladin gaue a moſt terrible aſſault vpon May day in the morning, Anno 1187. which was by the Chriſtians notably defended,& the enemy with great ſlaughter ſtill beaten down. In the heat of this aſſault, the two great Maſters ſallying with certain troups of their moſt ready horſmen,aſſailed the enemies camp, & beating down al before them, raiſed there a great tumult; and by and by turning vpon the backs of them that were aſſaulting the city,made there an exceeding great ſlaughter. Inſomuch that Saladin diſmaid,firſt with the confuſion in his camp,and now with the ſudden danger behinde him, was glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and to turn his whole forces vpon them, where was ſought a moſt bloudy and terrible battell. Amongſt others that there fought,the County of Tripolis, now an enemy vnto God and his country,diſguiſed in the habit of a Turk,notably helped the Infidels, and meeting with the Maſter of the Knights Hoſpitalers, vnhorſed him; who, ſurcharged with the weight of his armor,and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies,there died. Neuertheles ſuch was the valor of theſe worthy men, and new ſuccor ſtill comming out of the city,that Saladin hauing in that battell and at the aſſault loſt 15000 of his Turkes, was glad with the reſt to betake himſelfe to flight. Neither was this ſo notable a victory gained by the Chriſtians without bloud, moſt part of the worthy Knights Hoſpitalers being together with their grand Maſter there ſlain.

Saladin by this ouerthrow perceiuing,that by open force he ſhould not be able to do much againſt the Chriſtians,thought it good vnto his forces to join alſo policie. Wherein the falſe County of Tripolis was the man he thought beſt to make choice of, as his fitteſt inſtrument to work by. Him he compacted withall,to ſeek for grace at the King of Ieruſalems hand, as of his dread Soueraign,and after ſo long diſcord,to ſue to be reconciled vnto him,as now weary of the Turks amity,with whom he ſhould make ſhew to be vtterly fallen out. At which time alſo,to giue the matter the better grace, Saladin of purpoſe with a great army came and beſieged Tiberias,a city of the Counties juriſdiction: for the reliefe wherof the traiterous County craued aid of the King and the other Princes of the ſacred war. Who with an army,though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his deſire, and incamped neer vnto the fountain of Sophor: where they had not long ſtaid,but that they met with the huge army of the Turkes,beeing in number ſix ſcore thouſand horſe and eight ſcore thouſand foot, with whom they joined a moſt ſharp and terrible battell, which by reaſon of the extremitie of the heate of the weather (it then beeing the twelfth of Iuly) and the approch of the night,was again giuen ouer,both armies as if it had bin by conſent retyring. The next day the battell was again begun,wherein the Turks,by the treaſon and ſhamefull flight of the falſe County of Tripolis,gained the victory. In this battell, Guy the King himſelfe, with Gerard maſter of the Templers, Boniface Marquis of Mont-Ferrat,and diuers others,men of great rank, were taken priſoners. And to ſay the truth, In this battel was broken the whole ſtrength of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt.

Guy king of Jeruſalem taken priſoner.

The Chriſtian commonweal by the treaſon of the falſe County thus betrayed to the Infidels, Saladin without any great reſiſtance,had the cities of Ptolemais,Biblis,and Berithus deliuered vnto him: in all which places hee vſed his victorie with great moderation, not inforcing any Chriſtian (more than the Latines) to depart thence,but ſuffring them there ſtil to remain as before,yeelding vnto him their obedience, with ſuch tribute as he had impoſed vpon them. With like good fortune he within the ſpace of one moneth tooke all the port Townes betwixt Sidon and Aſcalon alongſt the ſea coaſt, excepting only the antient city of Tyre: vnto G the city of Aſcalon alſo hee laid ſiege by the ſpace of nine daies: but loth to ſtay the courſe of his victory, by the valor of the defendants reſolued there to ſpend their liues, he departed thence, and marched directly vnto Ieruſalem the chiefe city of that kingdom: and approching the ſame, gaue ſummons therunto, perſuading the citiſens yet whilſt they had time, to yeeld themſelues together with the city vnto his mercy. Which they refuſing to do, he incloſed the ſame with his army, and by the ſpace of 14 days layd hard ſiege vnto it, leauing nothing vndone or vnattempted, that might ſerue for the gaining thereof. At which time the citiſens conſidering the danger they were in, and that the ſtrength of the kingdome, with the flour of their Chiualry were in the late battell loſt, and that they were not now to expect any forein aid; agreed vpon certain conditions to yeeld vp the city: which were, That ſuch Chriſtians H as would, might remain ſtill with their libertie and goods; and that ſuch as would not might in ſafety depart with ſo much of their goods as they could carry vpon their backes.

Theſe conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy city was vnto him deliuered the ſecond of October, Anno 1187; after it had been by the Chriſtians holden from the time that it was by Godfrey of Buillon and other Chriſtians won, about 89 years. Saladin entring into the city, prophaned firſt the Temple of the Lord, conuerting it vnto the vſe of his Mahometan ſuperſtition: the other churches he vſed as ſtables for his horſes, only the temple of the Sepulchre was by the Chriſtians for a great ſum of mony redeemed, and ſo kept vndefiled. The Latine Chriſtians he thruſt out of the city, yet with leaue to cary with them ſuch things as they were able themſelues to bear: who trauelling with heauy burthens, but much more heauy hearts, ſome I to Tripolis, ſome to Tyre, and ſome to Antioch (for only theſe three cities were now left vnto the Chriſtians) were by the falſe County of Tripolis by the way lightned of their burthens, to the increaſing of the heauineſſe of their hearts, moſt of them being by him and his followers ſpoiled of that little they had by the mercy of their enemies ſaued in the ruine of their ſtate.

Jeruſalem beſieged.

Jeruſalem taken by Saladin.

Vnto the other Chriſtians that were naturall Sytians, Greeks, Armenians, Georgians, and ſuch like, Saladin appointed certain places of the city for them to dwell in, where ſome of their poſteritie were long time after to be found. All the monuments of the Chriſtians were by the barbarous Mahometans and Turks defaced; onely the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour Chriſt, with the monuments of Godfrey of Buillon and his brother Baldwin, for the reuerence K of the men, were by them ſpared. In theſe ſo great troubles aboue 20000 of the Chriſtians periſhed. Among the reſt, the County of Tripolis was ſhortly after found dead in his bed, and as ſome ſay, circumciſed; a manifeſt token of his reuolt, not from the King only, but from the Chriſtian faith alſo.

The death of Raymund the traitrous county of Tripolis.

Ieruſalem thus won, Saladin returned again to the ſiege of Aſcalon, which after hee had by the ſpace of ten daies moſt ſtreitly beſieged, was to him by compoſition deliuered: wherin amongſt other things agreed vpon for the ſafe departure of the Citiſens, was compriſed alſo, That he ſhould freely ſet at liberty Guy the King, and Gerard maſter of the Templers, both before taken priſoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turk ſtil vrging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to haue L taken Tripolis: but hauing made ſome proofe of his owne forces, and the valour of the defendants, he was glad to giue ouer the ſiege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his army, becauſe he would leaue no place vnattempted, he laid ſiege vnto the city of Tyre, where Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat was a little before arriued with Iſaac Angelus the Greek Emperors fleet, and a ſupply of certain companies of good ſoldiers. Vnto which place were come great numbers of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians, fled from Ieruſalem and other places, ſo that the city was full of men.

This city Saladin moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, but was by the Chriſtians notably repulſed, not without the great loſſe of his beſt ſoldiers. At which time alſo the Admirall of Sicilia diſcomfited his fleet at ſea, and landing his forces came vnlooked for vpon the back of him. So M that hauing his hands ful before by them of the town, and charged behind by theſe new come enemies, he was glad to retyre in ſuch haſt, as that hee left his Tents, with all that therein was, vnto the ſpoile of the Chriſtians.

Within a few dayes after, Saladin hauing againe repaired his army, inuaded the Countrey about

about Antioch,with fire and ſword deſtroying whatſoeuer was ſubiect to his fury,euen to the gates of the city. But knowing that ſo ſtrong a city was not without great charge and a long ſiege to be won,he thought good to make proofe if it might by policie or corruption be gained. Wherein he ſo cunningly dealt with the Patriark,that he had by his meanes the Caſtle (otherwiſe almoſt impregnable) for gold betraied to him. By means wherof he in ſhort time became lord & maſter of that famous city (about 90 years before hardly gained by the whole power of the Chriſtians,after eleuen months ſiege) and with it twenty fiue cities moe, that depended of the fortune thereof,with all the prouinces belonging thereunto,alwaies deemed to haue bin the third part of the kingdom of Ieruſalem.

The famous city of Antioch betrayd vnto the Turks.

The loſſe of ſo great a city,together with the ruine of the whole kingdome, had in a ſhort ſpace filled euery corner of Chriſtendom with the heauy report therof. Wherwith the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt (namely Frederick the German Emperour,with Frederick his ſonne duke of Suevia,Philip the French King,Henry the ſecond,King of England,Otto duke of Burgondie,Leopold Duke of Auſtria,with many other great Princes and Prelats of Germany,Italy,and other places)not a little moued,as alſo with the pittifull complaints of the Embaſſadors at the ſame time ſent from the diſtreſſed Chriſtians,and the effectuall perſuaſions of Clement the third, then Pope; promiſed, and all or moſt part indeed made great preparations: which they afterward,though not all at once(as letted by other occaſions)but at diuers times imployed,for the moſt part with the danger of their own perſons, againſt the Turkes, for the reliefe of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians,and recouery of the Holy land: but with what ſucces ſhall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which ſo great preparations made againſt him, Saladin not ignorant, ſet at liberty Guy King of Ieruſalem,who contrary to his promiſe made at Aſcalon,he had now detained a year in priſon; yet before his inlargement exacting of him an oath, Neuer by force of arms afterwards to ſeek to recouer his kingdom,or to reuenge the wrongs he had ſuſtained:hoping therby to ſtay the comming of the other Princes in his quarell. Which oath for all that,the Pope diſpenſed withall,as extorted by conſtraint from him,at ſuch time as Saladin had longer detained him in priſon than of right he ſhould.

Guy now at liberty,and yet in mind a King, came to Tyre, but could not be there receiued, the Citiſens hauing before ſworne their obedience to Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, who had notably defended them againſt the fury of Saladin. Wherfore departing thence with ſuch power as he had,and the diſperſed Chriſtians daily repairing vnto him out of all parts of Syria,he came and beſieged Ptolemais: where he had not long lien, but firſt came vnto him the Venetian fleet,with them alſo of Piſa,and after them the Flemings with a fleet of fifty ſaile, who all joined their forces together for the winning of the city. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais,came Saladin with a great army for the reliefe of the beſieged; where betwixt him and the Chriſtians was fought a great battell, wherein the Chriſtians at the firſt had the better, but afterward fainting,and ready to fly,had there vndoubtedly receiued a great ouerthrow,had not Iefferey Luſignan the Kings brother (left for the garding of the campe) in good time come in with new ſupplies,and not only ſtayd their flight,but alſo repreſſed the further purſuit of the fierce enemy,now almoſt in poſſeſſion of the deſired victorie. Neuertheleſſe there were 2000 Chriſtians there ſlain,and amongſt them Gerard Maſter of the Templers. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiuing how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue the city, ſent for the fleet which hee had ſtrongly rigged vp at Alexandria,and ſo by force put new ſupplies both of men and victuals into the beſieged city. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often ſallies vpon the Chriſtians, and in deſpight of the Chriſtian religion, whipped the image of Chriſt crucified,which they had for that purpoſe in the ſight of the Chriſtians ſet vp vpon the top of the wall. With the ſaid fleet alſo he ſo ſcoured the ſeas, that no victuals or new ſupplies of men could that way without great danger be brought vnto the campe: wherby ſuch ſcarcitie and want of all things began ſhortly after to ariſe among the Chriſtians, that ſome of them not able longer to endure the famin,fled vnto the Turks camp,then lying not far off,crying out for bread. Of which diſtreſſe in the campe of the Chriſtians Saladin knowing right well, both by ſuch fugitiues as dayly came ouer vnto him,and by his own eſpials; yet made ſhew as if he vnderſtood nothing thereof, but ſuddenly riſing with his army, as doubtfull of his own ſtrength, departed, leauing his camp full of all maner of victuals: whereof the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, and ſuppoſing G him for fear to haue bin gon indeed, in great numbers haſted vnto the forſaken camp as vnto a moſt deſired prey: where whileſt they were gorging themſelues, Saladin ſuddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great ſlaughter. Neuertheles the Chriſtians hauing now lien before the city ſix months, continued the ſiege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardeſt difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Chriſtian princes, whoſe comming they expected with the firſt of the next Spring: during which time many an hot skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them and the Turks both by ſea and land.

Fredericke the Emperour ſets forwards toward the Holy-land.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, Frederick the Emperor, with diuers of the great German princes and others, before reſolued vpon an expedition for the recouery of the Holy land, and the reliefe of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria: hauing now raiſed H a great army, furniſhed with all things neceſſary for ſo long a journey, ſet forward from Ratiſbone, and ſo comming to Vienna, and paſſing thorow Hungary, Bulgaria, and Thracia, arriued at length at Conſtantinople; where he was by Iſaac Angelus the Emperor that then reigned, honorably entertained, but indeed more for feare and faſhion ſake, than for any loue or good wil; for that he, after the ſuſpitious manner of the Greeks, hauing in diſtruſt ſo great a power of the Latine Emperors, wiſhed rather for his abſence than his preſence; and therfore ceaſed not in what he might, to haſten his paſſage ouer into Aſia, pretending for the colour thereof, the neceſſitie the Chriſtians had of his preſent aid. So the Emperour with his army paſſing ouer the ſtreit, and without reſiſtance marching thorow the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia, entred into Lycaonia, where meeting with a great power of the Turks, who were come from the I Sultan of Iconium to ſtay his further paſſage, he ouerthrew him in a great battell: and ſo marching directly on to Iconium, took it by force, and gaue the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers, in reuenge of the injuries before done vnto his vncle the Emperor Conrade, by the Souldan of that city. Departing thence, and marching thorow Cilicia, hee in another battell ouerthrew the Turks, that hauing taken the ſtreits of the mountains, had thought to haue ſtayd his further paſſage into Syria. After that he took the city Philomela (which the Sultan had ſtrongly fortified) and raſed it to the ground, putting to the ſword all the people therein, for that they contrary to the law of Nations, had ſlaine ſuch meſſengers as hee had ſent vnto them for the ſummoning of the city. In like manner he entred into the leſſer Armenia, where he tooke the city Melitene, and ſubdued all the country thereabouts: vnto the relief wherof the Turks K comming with a moſt huge army, were by him with an exceeding great ſlaughter ouerthrown and put to flight. After that, entring into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his ſon, with a great Army of the Turks, he ouerthrew him in the plain field, and diſcomfited his whole army. But whileſt he too eagerly purſueth his enemy hee had then in chaſe, his horſe foundring vnder him as he paſſed the riuer Saleph, hee was ſo ouerthrown, and his foot hanging faſt in his ſtirrop, drawne thorow the deepe riuer, and almoſt drowned; and at the farther ſide of the riuer was ſo plunged by his horſe at his landing, that he was taken vp for dead: yet breathing a little, and caſting vp his eies to heauen, with much adoe hee vttered theſe few words, Lord receiue my Soule; and ſo in the hands of them that tooke him vp, gaue vp the ghoſt, vnto the great griefe and hinderance of the Chriſtian commonweal. For Saladin hearing of L his approch, was ſo afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before got in Syria, but how to defend himſelfe in Egypt. Thus miſerably periſhed this worthy Emperor the tenth of Iune, in the yeare of Grace 1190, being then of the age of ſeuentie yeares, whereof he had with much trouble reigned eight and thirty. His dead body was carried along with the army, and afterward with all funeral pomp buried in the cathedral church at Tyre.

Fredericke the Emperours ſon choſen General of the Chriſtian Army.

Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his ſon Duke of Suevia, was by the general conſent of the Princes in the army choſen Generall in his ſtead: vpon whom, with the reſt of the army, yet mourning for the death of the Emperor, the Turks gaue a ſudden and fierce charge, in hope ſo to haue ouerthrown them; but finding greater reſiſtance than they had before ſuppoſed, M and hauing loſt ſome of their men, they with like ſpeed that they came, retyred againe. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great Armies) to encreaſe in the Campe: for why, the Turks for that purpoſe had before deſtroyed or carried away all that was in the country, leauing nothing for the Chriſtians more than the bare ground. Wherfore

Frederick turning a little out of the way, came to Antioch, which was eaſily deliuered to him, and his hungry ſoldiers well refreſhed by the citiſens, being as yet for the moſt part Chriſtians. But he had not there ſtayd paſt fifteen dayes for the refreſhing of his army, but that the plague (the hand-maid of Famin, and another ſcourge of the greateſt multitudes) began to rage among his ſoldiers in ſuch ſort, that he was glad with his army to forſake the city, & to get him abroad again into the open field: where forthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodcquin Generall of ſuch forces as Saladin had ſent for out of Egypt (which were not ſmall) was by great journies comming towards him. Againſt whom he in good order ſet forward, with his fathers Corſe ſtill caried in the midſt of his army. Theſe two armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, joined a great and doubtfull battell, fortune now inclining to the one ſide, and by and by to the other; the Chriſtians exceeding their enemies in valor, and they them again in number. At length the Chriſtians in the vantgard began to retyre, & they that ſeconded them were alſo hardly charged: when Frederick mindfull of his fathers valour, with a troup of valiant horſmen brake into the enemies battel with ſuch force, that the Turks were glad to giue ground: after whom Leopold Duke of Auſtria comming preſently on with his footmen, brought ſuch a feare vpon the whole army of the Turks, that they betook themſelues to ſpeedy flight. In this battell were 4000 of the enemies ſlain, with ſmall loſſe of the Chriſtians; and about 1000 more taken priſoners, with 15 of their enſignes. After which victorie, Frederick marching further into Cœlo-Syria, pacified Laodicea then in mutinie, and like to haue bin deliuered to the Turks. He alſo with a little labor took Berythus, with diuers other cities of Syria, which before belonging vnto the Kings of Ieruſalem, were now revolted vnto the Turks. So afterward comming to Tyre, he there ſolemnly buried his father, (dead as is before ſaid) and from thence certified Guy the King (ſtill lying with the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſiege of Ptolemais) of his comming: who forthwith ſent the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat with part of the fleet, to tranſport him with his people that were left, by ſea; for that by land he could not ſo ſafely haue come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladin, who with a great army lay ſtill houering about his beſieged city, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was Duke Frederick with his ſoldiers yet left, ſafely by ſea conducted from Tyre to the camp at Ptolemais, and there joyfully receiued by the King and the other Princes, with the general applauſe of the whole camp.

In the mean time the Turks ſallying out of Ptolemais, had done great harme amongſt the Chriſtians, by whom they were not without ſome loſſe againe repulſed. But after the comming of duke Frederick, it was thought good by the general conſent of all the great commanders in the army, that the city ſhould be aſſaulted round, and to that purpoſe was euery mans regiment appointed what place to aſſail. The King himſelfe with the Templers and the Italians from Piſa, vndertook that part of the city which was toward the ſea: vnto duke Frederick and his Germans was allotted all betwixt the bridge ouer the riuer Bele, and the Biſhops palace: the Venetians, Genoa's, and Knights Hoſpitalers were appointed vnto the reſt of the wall as far as the court of Raymund: the Friſelanders, Flemings and Hollanders tooke vp all the reſt of the wall vnto the ſea ſide. Thus was the City at once on euery ſide aſſailed by the Chriſtians, with ſuch fury, as if they had thereon purpoſed to ingage their whole forces, ſeeking by a thouſand wounds, and a thouſand kinds of death, to haue by their ſcaling ladders gained the top of the walls; the Turks with no leſſe courage ſtill beating them down again. But in the heate of this ſo dreadfull and deſperat aſſault, Saladin ſtil houering aloof, came now vpon the ſudden and aſſailed the camp of the Chriſtians, filling the ſame with fear and tumult: whoſe charge they that were left for the defence of the ſame, at the firſt notably receiued; but finding themſelues too weak, began to giue ground: by which means the Turks took certain tents with ſome enſignes, and fired ſome other of the pauilions of the Chriſtians, hauing ſlain aboue an hundred of the defendants.

The Chriſtians in the mean time little preuailing in the aſſault, and troubled with the danger of their camp, retyred to the reliefe thereof. But the Turk perceiuing himſelfe too weake for the whole power of the Chriſtians, retyred alſo; yet not with ſuch haſt but that hee had there almoſt loſt himſelfe. This notable aſſault was giuen the fourteenth of October: after which many light skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, but more for booty than for any other great purpoſe.

In the meane time diuers great Princes of the Weſt that had vowed themſelues to this ſacred war,came thither,whoſe number rather increaſed the want of victuals,than furthered the ſeruice. At which time alſo,the diſcord betwixt Guy the King (whoſe wife and children were now dead) and Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat(who had maried Iſabel the late queens ſiſter, by whom he pretended a claim vnto the title of the imaginary kingdom)did much harm vnto the proceedings of the Chriſtians: ſo pleaſing a thing theſe hauty ſtiles be vnto the lofty minds of the ambitious. Shortly after,the Chriſtians yet lying at the ſiege,the contagion and famin ſtill increaſing,it fortuned that duke Frederick fell ſick of the plague, whereof he died, and with the great mourning of the whole army was afterward ſolemnly buried faſt by his father,in the Cathedral Church at Tyre: after whoſe death the Chriſtians attempted no great matter againſt the city,although they were by the Turks often prouoked; but lay ſtill ſtrongly intrenched,expecting ſome greater aid from the Princes of the Weſt.

Now all the hope of the Chriſtians affairs in Syria and in the land of Paleſtine,reſted vpon the comming of the two mighty Princes, Philip the ſecond of that name, King of France, and Richard the firſt,King of England: who hauing agreed betwixt themſelues,with their combined forces to relieue the diſtreſſed Chriſtians of the Eaſt,and again (if it were poſſible)to repair the broken ſtate of the kingdom of Ieruſalem, were now met together at Marſeilles in Prouence. From whence the French King firſt departing with his fleet for Sicilia,and with a proſperous gale for certain daies holding on his courſe, and now come nigh vnto the Iſland, was by force of a furious tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing,ſo toſſed and tumbled in the deep,that many of his ſhips there periſhed,eaten vp of the ſea; others by force of weather driuen vpon the ſands and rocks,were broken all to pieces; and the reſt, ſome with their maſts broken, ſome with their tackling and ſails rent,& all in generall ſore weather-beaten, with much ado arriued at Meſſena the deſired Port. At which place King Richard alſo (but with better fortune)arriued with his fleet alſo. Both the Kings now met together,reſolued there to winter; the French King inforced by neceſſitie ſo to do,for the repairing of the late loſſes he had receiued,as wel in his people and prouiſion, as in his ſhipping; all which was to be relieued by new ſupplies out of France: and the King of England ſtaying to take order for the dowry of his ſiſter Ioan (widow of William the late King of Sicilia) with Tancred the baſe ſon of Roger, who had now aſpired vnto the kingdom of that Iſland. About which matter great ſtirs aroſe betwixt King Richard the Queens brother,and Tancred the new king; inſomuch that it was like to haue broken out into open war,had it not to the good contentment of King Richard bin otherwiſe taken vp,and ſo the controuerſie ended. But whilſt theſe two great Kings thus wintred in this fruitfull Iſland, and oftentimes as good friends met together,ſomtime for their diſport, and ſomtime to confer of their ſo weighty affaires, (the way as was thought to haue appeaſed all former diſpleaſure,and to haue encreaſed loue) it fell out clean contrary, jealouſie and diſtruſt not only reuiuing the old,but alſo ſtill raiſing new quarrels betwixt them,to the great hinderance of the Common good by them intended. Which may ſerue for a warning to all great Princes, willing to continue in amitie, and to hold a good opinion one of another, neuer to ſee one the other; or comming ſo to an interview,not to conuerſe or ſtay long together: which as it is not often done without the danger of their perſons, ſo can it not poſſibly be long continued, but that it will ingender in themſelues, as well as in their followers, jealouſie, enuy, hatred and diſtruſt, as we haue before ſaid, and hereafter in the courſe of this hiſtorie may appeare.

There was an old quarrell betwixt theſe two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French Kings ſiſter; whom Richard hauing before (his father yet liuing) affianced, had now rejected,as her whom his aged father Henry the ſecond had too familiarly vſed: and in ſtead of her,to the great diſgrace of the French,eſpouſed the Lady Berengaria, daughter to the King of Nauar. Which indignitie with diuers others then ariſing betwixt the French and Engliſh, as then with great heart-burning ſmouldred vp in reſpect of the common cauſe then in hand,afterwards brake out again to the ſhamefull ouerthrow of this moſt honorable expedition, and lamentable diſturbance of both realms.

Winter paſt,and the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the beſt pleaſed, firſt looſed from Meſſena,and with his fleet in ſafety arriued at Ptolemais, where hee was by the Chriſtians,now the third yeare lying at the ſiege, ſo joyfully receiued, as if he had been to them ſent with ſuccors from heauen. After whom ſhortly after followed alſo king Richard, of whoſe fleet (by force of weather ſore beaten and diſperſed) two ſhips by the rage of the tempeſt driuen aground vpon the coaſt of Cyprus, were by the Iſland people ſpoiled, and the men that in them had hardly eſcaped the danger of the ſea, with moſt barbarous inhumanity, ſome ſlain, and ſome taken priſoners: the reſt of the fleet arriuing there alſo, were with like inciuilitie forbidden to land; the Cypriots ready at hand in all places to keep them off. With which ſo great an indignitie the King juſtly moued, and by force landing his people, with incredible celeritie and ſucceſſe ouer-ran the whole Iſland, neuer ceaſing vntill hee had made a full conqueſt thereof, and taken Iſaac Comnenus (commonly called the king of that Iſland, and of ſome, for what reaſon I know not, Emperor of the Griffons) priſoner: yet was hee indeed neither King nor Emperor, but being a man of great nobilitie and power, and of the honourable ſtock of the Comneni, had in the troubleſom reign of Andronicus Comnenus the Emperor his couſin, laid hold vpon that fruitfull Iſland, and there tyranniſed as a reputed King, vntill that now he was by King Richard taken priſoner, and for his vnfaithfull dealing ſent faſt bound in chaines of ſiluer into Syria. The King thus poſſeſſed of the whole Iſland, there at Limozin maried the Lady Berengaria the King of Nauars daughter, brought thither by Ioan late queen of Sicilia, the Kings ſiſter. And ſo diſpoſing of all things as he thought beſt, for the ſafe keeping of the Iſland, ſet forward again with his fleet towards Syria: where by the way hee light vpon a great ſhip of the Sultans, laded with victuals and warlike prouiſions for the reliefe of the beſieged; all which became a prey vnto him. So holding on his courſe, he at length arri-C ued at Ptolemais, where he was by the French King and the reſt of the Chriſtians there lying, moſt honorably receiued.

K Richard reuengeth the injury don to his people by the Cypriots.

K. Richard arriueth at Ptolemais.

Now had the city of Ptolemais bin three yeares beſieged by the Chriſtians, and notably defended by the Turks: during which time, many an hot aſſault and bloudy skirmiſh had paſſed betwixt them. And now the eies of all men were fixed vpon the two Kings of England and France, vnto whom all the reſt offered their obedience and ſeruice. The Chriſtian campe was great, compoſed eſpecially of Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almanes; not them that were left of the Emperor Fredericks army, (for they were for the moſt part dead, or els returned home again into their countries) but of ſuch, as mooued with the zeal they bare to this religious war, came daily in great numbers thither; as did alſo many others of diuers nations, deſirous in ſome meaſure to be partakers of ſo honorable a war.

Theſe religious and worthy Chriſtians thus lying at the ſiege, had with much painfull labor vndermined one of the greateſt Towers of the city, called the accurſed Tower, with ſome part of the wall alſo; by means wherof they were in hope to find a way into the city. Wherefore all things being now in readineſſe for the firing of the mine, it was thought good by generall conſent, that an aſſault ſhould alſo at the ſame time be giuen vnto the city: and thereupon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wal to aſſail, which they all with great courage vndertook. In the heat of which aſſault, the aforeſaid vndermined tower, with ſome part of the wall (the timber whereon it ſtayd, now burnt) fell down with a great fall, laying open a fair breach for the Chriſtians to enter: wherwith the Turkes diſmayed, forthwith craued to come to parley, which granted, they for ſafegard of their liues yeelded forthwith to giue vp the city, and to reſtore to the Chriſtians the holy Croſſe, with two thouſand captiues and 200 horſemen, ſuch as they ſhould require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; beſides 200000 Conſtantinopolitan ducats to be by him giuen to the two Kings, for the coſt by them beſtowed in the ſiege. For paiment whereof the Turks in the city were to remaine as hoſtages vnder the ſafe keeping of the Chriſtians: ſo that if all the couenants aforeſaid were not within forty days performed by Saladin, they ſhould all for their liues be at the kings mercie. So was this ſtrong city, after it had bin almoſt three years beſieged, deliuered vp vnto the
as if they had bin the only men by whoſe valor the city was won, at their firſt entry preſumptuouſly aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the wals, to the great offence of all the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of King Richard, who (not vnworthily for his princely courage, commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon) not brooking ſo proud an indignitie, cauſed the enſignes of Leopold their Duke to be puld down and foiled vnder foot; which ſhortly after gaue him occaſion of repentance, as ſhall hereafter be ſeen.

The two Kings poſſeſſed of the city, diuided the ſame, with all the people and ſpoil therof G betwixt them, without regard of the reſt of the other noble Chriſtians that had ſuſtained the whole trauel of that long ſiege: for which cauſe moſt of them, ſeeing themſelues ſo deluded, withdrew themſelues from them, & with one conſent ſent them word, that they would forſake them, except they were made partakers of the gains, as they had bin of the pains. Which the two Kings to content them promiſed they ſhould; howbeit they ſo long delayed their promiſes, that many worthy men, conſtrained by pouerty, departed diſcontented from them, into their own countries.

But long it was not that this one city ſo lately gained could contain theſe two kings, whom two large kingdoms could not retain in peace: for abeit they were in body together preſent, and in one, and that a moſt honourable action, combined, yet were they in hearts far aſunder, H and their ſecret deſignes much different; envy and diſtruſt ſtill reuiuing vnkindnes paſt, and miniſtring new matter of greater diſcontentments. King Richard according tõ his noble nature, was of nothing more deſirous, than to haue had the war continued vntill they had made a full conqueſt of Syria and the land of Paleſtine; and for that cauſe requeſted the French king to bind himſelfe together with him by ſolemne oath, there to ſtay yet three years, for regaining thoſe countries. But he in mind long before eſtranged from King Richard, and in his deep conceit plotting matters neerer home better fitting his purpoſe, would by no means be perſuaded ſo to do, but ſtill found one occaſion or other for to colour his departure. And ſhortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extremely ſicke, he requeſted King Richard and the other Chriſtian princes to come vnto him: vnto whom being come, hee in few words I declared his purpoſe of return, as followeth:

I cannot (my Lords) longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the aire in this extreame hot ſeaſon. If my death might profit the Chriſtian Religion, or any one of you, or the Chriſtian Commonweale, there ſhould be no diſtemperature whatſoeuer, that could ſeparate me from you, or could draw mee from hence. But more may the life of one abſent, ſerue and profit you, than the death of him preſent. I muſt of neceſſitie depart; yet at my departure I will leaue you fiue hundred men at armes, and ten thouſand footmen, the floure and choice of all the Forces of France, vnder the conduct of my Couſin Odo duke of Burgondie, vnto whom I will giue pay and entertainment, with a continuall ſupply of all things for them neceſſary. K

The King of France ſwears to K. Richard, in his abſence not to invade his Territories in France.

This excuſe of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part: but ſaid, That it was apparant to all men, that he abandoned the wars in Syria, to return into France, for no other end or purpoſe but the more eaſily to inuade the prouinces of Guyen and Normandy, now diſfurniſhed of their garriſons, and ſo ſubject to his malice. Which point hee ſo vrged, that the French King could haue no leaue with his honor to depart, vntill ſuch time as he had by ſolemn oath bound himſelfe vnto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud, againſt him or any thing of his, vntill fifty daies were expired after King Richard his return home: which how well it was by the French King obſerued, I leaue to the report of the hiſtories of that time. And ſo the French King, not to be intreated any langer to ſtay, leauing L behind him the aforeſaid number of men he had promiſed, imbarking the reſt of his army, and accompanied with three tall ſhips of the Genoa's his friends, and Ruffin Volta their Admiral, departed from Ptolemais to Tyre, the firſt of Auguſt, and two daies after looſing thence, ſailed alongſt the ſea coaſt of Aſia, and cutting through the Mediterranian, arriued at length in the mouth of the riuer of Tyber, and from thence went to Rome; where after hee had viſited Pope Celeſtine, and the famous places of that moſt renowned city, hee returned again vnto his fleet, and ſo by ſea arriued ſafely in France; hauing in that great expedition, ſo honorably by him vndertaken, performed nothing anſwerable to that the world looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with his Germans: and not long after him the Venetians alſo, with them of Piſa and Genoa. Of whoſe departure Saladin vnder- M ſtanding, & that the Chriſtian forces were thereby much impaired, refuſed either to pay the money, or to reſtore the priſoners, as was promiſed at the giuing vp of Ptolemais; threatning moreouer to chop off the heads of all ſuch Chriſtian captiues as he had in his power, if the King ſhould ſhew extremity to the pledges of the city. Neuertheles ſhortly, after he ſent his mbaſſadors with great preſents vnto the King, requeſting a longer time for the ſparing of s pledges: which his requeſt, together with his gifts, the King refuſed to grant or accept.

Vhereupon Saladin forthwith cauſed ſuch Chriſtian captiues as were in his power, to be beaded: which albeit King Richard vnderſtood, yet would he not preuent the time before agreed vpon for the execution of his priſoners, being the twentieth day of Auguſt; vpon which y he cauſed the Turks priſoners (to the number of 2500 (or as the Germanes and French e, to the number of 7000) in the ſight of Saladins army to be executed.

The loſſe of the ſtrong town of Ptolemais much impaired the reputation of Saladin, euen ong his own people: as it commonly falls out, that the euill ſucceſſe of a great Commanr in his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, and opinion, eſpecially of the vulgar ſort, ich iudge of all things by the euent. And albeit that his loſſes were great, and ſuch as much unted him; yet he thought it beſt, as the caſe then ſtood, to make them greater, and with own hands (as it were) to ruinat and ouerthrow ſuch towns and cities as as he ſaw he could t keep, rather than to ſuffer them whole and vndefaced to fal into the enemies hand. So card headlong with diſpaire, he cauſed all the towns he had along the ſea coaſt in Syria and leſtine, to be ſacked and ruinated, and their walls ouerthrown; eſpecially ſuch as were of oſt importance, and like to ſtand the Chriſtians in ſtead, namely Porphiria, Cæſarea, Ioppa, ſcalon, Gaza, and Elam, with diuers other caſtles and citadels in the countries thereabouts; oſt part whereof were again by King Richard and the Templers fortified and repeopled, al-ough Saladin in the mean time did what he might to haue letted the ſame.

Nothing more hindered the good proceeding of the Chriſtian Princes in this and other ir moſt honorable expeditions againſt the Infidels, than the diſcord amongſt themſelues, ſtill enuying at at anothers honour, and euery one jealous of his owne. Great ſtrife and t-burning there had been betweene the two Kings of France and England, during the they were together in this ſacred expedition, to the great hinderance of the ſame. No contention had there been betwixt Guy the late King of Ieruſalem, and Conrade Marquis ont-Ferrat, about the title of that loſt kingdom; whereby the whole power of the Chris in Syria was diuided into two factions. Richard King of England, Baldwin Earle of nders, Henry Earle of Champaign, the Knights Hoſpitallers of S. Iohn, the Venetians, and ans, taking part with Guy: and Philip the French King, Odo Duke of Burgondie, Rodolph rle of Claremont, the Templers, the Genoa's, the Landtgraue of Thurin, Leopold Duke of ſtria, and Robert County of Naſſau, taking part with Conrade the Marquis. But Conrade ortly after the taking of Ptolemais being ſlain by two of the deſperat Aſaſſines, or (as ſome hers ſay) by two deſperat ruffians, (ſuborned therunto by the Prince of Tyrone, in reuenge the deſpight done vnto him by the ſaid Marquis, by taking from him Iſabel his eſpouſed fe) as he was walking in his city of Tyre, and doubting no ſuch treaſon: King Richard ſeeing a fit occaſion offered for the vtter extinguiſhing of that claime, and how to intitle hime vnto that kingdome; perſuaded the aforeſaid Iſabel (the widow of the late Marquis, and whoſe right he had laid claim vnto the Kingdom) to relinquiſh that ſo troubleſome a title, d to take to her husband Henry Earle of Champain his nephew, vnto whom he gaue the ci-of Tyre: Guy the King exclaiming to the contrary, as of a wrong done vnto himſelf. Shortfter he began alſo to temper with Guy, perſuading him to reſigne vnto him that little right intereſt he had in the kingdome of Ieruſalem, and in lieu thereof to receiue at his hands kingdom of Cyprus: which his offer the poore King was glad to accept. By which exhange, Guy became King of Cyprus, and Richard King of Ieruſalem: which honorable ti-he afterwards (as ſome report) vſed in his ſtile, as did ſome others his ſucceſſors, the Kings England after him. So Guy with all his wealth paſſing ouer into Cyprus, took poſſeſſion of kingdom, where he liued not long. Neuertheleſſe that pleaſant kingdome continued in family of the Luſignans by the ſpace of about 283 years after: vntill at length that fami-failing in the poſthumus ſonne of Iames the baſtard, laſt King of that Iſland, it fell into the nds of the Venetians; by whom it was holden as a part of their ſeigniorie almoſt an huned yeares, vntill it was in our freſh remembrance again from them taken by Selymus the ſeond, great Emperor of the Turks, in the yeare 1571, as in the proces of this hiſtorie ſhall in e place (God willing) be declared.

Now was King Richard, for the increaſe of his honor, more deſirous than before of the city of Ieruſalem,as the moſt pretious and honorable priſe of all that religious war. And thereupon with all the power of the Chriſtians then at his command,ſet forward from Ptolemais,and was come on his way as far as Arſua,a towne ſcituated betwixt Cæſarea and Ioppa. In the vauward was King Richard himſelfe with the Engliſhmen: after whom followed Odo Duke of Burgondie,with his French: and in the rereward Iaques de Auenes,with the Flemings,Brabanders,and Wallons,who after the death of their County Philip at the ſiege of Ptolomais, had put themſelues vnder his regiment. Saladin with a great army ſtil at hand,and as it were tending vpon them, firſt with certain ambuſcado's charged the rereward,and ſo afterwards came on with his whole power: vpon whom Iaques turning himſelfe, with his Flemings receiued the charge with great aſſurance, and ſo long themſelues endured the ſame, vntill the French came in to their ſuccours,and after them the Engliſh alſo. There was fought a notable battell,and great valour ſhewed both on the one ſide and on the other, but eſpecially by them of the Turks part, who knew well the purpoſe of the Chriſtians for the beſieging of Ieruſalem, and that thereon depended their onely hope,and that hee that could hold the ſame might almoſt aſſure himſelfe to carry away the glory of that war. The French and Engliſh in that battell honorably ſtroue who might ſhew the greateſt valour: neither would the Low-Countrey men vnder Iaques their Generall ſeem to be any thing behind them. This ſharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going down of the Sunne. King Richard (as ſome write) was there wounded with an arrow: and Iaques valiantly there fighting, was ſlaine, hauing ſold his life deare, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the victory vnto the Chriſtians. It is reported, That in this battell was ſlaine more Turkes and Saraſins, than in any one battell within the memory of man before. Of the Chriſtians were not loſt any great number,either any man of name,more than the aforeſaid Iaques the valiant Generall of the Flemings.

The next day the Chriſtians remoued to Bethlem,a town about the mid way betwixt Ioppa and Ieruſalem. But Winter now comming faſt on,and want of victuals like enough to increaſe,the King changing his mind for the ſiege, returned with the greateſt part of the army to Aſcalon, which hee that Winter newly fortified, the walls thereof beeing before by Saladin in his diſpaire demoliſhed. The Duke of Burgondy with his French men all that while quietly wintring at Tyre. In the mean time the power of the Chriſtians was greatly diminiſhed, ſome one way departing from the camp, and ſome another. The Italians for the moſt part,with them of Piſa (who in theſe three yeares wars had ſtriuen with the Venetians for the honor of their ſeruice) were now returned home,as were the Venetians themſelues alſo. Neuertheleſſe, Winter now paſt,and the Spring time come, King Richard tooke the field again, and came to Bethlem; where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of Camels, charged with great ſtore of victuals and munition,ſent by Saladin out of Egypt to Ieruſalem, all which he took:but purpoſing to haue gon on to the ſiege of Ieruſalem,he was by the backwardneſſe of the French glad to change his purpoſe, and to returne to Ptolomais. For the French men,perſuaded by the Duke their Generall (who well knew the French Kings mind) that if any thing worth remembrance were done, it was to be done by them, and that the glory thereof ſhould wholly redound vnto the King of England, as there in perſon preſent, and to his Engliſh men; ſhewed themſelues ſo vnwilling to the ſiege,as therein was nothing don, to the great griefe of that worthy Prince. At which time alſo newes was brought vnto King Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetfull of his ſolemne promiſe made before his departure out of Syria) had now inuaded the Countrey of Normandie, and excited Earle Iohn the Kings brother (a man of an haughty and aſpiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdom of England in his abſence; as had before in like caſe William the yonger brother ſerued Duke Robert his eldeſt brother,then abſent at his father the Conquerors death, in the firſt ſacred expedition vnder Godfrey of Buillon. Wherefore King Richard beſides the preſent difficulties, fearing leſt while he was ſo far off in wars for defence of the Chriſtian commonweal, he might loſe his kingdom at home; thought it beſt to grow to ſome good end with Saladin, and ſo to make his return. But the politique and wary Sultan, not ignorant of the diſcord of the Chriſtians,and that their forces daily decaied in Syria: either of the troubled eſtate of the Kings affairs at home in his own kingdom, or of his deſire to returne, would not hearken to any other conditions of peace,but ſuch as might both for the preſent weaken the forces of

Chriſtians in Syria, and diſcourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, en they ſhould ſee that for nought they ſhould trauell to conquer that, which in the end y muſt of neceſſity reſtore againe. The conditions he offered, were, That the Chriſtians uld forthwith reſtore whatſoeuer they had woon in thoſe three yeres wars,Ptolemais only epted ; and from thenceforth for the ſpace of fiue yeres, the Turks ſhould not in any thing leſt the Chriſtians,but to ſuffer them in peace to liue by them:which hard conditions(for no better could be had)the King was glad to accept,and ſo concluded a peace.Wherby labor and trauell of the two great Kings,and ſo many nations with them,were all become trate and vain;hauing now to no purpoſe loſt their men,their mony,their time,their hope, r bloud,their long trauell, to gaine that they muſt now in one houre forgo ; nothing more vnto the poore Chriſtians in Syria,than the cities of Antioch, Tyre,and Ptolemais.

This done, King Richard leauing the affaires of Aſia vnto the charge of Henry County of ampagne his nephew,ſhipping the greateſt part of his people,with his wife Berengaria,firſt Sicilia, and from thence for England, (where they in ſafety at length arriued) followed rtly after with ſome few himſelfe ; where by the way, by extremitie of weather he was in Adriatique driuen to land vpon the coaſt of Hiſtria:where trauelling with a ſmall retinue mewards in the babit of a Templar,he was diſcouered and taken priſoner by Leopold duke of ſtria, whom he had before diſgraced at the winning of Ptolemais, as is before declared : o now glad to haue him in his power, made priſe of him,and ſold him to Henry the Empe- ,for forty thouſand pounds ; by whom he was kept priſoner by the ſpace of a yere and three neths,and then ranſomed for the ſumme of an hundred and fifty thouſand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greateſt terrour of the Chriſtians: who ndfull of mans fragility,and the vanity of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his h no ſolemnity to be vſed at his buriall, but only his ſhirt in manner of an enſigne, made vnto the point of a lance, to be carried before his dead body as an enſigne, a plaine Prieſt ng before,and crying aloud vnto the people in this ſort : Saladin Conqueror of the Eaſt,of all reatneſſe and riches he had in his life,carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his . A ſight worthy ſo great a King, which wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, e than the true knowledge of his ſaluation in Ieſus Chriſt. He raigned about ſixteene res with great honour, and dying left nine ſonnes, which were all murthered by Saphradin ir vncle,excepting one called alſo Saphradin Sultan of Aleppo ; who by the fauor and ſupt of his fathers good friends,ſaued himſelfe from the treacherous practiſes of his vncle.Of is Saphradin the vncle, deſcended Meledin Sultan of Ægypt,and Coradin Sultan of Damaſco d Ieruſalem : Saladin his great Kingdome being by them now againe rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in ſhort time bruited abroad,with the diſcord amongſt the Turks and raſins about his dominions,put Celeſtinus (then Pope) in good hope,that the city of Ieruſan might in that change and hurly be eaſily againe recouered, and that kingdome eſtablid. But when he had in vaine dealt to that purpoſe with the Kings of France and England, hen altogether buſied in their wars the one againſt the other) he perſuaded Henry the ſixt, en Emperour,to take the matter in hand : who (for that he well could not, or elſe would not nſelfe in perſon vndertake that long expedition) ſent Henry Duke of Saxonie his Lieutent,with a great army into Aſia : vnto whom were joyned two Legats, Conradus Archbiſhop Mogunſia another of the Electors,and Conradus the Biſhop of Herbipolis. At which time o many other great Princes tooke vpon them that holy war ; namely, Herman Lantgraue of urin,Henry Palatine of Rhine, Henry Duke of Brabant, Conrade Marqueſſe of Morauia, Fre-icke Duke of Auſtria,and Albertus Hapſpurgenſis, with ſome others : vnto whom alſo joyned emſelues the Biſhops of Rheme, Halberſtat, and Ratisbone, with diuers other great Prelats. Who hauing paſſed thorow Hungary and Thracia,and by the Greeke Emperor Alexius Ange-lus relieued with all things neceſſary, were by the Græcian ſhips tranſported vnto Antioch, nd ſo by land came to Tyre, and from thence to Ptolemais,with purpoſe to haue gone to relieue the Germans beſieged in Ioppe ; who before their comming were all by treaſon ſlaine, d the city raſed : wherefore being come to the ruines thereof, they departed thence to Sion,which they found alſo abandoned by the Turks. After that,they tooke Berithus, which ity they fortified, and ſo went to beſiege Torone ; which city when they had brought to the xtremity,as that it muſt needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or be taken, the Turkes came on ſo faſt to the reliefe thereof, that the Chriſtians were glad to raiſe their ſiege and to be gone: which they in garriſon at Berithus perceiuing, and ſeeing the enemy to approch them, they abandoned the city, and ioyning themſelues vnto the reſt of the army, marched all together to Ioppa, a little before ruinated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemy comming to Berithus, and finding it forſaken, raſed it downe to the ground, and ſo in few moneths ſpace was Berithus both repaired and raſed, in the yeare 1197. 1197

But whilſt the Chriſtians were repairing the city of Ioppe, the Turkes proud of that they had done at Berithus, came now to diſturbe alſo the fortifying of that place. Of whoſe comming the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, remoued by night about fiue miles from the city, of purpoſe to draw the Turks vnto a conuenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to haue been fled for feare, ſent part of their army to aſſaile the city; and with the other followed after them diſorderly, as if it had bin after men they had had in chaſe. Vpon whom the Chriſtians turning, had with them at the firſt a ſharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight; in which conflict certain thouſands of the Turks fell; of whom the Chriſtians taking the ſpoile, and hauing put the reſt to flight, returned againe vnto the fortifying of the city. But the ioy of this victory was by the ſudden death of two of the greateſt Princes in the army greatly diminiſhed: for the Duke of Saxonie hauing in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a worthy Generall and valiant ſouldier, had ouer-heated himſelfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taken cold, died of a feuer the fourth day after. The Duke of Auſtria mortally wounded in the battell, died alſo the night following.

About this time or not long after, died Celeſtinus the Pope, author of this expedition, and Henry alſo the German Emperour: after whoſe death great troubles began to ariſe in Germany about the chuſing of a new Emperour. Whereof the Biſhop of Moguntia (then chiefe Commander of the Army of the Chriſtians in Syria) one of the Electors, and the other German Princes with him, hauing intelligence, could not by any intreaty of the poore Chriſtians (in whoſe quarrell they were come) be perſuaded longer ro ſtay, but that needs home they would, and indeed home they went the ſame way that they came. After whoſe departure the Turkes tooke Ioppe, hauing one of the ports betraied vnto them by one of the City, at ſuch time as the Germans there in garriſon, after the manner of their country, vpon S. Martins day were careleſly making merry together in their pots: vpon whom ſo ſurcharged with wine, the Turks entring by the port giuen vnto them, put them all with the reſt of the Chriſtians to the ſword, and ſo afterward raſed the city downe to the ground. Of which victory they became ſo proud, that they had thought without ſtop to haue driuen the Chriſtians quite out of Syria: but by the comming of Simon County of Mont-Fort (a moſt valiant and expert captain, ſent thither by Philip the French King, with a regiment of tall ſoldiers, at the inſtance of Innocentius 3, that ſucceeded Celeſtinus in the Papacie) and by ciuill diſcord then raigning amongſt the Turks themſelues for ſoueraigntie, their fury was repreſſed, and a peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians concluded for the ſpace of ten yeares; during which time the Turks promiſed not to moleſt the Chriſtians in Tyre or Ptolemais: which hapned in the yere 1199, or as ſome others ſay, 1198. After which peace ſo concluded, the worthy County returned againe with his ſouldiers into France: with whom we alſo will repaire vnto the leſſer Aſia (whither the courſe both of the time and of the Hiſtory now calleth vs) to ſee the other great affaires of the Turks in thoſe Eaſterne countries; leauing for a ſeaſon theſe poore remainders of ſo many Chriſtians in Tyre and Ptolemais now for a while in peace, but to be ere long deuoured of the Infidels their enemies, as in the proces of this Hiſtory ſhall in due time and place appeare.

The Germane Princes return home.

The ruine of the Turks firſt Empire in PERSIA: with the ſucceſſe of their ſecond Kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, vnder the Aladin Kings.

Kingdomes after the manner of other things, haue but their time to flouriſh in, and ſo againe decay.

AS no Kingdome or Empire vpon earth (were it neuer ſo flouriſhing or great) was euer yet ſo aſſured, but that in the reuolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ſicke body beene ſubiect vnto many ſtrange innouations and changes, and at length come to nothing: ſo fared it now with the Turkiſh Empire, which firſt planted by Tangrolipix in Perſia, and the other farre Eaſterne Countries, increaſed by Axan his ſonne, and ſo by the Turkiſh Sultans their Succeſſours (although their names and doings, as too farre off, be not vnto vs all knowne) for the ſpace of one hundred d ſeuentie yeares continued, muſt now (I ſay) giue place vnto a greater power, and ſettle it lſe elſewhere, the ineuitable deſtiny thereof ſo requiring. It fortuned, that about this time hen in the ſpace of a few yeares ſuch mutations as had not before of long beene ſeene, chan- d in diuers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting large, cold, and bare Countries in the North ſide of Aſia (of all others a moſt bararous, ce, and needy Nation) ſtirred vp by their owne wants, and the perſuaſion of one Zingis (or ome call him, Cangis) holden amongſt them for a great Prophet, and now by them made ir Leader, and honoured by the name of Vlan-Chan, that is to ſay, The mighty King, (com- nly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the ſand of the ſea, and con- ering firſt their poore neighbours, of condition and qualitie like themſelues, and eaſie ough to be entreated with them to ſeeke their better fortune, like ſwarmes of Graſhoppers nt out to deuoure the world, paſſed the high Mountaine Caucaſus, part of the Mountaine aurus, of all the Mountaines in the world the greateſt; which beginning neere vnto the Ar- ipelago, and ending vpon the Orientall Ocean, and running thorow many great and famous ngdomes, diuideth Aſia into two parts: ouer which great Mountaine, one of the moſt aſſu- d bounders of nature, that had ſo many worlds of yeares ſhut vp this rough and ſauage peo- e, they now paſſing without number, and comming downe as it were into another World, ll of ſuch Natures pleaſant delights as neuer were to them before ſeene, bare downe all be- re them as they went, nothing being now able to ſtand in their way. Old Zingis their for- nate Leader dead in this ſo great an expedition, Hoccata his ſonne, eldeſt of his twelue bre- eren, a man of great wiſdome and courage, tooke vpon him his fathers place: who ſending t of his great Army for the ſubduing of the Countries Weſtward, turned himſelfe with world of people toward the Eaſt: where hauing ſubdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with ers others, he entred into India, and ſubduing that rich country on both ſides the riuer In- s, euen to the Eaſt Ocean, there in the country of Cathai built the famous city of Camba- , in circuit eight and twenty miles about; for pleaſure and plenty of all things neceſſary the life of man, of all the cities of Aſia the chiefe: where the great Cham of Tartarie ſtill ſiant, as in his Imperiall City, commandeth ouer one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt Empires the World. In whoſe Kingdome alſo, in the Prouince of Mangy more towards the Eaſt, e hath another moſt famous City called Quinſay, of all the Cities in the world the greateſt, circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himſelfe dwelt therein bout the yere 1260. It is ſcituate in a lake of freſh water, and hath in it twelue thouſand brid- es; of which ſome are of ſuch an heigth, that tall Ships with their ſailes may eaſily paſſe nder them. In this populous city the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof alwaies thirty houſand men in garriſon. The Tartar Kingdome thus planted in Cambalu, Hoccata contenting himſelfe with the rich pleaſures of India, afterward managed his wars by his lieutenants, G being for the moſt part his brethren, or other his nigh kinſmen; of whom he ſent out with his armies ſome Northward, ſome Weſtward, and ſome toward the South : by whom he ſubdued the Arachoſians, Margians, and diuers other great nations ; and entring into Perſia, ſubdued the country, with all Parthia, Aſſiria, Meſopotamia, and Media. At this time in the city Balch or Belch in the country of Choraſan in the fartheſt part of Perſia, reigned ouer the Turks one Curſumes, of the Greekes called Corſantes ; who finding himſelfe farre too weake to ſtand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leauing vnto them both the city and the country, which hee and the Turkes his predeceſſors had euer ſince the time of Tangrolipix poſſeſſed: which city the Tartars raſed, and tooke the Country vnto themſelues. In this generall flight of the Turks, when as euery man was glad to make what ſhift he might for himſelfe, Curſumes H their Sultan died, the laſt of the Kings of the Selzuccian family that reigned ouer the Turks in Perſia : whoſe ſonne Vgnan-Chan taking vpon him the leading of ſuch multitudes of Turks as followed his father, ſeiſed vpon the great city of Babylon, now called Bagadat, neere vnto the ruines of the old Babylon: where hauing put to the ſword all the inhabitants thereof, he there and in the country thereabout ſeated himſelfe with the Turks his followers : but long he had not there reſted, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, purſued him, tooke him priſoner, and expulſed thence all his people. There was at the ſame time alſo another kingdome of the Turks at Nachan a city in Perſia, giuing name vnto the country wherein it ſtood, not farre from Choraſan : wherein then raigned one Solyman, of the OguZian family, as had diuers other of his progenitors before him ; who terrified with this dreadfull ſtorme ſo ſuddenly riſen I out of the North, and warned by the ſudden fall of the SelZuccian Sultan and his kingdom, of far greater fame and power than himſelfe or his, fled alſo with ſuch his ſubjects as would follow him, into the leſſer Aſia. But of him and his proceedings more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the riſing of the victorious Othoman family, as deſcended from him. After this, the Tartars together with their good fortune ſtill extending the bounds of their Empire, conquered Armenia the greater, with the Countries of Colchis and Iberia : ſo that now their Empire was become of all others the greateſt and moſt flouriſhing. This great Conquerour the Tartar, had in his proud conceit purpoſed to haue ſubdued all Aſia, and to haue made the ſea the only bounder of his Empire : but ouercome with the delicacies of India, hauing diuided amongſt his people thoſe great prouinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities & pleaſant fields, K he ſo reſted, embracing the manners and ſuperſtition of the people he had ouercome. Long it were, and far from our purpoſe, to recount all the famous victories and conqueſts of this bare Northerne people : ſufficeth it to the Hiſtory we haue in hand, that the Turkes were by them then driuen out of Perſia, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togran kingdome (as 1202 they call it) firſt founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguiſhed, about the yere of our Lord 1202. The Turks thus driuen out of Perſia, and their kingdome ouerthrowne, retired themſelues into the leſſer Aſia, poſſeſſed by the Turks their country-men, long before brought thither by Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons, (as is before declared) and by them euer ſince in ſome part, though with diuers fortune holden. Where theſe Turks now arriued out of Perſia vnder the leading of Aladin the ſonne of Kei Huſren, deſcended alſo of the Selzuccian family in Perſia, and taking L the opportunitie offered them by the mortall diſcord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greeks among themſelues, ſeiſed vpon Cilicia with the countries thereabouts, and there firſt at Sebaſtia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdome ; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the Kingdome of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not all ſo.

The beginning of the Aladinian kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, at Sebaſtia and Iconium.

Now about this time, and within the courſe of ſome few yeres after, ſuch great and ſtrange mutations happened in the Conſtantinopolitane Empire, as had not therein any time before bin ſeene : whereby the whole eſtate of that great Empire, which ſometime commanded ouer a great part of the world, was almoſt vtterly ſubuerted, and a fit opportunity giuen vnto the Turks and infidels for the ſure ſetling of themſelues, and eſtabliſhing of their kingdoms both M in Syria and the leſſer Aſia : which briefly to run thorow ſhall not be from our purpoſe ; their affaires proſpering by theſe troubles, and their proud and ſtately Empire that now braueth all the reſt of the world, being raiſed out of the ruines of that Chriſtian Empire ; and at this preſent triumphing euen in the ſame Imperiall city wherein theſe ſo great innouations happned ough the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and deſtruction of a great t of the Chriſtian Common-weale.

Alexius the young Prince craueth ayd of Philip the Emperour and the Latine Princes, againſt his Vncle the Vſurper.

Alexius the vſurper, but now Emperor, not contented (as is before declared) traiterouſly to ue depriued Iſaac his elder brother of his Empire and ſight together, ſought alſo after the of the yong Prince Alexius his brothers ſon, and heire apparant of the empire, who ſeeing villany committed in the perſon of his father, ſaued himſelf by flight from the fury of his le, and ſo accompanied with certaine great Lords of the Greeks his fathers friends, fled to e aid of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, whom the Grecians commonly call the La-
. And firſt he took his way to Philip the German emperor, who had married Irene his ſiſter, Emperor Iſaacs daughter, by whom he was moſt honourably receiued & entertained. This t lady not a little moued with the miſery of her father, and the flight of her brother, cea-not moſt inſtantly to ſolicite the Emperor her husband, not to leaue vnreuenged ſo great a any, by the example thereof dangerous vnto himſelfe, and others of like majeſty and ſtate. declared to him what an execrable indignity it was, to ſee her father the Emperor vnworly impriſoned, depriued of his empire and ſight, and of the ſocietie of men, by his brother t had by him receiued and recouered his life, his light, and his liberty: and to ſee the heire arant of the Empire baniſhed by the wickednes of his vncle, to wander vp and down here there like a begger: a great part of which diſgrace, as ſhe ſaid, redounded vnto her ſelfe the ghter of Iſaac, and ſiſter to the young wandring Prince, and to himſelfe alſo, the ſon in law o the vnfortunat Emperour her father. Moreouer ſhe ſaid, that the murdred Alexius durſt er haue bin ſo hardy as to commit ſo great and deteſtible a villany, if he had not lightly reded and contemned the majeſty of the ſaid Philip; whom if he had had in any reuerence or or, or at all feared, he durſt not haue attempted ſo villanous an act. This Greeke lady, mo-with juſt griefe, with theſe & ſuch like complaints ſo preuailed with her husband, that he niſed her to be in ſome part therof reuenged; which he could not for the preſent perform, d by the wars he then had with Otho his competitor of the Empire. At the ſame time it ned, that great preparations were making in France and Italy, and diuers other places of iſtendome, for an expedition to be made againſt the Turks into the Holy-land. The chiefe wherin were Theobald County of Champaigne, (a man of great fame, and General of the riſtian army) Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders and Henault, Henry his brother Earle of S. Paul, Henry Duke of Louain, Gualter Earle of Breame, with dis other noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious: vnto whom reſorted alſo many vat and deuout Chriſtians out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome, ready to haue ſpent their es iu that ſo religious a war: ſo that now the number of them was great, and the army right pulous. But being thus aſſembled together, they thought it not beſt to take their way to nſtantinople, thorow Hungary and Thrace, and ſo to paſſe ouer into Bythinia, for that the eeks had ſtill in all former times ſhewed great vncourteſie vnto the Latines, in paſſing with ir armies that way: and therefore they thought it much better now by the way of Italy to e their journey by ſea into the Holy-land; and for their tranſportation, eſpecially to vſe the pe of the Venetians, whom they found much the eaſier to be intreated, for that by the ans of ſo great an army, they were in hope to ſcoure the Adriaticke (then much infeſted by Dalmatians) as alſo to recouer Iadera, with ſome other cities vpon the coaſt of Sclauonia, ore reuolted from their ſtate to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterwards did. But by the as this army was marching out of France, and come into Piemont, the noble County of mpaigne Generall therof, there fell ſicke & died, to the exceeding griefe & ſorrow of the le army: in whoſe ſtead, the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great nobility, and wel acinted with the wars of the Eaſt, was choſen Generall. This great army, tranſported by the etians into Sclauonia, tooke Iadera, with diuers other port townes along the ſea coaſt, and ing there done what the Venetians moſt deſired, was about again to haue bin imbarkt for ria, & ſo into the Holy-land. But the yong Prince Alexius in the mean time had by himſelfe d the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) ſo wrought the matter with the tin Princes of the Weſt, eſpecially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the emperor s brother in law, & Philip the French king, that they pittying his eſtate, & induced alſo with me other conſiderations more proper to themſelues, tooke him as it were into their prote-ion, commending by letters & meſſengers for that purpoſe ſent vnto the army, (which they might command) the defence both of himſelfe and his cauſe: who with the commendation of three ſo great Princes, comming to the army yet lying at Iadera (expecting but a faire wind to haue paſſed into Syria) was there of them all moſt honorably receiued, as the ſon of an Emperor, and as became one to them ſo highly commended. And he himſelf alſo, as one knowing his good, was not wanting vnto himſelfe, but recommended his perſon to their protection, as a poore exiled Prince in diſtreſſe; yet was he of a liuely ſpirit, gratious in ſpeech, beautifull to behold, and very young, and withall fully inſtructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might ſerue to further his purpoſe. And foraſmuch as this great Army conſiſted of diuers nations, ſpecially of the French, Italians, & Venetians, not all to be by one mean moued; he fitted euery one with ſuch motiues as he thought might beſt preuaile with them: Vnto the French he promiſed to pay the great ſums of money they had borrowed of the Venetians for the furniſhing of themſelues in this war: Vnto the Venetians he promiſed recompence for all the injuries they had ſuſtained by the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, eſpecially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they refuſed to aid him in his wars againſt William king of Sicily, did in one day confiſcat al the goods of the Venetian merchants within his empire, of a great value; and afterwards contrary to the law of nations, ſhamefully intreated their embaſſadors ſent vnto him, amongſt whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune generall for the Venetians in the army: who moued as well with the wrong in particular done vnto himſelfe, as with the common, deſired to be reuenged both of the one and the other; which although he could not haue of Emanuel himſelfe, being long before dead, yet was he ſtill deſirous to haue it of ſome one of the Greeke Emperors, whoſoeuer he were:) Vnto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the noble men with him, had before promiſed, that the Greek church ſhould euer acknowledge the ſupremacy of the Church of Rome, and from thenceforth ſubmit it ſelfe therunto, as vnto the ſoueraign judge of all the Chriſtian Churches: which cauſed the Pope Innocentius, by letters, by legats, by embaſſadors, and by all other means poſſible, to further the cauſe of the yong Prince Alexius, ſo combined with his own; alledging the diuerſity of opinions in matters of religion, betwixt the Greeks and the Latines, to haue been the chiefe cauſe that the Mahometans had not been long agoe by their vnited forces ſubdued, or vtterly rooted out. In briefe, the young Prince ſpared not to promiſe moſt bountifull rewards in generall, to all that ſhould take his part againſt his vncle the vſurping Emperor.

By this means, the deuout war taken in hand for the reliefe of the poore Chriſtians in Syria, was laid aſide, and the ſame forces that ſhould haue bin therin imploid, now conuerted againſt the Greeke empire, to the great weakning of that ſide of the Chriſtian commonweale, and aduantage of the common enemy; who might then eaſily haue beene oppreſſed, had he with the vnited forces of the Chriſtians bin on this ſide charged home, as he was one the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian war thus reſolued vpon, it ſeemed beſt vnto the great Commanders of the army, to march directly to Conſtantinople, as to the head of the Grecian ſtate, and place where the tyrant whom they ſought after was reſiant. In the meane time it was by them giuen out thorow all the Greeke cities which the Emperor had ſtrongly manned and fortified for the ſtaying of their paſſage, that their purpoſe was not to make war againſt the Grecians their friends, but only to reſtore their lawfull Emperor vnto his former ſtate and honor: And that foraſmuch as euery city and town in antient Greece had appointed rewards, and almoſt diuine honours vnto ſuch as had deliuered them from tyrants, they ſhould now more fauourably receiue and intreat them that came to reſtore vnto euery city, and to euery man in generall, their former liberty and honor. And ſo vpon the reſolution for Conſtantinople imbarking their army, and paſſing thorow the Ionian ſea into the Ægeum, and ſo without let thorow the ſtreits of Heleſpontus into Propontis, and entring the ſtreits of Boſphorus Thracius, which diuide Europe from Aſia, they came to an anker euen in the face of the city. In this fleet were two hundred and forty ſaile of tall ſhips, ſixty gallies, ſeuentie ſhips for burthen, and one hundred and twenty ſaile of Victualers: which all together made a moſt braue ſhew, couering that ſtrait in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed rather a wood than a part of the ſea. Thus for a ſpace they lay facing the City, attending if happily vpon the comming and ſight of ſo great a fleet, and the report of ſo puiſſant an army as the young Prince Alexius had brought with him, any tumult or ſedition might ariſe in the City. But the wary Tyrant had ſo well prouided therefore before hand, that the Citiſens, although they in heart fauoured the young Prince, and wiſhed him well, yet durſt they not once moue or ſtirre in his quarrell. Whilſt the fleet thus lay, baſſadors came from the Iſle of Creet, in two great gallies, with three banks of oars, yeel-g vnto the young Prince that goodly Iſland, with all the towns and cities therin: which he with gaue vnto the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Generall of the army, thereby to encouthe other great commanders of the army to do the vttermoſt of their deuoire, in hope of mpence and rewards anſwerable to their deſerts and valour.

efore the arriuall of this fleet, Alexius the Emperour had with a great chaine made faſt ntrance of the hauen betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, and appointed twenty great galvell manned for the keeping therof: but a great gale of wind ariſing, the Generall ſent out reateſt and ſtrongeſt ſhip in the fleet (of her greatnes and ſwiftnes called the Eagle) which all her ſailes vp, carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chane, and e a way for the reſt of the fleet to enter; which the Greeks in their gallies ſeeing, for feare , leauing the gallies for a ſpoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not an found in them. The hauen thus gained, Theodorus Laſcaris the Emperors ſon in law, was ſently ready vpon the ſhore with a ſelect company of the braueſt gallants of the city and he court, to haue hindred the Latines from landing; who running their ſhips a ground, led with ſuch cheerfulnes and courage, and with ſuch haſt, that in one moment you might e ſeene them leape out of their ſhips, take land, enter into the battell, and lay about them mad men. This hot skirmiſh endured a great while, for that they were only footmen that ained this brunt, for the horſes could not ſo ſoone be landed, and the Greeks were brauely nted. All this great fight the Conſtantinopolitans beheld, with doubtfull hearts, expeg what ſhould be the euent thereof. There were in the city ſix thouſand of the flower of ece, which brauely ſallying out, made the battell much more doubtfull; yet ſuch was the r and reſolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greeks diſcomfited, were glad to retire ſelues againe into the city, but with what loſſe was not certainely knowne: eaſie it were eſſe, that it was right great, for that the old tyrant Alexius diſcouraged therewith, and tfull of his owne eſtate, with Theodorus Laſcaris his ſon in law, and ſome few others of his y friends (hard to be found in ſo dangerous a caſe) the next night following ſecretly fled of the city, carrying away with him a wonderfull maſſe of treaſure (which he againſt all h euents had cauſed to be ſecretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monaſtery of Nuns hin the City, whereof ſhe was the abbeſſe) and ſo ſaued himſelfe.

The Latines by force enter the hauen of Conſtantinople.

he flight of the tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Conſtantinopolitans taking the Emperor Iſaac out of priſon, ſaluted him againe for their Emperor, rejoycing greatly for deliuerance and the ſafegard of his life: and after that opened the gates of the city to the ines, calling and ſaluting them by the names of the reuengers and ſauiors of the liberty of Greekes, as alſo of the life and majeſtie of their Emperor: they requeſted them that they ht ſee and ſalute Alexius their young Prince, whom they had ſo long deſired: and ſo was city of Conſtantinople, by the ſubmiſſion of the Citiſens, for that time ſaued from ſac-e and ſpoile. The old Emperor thus deliuered, and together with his ſon Alexius again plain the imperiall ſeat, gaue the moſt hearty thankes that poſſibly he could vnto the Latine nces, for that by their bounty, charity, and valor, the Greeke Empire had bin deliuered out long and miſerable ſeruitude: and for his own particular, that he had receiued of them ſo t good, that albeit his ſight could not be reſtored to him againe, neuertheleſſe he acknowed his life, his liberty, his empire, his country, his ſon, to haue bin vnto him by them red, and he likewiſe to them; for which their ſo great deſerts he could not (as he ſaid) render condigne thanks, or deuiſe rewards or honors anſwerable to their demerits and valour:
that therefore he did ratifie and confirme whatſoeuer his ſon had before promiſed vnto m for his deliuerance: and not only that, but further promiſed, That if they were not there-h contented, hee would of his owne bounty giue them better contentment, not meaning y ſhould go diſcontented, that had ſaued his life, and otherwaies ſo highly pleaſured him. reupon this good old Emperor began to conſult with his friends about the meanes where-he might ſatisfie & content the Latines in ſuch things as the yong Prince his ſon had vnto em promiſed. And to the intent that the Citiſens of Conſtantinople might the more wilgly doe that he was to command them, and the more cheerefully pay ſuch impoſitions as was to lay vpon them, he intreated all the Latines to retire themſelues out of the city into their campe or about their ſhips, which they accordingly did. But the impoſition being ſet downe, and what euery man was to pay, ſeemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accuſtomed to receiue tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter moſt heauie and intolerable. In this very inſtant that this exaction was required, died the old Emperor Iſaac, who hauing of long beene kept in a darke and ſtinking priſon in continuall feare of death, and now deliuered and reſtored to his Empire, could not indure ſo ſudden and vnexpected a change, both of the aire and of his manner of liuing, but ſo ſuddenly died.

At this exaction impoſed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Conſtantinopolitans grieuouſly murmured and exclaimed, ſaying, That it was a villanous thing to ſee the Greeke Empire ingaged and bound (by a yong boy) vnto a couetous and proud nation, and ſo to be ſpoiled and bare of coyne: That the great and rich Iſland of Creet lying in the midſt of the ſea, was by him giuen as a gift vnto the Latines: That the city of Conſtantinople and the Greeke Church, had by him beene enforced and conſtrained to yeeld vnto the See at Rome, to receiue the opinions of the Latine Church, to ſubmit it ſelfe vnto the obeyſence of old Rome, from whence it had once happily departed euer ſince the time that the Empire was by Conſtantine the Great tranſlated thence to them. Thus euery one ſaid for himſelfe in particular: thus all men ſaid in generall. And therof the noble men in their aſſemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grieuouſly complained: whereupon a great ſedition and tumult was raiſed in the city. Some preſently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged ran furiouſly diſordered vnto the palace, with a purpoſe ro haue committed ſome great outrage vpon the perſon of the yong emperor Alexius: who in that ſo ſudden an inſurrection, as might well haue troubled a right conſtant man, without longer ſtay reſolued vpon a moſt wholſome and neceſſarie point for the appeaſing of the peoples fury; vnto whom (aſſembled in a wonderfull multitude) he ſhewed himſelfe from aboue in his palace, promiſing them to remain in their power, and not from thenceforth to doe any thing without their aduice and liking, but wholly to depend vpon them: with which good words the people held themſelues well content, and ſo was the tumult for that time appeaſed. But forthwith the yong Emperor conſidering the iujury done vnto him, began to burn with the deſire of reuenge, and to change his purpoſe. He could not together ſatisfie the citiſens and the Latins: for if he would keepe his promiſe with the Latines, he muſt of neceſſitie offend his owne people; neither was there any means to be fonnd to ſatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himſelfe more bound to keep his promiſe with the Latines, whoſe forces he knew not how to withſtand, he ſent ſecretly to requeſt the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, Generall of the army, to ſend him about midnight certaine companies of ſoldiers vnto the city, aſſuring him to receiue them in by a gate neere vnto the palace, which ſhould be opened vnto them by certaine of his truſtie ſeruants there left for that purpoſe. Of this plot Alexius Ducas (of his bittle browes ſurnamed Murzufle, whom of a baſe fellow the Emperor Iſaac had promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aſpiring mind, and in thoſe troubleſome times hauing long thirſted after the Empire, tooke now this occaſion to worke vpon.

Alexius ſeeketh to bring the Latines againe into the Citie.

The Conſtantinopolitans againe in an vprore.

The night following, he by his agents, men inſtructed for the purpoſe, raiſed a tumult in the city, not inferiour vnto that which had hapned the day before: and at the ſame inſtant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came ſuddenly to the yong Emperor in the dead time of the night (which he might at all times do, by reaſon of the great confidence the Emperor had in him) and with a ſad countenance told him, That the people were vp againe in an vprore, and eſpecially they of his guard, & that they were comming toward him to do him ſome violence for the loue he bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected news the yong Emperor terrified, demanded of him as of his his moſt faithfull counſellor, What were beſt in that caſe for him to do? Who preſently embracing him in his night gowne, led him out by a ſecret doore into a tent he had of his owne in the court, as if he would there haue kept him ſafe: but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeaſe the tumult, had before taken order, that he ſhauld preſently after his departure, be caſt into bonds, & ſo be clapt vp into a cloſe ſtinking priſon: which done, the falſe traitor openly ſhewing himſelfe, made an oration to the people, wherin he ſhewed himſelf to haue great compaſſiou of the Greek empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themſelues, ſpecially in that they were gouerned by a youth vnfit for the gouernment, who ſuffered himſelfe to be miſ-led according to the

is his ſpeech, fitted of purpoſe vnto the humour of the ſeditious, was receiued with the outcry and applauſe of the windy headed people. Some cried out, that he, and none e, was to be made chiefe of the common-weale that was by them to be eſtabliſhed: ſome cried as loud to haue him made generall of the armies and forces of the ſtate: but reateſt cry was to haue him choſen and created Emperour; whereunto the reſt giuing lexius the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull ſucceſſion, but onely by the fury of umultuous people, thus created Emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to ke the forces of the Latines, of whom only he now ſtood in dread. And therefore to begin all, he firſt attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch, flax, brimſtone, and ſuch like er apt to take fire, to haue burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies ſo ſet on fire and carried a faire gale of wind among the fleet, had bin like enough to haue done great harm, had it by the warineſſe of the Venetians bin preuented: who being good ſea-men, and not vnac-inted with ſuch deuices, eaſily and without danger auoided the ſame, by keeping them-s aloofe one from another in the ſea. This finenes ſorting to no purpoſe, he to color the to vnderſtand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had bin done without iuity, by the malice of the tumultuous people, and that for his part he would be glad of fauor & friendſhip, aſſuring them likewiſe of his, and promiſing them to aid them both he tyrant in vain hauing thus attempted the burning of the fleet, & ſtil fearing the reuenſword of the Latines, reſolued now by plain force to meet them in the field, and there to hem battell. So hauing made ready and armed the whole ſtrength of the imperiall city, h cheerefull ſpeech encouraged his ſoldiers, requeſting them valiantly to maintain and the County of Flanders lay,where at the firſt was fought a right fierce and doubtfull battell, But afterward the alarum running throughout all the campe of the Latines, and new ſupplies comming in on euery ſide, the Greeks were put to the worſe,and inforced againe to retire into the city,hauing loſt a great number of men,together with their ſuperſtitious enſigne. It was a wonderfull thing to ſee,with what rare agreement the Latines,being of diuers nations,continued this expedition vndertaken againſt the Greekes. Seuenty two daies was this City of Conſtantinople ſtreightly beſieged by the Latines both by ſea and land, without giuing any time of reſt or repoſe day or night to the beſieged, freſh men comming ſtill on to the aſſault, as the other fell off,and in ſuch ſort troubled the Greekes in the city, that they knew not well what to do or which way to turne themſelues. The Venetians vnto whom was committed the charge to aſſault that ſide of the City which was toward the hauen, vpon two great gallies made faſt together, built a ſtrong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiars of the towne,out of which they both with ſhot and fireworks much troubled the defendants, wherewith they in the time of the aſſault approching the wall,by their fine deuices fired that ſide of the city : by the rage whereof, a great number of houſes were burnt,with many other ſtately buildings and ancient monuments of that famous city:and had at that preſent gained a great tower neere vnto the port, deſtitute of defenders, had not the tyrant himſelfe in good time come with new ſupplies to the reſcue thereof. In like manner,the French,with the reſt,aſſayled the other ſide of the city by land, where they were to fight not againſt the defendants only,but againſt deepe ditches,high and ſtrong wals,and bulwarkes alſo:neuertheleſſe,ſuch was the valour and fury of the Latines,with the deſire of victory, as that they were not with any difficulties to be diſmaied ; but preſſing ſtill on,by a thouſand dangers,at length after a moſt ſharpe aſſault,they gained one of the greateſt baſtilions on that ſide of the city,called the Angels tower,and ſo by plaine force opened a way both for themſelues and the reſt into the city, Whereof Alexius vnderſtanding, and ſtrucke with preſent deſpaire both of his ſtate and life, the night now comming on,fled with Euphroſina the Emperour Alexius his wife, and Eudocia her daughter, whom he had married when he had raigned about a moneth and ſixteene daies.

The tyrant,author of all this miſchiefe,and of the calamities enſuing,thus fled,and the Latins furiouſly entring,the Prieſts and religious men in their ſurplices,and other eccleſiaſticke ornaments with their croſſes & banners (as in ſolemne proceſſion) met the Latines:and falling downe at the ſoldiers feet,with floods of teares abundantly running downe their heauy countenances,beſought them,but ſpecially the captains and commanders,to remember the condition of worldly things,and contenting themſelues with the victory,the glory, the honour,the empire,the immortality of their name,to abſtain from ſlaughter,from burning,from ſpoiling & ranſacking of ſo beautifull a city:and that ſeeing they were themſelues men,they would alſo haue pity of men : and being themſelues captains and ſoldiers,they ſhould alſo haue compaſſion vpon captaines and ſoldiers ; who although they were not ſo valiant and fortunate as they were, yet neuertheleſſe were both captains and ſoldiers : and that they would keepe and preſerue their city,whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might haue much more pleaſure and commodity,than if they ſhould deſtroy the ſame:which as it had bin the principal ſeat of the Greek empire,ſo might it now be of the Latines : That ſeeing they had thereof a carefull regard,as then belonging to another man,they ought now vpon better reaſon to haue more care therof,being their own: That the authors of all thoſe troubles and miſchiefes, Alexius the elder,and Murzufle, had already receiued a reward anſwerable to their follies, in that they were driuen into exile : That they would haue pity and compaſſion of an innocent and vnfortunate multitude of poore people, oppreſſed and grieuouſly tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous lords and gouernors : That in ſo doing, God the Lord of hoſts, the giuer and guider of battels, the God of mercy,would therefore reward them: To conclude, they humbly beſought them to pardon their citiſens,to put on the hearts of gratious & mercifull lords and fathers,not of enemies and rough maſters;of forgiuers,not of reuengers;and to vnderſtand by their tears,their miſerable eſtate and woes paſſed. With this ſo humble a ſubmiſſion & complaint of the religious,ſome of the better ſort were happily moued:but with the common ſoldiers,breathing nothing but victory,with their weapons in their hands,& the ſpoile of an empire in their power,what auaileth praiers or tears? Euery man fell to the ſpoile,and in ſo great choiſe & liberty of al things,fitted his own diſordred appetite, without reſpect of the wrong injury done to others : onely from the effuſion of innocent bloud they abſtained ; they oſe liues they ſought after, being already fled, together with the tyrant. Other injuries outrages (ſo great, as that greater none could be) were in euery place ſo riſe, that euery et, euery lane, euery corner of the City was filled with mourning and heauineſſe. There ht a man haue ſeene noble men earſt of great honor, and reuerend for their hoary haires, other citizens of great wealth, thruſt out of all they had, walking vp and downe the city ing and wringing their hands, as men forlorne, knowing not were to ſhroud their heads. ther ſtaied the greedy rage of the inſolent ſouldiers within the wals of mens priuate hou- ut brake out into the ſtately palaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes alſo, where all good prize, and nothing dedicated to the ſeruice of God, left vnpolluted and defaced, no e vnſought, no corner vnrifled : right lamentable and almoſt incredible it were to report he miſeries of that time. Some of the Greeke Hiſtoriographers, men of great marke and e, and themſelues eie-witneſſes and partakers of thoſe euils, haue by their writings com- ined to all poſterity, of the inſolencie of the Latines at the winning of the City, to their nall diſhoner : but that diſordered ſouldiers in all ages in the libertie of their inſolent vi- y, haue done ſuch outrages, as honeſt minds abhorre to think vpon. Thus Conſtantinople moſt famous City of the Eaſt, the ſeat and glory of the Greeke Empire, by the miſerable ition and diſſention of the Greekes for ſoueraigntie, fell into the hands of the Latines, twelfth of Aprill, in the yeare 1204, or after the account of others, 1200.

onſtantinople thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great commanders he Army held a counſell, to conſider what were beſt to be done concerning the City and new gained Empire : for after ſo great a victory, they thought it not good to raſe ſo an- t and important a City, ſeated as it were a watch tower vpon the theatre of the World, looking both Aſia and Europe from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuerſall, and mmodiouſly planted, as was no other city of the world, for the keeping vnder of the ene- of the Chriſtian Religion : but that it were much better to place there a Latin gouernor, abliſh there the Latine lawes and cuſtomes, and to vnite the Greeke church as a member the Church of Rome. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, not to haue any Emperours in Chriſtendome but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the Ger- e Emperour, author of this warre, whoſe wife Irene was the onely daughter and heire of late Emperour Iſaac Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers Em- belonged. But the greater part, conſidering that the troubled affaires of Greece, in ſo t a change and newneſſe of the Empire, had need of the perſonall preſence of a Prince; ught it better to make choice of one among themſelues, who there ſtill reſiant in that e, might at all times giue aid vnto the Latines in their ſacred wars, taken in hand againſt Infidels : which opinion as the better, was approued of them all. The chiefe men in this ion of the new Emperour, were Baldwin County of Flanders and Hainault, Henry his bro- Lewis County of Bloys, Symon de Montfort, Iohn de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh nty of S. Paul, Iohn County of Brenne, Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Stephen nty of Perch, and fiue gentlemen of Venice : vnto whom alſo were joyned two Biſhops yria, the one of Bethlem, the other of Ptolemais, who had oftentimes come to the campe e Latines, to ſtirre them vp for the taking in hand the ſacred warre in Syria ; with two ops of France alſo, namely, of Soiſſon and Troy in Champagne, and the Abbot of Leme- Theſe great Lords and Prelates aſſembled into the Church of the holy Apoſtles, after had there with great deuotion craued of God to inſpire them with his ſpirit for the ce of a good and juſt Prince fit for ſo great a charge ; with one conſent made choice of win County of Flanders and Haynault, for Emperour of Greece : a braue and valiant ce, about two and thirty yeares old, who was afterward the ſixteenth day of May in the e 1204 (or after the computation of others, in the yeare 1205) in the great Temple of ophia ſolemnly crowned by Thomas Maurocenus a Venetian, firſt Patriarch of the Latines Conſtantinople. From which time the Greeke Church in Conſtantinople began to re- ne the rites and ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the ſupremacy of the urch of Rome.

It was not long after that Conſtantinople was thus taken by the Latines, but that they iding their forces, without any reſiſtance tooke in the moſt part of the great countries and prouinces on Europe ſide, belonging to the Greeke Empire in the time of Iſaac Angelus the late Emperour: the fortune of the whole Empire, as it were following the fortune of the imperiall city. Which large countries ſo gained from the Greeks, the Latins diuided amongſt themſelues, as good prize taken from their enemies. Vnto Baldwin the emperor and his ſucceſſors in the Empire, was aſſigned the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, and the countrey of Thracia, with a limited ſoueraigntie ouer all the reſt of the prouinces by the Latines already or afterwards to be gained. Vnto the Venetians in this diuiſion of the Empire, was allotted for their ſhare all the rich Iſlands of the Ægeum and Ionian, with the famous Iſland of Candie alſo; which although it were before by the young Emperor Alexius in the beginning of theſe warres, giuen vnto the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, yet in this diuiſion of the Empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and giuen to the Venetians, as for them more fit: in ſtead and lieu whereof, the Marqueſſe had the city of Theſſalonica with all the kingdome of Theſſalie, and a great part of Peloponeſus aſſigned vnto him, with the Royall title of a King. Of the aforeſaid Iſlands in(number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the ſtate, fortified ſome few of the greateſt with conuenient garriſons, the reſt they left to be poſſeſſed and defended by the better ſort of the citizens at their priuate coſt and charges; who according to their ability, tooke into their poſſeſſion, ſome one Iſland, ſome another, and ſome two or three, one, as they were able to ſet out their gallies, one, two, or moe, for the keeping of the ſame: ouer all which, the ſeigniorie neuertheleſſe had a generall care, ſtill keeping a fleet with one of their Admirals at Sea: by whom they not onely repreſſed the Genoa pirats then buſie in thoſe ſeas, but alſo tooke in certaine ſtrong townes in the maine vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, namely, Modon and Corone; all which they of long time after held as a part of their ſeignorie. Some other particular places, yet parts alſo of the empire, were giuen vnto particular men: as the dukedom of Athens vnto one Geffrey of Troy in Champaigne, a French man, a Valiant Captaine, whom they alſo made Prince of Achaia: Another Dukedome was alſo giuen vnto the County of Bloys; as were diuers other countries and townes alſo vnto other more priuate men: who neuertheleſſe were bound to hold the ſame of the Emperor, as of their Lord, and to pay him yerely a fourth part of the reuenue ariſing thereof, towards the maintenance of his ſtate. Yea the Greekes themſelues in this ſhipwracke of their ſtate and empire, although they diſdained nothing more than the ſtrange gouernement of the Latines, yet could they not be perſuaded to joyne together in ſo common a calamitie, but after their wonted manner ſought euery man how to ſhare out ſomthing for himſelfe, without regard of the common good: one ſeized vpon one ſtrong Towne or Citie, and ſo likewiſe another; which for all that, they held not long, driuen thence for the moſt part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their owne countrymen.

The man whom the diſcontented Greekes moſt looked after, was Theodorus Laſcaris, the Emperour Alexius Angelus his ſonne in law; who at the taking of the city, fled to Adrianople, and afterward into Bythinia, where he was of the people, not of that country onely, but of others alſo farther off, joyfully receiued and honoured as their Emperor. So taking into his hands the countries of Bythinia, Phrygia, Miſſia, Ionia, and Lydia, euen from the windings of the famous riuer Mæander Southward, vnto the Euxine Sea Northward; he with the generall good liking of the people, tooke vpon him the eſtate of an Emperour, and ſo in the renowned city of Nice made the ſeat of his Empire. At the ſame time alſo David, and Alexius Comneni, the nephewes of the tyrant Andronicus (ſometime Emperour of Conſtantinople) by his ſonne Manuel, poſſeſſing the more Eaſterne countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Capadocia, erected vnto themſelues another Empire in Trapezond, where their poſteritie of the honourable houſe of the Comneni raigned in great glory many yeares after, vntill their Empire, together with the Empire of Conſtantinople, was by the great Emperour of the Turkes, Mahomet the ſecond, ſubuerted and brought to nought, as ſhall hereafter in due time and place be declared. Thus the Greeke Empire expoſed (as it were) to the generall ſpoile, was no longer one, but many Empires: Baldwin raigning in Conſtantinople, the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat in Theſſalie, Theodorus Laſcaris at Nice, Alexius Comnenus in Trapezond, and the Venetians in the Iſlands, all in royall dignitie. Beſides whom were many other leſſer Princes, which had heere and there according to their abilitie ſeiſed vpon ſome one or other part of the Empire, and there erected their Toparchies, raigning therein as y Kings : as did Aldebrandinus in Attalia, Michael Angelus in Epirus, with diuers others long to rehearſe.

Adrianople beſieged by the Emperor Baldwin.

Baldwin,as is aforeſaid,created Emperour of Conſtantinople, by the help of the Venetian mirall Dandulus,and other great commanders of the army; in ſhort time brought vnder his iſance all the cities of Thracia,except the city of Adrianople,wherunto the better ſort of iſcontented Greeks,together with Theodorus Laſcarus (diſdaining the gouernment of the ines) were fled,as vnto a moſt ſafe ſanctuarie. Which Baldwin knowing,and withall deſi- whileſt yet he had his friends about him,to ſet his new Empire in ſome good ſtay, with- farther delay laid hard ſiege to the ſame. Now the Greekes generally euill entreated by Latines, and grieued to be gouerned by them, ſome were fled into their neighbour prin- countries,but eſpecially into Bulgaria,otherwiſe called Myſia,a large kingdom lying be- t the great mountain Æmus and Danubius : by whoſe perſuaſion,Iohn king of that coun- aided by the Scythians (a fierce Northern people but lately come into thoſe quarters) and he fugitiue Greeks themſelues, tooke vpon him to relieue the City : and ſo with a great y approching the ſame,ſent before certain troups of Scythian archers on horſebacke, to h in ſuch booty of horſes or cattell as they ſhould find neer vnto the Emperors camp;and hall commanded them,that being charged by the Imperials,they ſhould forthwith retire, o draw them out of their trenches,into the place where the King with the greateſt part of Army lay couertly to intrap them. Which the Scythians (wel acquainted with ſuch ſer- e) ſo well performed vnder the leading of one Cozus their Generall, that hauing once or ce drawn their enemies vnto ſome light skirmiſhes,and ſo retiring,and ere long again with eater number returning,they at length cunningly drew the Emperor with all his army (in e to do ſome great matter vpon them euen as they wiſhed) into the place wheras the king his army lay in wait among the woods and mountains for them;where they,wearied and of breath with the former purſuit, and now on euery ſide beſet with freſh enemies, were throwne with a great ſlaughter. In which conflict,to encreaſe the loſſe,Baldwin the Em- himſelfe was taken, and ſent priſoner in bonds to Ternoua; where afterwards by the mandement of the barbarous King he was moſt cruelly put to death, hauing his hands feet cut off,and ſo diſmembred was caſt out into a deep valley, where hee yet lay miſera- breathing three dayes after,and ſo died; leauing his body as fortunes ſcorne, for a prey o the wild beaſts and birds of the aire, no man vouchſafing to bury it. Thus periſhed this thy Prince, for his vertues commended euen of the Greekes themſelues, (beeing about age of three and thirty yeares,and not hauing reigned yet a full yeare) in the yeare of our rd 1206.

The victory thus gained,and the city relieued, the barbarous King with his ſauage ſouldi- hauing taſted the wealth of the Latines ouerthrown in the late battell,and the pleaſures of racia now ſubject to their luſt; greedily purſued their good fortune without reſpect of all manity : the open countrey they ouer-ran,ſpoiling whatſoeuer came to hand; the rich and ous cities they rifled,and afterward raſed them downe to the ground : namely Serræ,Phi- popolis, Apri,Rhedeſtum,Perinthus,Daonium,Arcadiopolis,Meſena,Zurulus,& Athyra. e citiſens and country people fled into the cities for refuge,they put all to the ſword,with- t reſpect of age,ſex or condition,except ſome few,whom they caried away with them priſo- s;ſo that of all the prouinces of that rent and ruinated empire,the countrey of Thrace was ſt miſerable, as firſt ſpoiled by the Latines, and now laid deſolate by the Bulgarians and ythians.Only ſome few of the ſtrongeſt cities,as Didymoticum and Adrianople (valiantly ended by the Greeks and Latines) eſcaped this fury of the Barbarians, all the reſt that fell o their hands being laid waſt and deſolate.

Henry ſecond Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople.

In this ſo troubled a ſtate of the new erected empire of the Latines in Conſtantinople,the tines made choice of Henry the late emperor Baldwins brother,as of all others the fitteſt to ucceed him in the empire : who aided by the Marquis, now King of Theſſaly, and the other atine princes,notably repulſed the Barbarians,and left them not vntill that at length he had ecouered from them all ſuch towns and cities as they had before taken,& driuen them quite t of the country,and ſo well eſtabliſhed himſelfe in his new empire.

But to leaue this diſmembred empire now in the hands of many, and to come neerer to our urpoſe: Alexius Angelus the Vſurper,driuen out of the Imperial city by the Latins,to ſaue himſelfe, fled into Theſſaly, and from thence vnto Leo Scurus (then a man of great fame among G the Greeks) who tyranniſing at Nauplus, as had his father before him, was in theſe troubleſome times grown greater, by ſurpriſing of the two famous Cities of Argos and Corinth: by whoſe means he cunningly intrapped Alexius Ducas, ſyrnamed MurZufle, the traitor, and for a ſecret grudge not commonly known, put out his eies: himſelfe an exiled man beeing a moſt heauy enemy vnto the other alſo exiled: and himſelfe thruſt out of the empire, a deadly foe vnto the other oppreſſed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which loſſe of his ſight, hee was by chance taken by the Latines, and ſo brought backe to Conſtantinople, where hee was for murthring the yong Emperour Alexius, worthily condemned vnto a ſtrange and horrible kind of death; for caſt off from an high tower, and tumbling heels ouer head downward, he was with the weight of himſelfe and violence of the fall cruſhed all to pieces, and ſo miſerably H died, a death too good for ſuch a traitor. Not long after it fortuned alſo, That Alexius himſelfe wandring vp and down in Thracia, was by the Marquiſſe of Mont-Ferrat (going againſt Scurus) taken and ſtript of his great treaſure, and whatſoeuer elſe hee had, and ſo ſent away naked; long time after in beggars eſtate wandring about in Achaia and Peloponneſus, now far vnlike that Alexius which ſomtimes proudly reigned in Conſtantinople: but ſuch is the aſſurance of euill gotten honor. He hearing that Theodorus Laſcaris his ſon in law reigned in Aſia, and there held the ſtate of an Emperor, rejoiced not therat as a kind father in law, but inwardly grieued thereat as an enemy; ſory that any other but himſelfe ſhould be honoured with the title of the Greek Emperor. In which malicious humor he ſailing out of Greece into Aſia, ouer the Ægeum, came ſecretly vnto the Turks Sultan Iathatines his old acquaintance I then lying at Attalia, (which famous city he had not long before taken from the Chriſtians) vnto whom he declared his heauy eſtate, and how his empire had bin rent from him, as well by the Greeks as the Latines, requeſting that by his means he might be reſtored again into ſome part thereof, eſpecially that in the leſſer Aſia, which was by Theodorus Laſcaris, together with the honour of the Greeke Emperour, vniuſtly (as he ſaid) detained from him. This Iathatines now Sultan of Iconium, was the younger ſonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long ſuruiuing his father Cai-Choſroë, left his Kingdom vnto his two ſonnes Azadin and Iaſſadin, of the Greeks called Azatines and Iathatines: where long it was not, but that theſe two brethren falling out for the ſoueraignty (which admitteth no equalitie) Iathatines was by AZatines his elder brother driuen into exile, and for the ſafegard of his life glad to fly vnto this Alexius then reigning K at Conſtantinople, by whom he was honourably entertained, and as ſome write, conuerted and baptiſed. But Azatines the Sultan ſhortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home again, and renouncing the Chriſtian religion, was by the Turks receiued for their Sultan: of whom the Emperor Alexius now in the like extremitie craueth aid. The Sultan not forgetfull of his own troubles before paſſed, or of the kindneſſe he had receiued, and mooued with the pittifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers, beſides that he was in hope to ſhare out ſome good part of whatſoeuer he got, for himſelfe; took him into his protection, and forthwith ſent Embaſſadours to Laſcaris, threatning vnto him all extremities, except he did forthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom as vnto the Greek Emperor, thoſe countries which were by him poſſeſſed, of right (as hee ſaid) appertained. L With which vnexpected meſſage Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperour. Neuertheleſſe hauing propounded the matter in Councell, and finding the minds of his ſubjects well affected towards him, and a readineſſe in them, in his quarrell to aduenture their liues; hee encouraged therwith, accompanied only with two thouſand choice horſemen, together with the Sultans Embaſſadour, without further ſtay ſet forward to Philadelphia: the Sultan at the ſame time with Alexius (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceiue the people withall) and twenty thouſand Turks beſieging the city of Antioch, ſcituate vpon the winding banks of the Riuer Mœander. Which the Emperor Theodorus wel vnderſtanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that ſtrong city (ſtanding on the paſſage of the great riuer the bounder of his Empire) ſhould M open a faire way for himſelfe into the heart of Romania Aſiatica, to the great hazard of his whole Empire; reſolued with thoſe few he had to do what he might to relieue his beſieged city: and ſo ſetting forward vpon the ſpur, carying nothing with him more than a little victuall; and now come neere vnto the City, ſent before the Sultans Embaſſadour, following him

e heels. Who comming to the Sultan,and telling him of the Emperors approch with ſo ll a power, could hardly perſuade him that it was ſo, although hee bound it with many es: yet at length perſuaded of the truth of the matter,and that indeed it was ſo, he in all put his army in the beſt order he could vpon ſuch a ſudden, but not to his beſt aduan- ge,being hindred ſo to do by the ſtreitneſſe of the place wherin he lay. Of the two thouſand horſmen in the Emperors army were eight hundred Italians,all moſt reſolute men,who g the firſt charge, brake through the midſt of the Sultans Army, diſordering his whole ll as they went: after whom followed alſo the Greekes, though not with like courage. hoſe Italian horſemen now diuided from the reſt, and in number but few, in comming again,were by the diſordered Turks,ſome on horſebacke,ſome on foot, ſo beſet on eue- le as that there was no way left for them to paſſe,but valiantly there fighting,were all to- er ſlain,hauing both before and at the time of their deaths made ſuch a ſlaughter among Turks,as is hardly to be beleeued to haue bin poſſible for ſo few men to haue made. The eks alſo hardly laid to by the Turks,and diſcouraged by the ſlaughter of the Latins,were at the point to haue fled: when as the Sultan,now almoſt in poſſeſſion of a certain victo- deſcrying the Greek Emperor,and truſting to his own great ſtrength,ſingled him out,be- as ready as himſelf to meet him; when as at the firſt encounter,the Sultan with his horſ- s mace gaue him ſuch a blow vpon the head,as might haue killed a Bull: ſo that the Em- r therewith aſtonied,fell down from his horſe; who yet euen in the fall comming ſome- g again to himſelfe,and although diſmounted,yet quickly recouering his feet, with his chion hoxed the hinder legs of the Mare wheron the Sultan rid, beeing a moſt beautifull ,and of a wonderfull height: which now ſuddenly falling vnder him, and ſo the Sultan bling down as from an high tower; before he could recouer himſelf,had his head cut off e Emperor,which by and by put vpon a lance and ſo holden vp,with the ſight thereof ſo ied the Turks,that ſtriken with a ſudden fear they preſently fled,leauing the victory to mperor,before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that,conſidering his ſmall num- urſt not farther purſue them,but entring the city,gaue thankes to God for ſo great a vi- y. Vnto whom the Turks ſhortly after ſent their Embaſſadors, and ſo upon ſuch reaſo- e conditions as it pleaſed him to ſet down,concluded with him a peace. Alexius himſelfe or of theſe troubles,taken in this battell and caried to Nice,was by the Emperor his ſon w,notwithſtanding his euill deſerts,wel intreated and vſed.

Whilſt the Latines thus ſpend their forces in ſubuerting the Greek empire,which ſhould e bin imploid for reliefe of the Chriſtians in Syria, and that the Greek Emperor Laſcaris thus troubled with the Turks,the Chriſtians affairs in Syria and the Holy land grew ſtil ſe and worſe. Wherof the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templers (the chief Champions of Chriſtian religion in thoſe countries) greatly blamed Almericus King of Cyprus,for that eing ſo neer at hand,and hauing married Iſabel the heir of that kingdome, and ſo in her t taken vpon him the title of King of Ieruſalem, gaue himſelfe wholly vnto pleaſure,do- nothing for the defence or reliefe of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians, or repreſſing the In- els; who although they were yet in league with the Chriſtians there,and at ſome diſcord amongſt themſelues,yet ſpared not as occaſion ſerued, ſtill more and more to incroach n them,and by building of new Caſtles and fortreſſes to cut them ſhort. Of all which gs the aforeſaid Knights by their Embaſſadors certified Pope Innocentius, requeſting his erly care for the remedie thereof: Certifying him withall,that there was yet liuing one ,the daughter of the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat,a Lady of rare beauty, whom they as her ors had brought vp in hope of the Kingdome, and now were ready to beſtow her vpon e ſuch man as he ſhould thinke worthy of her, together with the right ſhee had vnto the gdom. Herupon Innocentius diſcharging Almerieus of the title of the kingdom of Ieruſa- m,gaue it to Iohn County de Brenne of Daulphine in France, a man of great fame and va- ,then in arms with the other Latin princes againſt the Greeks. Who now returning home mmended his Earldom unto his brother, and with ſuch power as he was able to make, ſet- g forward, came firſt to Venice,where he was roially entertained: and from thence ſailing Conſtantinople, was with like honour receiued by the Emperour Henry; and ſo at length e fift of September arriued at Ptolemais in Syria,where he was with the great applauſe and joycing of the people receiued as their King. And the laſt of the ſame moneth marrying the aforeſaid Lady Mary at Tyre, was there together with her with a great ſolemnitie crowned King in the yeare 1209. Which Almericus the old King of Cyprus hearing, ſhortly after died for griefe. Neither wanted this noble gentleman, thus honored with the title of a kingdom, ſome that enuied at his promotion, and therefore commonly called him in deriſion, a King, but ſtill with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to ſay, Without a town.

Now was the ten years peace, before made betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians in Syria, at the comming ouer of Symon Marquis of Mont-Ferrat (as is before declared) almoſt expired: which had not ſo much giuen to thoſe poor remnants of the Chriſtians ſome time of reſt and breathing, as had the diſcord among the Turks themſelues, which hauing for the ſpace of nine years continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the ſoueraignty, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himſelfe with the gouernment of Aleppo, and Corradin and Meledin the two ſons of Saphadin diuiding their fathers kingdome betwixt them, the one taking to himſelf Damaſco and Syria, and the other the great kingdom of Egypt, but all enemies vnto the Chriſtians.

About this time alſo, or not long after, Innocentius tertius yet Pope, ſummoned a generall Councel to Lateran, wherunto, beſides a multitude of great Biſhops and other reuerend prelats, repaired alſo the honorable Embaſſadors of moſt of the Princes of Chriſtendom. Vnto whom ſo aſſembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous eſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, and how the ſame was by the help of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt to be relieued. Wherunto all the Fathers and Princes there aſſembled eaſily gaue their conſent; and therupon were ſome appointed in euery country and prouince, to publiſh this Decree of the Councel, for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians, and to ſtirre vp the deuout people for the vndertaking of ſo religious a War. The chiefe furtherers of this ſacred expedition, to be thus taken in hand againſt the Infidels, were the Biſhops of Germany, eſpecially the three great Biſhops of Mentz, Cullen, and Triuers, whoſe example mooued alſo many others, all which to rehearſe were tedious. Out of France alſo were ſent Henry the County of Niuers, and one Gualter the Kings great Chamberlaine, with a great number of the gallant youths of France, and ſo out of diuers other places alſo: ſo that at length ſuch a number of men were met together at diuers ports of the Adriatick, as made vp a fleet of 200 ſail: which with a proſperous wind caried ouer into Syria, arriued in ſafety at Ptolemais the chief city of the Chriſtians, now that Ieruſalem was loſt. After whom followed alſo Andrew King of Hungary, long before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promiſe, for the vndertaking of that ſacred Expedition: with whom came alſo Lewis Duke of Bavaria, and Leopold duke of Auſtria, with their forces all well appointed: vnto whom alſo Iohn King of Ieruſalem joyned himſelfe with his power. Great hope and expectation there was for ſome great matter to haue been done, now that ſo great forces of the Chriſtians were thus met together. Who ſetting forward from Ptolemais, and the firſt day marching into Galile, by the way met with certain companies of the Turks, whom they eaſily ouerthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the riuer of Iordan, where they alſo diſtreſſed certaine of the Turkes garriſons. There the King of Hungary bathing himſelfe in the riuer, forthwith (as one diſcharged of his vow and promiſe) returned with all his power vnto Ptolemais, and ſo from thence backe again into his own country, all the reſt of the army of the Chriſtians crying out to him to the contrary: who after the Kings departure ſtill marching on, came to the mount Thabor. But ſhortly after, Winter now comming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned, ſome to Ptolemais, and ſome to Tyre, and there wintred. King Iohn and the Duke of Auſtria in the meane time tooke a Caſtle betwixt Cæſarea and Caipha, called the Caſtle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts all that winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the army again met together, it was thought beſt by all the great Commanders, That foraſmuch as the kingdom of Egypt was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan ſuperſtition againſt the Chriſtians in thoſe parts, and that ſo long as it ſtood vpright, they ſhould not be able to do any great matter in Syria, to attempt the conqueſt therof, as an exploit beſt beſeeming their valour and ſo great preparation: for that that land being once ſubdued, the city of Ieruſalem with all the land of Paleſtine would of themſelues without more adoe ſtraightway yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous City of Damiata, called in antient time Peluſium, not much inferiour vnto Alex-

ia, was the firſt and moſt commodious port for their purpoſe, as neereſt vnto Syria; and by the taking thereof they ſhould haue a fair entrance into the great Riuer Nilus, with ommand of a moſt rich and pleaſant countrey about it; they reſolued there to begin the And therupon imbarking themſelues with all things neceſſary for ſo great an enterpriſe, olemais, and caried with a fair wind, they in ſhort time ariued at the deſired port. Now ch and antient city, the key of that ſide of the kingdom, ſtood about a mile from the ſea mwhat diſtant alſo from the great riuer, invironed with a nauigable ditch or cut drawn the Nile in maner of an Iſland, as a man commeth from Syria by land; and compaſſed with three ſtrong ſtone walls, the worke of that good Emperor Ælius Pertinax, and of s ſome affirm, called alſo Æliopolis. At the mouth of this cut, as you ſhould enter into ty, ſtood a ſtrong watch-tower for defence therof, and round about it a number of faire s, in manner of a pretty town intrenched. Beſides that, for the more ſafety thereof, the cut was barred with a great ſtrong iron chaine, in ſuch ſort as that it was impoſſible for hip without breaking the ſame, to enter. The Chriſtians with their fleet entering the h of the riuer, and comming to this cut, by great ſtrength brake the chain. But thinking haue made their paſſage to the city, they found a greater ſtay at the watch-tower, which gly built of ſquare ſtone, and well ſtored with warlike engins of all ſorts, and a good gar- of valiant ſoldiers, ſtayed their farther paſſage, ouerwhelming them as they approched, ſhot, fire, ſtones, timber, and ſuch like, before prouided for that purpoſe.

e Chriſtians, after the maner of the fight of that time, had vpon certain flat veſſels built in high towers of wood for the aſſailing of the watch-tower: in the approching wherof, were not only troubled with the enemy, but with the tumult and ſtir of their owne peo- ſo; ſome crying that they ſhould yet draw neerer vnto the tower; otherſome crying out , to haue the bridges caſt out, therby to enter: and the enemies likewiſe with much cla- couraging one another for the repulſing of the Chriſtians. So the ſoldiers hindred the rs to do their buſines, and the mariners the ſoldiers. In the midſt of this hurly-burley ult, one of the woodden towers ſurmounting the reſt in height, ouercharged with the of men, fell, and in falling made ſuch a noiſe, as if heauen it ſelfe had fallen: where in a nt as it were was preſently to be ſeen a moſt heauy ſpectacle; many ouerwhelmed with ll of the tower, lay there cruſhed to death; ſome grieuouſly hurt, and yet not dead, lay ſt with the timber, crying out for help; others bruiſed or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for f further harm, leapt ſome into the Nile, ſome abord the other ſhips neer by, ſome cry- ut of his arm, ſome of his leg, ſome of his head or other part of his body, to the great diſ- fort of the reſt, inſomuch that the aſſault was for that time giuen ouer.

ing Iohn (as well for his valor, as for the title of the King of Ieruſalem, choſen General of rmy) after he had appeaſed this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed rt, vnto ſkilfull ſurgeons, and buried the bodies of ſuch as were found drowned or ouer- med; with cheerfull ſpeech incouraged the reſt of his ſoldiers, perſuading them not to ſcouraged with the accident of the fall of a tower, which was neither to be imputed vnto cowardiſe, or the valor of the enemy, but only to the chance of war.

the mean time Meledin the Egyptian Sultan had with a great Army incamped himſelfe in the ſight of Damiata, therby to encourage the beſieged, and to fill them with hope of fe; ſending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, meſſages, victuals, ſoldiers, armour, and ſoeuer elſe they wanted. The chief cauſe of his ſtaying there, was to take occaſion for rpriſing of the Chriſtians, if any ſhould be offered either by chance or their own negli- e. Euery day ſome skirmiſh or other paſſed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours carying away the victory: yet could theſe Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battell, ould our men keepe them from victuals, foraſmuch as they had the riuer Nile at com- d, wherby victuals were out of the vpper part of Egypt in great abundance conueighed the Sultans Campe. Whereas on the contrary part, the ſame Riuer diuiding it ſelfe in- many armes, in ſome places here and there ouerflowing, in another cut into many Ditches channels, and in ſome other pent vp by walls and cauſies, gaue to our men a thouſand diſ- ſures. And therfore ſeeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battel, they lued againe to lay ſiege to the Tower. Wherefore hauing with great cunning, vpon two ps faſtned together, framed a tower of moſt ſtrong timber in hight equall to the Watch-tower, they brought the ſame neer vnto the Turks tower, and the ſuburbs adjoining therunto, after which followed alſo the reſt of the fleet well appointed for the aſſault. At which time all the reſt of the army at land ſtood in battell ready ranged, as well to diſcourage them of the town, as that the Sultan ſhould not be able to help them without the haſarding of battell. There began a fierce and cruell aſſault, they of the ſuburbs right valiantly defending themſelues againſt their enemies. Within theſe ſuburbs, the tower, and the trenches, dwelt not only Egyptians (the naturall inhabitants of the country) but alſo Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Indians, Moores, and Ethiopians, who were there reſiant; becauſe that City was a publique mart, wherunto al ſorts of merchandiſe was brought from far out of the remoteſt parts of the world, and ſo from thence in like maner tranſported alſo: which incouraged them the more to fight for the defence of their liues and goods, the two things which men hold moſt deare; & in like ſort animated our men to the aſſault, as wel in the quarrel of the Chriſtian religion as to inrich themſelues with the ſpoils of thoſe rich nations. The Chriſtians with their ſhips drew as neer as poſſibly they could vnto the land, to the intent that vpon the bank of the riuer they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and ſo come cloſe vnto their Enemies: but the Barbarians on the other ſide ſought by ſhot and all other means they could, to keep them farther off, and ſo from landing.

That which moſt feared the Egyptians, was, that as one of our ſhips by chance ran aground vpon that ſide of the riuer where the enemy lay, and being borded by the enemy, thronging in as faſt as he could, and there making a cruell ſlaughter; one of the Chriſtian ſouldiers going down vnder hatches made there a great hole, wherby the water abundantly comming in, ſunk the ſhip before the enemy was aware, and ſo drowned a great number of the Egyptians together with the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the high tower built vpon the two ſhips, joining now cloſe to the Watch-tower, and mating the ſame, diſmaied the defendants with the ſtrangeneſſe therof as with a miracle, in ſuch ſort as they now ſtriken with a great fear, as beeing to fight with a ſtrange, hardy, and cruell kind of men, without any great reſiſtance forſook the tower and fled. The watch-tower thus taken, & they that ſhould haue defended the ſame, ſome taken, ſome ſlain, and ſome fled; they in the ſuburbs diſcouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from aboue, out of the watch-Tower but now gained by the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the other ſhips landed the ſouldiers, who entring the ſuburbs, put all they found there to the ſword, euen vnto the laſt man. There was found great abundance of victuals, but far greater ſtore of riches, inſomuch as it ſeemed to haue bin the ſpoil of Arabia, Perſia, and the rich Indies.

Now yet remained the ſtrong Towne of Damiata, which was forthwith aſſaulted by the Chriſtians, more to proue if in that heate and ſudden fear it would be yeelded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But hauing done what they could both by ſcaling & other engins, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, and ſo retyred. Neuertheleſſe they lodged themſelues in the ſuburbs, and laid a great part of the army betwixt the Sultan & the beſieged city, to the intent that no ſupply of victuals ſhould be brought vnto it: yet both the enemy oftentimes attempted to haue entred the city, and the beſieged to haue ſallied out; but both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would haue done, and that not without great loſſe of their men: for why, the town was now on euery ſide ſo incloſed by the Chriſtians, as that no man could enter in or out therof. Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege it fortuned that the riuer of Nile ſwelling with a great Eaſt wind, roſe aboue the banks, and ſo ouerflowed the places wherin the Chriſtians lay, that they could keep nothing dry, moſt part of their victuals being therwith ſpoiled. With which vnſeaſonable riſing of the riuer the Chriſtians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagius the Legat, gaue themſelues to faſting and prayer by the ſpace of three daies. But the wind falling the fourth day, and the riuer again decreaſing, they gaue themſelues more earneſtly to prayer than before, thanking the Almighty, that as hee had put them in a great fear, ſo he had in mercy againe comforted them.

Now with long lying, victuals began to grow ſcant in the Sultans Camp, ſo that hee was glad to ſend away halfe his Army vp againe into the Country of Caire. At which time alſo it chanced (as if it had been an extreame and common danger of the Mahometane ſuperſtition) that Embaſſadors ſent from Corradin Sultan of Damaſco and Ieruſalem, vnto the nces of the Chriſtian Army, came to ſue for peace both for himſelfe and his brother the ptian Sultan; promiſing in regard therof againe to reſtore vnto them the Holy-Croſſe, what ſoeuer elſe himſelfe, his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them. Of h their offer moſt part of the Army liked well, ſaying, That they had therefore taken vp for the recouery of that which had bin before gotten & gained by the valor of the wor-hriſtian captains, and had of late been taken from them; and to blot out the ignominy loſſe thereof, to the end it ſhould not be ſaid, that they could not leaue whole & entyre heir children, what their fathers had got, when they had the keeping therof; neither haloſt it, be able again to recouer it: that all theſe things beeing reſtored, there reſted not ertheles Pelagius Pope Honorius his Legat (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars efore dead at Peluſium) with King Iohn, the Maſters of the Knights Hoſpitalers and plers, the Duke of Auſtria, and the Germans were of opinion to the contrary: alledging this ſacred Warre was vndertaken generally againſt the Infidels, and for religions ſake, nſt the Mahometan ſuperſtition, wherof the kingdom of Egypt was the chiefe ſeat and and that therefore they ought eſpecially to impugn that. Which perſuaſion, together the authority of the perſuaders, ſo preuailed, that the Sultans large offers were rejected, the Embaſſadors diſpatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Wher-Corradin fearing that the Chriſtians would at length come to Ieruſalem, as the place moſt deſired, and doubting how he ſhould be able to defend the ſame, forthwith raſed alls thereof, and the more to deface it, ouerthrew and pluckt downe moſt of the goodly es and other ſtately buildings therin; ſparing yet the tower of Dauid and the holy ſepulwhich he is ſaid to haue done at the humble requeſt and interceſſion of the Chriſtians ers countries, which yet dwelt there, mixt with the Turks and Saraſins.

A faire offer euill refuſed.

hileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Damiata, the plague began to ariſe in the wherof ſo many died, that it began to repent the great Commanders of the army, that had ſo much hearkened to the perſuaſion of the Legate (a man making no profeſſion of rather than to the ſound aduice of others, who by long experience taught the ſudden al-on of matters of war, would willingly haue accepted of the Sultans large offers. So be-Pelagius the Legat to be generally euill ſpoken of. There were now already ſix moneths ſince the beginning of the ſiege, and the Sultan lying in ſight had not with him ſo great rmy as before, but only the floure and choice of his people, hauing (as is before ſaid) for of victuals ſent away the reſt vp again into the country. Now it fortuned that the Chris, as men weary of the long ſiege, ſtood not ſo carefully vpon their gard, with watch and as before, but gaue themſelues more to eaſe: which the Sultan perceiuing, drew neerer e town, in hope vnder the couert of the ſilent night to ſend new ſupplies to the beſieged; h companies by him appointed for that ſeruice, couragiouſly ſet forward, in hope to dethe Chriſtian ſentinels, and ſo indeed came neer to the town unſeen or diſcouered: and the formoſt of thoſe companies were already entred the town; when the Chriſtians per-ing them, raiſed an alarm, and put themſelues in arms, and ſo furiouſly aſſailed the hind-of them, and in ſuch ſort, that they which were before within, and thoſe that were but entred, fearing leſt the enemy in that hurly burly ſhould pell mell enter in with the reſt, them out of the gates, expoſed to the butchery, where all were preſently cut in pieces.

Succours ſent vnto the beſieged.

he Chriſtians incouraged with this victory, the next day leauing a great part of the army e the town to continue the ſiege, preſented themſelues before the Sultans camp to giue battel. Who for all that, well conſidering that the loſſe of a battell might endanger the e ſtate of his kingdome, would by no means be drawne out of his trenches, but lay ſtill: erwith the Chriſtians, eſpecially the French men (in the firſt charge naturally furious) ly incouraged, attempted to haue forcibly entred their rampiers, but not with ſucces anrable to their courage. For the Egyptians perceiuing the ſmall number of their enemies, ably repulſed them, and in fine forced them to retyre, hauing loſt Gualter one of their chief mmanders, with diuers others: yea King Iohn in aſſailing the campe loſt many of his men, grieuouſly burnt in his face, hardly eſcaped himſelfe with life. After which diſcomfiture y reſolued not to think of any thing elſe but of the ſiege, and aboue all things to prouide t no ſuccours ſhould be brought into the town. They in the city more ſtreitly beſet and beſieged than before, and now brought vnto extreme neceſſity and famin, and out of all hope of reliefe, aſſembled themſelues to conſult of their affairs, and what were beſt for them to do in ſo dangerous a ſtate; ſome one or other of them by night or otherwiſe ſecretly flying into the camp. And that more was, the city had vndoubtedly bin yeelded by the greater part, had not the chiefe commanders within mured vp the gates, and commanded that none of the inhabitants vpon pain of death ſhould come vpon the wals or rampiers, to the intent that they ſhould not get out, or caſt themſelues from aboue ouer the wals into the ditches. The chiefe commanders and captains went here and there vp and down the City, to ſearch and view all things, eſpecially the ſhops and ſtore houſes, where finding ſmal ſtore of wheat, they diuided it in ſmal portions among themſelues. The common people inforced with want, eat whatſoeuer came to hand, were it lawfull or vnlawfull, or elſe forbidden by their ſuperſtition, wholeſome or vnwholſome, good or bad, ſalt or freſh, roſt or raw; and ſo prolonged their liues with ſuch things as they could find. Now the beſieged not able to endure theſe extremities of the famin (being the paſſion that moſt grieuouſly and often troubleth mankind) they were alſo attached by the wrath of God: for the plague (the fury wherof had before attainted the camp of the Chriſtians, and afterward quite ceaſed) was now got into the city, where it made great ſlaughter; which mortalitie day by day in ſuch ſort encreaſed, that men were not onely now no more to be found, to viſit, comfort, ſuccor, ſerue, and help the ſick; but were wanting alſo to bury them, to draw them out of their beds and houſes, and to ſeperat the liuing from thoſe that were dead: the ſtreets and houſes being full of dead bodies, gaue forth a moſt horrible ſtinke, with a moſt grieuous & infectious aire: there was not any place cleer from the plague or any man that could boaſt he had not bin attainted therwith, or the fear therof, and remedy was there none. The rage and fury of theſe two deuourers, the famin and the plague, deuoured them without number, chuſing rather ſo to die, than to ſubmit themſelues vnto their enemies, or to humble themſelues ſo low as to craue their fauor. That they within were thus pinched with famin the Chriſtians knew, but that the plague ſo raged amongſt them they knew not. Now the Chriſtians had of purpoſe caſt vp certain trenches and barricado's, for the keeping in of ſuch as the famin ſhould inforce to come out of the town; thinking that the beſieged, to eaſe their wants, would thruſt the baſer ſort of people and vnprofitable mouthes out of the city, vnto whom the Chriſtians meant not to giue any paſſage: for they hauing long before ſo ſtreitly inuironed the city, as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it, lay now ſtill expecting when the beſieged, inforced by neceſſitie, ſhould yeeld themſelues, and ſo without loſſe of any man, to become maſters of ſo ſtrong and rich a town. It was now more than a year that the Chriſtians had thus lien at the ſiege of Damiata; when as certain of the ſoldiers vpon a brauery aduentured with a few ſcaling ladders to mount the wal: in which doing, finding no reſiſtance, and withall hearing ſo great ſilence as if there had bin no body within the city, they ſtood ſtill a great while hearkning: but ſeeing that dumb ſilence ſtill to continue, they returned vnto the camp, giuing the captains to vnderſtand how the matter ſtood: who at the firſt thought it to be ſome policie and fineneſſe of the deceitfull enemy; yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certain men, to proue their fortune, and to cauſe certain Companies well appointed to ſcale one of the bulwarks of the City, in ſuch ſort as if they ſhould haue gon againſt a puiſſant enemy that had had power to reſiſt them. And hereupon were ſcaling ladders brought forth, and all things made ready as for a great aſſault. So the Chriſtians couragiouſly mounting the ladders, without reſiſtance took the bulwarke. But as they were entring farther into the town, a ſmall company of the Turks and Barbarians (all the ſoldiers that the fury of the plague had left, and they alſo with the famin and infection of the air very weak and feeble) met them, and began to make ſome ſmal reſiſtance, but to no purpoſe, being forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherwith the gates of the city were mured, was preſently remoued, the gates ſet open, and the Chriſtians with enſignes diſplayed let in. But euen at the very entring in at the gates they were attainted with a moſt grieuous and horrible ſtink, they ſaw a fair city diſpeopled, and that which was moſt fearfull to behold, the ſtreets couered with bodies of the dead, and ſuch a dreadfull deſolation, as might moue euen the enemy himſelf to compaſſion. The Chriſtians were entred as men appointed to have don a great execution, and to haue made the chanels run with bloud, as men juſtly prouoked with the long ſiege and the pains they had endured; they had their ſwords and weapons in their hus was Damiata taken by the Chriſtians the fift day of Nouember, in the yeare 1221, 1221 it had bin more than a yeare by them beſieged. The ſpoil there taken was great, for be-the rich merchandiſe brought thither from far,was found great ſtore of gold, ſiluer,and

In the beginning of theſe wars,the Princes of the army had with one conſent agreed,that ſoeuer city or territory ſhould by them be taken from the Turkes or infidels,ſhould bee n vnto the King of Ieruſalem , whom after the departure of the King of Hungarie they made Generall of the whole army. But now that the City was taken, Pelagius the Legat nding, That by vertue of his Legation it belonged vnto him to diſpoſe of all things tain that ſacred war ; as a man not vnmindfull of his maſter, adjudged the city from thence-to belong vnto the See of Rome. With which indignitie and wrong the King inwardſcontented,and yet for the Legats authority diſſembling the matter,withdrew himſelfe, othing doing,conſidering the deſire and hope he had vtterly to haue ruinated the Infi-ogether with their ſuperſtition;commanded that euery man ſhould again take vp arms proſecuting of this war againſt the Sultan,and the beſieging of Cair. But for all that, e had commanded what he would or could,the ſoldiers little regarding his command, one voice cried out,that they would not be commanded by any but by the King of Ieru-only. So that the Legat,inforced by the ſoldiers,was glad to ſend vnto the King to re-him again to return vnto Damiata,and to take vpon him the charge for the mannaging t war,taken in hand for the defence of the Chriſtian religion. Who for all that, excuimſelfe from ſo doing,one while by his own particular affairs,another while by his own ſpoſition : yet in fine,preſſed and ouercome by the prayers and requeſts of the other La-Princes,he returned to Damiata at the ſelfe ſame time that the Duke of Bauaria arriued with a goodly company of braue men,brought thither out of his own country,after hee Pelagius the legat perſuadeth the Princes of the Christian Army to proceed for the conqueſt of Aegypt.

e Legat deſirous of the proſecution of this War,requeſted and vrged the King,with the f the Princes and great Commanders,without delay to take the field ; telling them that nterpriſe of the Holy war was grown old and cold,by thoſe long delayes and protracting e time : and that they which kept wars ſo far from home,ought to make haſt to force the y,to take all occaſions,to loſe no time,but euer to be doing,and to proue all things for ng the Enemy. And that that was the way wherby the Worthies of antient times,both and Emperours, had gained vnto themſelues Empires, glory, greatneſſe and wealth : it was for them that were inuaded and aſſailed,vpon whoſe liues depended the ſafety of country,their wiues,children, and goods, to delay and prolong the time as they might, ude the enemy,to fruſtrat his deſignes,to defeat his attempts, and with delaies to dally off,till that hauing therby weakned his forces, he ſhould together with his courage loſe his hope. Cair indeed (he ſaid) was a great city, but yet that the greateſt cities that euer ,had by wars become great deſarts,forced by the power of their puiſſant and ſpeedy enehoued either not to haue attempted or aſſailed Egypt at all ; or elſe now, after it had bin once aſſailed, not ſo to giue it ouer before it were conquered. The King of Ieruſalem, whether G it were that he were pricked with grief, that being called the King of the Holy land, he could not haue the city of Damiata (vnder his leading and conduct won by the Chriſtians come to the ſacred War) giuen vnto him by the Legat; or that he had before proued, that the higher Country of Egypt was not without great and manifeſt danger to be attempted; ſaid, That he would not go: alledging that honorable and ſacred War to haue bin taken in hand onely for the recouery of the Holy land, and not for the winning of Memphis, Babylon, or Thebes in Egypt; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie and obedience, nor could they poſſibly be kept by force. Wheras Syria, by Godfrey of Buillon and other great Princes his aſſociats entred into, conquered and poſſeſſed, and ſince his time by diuers other Chriſtian Kings and Princes holden, was in right their own: And that therefore H he greatly commended the forwardneſſe, the diligence, the courage, the deſire, and whatſoeuer thing elſe Pelagius commended; but that he ought to employ the ſame in Syria, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawn or expected. Neuertheleſſe the Legat, wedded to his own opinion, by the power of his Authoritie commanded the King of Ieruſalem, the Duke of Bauaria, with the reſt of the great Commanders & Captaines, to take vp their Arms, to get them into the field vpon the expedition by him appointed againſt the Sultan; threatening the paine of the high ſentence of Excommunication againſt him or them that would ſhew themſelues backeward or vnwilling to do what hee had commanded. So as it were inforced by the Legat, they began with euill will & worſe ſpeed to ſet forward in Auguſt, in the very hotteſt time of the yeare. At which time the Sultan beholding I the great army of the Chriſtians, in number about ſeuenty thouſand, retyred as a man afraid, into ſuch places as he thought beſt, farther off. Which the Legat ſeeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of war) rejoiced greatly as if the victorie had bin already more than half gained; commending to the heauens them that he ſaw couragiouſly marching forward, ſaying, That fortune alwaies fauored the Valiant, and that vnto Cowards all things fell ſtill out to the worſt. By the way the Chriſtians ſeiſed vpon a bridge which the Enemy had made ouer the Nile, and cut in pieces ſuch companies as were left for the keeping therof. So marching on they drew neer vnto Cair, and there in the ſight of that great and rich City incamped: where running vp and down, the more to terrifie them of the city, prouoked them to battel, vpbraiding vnto them their lazineſſe, cowardiſe, and ſloath, brauing them (if they were K men) to come out. Yet for all that, they would not ſo do, but keeping themſelues cloſe & couert within the city, let them alone to brag and boaſt at their own pleaſure. This ſiege continued long, of purpoſe protracted ſtill from day to day by them of the city: and the great opinion the Chriſtians had of their own valor, with the ſmal regard they had of the enemies, made them ſo proud and careles, that they remembred no more to take good care of the war, of their duty, their watch or their ſentinels: their confidence was in their own valor and good fortune, not conſidering or remembring that they were come into Egypt, or that they had put themſelues within the trenches, ſallies, channels, and cuts of a deceitfull riuer, which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies, but alſo fortified them; who by how much they were the leſſe valiant, and leſſe vnderſtood the art of war, the more they vſed craft and ſubtiltie L for their own preſeruation: ſo the cunning enemies drew the Chriſtians out at length, abuſing them with many delayes and deceits, ſhewing ſemblance of great fear, to make themſelues the leſſe to be feared, and the more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the paſſages and ſtreits of the country, and reſeruing themſelues vnto the occaſions and aduantages both of the time, and of their enemies, might circumuent them and intrap them at ſuch time as they leaſt feared any ſuch matter. The Chriſtians at all aduenture had incamped in a low ground, within the banks and cauſies of that fenny country, vnder the couert therof thinking themſelues ſafe as in their trenches, againſt al ſudden ſallies or attempts of their enemies. But theſe places wherin they lay were ſoft & durty, foraſmuch as the country people vſed at their pleaſure to water them by channels and ſluces out of the riuer Nile; M which now pluckt vp and opened, the riuer began to riſe and ouerflow all. Then too late they perceiued themſelues taken as in a grin, without power to defend themſelues, or to make any reſiſtance, or by any other means to ſhew their valor. So the riuer ſtill ariſing and ouerflowing, gaue to the Turks and Egyptians good hope of their wars, and of a victory more deſired

A than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Chriſtians lay incamped was couered with water, ſo high that the victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to ſtand or lie dry in.

Now at the ſame time the Egyptians had taken the high places, with the paſſages vpon the wals and banks in that drowned country, to the intent that the Chriſtians ſhould not be able to retyre or ſaue themſelues out of the bogs and mariſhes couered ouer with water. So was their raſh valour and preſumptuous confidence in themſelues, expoſed vnto the enemies ſhot and fury; and when they would by force haue defended themſelues, their hardineſſe was ouercome by the crafty ſubtiltie of the weake enemy. Then began euery man to cry out againſt Pelagius the Legat, accuſing, condemning, and railing at him: the King himſelfe they blamed B not, for that he had done his duty in diſſuading of this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himſelfe drawn into this war, the charge wherof he had not without great intreatie taken vpon him: neither might he with his credit well complain of this misfortune, leſt in ſo doing he might ſeem to haue had no comfort in himſelfe. But as for the Legat, What counſell could he then giue? What counſell could he then take for himſelfe? They of Venice, Piſa, and Genoa, left at Damiata, were indeed ſtrong at ſea, but how could they come to relieue him at Cair? And how or by what forces could the Chriſtians break out of the banks and ſluces of the cuts and channels, which winding in and out with a thouſand inextricable turnings, incloſed them, beſet alſo on euery ſide with the victorious enemy? After they had bin thus coupt vp and enuironed with the waters 3 daies, you might haue ſeen the poor ſouldiers C in euery place fall down dead for want of food and ſleepe, and ſo periſh in the water: the like miſerable kind of death the reſt were alſo in ſhort time after to expect: other helpe there was none, but to yeeld vnto neceſſitie, and to accept of ſuch conditions as it ſhould pleaſe the proud enemy to propound. Now the Sultan deſired not ſo much their liues, as the liberty of his Country; and therefore required to haue the City of Damiata again reſtored vnto him, and all things elſe in ſuch ſort as were before the beſieging thereof: and ſo the Chriſtians without more ado to depart his Countrey. Hard conditions, if a man reſpect the hope wherupon the Chriſtians had vndertaken this War, and were ſo come into Egypt, with the toyle there by them endured. But vnto him that will but enter into the conſideration of mens affairs, and eſpecially in martiall matters, it will ſeem but an accident to be yeelded to, the like D wherof hath oftentimes hapned vnto the greateſt men of the world. Theſe conditions (ſuch as they were) were by the diſtreſſed Chriſtians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damiata, and there propounded to the Chriſtians there left, a great contention began to ariſe among them; ſome ſaid they would not accept of them, or ſurrender the towne, which beeing kept would be a ſtay for all the affairs of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt, and a moſt commodious place for them to haue recourſe vnto: but being reſtored and loſt, caried away with it all the hope of the Chriſtians: and that therfore it were better to endure all extremities, than to receiue ſuch diſhonorable and hurtfull peace. Others of the contrary opinion ſaid, That they ought not to forſake them that were in danger before Cair, nor to expoſe them to the butcherie, but to haue a Chriſtian compaſſion of ſo many thouſand ſouls as there lay diſtreſſed, ſeeing E they might be ſaued by ſurrendring that one town: Townes, as they ſaid, conſiſted of the number of men, and not men of the incloſures of walls and ditches. They that were of this opinion for the deliuering vp of the town, ſeeing the other obſtinately ſet down to the contrarie, withdrawing themſelues from the councel, preſently took vp arms, and by force entred the houſes of them of contrary opinion, and took from them their weapons, by that means & perforce to conſtrain them to yeeld to their deſire. As ſoon as they that lay before Cair (almoſt drowned in the waters) vnderſtood of this diſſention at Damiata about the deliuerie of the town, they ſent them word, that if they would not yeeld the Towne to the Sultan, they would forthwith ſend to Ptolemais, which would not fail to do what ſhould be commanded, to haue it in ſtead of Damiata rendred to the Egyptians. So was Damiata again yeelded to the Infidels, F and ſo great labors of the Chriſtians taken at the ſiege & winning therof, all loſt. That which made this indignity more tolerable, was, that Sultan Meladin hauing without bloudſhed gained ſo great a victory, did neither by word or deed any thing in deſpight or reproch of the Chriſtians, but vſed them with all curteſie, relieuing them alſo with victuals and other things as they wanted, and by faithfull guids conducting them in ſafety out of the Country.

The miſerie of the Chriſtians in the drowned land.

In like maner alſo Corradine his brother, Sultan of Damaſco, made truce with the Latins for eight years. Wherupon the King of Ieruſalem went ouer into Italy, and there by the perſuaſion of Honorius the Pope, his wife being now dead, gaue his daughter Yoland (now crowned Queen of Ieruſalem in the right of her mother) in marriage to Frederick King of Sicilia, and Emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to ſtir him vp for the taking in hand of the ſacred war. Euer ſince which time, he and his ſucceſſors Kings of Sicilia haue bin called Kings of Ieruſalem, albeit they haue euilly proſecuted that their pretended right and title, as ſtil buſied in more prophane wars againſt other Chriſtian Princes. King Iohn afterwards departing from Rome for France, was by the way honourably entertained at Piſa: but arriuing at the French court, he found Philip the French King deſperatly ſick, who by his laſt will and Teſtament gaue vnto the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templers ſixty thouſand crownes for the maintenance of their wars againſt the Infidels; which mony was to their vſe afterward payd vnto King Iohn. Who ſhortly after, to diſcharge himſelfe of a vow he had made, to viſit the pilgrimage at Compoſtella; going into Spain, by the way married Berengaria the King of Caſtiles daughter: and there ſtaying a great while, returned again into France, where he lay long, expecting the ſetting forward of the Emperor Frederick his ſon in law, for recouery of his wiues right to the kingdom of Ieruſalem: which although hee ſolemnly vowed at ſuch time as hee with all princely magnificence maried the ſaid Lady at Rome, yet otherwiſe letted with troubles neerer home, performed not the ſame vntill almoſt ſeuen years after. All which time the Chriſtians in Syria enjoying the fruit of the late concluded peace for 8 yeares, liued in great reſt and quietnes: where ſo leauing them vntill the ariſing of new troubles, let vs in the mean time return again vnto the troubled affairs of the Turks, Greeks, and Latins at Conſtantinople and in the leſſer Aſia.

The death of Henry emperor of Conſtantinople.

Peter Emperor.

Henry the ſecond Emperor of the Latines at Conſtantinople, after he had (as is aforeſayd) with much ado repreſſed the fury of the Bulgarians and Scythes his barbarous enemies, and ſo giuen peace to the miſerable country of Thracia, died, hauing reigned a moſt troubleſom reign about the ſpace of eleuen yeares. After whom ſucceeded Peter County of Auſſerre, his ſonne in Law, third Emperour of the Latines in Conſtantinople. Who in the beginning of his Empire, willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to reuenge himſelfe of Theodorus Angelus a great Prince of Epirus, Competitor in his empire, beſieged him in Dirrachium; which ſtrong City the ſaid Theodorus had but a little before ſurpriſed, belonging vnto the Venetian Seigniory. At which ſiege Peter the Emperour lying, was ſo cunningly by the wyly Greeke vſed, that a peace was vpon moſt honorable conditions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kind of friendſhip joined. Inſomuch that the Emperour at his requeſt, not well aduiſed, came vnto him as a gueſt: who now of his enemy became his hoſt, entertaining him with all the formalities that feigned friendſhip could deuiſe. But hauing him now in his power, and fearing no harme, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hoſpitalitie, he moſt traiterouſly ſlew him as he was yet in the midſt of his banquet. Of whoſe end ſome others yet otherwiſe report, as that he ſhould by the ſame Theodore haue bin intercepted about the pleaſant woods of Tempe in Theſſaly, as he was trauelling from Rome to Conſtantinople, and ſo afterwards to haue bin by him cruelly put to death. Of whoſe misfortune Tepulus Gouernor of Conſtantinople vnderſtanding, for the more ſafety of the ſtate in that vacancie of the Empire, made peace with Theodorus for fiue years, and with the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert (ſon to the aforeſaid vnfortunat Emperour Peter) with his mother to Conſtantinople, and there in his fathers ſtead was ſolemnly ſaluted Emperor, but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for ſhortly after his comming, he took to wife a fair yong Lady, the daughter of a great rich and noble matron in the city, but before betrothed vnto a gallant Gentleman a Burgundian born. With whom the old Lady broke her promiſe, and more carefull of her daughters preferment, than her fidelity, gaue her in marriage vnto the yong Emperour. The ioy of which ſo great an honour was ſhortly after conuerted not into a deadly heauines, but euen into death it ſelf: for the yong Burgundian more inraged with the wrong done him, than diſcouraged with the greatneſſe and power of the Emperor, conſorted himſelfe with a company of luſty tall ſouldiers acquainted with his purpoſe, and awaiting his time when the Emperor was abſent, by night entred the court with his deſperat followers, and firſt meeting with the beautifull yong Empreſſe, cut off her noſe and her ears, and afterward threw her old

A mother into the ſea,and ſo fled out of the city into the woods and mountains,with thoſe deſperat cut-throats the miniſters of his barbarous crueltie. The Emperor pierced to the heart with this ſo great a diſgrace, ſhortly after went to Rome, to what purpoſe was not certainely known;but in returning back againe thorough Achaia,he there died,leauing behind him his yong ſon Baldwin, yet but a childe, begotten by his firſt wife, to ſucceed him in the empire; who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond, was crowned the fift and laſt Emperor of the Latins in Conſtantinople.And for becauſe he was as yet but yong and vnfit for the gouernment,he was by conſent of the Nobilitie affianced, and afterward married vnto Martha the younger daughter of Iohn Brenne King of Ieruſalem,a worthy old captaine,(but as then Gouernour of Rauenna,which city,he being certaine yeres before ſent for out of France for that purpoſe,by B Honorius the Pope,he notably defended againſt the emperor Frederick his ſon in law,but that affinity was before broken off by the death of the ſaid Emperors wife) who now ſent for out of Italy vnto Conſtantinople, had committed to his charge and protection, both the perſon and empire of the yong Emperor Baldwin,now his ſon in law. Which great and heauy charge he for certain yeares after worthily and faithfully diſcharged, vntill ſuch time as that Baldwin was himſelfe grown able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the imperial city of Conſtantinople,with the countries of Thracia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, Achaia, Peloponeſus,and the reſt of the prouinces of Greece;were al or for the moſt part vnder the gouernment of Baldwin the Emperour, the Venetians, or other the inferiour Latine Princes; yet were the oppreſſed Greekes, the naturall inhabitants thereof,in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing C more than that their forrein gouernment;but wholly deuoted to their owne natural Princes, Theodorus Laſcaris and Alexius Comnenus, the one raigning at Nice in Bithynia, the other at Trapezond in Pontus,both called by the Greeks,Emperours, and ſo of them generally reputed.Laſcaris of the two the better beloued, and by farre of greateſt power, had during the time of his gouernment fought many an hard battell, (as is in part before declared) and ſtrongly fortified his chiefe cities againſt the inuaſion of his enemies,as well the Turks as the Latins: and ſo hauing as it were erected a new empire in Aſia,and there reigned eighteen yeres,died, leauing behind him one Iohn Ducas Batazes,that had maried the faire Lady Irene his daughter and heire, to ſucceed him in the Greeke empire in Aſia. This Iohn was a man of a great wit and ſpirit,and of more grauity for his yeres,than was Theodorus his father in law,neuer vndertaking D any thing before he had thereof well conſidered; and once reſolued, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance therof:ſo that it was not vnfitly ſaid of the Greeks, The planting of this new empire to haue required the celeritie of Laſcaris,but the ſtay therof to haue been the grauity of Ducas. He in the beginning of his reign in very ſhort time hauing ſet all things in good order,greatly augmented his legions,and ſhooting at a fairer mark than the empire he held,euen the imperiall city it ſelfe, and the recouery of all Thracia & Grecia out of the hands of the Latines, which could not be done without a fleet at ſea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the leſſer Aſia. And ſo hauing rigged vp & manned a ſtrong fleet,and ſcouring the ſeas, in one Summer took in moſt of the Iſlands of the Ægeum,namely Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Icaria, Coos, with the famous Iſland of the Rhodes,and many others E alſo. And not ſo contented, to haue increaſed his empire, the next Spring croſſing the Helleſpont, and landing his forces firſt inuaded Cherſoneſus; and afterward to terrifie the Latines, forraged the countrey farre and neere, euen to the gates of Conſtantinople, no man daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him. At which time alſo he tooke many cities and ſtrong towns alongſt the ſea coaſt,as, Calliopolis,Ceſtus,and Cardia,with diuers others therabout, ſome by force,ſome by compoſition, the Greeks almoſt in euery place yeelding themſelues, where they were not ſo oppreſſed by the Latines, as that they could not help him. Now by theſe proceedings of the Greek Emperor in Europe, was plainly to be ſeene again the ruine of the Latine Empire in the Eaſt, all things proſpering in his hand according to his hearts deſire. Aſſan the Bulgarian King (no ſmall terror both vnto the Latines and the Greeks) moued F with the fame hereof,by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe vnto Iohn the Greek Emperor, offered his daughter Helena in mariage with young Theodore his ſonne:of which offer the Emperour gladly accepted. For being buſied in his great affaires, he was loth to haue ſo great a King as was Aſſan,his enemy, able at his pleaſure to call in the Scythes;who with their multitude,as a great flood breaking ouer the banks,had oftentimes carried away whole countries before them. Wherefore the match agreed vpon, the two great Princes by appointment met together about Cherſoneſus, where Helena king Aſſans daughter, being then about ten yeares old, was with great ioy and triumph ſolemnly married vnto Theodore the Emperors ſon, much of the ſame age. Not long after, Embaſſadors were alſo ſent vnto the Emperor from the Sultan of Iconium, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to haue driuen the Turks out of Perſia and the far Eaſterne countries, began now alſo to cut them ſhort in their Prouinces in the leſſer Aſia. Wherefore the Sultan of Iconium, fearing leſt whiles he had his hands full of thoſe his moſt dreadfull enemies, of themſelues too ſtrong for him, he ſhould behind be ſet vpon by the Greeke Emperor, and ſo thruſt out of all; ſent theſe his Embaſſadors vnto him for peace: which he for many cauſes eaſily granted. Firſt, for that he foreſaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintaine warre at once both in Aſia againſt the Turks, and in Europ againſt the Latins: then by this warlike nation, as by a moſt ſure bulwarke, to keep his owne countries ſafe from the incurſion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whoſe fury he ſhould himſelfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both ſufficient reaſons for the Emperor to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: ſo was the peace concluded, and the Embaſſadors diſpatched. This peace exceedingly comforted, and afterwards enriched the Emperors countries: for now the people generally deliuered of the feare and miſery of continuall war, began on all hands to fall to their fruitfull labours of peace. Yea the Emperor himſelfe, to the ſtirring vp of others to the like good husbandrie, cauſed ſo much land to be ploughed vp for corne, and ſo many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully ſuffice his owne houſe, and ſuch poore as he daily relieued; with a great ouerplus, which he cauſed to be carefully layd vp in ſtore: hee kept alſo great herds of cattell, flocks of ſheep, and fowles of all ſorts, without number. The like he cauſed his kinſmen and other of the nobility to do, to the intent that euery great man hauing ſufficient for his owne ſpending at home, ſhould not take any thing from the poore country men, that ſo euery man contenting himſelfe with his owne, might liue in peace without the grieuance of others. By which meanes in a few yeares euery barne and granarie was full of corne, euery cellar full of wines, euery ſtable full of cattell, euery ſtore-houſe full of victuals; the fields were couered with corn and cattel, and in euery mans yard were to be ſeen all kinds of tame fowles, without number. About which time alſo there fortuned a great famine among the Turks, inſomuch as that they were inforced to fetch their greateſt reliefe from out of the Chriſtian countries. Then might you haue ſeen euery way full of Turks, men, women, and children, trauelling too and fro into the Emperors countrey for victuals; their gold, their ſiluer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Chriſtians for food; a little corn was worth a good commodity, euery bird, ſheep, and kid, was ſold at a great rate: by which meanes the countrey mens houſes were ful of the Turks wealth, and the emperors coffers ſtored with their treaſure: the greatnes of the profit ariſing of this plenty of the Chriſtians, and penury of the Turks, may hereby eaſily be gathered, for that of egges daily ſold, ſo much money was in ſhort time gathered, as made the Empreſſe an Imperiall crowne of gold, richly ſet with moſt orient pearle and precious ſtones of great price; which the Emperor called Ouata, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus flouriſhed the Greeke empire in the leſſer Aſia, vnder the good Emperor Iohn Ducas: the Turks at the ſame time declining as faſt, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and conſumed with famine at home.

Frederick the German emperor had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land; for performance whereof he was hardly called vpon, firſt by Honorius quartus the Pope, & afterward for his long delay excommunicated by Gregory the ninth: not ſo much for the zeale they had vnto the ſacred war, as to buſie the Emperour afar off in warres abroad, whilſt they in the meane time, to increaſe their owne power, drew from him ſome one part or other of his empire: which he not without cauſe fearing, from day to day, & yere to yeare, delayed the performance of his vow, ſo much vrged by the Pope; by his preſence & power ſtill diſappointing all the ſlie deſignes of the Popes, conceiued or put in practiſe againſt him: but now at length mooued, or more truly to ſay, inforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he reſolued to ſet forward in the yeare 1227. About which time, Iolenta, or Yoland his wife, the king of Ieruſalem his daughter, died in childbed, being before deliuered of a faire ſonne. Now were met together at Brunduſium an exceeding great number of couragious

A gious and deuout ſouldiers out of all parts of Chriſtendome, eſpecially out of Germanie, vnder the leading of Lodwick Lantgraue of Thuringe, and Sigefride Biſhop of Anguſta; al ſtirred vp with the fame of ſo notable an expedition. But whileſt they there ſtaid ſomewhat long, the plague aroſe among the Germanes, whereof in ſhort time after, both the Lantgraue and the Biſhop died, with many of the other beſt ſoldiers. The emperor himſelfe was vpon his way as far as Malea, vpon the further ſide of Peloponeſus, where falling deſperatly ſicke of a burning feuer, and put back with contrary winds, he returned againe to Brunduſium, and there ſtaid a great while after. Then began the Pope againe to fret and fume, and to caſt out his excommunications againſt the emperor, as if it had bin thunder and lightning, accuſing him of periury, infidelity, and many other grieuous crimes; of all which the Emperor was ready to haue cleered B himſelfe in an open aſſembly of the Princes of Germany to be holden at Rauenna, had it not bin by the Pope and the troubles of Lombardy diſturbed. Neuertheleſſe, he by open proteſtations and writings, fully anſwered all the Popes vniuſt accuſations, wherewith hee had been ſo hardly charged: and yet deſirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, hauing ſet all things in good order, and put himſelfe againe in a readines, he ſet forward from Brunduſium in Auguſt, in the yeare 1228, leauing the charge of his territories in Italy vnder 1228 the care of Reynold Duke of Spaleto. The Pope diſpleaſed, for that the Emperor at his departure had neither reconciled himſelfe, nor taken his leaue of him; and deeming therein his excommunications and fulminations to be contemned and ſet at naught, fell into ſuch a rage and choler, that he forbad all the Chriſtian forces that were in Syria, to follow him, or to C yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters alſo vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy Land: which letters the Sultan afterwards ſent vnto the Emperor. Neither yet ſo contented, immediatly after his departure, ran vpon his kingdome of Naples, and ſo filled all Italy with troubles. Neuertheles the Emperour arriuing at Ptolemais, was there honorably receiued of the Chriſtian forces, notwithſtanding the Popes threats and curſings. Of whoſe arriual Sultan Meledin hauing intelligence, and loth to draw ſo mighty an enemy as was the emperor, vpon him, by his embaſſadors offered him moſt honorable conditions of peace, which before he would accept of, he by conuenient meſſengers ſent vnto the Pope, to haue his conſent and approbation. But ſuch was his rage, as that he would not ſuffer the Meſſengers to come into his preſence, or vouchſafe D to read the Emperors letters, being brought vnto him, but like a mad man preſently rent them in pieces. All which indignities the Emperor neuertheleſſe took in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turks for ten yeares, vpon theſe conditions: Firſt, That he ſhould be anointed and accounted king of Ieruſalem: then, That the Holy City, with all the land of Paleſtine ſhould be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That he might at his pleaſure fortifie the cities of Nazareth and Ioppe: fourthly, That all ſuch places as were ſometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth King of Ieruſalem, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, ſhould be reſtored: and laſt of all, That all priſoners on both ſides ſhould be ſet at liberty without ranſome. So the peace concluded, the Emperor with his army came to the deſolate city of Ieruſalem, and there vpon Eaſter day with great ſolemnity was crowned king thereof, in the yere 1229. And 1229 E ſo hauing repaired the wals of the city, with certain Churches, fortified Nazareth and Ioppe, and furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons, and appointed Reynold Duke of Bauaria, his lieutenant in Syria, he with two gallies only returned into Italy. Euer ſince which time the kings of Sicilia haue beene alſo called Kings of Ieruſalem, and haue oftentimes borne the armes of both Kingdomes.

Fredericke the Emperor crowned King of Ieruſalem.

The next yeare Pope Gregory, in deſpight of the emperor Frederick, more than for any zeale 1230 to the Chriſtian Religion, did by the Dominicans and Franciſcans (two orders of Friers but then lately erected) as by his trumpeters, ſtir vp a wonderfull number of zealous and deuout Chriſtians, almoſt in euery part of Chriſtendome, to take vpon them the croſſe (as they termed it) the cogniſance of ſuch as had by vow bound themſelues to take vp arms againſt the F Turks and Saraſins, for a recouery or defence of the Holy land. Theſe deuout men met together in great number, vnder the leading of Theobald K. of Nauar, Almericus County of Montfort, Henry County of Champaigne, and others too long to rehearſe, (of purpoſe ſtirred vp to trouble the ten yeares peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Turks in Syria) ſet forward, and after long trauell paſſing the ſtreight of Boſphorus, not far from Conſtantinople, nople into Bithynia, came to the riuer Sangarius, & there ſtaid a while to refreſh themſelues. G Afterwards paſſing through Galatia, and ſo from country to country through the leſſer Aſia, they came at length to the ſtreits of the mountaine Amanus (a part of the mountain Taurus) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of Iconium himſelfe not far off incamped with a ſtrong army. Neuertheleſſe the valiant County of Montfort, which had the leading of the vantgard, couragiouſly marching forward, by plaine force opened the paſſage of the mountain, hauing ſlain or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof: the king of Nauarre in the meane time (though in vain) aſſailing the Sultan in his camp, who fearing the great power of the Chriſtians, kept himſelfe within his owne ſtrength, and would not ſtir. Wherefore the King ſeeing it to no purpoſe there longer to ſtay, diuiding his army into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the County, placing his baggage in the H midſt, and the beſt of his ſouldiers in the rereward. But whilſt they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turks better acquainted with thoſe paſſages, were ſtil at hand, aſſailing them ſomtime behind, ſomtime on the one ſide, ſomtime on the other, as they ſaw occaſion: and at length taking them at an aduantage in a great plaine, ſet vpon them, now before almoſt ſpent with hunger and trauell, and there ſlew of them an exceeding great number. But by the comming on of the night the battell was broken off, and the Chriſtians repairing vnto their enſignes, paſſed the ſtreits, and ſo at length arriued at Antioch, hauing loſt by the way the greateſt part of the army, with all their wealth, their victuals, and moſt part of their horſes: the remnant yet left, hauing a little refreſhed themſelues, were by ſea tranſported to Ptolemais; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to Gaza, where they lay, and of I the ſpoyle of the countrey greatly enriched themſelues. As for any other great matters, they were not able of themſelues to take in hand; and help of ſuch forces as the emperor had before left at Ieruſalem, and other places, they could haue none; hauing expreſſe charge from the Emperor himſelfe, not to do any thing againſt the enemy, tending to the breach of the tenne yeares league: which the Turks well perceiuing, and that they had to do but with theſe new come gueſts, and ſome few others their partakers; hauing gathered together their forces, lay in ambuſh for them in euery corner, to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that theſe of Gaza going far into the country, and returning laded with ſpoile, were ſet vpon by the Turks; whom they (caſting away the ſpoyle they had before taken) notably repulſed & put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a far greater number of K Turkes than before; which now putting on, charged the Chriſtians, who all that night had ſtood watching in their armor, and ſo ioined with them a moſt cruel battell: wherin the Chriſtians ſhewed ſo much valour as was poſſible for men to do, but wearied with the long fight, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, they were ouercome and ſlaine almoſt euery mothers ſon. Among the reſt, the two Counties, Americus and Henry fell: the King of Nauarre himſelfe hardly eſcaped by the exceeding ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, and by vncertaine wayes wandring vp and downe the countrey, not knowing well which way to take, after two dayes came by good fortune to Ioppe: ſome few others eſcaped by flight to Ptolemais, the heauy meſſengers of the misfortune of their fellowes. The King afterwards viſiting the holy places at Ieruſalem, returned home into his countrey, with ſome few of his followers, hauing L performed nothing of that the world expected.

The Chriſtians by perſwaſion of the Templers breake their League with the Turks.

About foure yeares after, Reynold Duke of Bauaria, whom Fredericke the Emperor had left his lieutennant in Ieruſalem, died, hauing by the ſpace of fiue yeres peaceably gouerned that bruiſed kingdome. After whoſe death, the Templers (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the League, but that they were by his wiſedome reſtrained) now tooke occaſion to ſtirre vp the people to take vp armes againſt the Turks, without reſpect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to inſue. Wherof the Ægyptian Sultan hearing, raiſed a great army, ſending alſo for the Choraſines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto Babylon, to come vnto his aid. Thus become very ſtrong, hee firſt layd ſiege to Gaza, but a little before repayred and fortified by the King of Nauarre and the Templers, which he at length M tooke by force, and put to ſword all that were therein, as well the citiſens, as the garriſon ſouldiers: in like manner he dealt alſo with them of Aſcalon and other places as he went. To repreſſe this his fury, the Templers and Hoſpitallers had aſſembled the whole ſtrength of that weake Kingdome, and neere vnto Tyberias came to haue giuen him battell. Who vpon

A their approch haſtily retyred, as if he had for feare ſhunned battell. But whiles the Chriſtians as victors the night following lay negligently incamped along the riuer ſide, hee returning backe again with his army, came vpon them before they were well aware, halfe ſleeping, halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed, with a moſt horrible outcry. The Chriſtians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the ſuddennes of the matter, haſtily and diſorderly (as muſt needs in ſo great a confuſion) tooke vp their weapons, ſuch as came firſt to hand, and ſo couragiouſly oppoſed themſelues againſt their enemies. There was fought a moſt terrible and doubtfull battell, and that alſo for a long ſpace, the Chriſtians ſtill incouraging one another to do their laſt deuoir: but the Turks ſtil keeping their order againſt the diſordred Chriſtians, and far moe alſo than they in number, preuailed, and there ouerthrew them with a great B ſlaughter, but not without the loſſe of many thouſands alſo of their owne men, which there lay dead vpon the ground. Moſt part of the beſt commanders both of the Templers and Hoſpitallers were there ſlaine, ſuch as eſcaped fled to Tyre.

1234 Ieruſalem take and raſed by the Turks.

The Sultan incouraged with ſo great a victory, marched forthwith to Ieruſalem, which he tooke without reſiſtance, and there put to ſword all that he found therein, men, women, and children, without reſpect of ſex or age: and afterwards hauing rifled the ſame, raſed it downe to the ground, burning the buildings, and ouerthrowing the wals not long before repaired by the emperor Frederick, and much beautified by his lieutenant Reynold. And carried with an infernall fury, defaced and moſt ſhamefully polluted the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauior, neuer before then violated or defiled, but of all nations vntouched & reuerenced; which for all that C may ſeem to haue bin done not ſo much for the hatred vnto the Chriſtian religion, as for that it was the place of all others moſt deſired of the Chriſtians; and for the gaining whereof they had vndertaken ſo many hard aduentures, and ſo much troubled the Saraſins and Turks.

Thus by the vnfaithfull breaking of the league, the moſt antient and famous city of Ieruſalem, ſometime the terreſtriall ſeat of the moſt Higheſt, and glory of the world, fell againe into the power of the Turks and Infidels, in the yeare 1234, in whoſe hands it hath euer ſince remained euen vntill this day: now a poore ruinous city, gouerned by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous, than for the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour againe repaired and much viſited by the deuout Chriſtians, and not vnreuerenced by the Turkes themſelues.

D The loſſe of this ſo famous a city, together with the dangerous ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, much grieued the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, eſpecially Fredericke the Emperor, by whom it had bin but a few yeares before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedy the matter according to his deſire, being himſelfe grieuouſly intangled with the endles troubles which Pope Gregory had as it were by tradition left vnto the other Popes his ſucceſſors, for the troubling of his ſtate, vntill at length they had depriued him of his Empire, and not long after of his life alſo. Among other the great Princes, carefull for the poore Chriſtians in Syria, was Lewis the ninth, the French King, a Prince of great power, but of all others of that time moſt famous for his zeale vnto the Chriſtian Religion, and for his deuout maner of life: who abounding in wealth and all things elſe of a great Prince to be deſired, and E oftentimes conſidering the notable expeditions many Chriſtian Princes had (to their immortall glory) made, ſome into Syria, ſome into Ægypt, againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians, was many times about to haue taken vpon himſelf the like. But in theſe his deuout motions, before he could reſolue vpon ſo great an enterpriſe, hee fell dangerouſly ſicke, inſomuch that for certaine dayes he lay ſpeechleſſe, deuoid of ſence and motion, without any ſigne of life, but that he did a little faintly breath: when comming a little vnto himſelfe, (whether moued by deuotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine, is vncertaine) the firſt thing he asked for was the Croſſe (the cogniſance of ſuch as vowed themſelues vnto the ſacred war) which he ſolemnly receiued at the hands of the Biſhop of Paris. At which time alſo his three brethren, Alphonſus County of F Poitiers, Charles County of Aniou, and Robert County of Arthois, with Hugh Duke of Burgondy, William Earle of Flanders, Hugh County of Saint Paul, and afterwards moſt of the nobility of France, to accompany the King, tooke vpon them the ſame charge. Neuertheleſſe it was not by and by taken in hand, but ſome few yeres let paſſe in the conſultation and preparation for ſo great an enterpriſe: many in the mean time diſcharging their vow, by dying before 1248 at home in peace in their owne countries. At length the deuout King ſtill reſolute in his former G determination, hauing taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and put all things in readines for his iourney, came to Lyons to take his leaue of Pope Innocentius the fourth, (who for feare of the Emperor Frederick, then lay there for his more ſafty) and from thence to Marceilles; where imbarking himſelfe with his army the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt, the yeare 1248, he the twentieth day of September following arriued in ſafety in the Iſland of Cyprus, and was there royally entertained by Guy Luſignan then King of that countrey.

Now was the French King deſirous to haue gone directly for Ægypt, without longer ſtay in Cyprus, had he not been otherwiſe perſuaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet come, and the time of the yere began to grow vnſeaſonable, and the weather tempeſtuous: but H whilſt he there ſtaid, paſſing the Winter, the plague (one of the ready attendants of great armies) began to ariſe in the camp, which daily increaſing, had in ſhort time taken away a great number of men, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort. Among whom were Robert Biſhop of Beauvais, Iohn County Montfort, the Counties of Vendoſme and Dreux, Archambaut Lord of Burbon, with diuers other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of 240. ſo that by force of the infectious contagion, the King was conſtrained to diuide his army into diuers places of the Iſland, attending vntill the infection ſhould ceaſe. In the meane time the Templers hauing in ſuſpect both the French and the Turks, (the Turks, for feare they ſhould ouerrunne all; the French, leſt hauing gotten the victory, they ſhould take all into their own hands, and ſo diminiſh I their power and authority wherewith they tyrannized ouer the other poore Chriſtians) ſent Embaſſadors ſecretly vnto Meledin Sultan of Ægypt, to perſuade him betimes to come to ſome good agreement for peace, ſo to auert the power of the French King from doing him further harme, or proceeding further in that war. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, ſent one of his noblemen to intreat with the maſter of the Templers concerning a peace, ſo that it might be by conſent of the French. The Templers glad of ſo honourable a meſſage, writ vnto the French king out of Syria, how the matter ſtood, perſuading him to accept of the peace offred, ſetting out in great words the Sultans great preparations and power. And ſo indeed had abuſed the king, had not the King of Cyprus, acquainted with his doings, perſuaded him that it was but a fineneſſe of the great Maſter, and that he had firſt ſent vnto the Sultan, and procured that nobleman to be ſent: which the King vpon conſideration perceiuing to be K true, fed the Turks Embaſſador with hope of peace, but writ to the Maſter of the Templers, vpon the price of his head, from thenceforth not to receiue any embaſſage from the enemy, or to haue any further intelligence with him.

Winter now paſt, and the plague well ceaſed, diuers noble gentlemen and great commanders which following the king, and ſetting forth ſomwhat late, or for feare of the plague had ſtayed by the way, and wintred ſome in one place, ſome in another, began to repaire vnto Cyprus: as Robert Duke of Burgondy, who hauing wintred in Achaia, came now in the beginning of the Spring vnto the King, with a number of good horſemen, and with him William Prince of Achaia, with a great fleet out of Peloponeſus, which countrey, with moſt part of Grecia, was then vnder the command of the Latines; among others came alſo William ſyrnamed Longeſpie, L Earle of Saliſbury, with a band of luſty tall ſouldiers. So the army being met together, and all things againe in readineſſe, King Lewis departing from Cyprus, and toſſed at ſea with contrary winds, about fiue days after fell with the coaſt of Ægypt, and there with all his fleet came before the ſtrong towne of Damiata, being (as we haue ſaid) the key of that kingdome. The Sultan long before vnderſtanding of the French Kings purpoſe for the inuaſion of his country, had ſtrongly fortified his frontier townes, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, beſide the great power, he kept with himſelfe in readineſſe at all aſſaies, as occaſion ſhould require. Vpon the Chriſtians approch, the Gouernour of Damiata was ready vpon the ſhore, with a number of braue ſouldiers to keep them from landing; who neuertheleſſe, reſolutely before ſet down for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long boats with their M archers and croſſebowes to beat the enemie from the ſhore, ranne a ground with their other ſmal boats, made of purpoſe for the landing of men, and ſo without longer ſtay came to handy blowes; where for a while was fought a moſt ſharp and cruell battell, the Chriſtians ſtriuing to land, and the Turks to keep them off, many falling on both ſides. But what ſhould an handfull

A full doe againſt ſo many? The Turks oppreſſed with the multitude ſtill landing more and more, and hauing done what was poſſible for them to do, fled into the towne, leauing behind them their gouernour, with fiue hundred of their beſt ſouldiers dead on the ſhore.

This city of Damiata was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres not bin taken but by more than a yeares ſiege, (as is before declared) and that not ſo much by the valour of the Chriſtians, as by the extremity of the plague and famine: ſince which time it had bin ſtrongly fortified by the Turks, with deep ditches, high wals, and ſtrong bulwarkes, and was at that time wel ſtored with victuals alſo, and all things els for the induring of a long ſiege. Neuertheles, the ſoldiers that were left, and the citizens (diſcouraged with the loſſe of their gouernor, and remembrance of the miſeries before endured in the former ſiege, and ſee-B ing the Chriſtians now ready again to beſiege the ſame) the night following, a little before the breake of day, ſet fire euery man vpon his owne houſe, and ſo by a bridge which they had made of boats fled ouer the great riuer, breaking the bridge when they were ouer, for feare their enemies ſhould thereby haue followed after them. The Chriſtians perceiuing their flight, without reſiſtance entred the city, and being ſtrangers, did what they could to quench the fire, and to ſaue that which the inhabitants themſelues would fain haue with fire deſtroid; and ſo afterwards found great aboundance of riches, with plentifull ſtore of all manner of victuals, wherwith the ſouldiers both inriched and refreſhed themſelues. This ſo happy and vnexpected a victory hapned to the Chriſtians about the beginning of October, in the yeare 1249. Sultan Meledin himſelfe, diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo ſtrong a city, offered vnto the C French King for the redeeming thereof, and to haue peace at his hands, more territory in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, than the Chriſtians had of long time before: which large offer was by the French, eſpecially by the Earle of Arthois the Kings brother, proudly reiected, and Alexandria, the moſt famous port and metropoliticall city of Ægypt, further demanded, to the great diſcontentment of the Turks and Saraſins. In theſe troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloued of his people: in whoſe ſtead Melech ſala (or Melexala, as ſome call him) a valiant and couragious Prince, well beloued of his ſubiects, and but euen then returned out of Syria and Arabia, where he had bin to craue aid of the other Mahometan Princes, was choſen Sultan. Which Princes, eſpecially the Sultan of Damaſco, although they had not of long bin at any good accord among themſelues, or with the Ægyptian, yet in this com-D mon danger of their ſuperſtition, which by the loſſe of Ægypt was like to bee greatly weak-ned, they ioyned hands together, and ſo ſent him great ayd.

The citizens of Damiata ſet fire vpon the city, and ran away by the light.

The new Sultan thus ſtrengthned, drew neerer to the Chriſtians, which then lay encamped not far from Damiata, and had with them a hot ſkirmiſh, wherin he was put to the worſe, and ſo with ſome loſſe glad to retire. But the Chriſtians the next day, in hope of like ſucceſſe ſal-lying out againe, were ouerthrowne, with ten times more loſſe than was he the day before, and ſo fain to fly vnto the camp. By which victory the Sultan incouraged, began now to conceiue better hope of the ſucceſſe of his wars; and by ſtopping the paſſages both by water and land, to prouide, that no victuals could without great perill be brought either vnto the city or the camp, inſomuch that at length victuals began to grow ſcarce in both: whereof the Sultan was E not ignorant, as being thereof throughly informed by ſuch fugitiues, as for want or other cauſes, oftentimes fled out of the French camp into his.

Winter thus paſſing, and wants ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that the gouernour of the great city of Caire (vpon the fortune whereof depended the ſtate of the whole kingdome) a man not euill affected to the Chriſtian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his brother by him wrongfully executed; by ſecret meſſengers perſuaded the French king to come on with his army to the city, the regal ſeat of the Sultan, promiſing him to deliuer it into his power, with full inſtructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining therof. Wherupon the King, who had before of himſelfe purpoſed the ſame exploit, but now filled with a greater hope, aſſembled together the greateſt forces he was able to make.
F At which time alſo he ſent for the Earle of Saliſbury, with the reſt of the Engliſhmen, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (eſpecially by the Earle of Artois the kings brother) whereof they could haue no redreſſe, were gone to Ptolemais, without purpoſe to haue any more ſerued in thoſe wars: but now being ſent for by the King, with promiſe of better vſage and honorable recompence for the wrongs paſt, returned againe into Ægypt,

A faire offer fondly refuſed.

there to do their laſt endeuor. With whoſe comming the King ſtrengthned, but more by the G new ſupplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonſus out of France, leauing the Duke of Burgondy with a conuenient garriſon, with the Queene his wife, Odo the Popes Legate, and diuers other great Ladies in Damiata, he himſelfe ſet forward with his army toward Caire.
Of whoſe comming the Sultan hearing, and loth vpon the fortune of one battell, to aduenture his whole eſtate, offred by his Embaſſadors to reſtore vnto him all the land of Paleſtine, with a great ſumme of mony for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars, and all the priſoners he had taken, ſo that he would redeliuer vnto him the city of Damiata, and ioyne with him in league and amity. Which faire offer for all that, the French King, by the perſuaſion of Legat and others, refuſed. So the King marching ſtill on, was to paſſe an arme of the great riuer Nilus (the Sultan on the other ſide ſtill ready with his army to ſtay his paſſage) which H he had thought to haue made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the ſame purpoſe: but better conducted by a fugitiue Saraſin vnto a foord, before to him vnknowne, ſent his brother Robert Earle of Artois, with the third part of the army before him, accompanied with the maſter of the Templers and the Earle of Salisbury, with their followers. Who paſſing the riuer at the aforeſaid foord, ſuddenly aſſailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then abſent in ſolemniſing one of their prophane feaſts) & put them to flight. With which victory the French Earle aboue meaſure incouraged, would needs on forwards, as if hee would himſelfe alone haue carried away the glory of the whole conqueſt. Whom for all that certain of the antient Templers, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than hee, and better conſidering alſo of their owne ability and ſtrength, perſuaded him to content himſelfe with I the honour he had already got, and not to proceed any further in proſecuting of the enemie, vntill the comming of the reſt of the army, eſpecially in that deſperat eſtate of the enemie, wherein he was to win or loſe all. Vnto whom the proud Earle in great deſpight replyed, that he would proſecute his victory, and follow his good fortune; calling them daſtards and cowards, opprobriouſly obiecting vnto them the common fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy land might long ſince haue been againe vnited vnto the body of the Chriſtian common-weale, but for the foule colluſion of the falſe Templers and Hoſpitallers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull ſpeech, the maſter of the Templers not without cauſe moued, anſwered for himſelfe and his fellowes, that he ſhould, when he would and where he durſt, diſplay his enſignes, and he ſhould find them as ready to follow as he was K to goe before them. The Earle of Salisbury alſo willing to ſtint this ſtrife, perſuaded Earle Robert not to be ſo wedded in his owne opinion, but to liſten to the graue and wholſom counſell of the Templers, being men of great experience: and ſo turning vnto the maſter of the Templars began likewiſe with gentle words to pacifie him alſo. But whilſt he was yet ſpeaKing, the Earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him daſtard and coward, and wiſhed that the army were rid of him, and the fearefull cowards his countreymen.
Whereunto the Earle of Salisbury anſwered, Well Generall, on in Gods name, and whereſoeuer you dare ſet your foot, mine ſhall be as far as yours; and I beleeue we go this day, where you ſhall not dare to come nigh my horſes taile; as afterward indeed it proued. How be it the Earle ſo ſaid, for that Earle Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and diſdaine, after their manner L called him and his followers Engliſh tailes.

The proud earle conſtant in his former purpoſe, and not to be otherwiſe perſuaded, ſet forward; and firſt aſſaulted a little towne or caſtle, not far off, called Manſor, wherunto he inconſiderately approching, was notably repulſed; and hauing loſt a number of his men, was as a man diſcouraged, about to haue retired. When ſuddenly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the Earle had thought, ſtirred vp with the noiſe of the alarum, came on with his whole power; and finding the army of the Chriſtians now diuided (as he had long wiſhed) with the multitude of his people incloſed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherin though the Chriſtians right worthily behaued themſelues, for the ſmall number they were, yet oppreſſed with the multitude, and on euery ſide beſet, they were ſlaine down right. Then but all M too late, it repented the Earle of his fooliſh raſhnes, and that he had not harkened vnto better counſel, and ſeeing the Earle of Salisbury valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to fly, ſeeing God as he ſaid fought againſt them. Whereunto the noble Earle anſwered no more, but God forbid that my fathers ſonne ſhould runne away from the face of a Saraſin. The French Earle thin-

A king by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe to haue ſaued his life, flying out of the battell, and taking the riuer of Thaſnes,ouerladed with his armour,was there drowned. The Earle of Salisbury couragiouſly enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully ſlew many a Turke and Saraſin that day, vntill that at length hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe ſo wounded in the legs, as that he was not able longer to ſtand, yet vpon his knees laying about him like a deſperate man,and ſelling his life as deere as he could,was there ſlain,but not vanquiſhed. With him periſhed the whole army,ſo incloſed by the Sultan, that ſcarce any one eſcaped aliue, more than two Templers,one Hoſpitaller,and one common ſouldier, the meſſengers of this heauy newes.

Earle Robert in flying drowned.

The Earle of Salubury valiantly fighting ſlaine.

About the ſame time alſo ſicknes daily increaſing in the French camp,the king purpoſing B to march forward to Caire, ſent a great number of ſicke and weake people downe the riuer of Nilus to Damiata:of whoſe going the Sultan vnderſtanding,cauſed a great number of ſmal boats to be carried in carts by land vnto the riuers ſide,which wel manned,and meeting them by the way,ſet vpon them,and burnt or drowned them euery mothers ſonne, ſauing one only Engliſhman,called Alexander Giffard,who wounded in fiue places of his body,eſcaped yet into the French camp,reporting there what had hapned vnto the reſt.

Now had the Sultan alſo got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernor of Caire and the King, for the betraying of the city:and thereupon had cauſed him to be ſuddenly apprehended and put in ſafe keeping,vntill he were at better leaſure to vnderſtand farther of the matter:which no leſſe troubled the French King,than did the former misfortune;al his hope C for the yeelding vp of the city,being therby cut off:thus his hopes together with his ſtrength daily decreaſing,he would haue gladly accepted of the conditions which he before refuſed, which the Sultan,now growne very ſtrong, would by no meanes heare of,but in ſtead thereof, by way of deriſion ſent to know of him,what was become of all his mattockes, forkes, rakes, ſyths,plows, and harrows,which he had brought ouer with him? and why he ſet them not to work,but ſuffred them like an euil husband to rot and ruſt beſide him? All which with much more,the good king was glad to put vp:for now his forces greatly diminiſhed,as wel by ſickneſſe,as by the former loſſes,finding himſelfe far to weake, he would fain haue retired backe again to Damiata:which the Sultan foreſeeing,got ſo betwixt him and home,that now there was no remedy,but either to fight it out,or yeeld. The king himſelfe had bin often before D intreated by his nobility, whilſt the riuer was yet vnpoſſeſſed by the enemy, to haue conueyed himſelfe by water to Damiata,for that in the ſafety of his perſon conſiſted(as they ſaid)the ſafety of his kingdom, whatſoeuer became of them:whereunto he could neuer be perſuaded, ſaying,that he would neuer forſake his people,becauſe he would not be forſaken of them,but was reſolued to indure with them whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe God to lay vpon him : ſo paſſing the riuer by the ſame foord wherby his brother had not long before vnfortunatly paſſed, and comming to the place where the battell was fought, he might ſee the dead bodies of the Chriſtians pitifully mangled,with their heads & hands cut off:for the Sultan,the more to incourage his ſoldiers,had before the battell proclaimed,that whoſoeuer ſhould bring him the head or hand of a Chriſtian,ſhould haue a great reward for his labor;in hope wherof,they had E ſo diſmembred them. But long he had not there ſtaid, but that the Sultan began ſuddenly to appeare,with a moſt huge great army,as if he would euen with the ſight thereof haue diſcouraged the Chriſtians:againſt whom for al that,the French men in good order oppoſed themſelues,and for the ſpace of 3 houres made great reſiſtance:but what could one do againſt ten, & he alſo fainting for ſicknes & food? the hard plight wherin the greateſt part of the French army then was. In concluſion, oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies,and no way left to flie,they were all ouerthrowne and ſlain,except ſome few,ſaued in hope of great ranſome.
The king himſelfe,with his two brethren, Alphonſus and Charles,and ſome few others,were taken priſoners,and brought vnto the Sultan: who demanding of him,what had moued him ſo to make war againſt him? was anſwered by the King,that it was for religion,and the defence F of the name of his God. In this vnfortunat battel,fought the 5. of Aprill,in the yere 1250, beſides the common ſoldiers, were ſlain moſt of the nobility of France,& all their tents taken.

The Gouernour of Caire apprehended.

The Sultan preſently vpon this ouerthrow,ſent of his owne ſouldiers the like number that the French were of,with French enſignes, and diſguiſed in the attire of the ſlain Frenchmen, to Damiata,where the Duke of Burgondy,the French Queene,and the Popes Legate lay; in hope

hope to haue bin ſo let in for frenchmen:but they were not ſo wel masked,but that they were G by them of the city diſcouered for enemies, and ſo kept out and deceiued of their purpoſe.

The Chriſtians thus ouerthrown, and the French King taken priſoner, Melech-ſala the Sultan taking compaſſion vpon him,and yet minding of his life to make his own gain;cheering him vp with comfortable ſpeeches, began to talk with him of his deliuerance, and of a good attonement to be made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were,That the King ſhould forthwith deliuer again vnto him the city of Damiata,and more-ouer pay vnto him for the ranſome of himſelfe and his, and for the charges of the war, eight thouſand pound of gold:That all priſoners ſhould on both ſides be frankly ſet at liberty,and ſo a peace to be taken for ten yeres:for the more aſſurance whereof, the Sultan offred to ſwear, That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mahomet: requiring alſo of the H king to ſweare,If he failed in any thing that he had promiſed,to deny his Chriſt to be God: which prophane oath the King deteſting,and wiſhing rather to die than to giue the ſame,the Sultan wondring at his conſtancy, tooke his word without any oath at all, and ſo publiſhed the league. But whilſt they were comming together to Damiata,Melech-ſala now in the pride of this victory,fearing nothing leſſe than the ſudden change of fortune,or the miſchief hanging ouer his head,was in the preſence of a number of his noblemen ſuddenly ſlain by two deſ-perat Mamulukes; and one Turquiminus a ſturdy ſlaue of their owne order and vocation (by whoſe procurement it was ſuppoſed to haue beene done) by the conſent of the whole armie created Sultan in his ſtead: who reuoking the league before concluded by Melech-ſala, made another in his owne name with the King,much vpon the ſame conditions that the other was; I which after he had receiued Damiata,he cauſed openly to be proclaimed. Neuertheles after that King Lewis had payed his ranſome, and was with the remnant of his army by the Genowaies tranſported from Damiata to Ptolemais, the falſe miſcreant performed not the half of that he had promiſed,of twelue thouſand Chriſtian captiues that ſhould haue beene ſet free, ſcarce inlarging foure thouſand; and killing all the ſicke ſouldiers whom by his promiſe hee ought to haue relieued,neither ſuffering any Chriſtian to cary any of his goods with him out of Ægypt,which by the league he ought to haue done alſo.

The French King comming to Ptolemais, and purpoſing to haue returned home, was in-treated by the maſter of the Templars and Hoſpitalers,and other the nobility of the Chriſti-ans, to ſtay, which he did almoſt by the ſpace of foure yeres: in which time he repaired the K cities of Cæſarea and Ioppe, and fortified many ſtrong places for the defence of the Chriſtians againſt the infidels:and ſo commending the protection thereof vnto the Knights of the ſacred war,and ſending his brethren away before him, followed after himſelfe,greatly lamented for by all the Chriſtians in Syria,and ſo arriued in France the ſixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and vnfortunat expedition of Lewis the French King,wherin as ſome write,were eighty thouſand Chriſtians loſt:howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their loſſe,report,of two and thirty thouſand French,ſix thouſand to haue returned againe into France. The City of Damiata in the ſpace of a few yeares twice woon,and twice loſt by the Chriſtians, was ſhortly after the deliuering vp therof,by the Sultan raſed down to the ground, becauſe it ſhould no more ſerue the Chriſtians for an entrance L into his kingdome.

The beginning of the Mamalukes and their kingdome.

The late Ægyptian Sultans thus oftentimes inuaded by the Chriſtian princes,& repoſing no great aſſurance in the prowes of the effœminate Ægyptians, a people fitter for merchandize and other baſe occupations than for chiualry and war,had for the ſtrengthening of their kingdome,bought an infinite number of ſlaues,eſpecially of the poore and hardy Circaſſians, called in antient time Geta & Zinchi,neer to Cholchis & the Euxine ſea,brought vnto Alexandria and other ports of Ægypt out of thoſe bare cold countries, by Merchants, and from thence tranſported to Caire & other cities of Ægypt:of which poore ſlaues, the late Ægyp-tian Sultans taking their choice,& culling out from the reſt ſuch as were like to bee of greateſt ſpirit & ability of body,deliuered them vnto moſt skilful and expert teachers;by whom M they were carefully taught to run,to leap,to vaut,to ſhoot,to ride,with all other feats of acti-uity,and withall cunningly to handle all manner of weapons,as wel on horſeback as on foot, and ſo inſtructed,and become cunning, were taken out of their ſchooles into pay, and inrolled together as the Sultans choice horſemen, and commonly called by the name of Mama-

A lukes:in whoſe good ſeruice the late Sultans finding great vſe,ſpared for no coſt,both for their maintenance and increaſing of their number; daily erecting new nurſeries ſtored with yong frie,which growing vp and ready, was ſtill ioined to the other. It is wonderfull to tell, vnto what a ſtrength and glory this order of the Mamalukes was in ſhort time growne by the care of the Ægyptian Kings:by them they mannaged their greateſt affaires, eſpecially in time of wars;and by their valor,not only defended their countrey,but gained many a faire victorie a-gainſt their enemies,as they did now againſt the French:but as too much power in ſuch mens hands,ſeldome or neuer wanteth danger,ſo fel it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech ſala, and thoſe maſterfull Mamaluke ſlaues;who proud of their preferment, and forgetful of their duty,and ſeeing the greateſt ſtrength of the kingdom in their hands,traiterouſly ſlew Melech- B ſala their chiefe founder, ſetting vp in his place (as aforeſaid) one Turquiminus, a baſe ſlaue, one of their owne order and ſeruile vocation,but indeed otherwiſe a man of a great ſpirit and valour. This Melech ſala murthered by the Mamalukes,was the laſt of the free borne kings of Ægypt;in whom the Turks kingdome in Ægypt, erected by Saracon and the great Sultan Sa- ladin(as is before ſaid)and in his ſtock and family euer ſince continued,took end,as did alſo al the power of the Turks in that great & rich kingdome. For the proud Mamalukes hauing now got the ſoueraigntie into their hands,& exalted a Sultan out of themſelues,imperiouſly commanded as great Lords ouer the reſt of the people, not ſuffering them to haue the vſe either of horſe or armor, or to beare any ſway in the common-weale: but keeping them vnder with moſt heauy impoſitions,and ſtill preferring their owne ſlaues(wherwith the countrey of C Ægypt now ſwarmed)made the natural countrey people,of all others moſt miſerable,not daring to meddle with any thing more than Merchandiſe,their Husbandry, or other their baſe mechanicall occupations:whereof the greateſt profit ſtill came vnto the Mamalukes,who as Lords of all,with great inſolency, at their pleaſure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan,they ſtill choſe him from among themſelues, not ſuffering any the Sultans children to ſucceed their fathers in the kingdome; for feare leſt they in the proceſſe of time, proud of their anceſtors and parentage,ſhould reckon of them as of his ſlaues(as indeed they were)and ſo at length bring in another more free kind of gouernment.

The ruin of the Turks kingdom in Ægypt.

Againſt which they prouided alſo,not only by this reſtraint of their Sultans children,but of their own alſo:taking order and eſtabliſhing it as an immutable law, That though the ſons D of the Mamalukes might enioy their fathers lands, and wealth after their death, yet that it ſhould not be lawfull for them in any caſe to take vpon them the name or honor of a Mama-luke: ſo debarring them from all gouernment in the common wealth, to the intent it might ſtill reſt with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahometane parenrs (which could not be ſlaues)or of the race of the Iews,to be admitted into that order;but only ſuch as being borne Chriſtians and become ſlaues,had from the time of their captiuity been inſtructed in the Mahometane ſuperſtition;or elſe being men growne, and comming thither, had abiured the Chriſtian Religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right ſtrange it is to conſider,vnto what honour and glory this ſlauiſh empire in ſhort time grew: many of theſe poore ſlaues by rare fortune or ſecret diuine power, exalted out of the duſt to E the higheſt degree of honor, prouing moſt excellent and renowned Princes, of ſuch ſtrength and power, as was dreadfull euen to the greateſt Princes of the world. In which great glory, this ſeruile empire (to the worlds wonder) flouriſhed from this time among the greateſt by the ſpace of 267 yeares; vntill that hauing run the appointed race,it was with a great deſtruction by Selymus the victorious Emperor of the Turks,ouerthrown in the yeare 1517,and the kingdome of Ægypt,with all Syria and the land of Paleſtine,brought into the forme of prouinces,vnited vnto the Turks empire,as they are at this day,and as in the courſe of this hiſtory ſhall in due time and place(God willing)at large appeare.

But leauing the kingdome of the Turks thus ouerthrowne in Ægypt, and the Mamalukes there triumphing,the French King returned into France,& the Chriſtians in peace in Syria; F let vs againe returne into the leſſer Aſia, and vnto the imperiall City of Conſtantinople, whether the affaires both of the Turkes and of the Chriſtians now call vs. All this while the Greeke Empire (for ſo the Greekes will haue it called) flouriſhed both in peace and plenty in the leſſer Aſia, vnder their Emperour Iohn Batazes: the power of the Latines in the meane time declining as faſt at Conſtantinople, vnder the gouernment of the Latine Emperour Baldwin the ſecond. As for the Turks whom we left grieuouſly troubled both with famine and the often incurſions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet alſo, enough and more than enough to do to withſtand the ſame enemy. At length it fortuned that Iohn Ducas the Greeke Emperor died, being at the time of his death about threeſcore yeares old, whereof he had happily reigned three and thirty: by whoſe good and diſcreet gouernment, the Greeke empire before brought low and almoſt to nought by the Latines, began againe to gather ſtrength and to flouriſh both in Aſia and ſome little part of Europ alſo. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpoſe I could willingly paſſe ouer, were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them ſtaid a while by the way.

The Emperor in loue with Marceſina.

This noble and famous Emperour hauing long lamented the death of the faire Empreſſe Irene his firſt wife, at laſt married another young Lady, the ſiſter of Manfred King of Sicilie, called Anne, with whom amongſt other honourable and beautifull dames, ſent by the King her brother for the acompanying of her to Conſtantinople, was one Marceſina, a rare paragon, of ſuch a feature as if nature had in her meant to beſtow her greateſt skil. From whoſe mouth alwaies flowed a fountaine of moſt ſugred words, and out of her eyes iſſued (as it were) nets to intangle the amorous in: vpon this ſo faire an obiect, the Emperor not fearing further harme, took pleaſure oftentimes to feed his eyes, vntill that at length caught with her looks, he had loſt his liberty, and was of a great Emperor cocome her thrall, in ſuch ſort, as that in compariſon of her he ſeemed little or nothing to regard the yong Empreſſe his wife; but ſo far doated vpon her, that he ſuffered her to be attired and honored with the ſame attire and honour that the Empreſſe was her ſelfe; whom ſhe now ſo far exceeded both in grace and fauour with the Emperor, and honor of the people, as that ſhe almoſt alone enioyed the ſame, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whilſt ſhe thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that ſhe in all her glory, attended vpon with moſt of the gallants of the court, and ſome of the Emperors guard, would needs go (whether for her deuotion or for her recreation, I know not) to viſit the monaſtery and fair church, which Blemmydes (a noble man of great renowne, both for his integrity of life, and learning) had of his own coſt and charges but lately built in the country, where he together with his monks, as men weary of the world, liued a deuout and ſolitary contemplatiue life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life & profound learning choſen Patriarch of Conſtantinople: which great honor, next to the Emperor himſelfe, he refuſed, contenting himſelfe with his cel. Marceſina comming thither in great pomp, and thinking to haue entred the church, had the doores ſhut againſt her by the Monks, before commanded ſo to do by Blemmydes their founder: and ſo was to her great diſgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impiety, to ſuffer that ſo wicked and ſhameleſſe a woman, againſt whom he had moſt ſharply both ſpoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet to tread vpon the ſacred pauement of his church. She inraged with this indignitie, hardly by ſo proud a woman to be with patience diſgeſted, and prickt forward by her flattering followers alſo, returning to the court, grieuouſly complained thereof vnto the emperor, ſtirring him vp by all means ſhe could to auenge the ſame, perſuading him to haue bin therein himſelfe diſgraced. Whereunto alſo were ioyned the hard ſpeeches of her pickthanke fauorites, who to curry fauor, ſpared not as it were to put oyle vnto the fire, for the ſtirring vp of the Emperor to reuenge. Who with ſo great a complaint nothing moued to wrath, but ſtruck as it were to the heart with a remorſe of conſcience, and oppreſſed with heauineſſe, with tears running down his cheeks, and fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid, Why prouoke you me to puniſh ſo deuout and iuſt a man? Whereas if I would my ſelfe haue liued without reproch and infamy, I ſhould haue kept my imperiall maieſty vnpolluted or ſtained. But now ſith I my ſelfe haue been the cauſe both of mine owne diſgrace, and of empires; I may thanke mine owne deſerts, it of ſuch euill ſeed as I haue ſowne, I now reap alſo an euill harueſt.

Marceſina the Emperors concubine ſhut out of the Church.

Theodorus Laſca is choſen Emperor.

After the death of this good Emperour, Theodorus his ſonne, borne the firſt yeare of his fathers reigne, being then about three and thirty yeares old, was by the generall conſent of the people ſaluted Emperor in his ſtead: who in the beginning af his empire renewed the league which his father had made with Iathatines the Turkiſh Sultan: & ſo hauing prouided for the ſecurity of his affairs in Aſia, he with a puiſſant army paſſed ouer the ſtreit of Helleſpontus, into Europe, to appeaſe the troubles there raiſed in Macedonia and Thracia, by the King of

A of Bulgaria his brother in law, and Michael Angelus the Deſpot of Theſſalia; who vpon the death of the old Emperor began to ſpoile thoſe countries,not without hope at length to haue joyned them vnto their own: by whoſe comming they were for all that diſappointed of their purpoſe,and glad to ſue to him for peace. But whileſt he was there buſied, he was aduertiſed by letters from Nice,that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left their gouernor in his abſence, was ſecretly fled vnto the Turks:with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cauſe of whoſe flight, as Paleologus himſelfe gaue it out,was, for that he perceiued himſelfe diuers waies by many his enemies brought into diſgrace,and the Emperors eares ſo filled with their odious complaints, ſo cunningly framed againſt him, as that they were not eaſily or in ſhort time to be refelled: and therfore fearing in the Emperors heauy diſpleaſure to be ſuddenly B taken away, to haue willingly gone into exile, if ſo happily he might ſaue his life from the malice of them that ſought after it.

At his comming to Iconium,he found Iathatines the Sultan making great preparation againſt the Tartars; who hauing driuen the Turks out of Perſia and other the far Eaſterne countries, (as is before declared) and running ſtill on,did with their continuall incurſions ſpoile a great part of their territories in the leſſer Aſia alſo; and now lay at Axara, a towne not far off from Iconium:againſt whom the Sultan now making the greateſt preparation he could,gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthy captain,commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes, whom he had retained to ſerue him in thoſe wars,as he had others of the Latines, vnder the conduct of Boniface Moline a Nobleman C of Venice: and ſo hauing put all things in readineſſe, and ſtrengthned with theſe forrein ſupplies of the Greekes and Latines,ſet forward againſt his enemies the Tartars: who at the firſt ſight of the ſtrange enſignes and ſoldiers were much diſmaied,fearing ſome greater force had bin come to the aid of the Turks;neuertheleſſe,joining with them in battel,had with them at the firſt a moſt terrible and bloudy conflict, wherein that part of the army that ſtood againſt Paleologus and his Greeks,was put to the worſe,to the great diſcomfiture of the Tartars,being euen vpon the point to haue fled,had not one of the greateſt Commanders in the Turks army, and a nigh kinſman of the Sultans,for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan,with all his regiment,in the heat of the battell reuolted vnto the Tartars:whereby the fortune of the battel was in a moment as it were quite altred, they which but now were about to haue fled,fighting D like lyons;and they that were victors now glad to turne their backs & fly:in which flight a great number of the Turks fell, the fierce Tartars moſt eagerly purſuing them. Paleologus, with the Generall of the Turks, hardly chaſed by the Tartars, and glad euery houre to make a ſtand,and to fight for their liues,with much adoe, after many daies flight recouered a caſtle of the Generals, neere vnto Caſtamona,and ſo ſaued themſelues. The Tartars after this ſo great a victory (wherein they had broken the whole ſtrength of the Turks,and brought in hazard the whole ſtate of their kingdome)without reſiſtance forraged all the countries and prouinces ſubject vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, making ſpoile of whatſoeuer they light vpon: inſomuch that the Sultan diſcouraged, and hauing now no ſtrength left to oppoſe againſt them, fled vnto the Greeke Emperor Theodorus for aid;who moſt honourably entertained him, with E all his traine, and comforted him with ſuch ſmall aid as he thought good then to ſpare him:
which for his more ſafety he ſent home with him, vnder the leading of Iſaacius Ducas, ſyrnamed Murtzufle,a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindneſſe, the Sultan gaue vnto the Emperor the city of Laodicea, whereinto he preſently put a ſtrong garriſon: neuertheleſſe, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greeks. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himſelfe ſtil too weak to withſtand the continuall inuaſions of the Tartars, and weary of the harmes he dayly ſuſtained, by the aduice of his chiefe counſellors made a league with them,yeelding to pay them a certaine yerely tribute,thereby to redeeme his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their tributaries and vaſſals.

F Not long after this, Michael Paleologus was by the Emperors kind and gratious letters called home;with his faithfull promiſe alſo before giuen for his ſecurity: who before his return bound himſelfe alſo by ſolemne oath, to be vnto the Emperour and his ſonne alwaies loyall, and from thenceforth neuer to ſeeke after the Empire, or giue cauſe of new ſuſpect for ſuch matters as he had beene before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the Emperour, his ſon,or other his ſucceſſors in the Empire, his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which G conditions he was again made great Conſtable,and ſo receiued into the Emperors fauor, and liued the reſt of his reign in great honor and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Greek emperor.

Enuy in Court.

Now Theodorus the Emperor hauing reigned 3 years,fell ſick and died,leauing behind him his ſon Iohn,then but a child of 6 years old,to ſucceed him in his empire : whom he vpon his death bed,together with the empire,commended to Arſenius the Patriark,and one George Muzalo his faithfull counſellor,as to his truſty tutors,to ſee him ſafely brought vp,and the Empire well and peaceably gouerned. This Muzalo was a man of mean parentage,but for his familiar acquaintance and ciuil behauior,of a child brought vp in the court with the Emperor as his play-fellow:with whom he growing vp,ſo framed himſelfe to his maners and diſpoſition,that he alone was to him in ſtead of all, ſtill at hand, ready to ſay or do whatſoeuer might H be gratious or pleaſing to the Emperor. And the elder they grew,ſo increaſed this their mutual affection and loue : in ſuch ſort,that with him now Emperor,he was of all others in greateſt fauor & authority,a wary obſeruer of his delights, a ready miniſter of his affairs,& faithful partaker of his ſecrets : for which he was in ſhort time promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the court,and honorably maried to one of the Emperors nigh kinſwomen ; and now at his death,by his laſt will,with the reuerend Patriark appointed tutor to the yong emperour and his two yong ſiſters. And for more aſſurance therof,a ſolemn oath of obedience to the yong Prince as emperor and vnto them as his tutors,was exacted of all ſorts of men,both high and low,of what condition ſoeuer;and that not once,but firſt a little before the Emperours death, and again after he was now dead:for many of the nobilitie honorably deſcended, ſeeing the I ſudden change of Muzalo's fortune, amongſt themſelues murmured thereat,as grieuing at his preferment,ſeeing there were many among them,to whom both the tuition of the yong Emperor and adminiſtration of the empire of better right appertained , ſeeing they were both neerer of kin to the Emperor,and fitter (as they thought) for ſo great a charge than was Muzalo,whom(as they ſaid)they had many cauſes both to contemn and hate : for, beſide that he was not honorably born,and had ſerued the late emperor Theodore as the miniſter of his wrath againſt ſome of the nobility (cauſes ſufficient for the peoples hatred) if he ſhould now alſo in ſo great authoritie affect the empire,it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted,that he would not ſpare to commit any maner of villany for the effecting of his inordinat deſire. Of all which Muzalo was not ignorant,a man at all other times of a moſt quick apprehenſion for K ſuch matters, but as then eſpecially, his wits being awaked with theſe ſo great motiues and dangers. Wherfore ſpeedily calling together all the nobility into the court,hee welcommed them one by one,and curteouſly diſcourſing with them, offred to diſcharge himſelfe both of the adminiſtration of the Empire, and tuition of the yong Emperor, & willingly to yeeld the ſame to any one of them,whom the reſt ſhould think fitteſt for ſo great a charge. Which although they all with one conſent as it were refuſed, ſaying, That hee of all others was to bee preferred,vnto whom the Emperor,lord both of the empire and the child,had committed the ſame:yet Muzalo erneſtly requeſted the contrary,and ſtifly withſtood their deſire,wiſhing indeed rather to haue led a quiet priuat life in ſecuritie,than to haue bin ſo ouercharged;not ſo much for doubt of the enuy then ariſing,as for fear of ſome great danger therof to enſue. But L would he,would he not,remedy there was none,but that as the late emperor had appointed,ſo muſt he take the charge vpon him. And now was euery one,as well the nobility as the inferior ſort,again with greater ſolemnity than before,the third time ſworne,to their vtmoſt power to defend the yong emperor in his empire,and Muzalo in the tuition of him, and adminiſtration of the affairs of ſtate, and faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience : which if they ſhould fail religiouſly to perform,they wiſhed to themſelues euery man,and to all theirs,a ſhamefull end and deſtruction. Yet notwithſtanding all this ſolemn ſwearing, mixt moſt times with much forſwearing,there was not fully 9 daies paſt, but that certain of the chief nobility,forgetfull or els careleſſe of their Oath, and full of enuy, ſeldom ſatisfied but with bloud, conſpired the vnworthy death of Muzalo the Protector both of the Emperor M and the Empire. The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the Emperor was now come ; at which time were met together at Soſandra (an Abbey by himſelfe built in the honor of the Virgin Mary at Magneſia) many great Ladies and graue Matrons, to mourne as the manner was ; all the great Princes of the Nobility,and among them the conſpirators alſo : thither re-

A paired alſo a number of ſoldiers prepared for the ſlaughter, with an infinit number of the common people, as at ſuch ſolemnities is vſuall. But what needs many words? whileſt the Hymns were yet in ſinging,and the obſequies performing,the ſouldiers as before inſtructed, ſuddenly breaking into the Church with their drawn ſwords in their hands,ſlew Muzalo (then fled to the altar for refuge) with his two brethren Andronicus & Theodorus,both men of great account,and diuers others appointed for the ſlaughter. So the matrons & the reſt of the multitude breaking off their mourning,and for fear thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as faſt as they could,ſome one way,ſome another,as they thought for their beſt ſafety. But the Prieſts and Monks thinking to haue done the like, were by the imperious ſouldiers again inforced into the church; where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with great force B and violence,and ſcarſe able to ſtand by reaſon of the ſlipperines of the bloud there ſhed vpon the pauement,they in great fear made an end of thoſe bloudy obſequies. This outrage appeaſed, Arſenius the Patriarch and only Tutor of the yong Emperour now left,was therewith yet much troubled,as with a thing dangerous both to the perſon of the yong Prince,& peace of the ſtate: but what good courſe to take therein he could not tell; for as hee was a man for his learning and integritie of life not inferior to the beſt,ſo in matters of ſtate he was as far to ſeek. As it commonly hapneth,the contemplatiue man buried in his meditations,to be vnfit for temporall gouernment: wheras he that ſhould perform both, muſt to his rare vertues and great learning join a ciuill conuerſation,with great experience in worldly affairs,not to bee learned but by great and long practiſe. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wiſhing C all wel) calling together the nobility,conſulted with them what were beſt to be done for the gouernment both of the yong Emperor and the empire, now that Muzalo was dead:not conſidering in the mean time,who they were with whom he conſulted,or,That counſell grounded vpon no wiſe foreſight or approued experience, was more dangerous to him whom he would haue prouided for,than all the enemies murthering ſwords,as ſhortly after appeared.

Muzalo traiterouſly murdered in the Church.

Among others of the nobility called to councel,was Michael Paleologus (of whom we haue before ſpoken) much ſuperior to the reſt,as deſcended from the Imperiall houſe of the Comneni, a man of a cheerfull countenance, gratious and curteous,and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall,wherby he eaſily won the hearts of all men in generall, but eſpecially of the Colenels,Captains,and other martial men commanders in the army:of whoſe aſpiring to the D empire,many preſages and common rumors (not alwaies vain) had formerly paſſed alſo, to the moouing of many; yea the Patriark himſelfe,not conſidering his hauty and aſpiring nature,made no leſſe account of him than did the reſt, but vpon an eſpecial fauor,committed to his only truſt the keys of the common treaſure,at ſuch time as mony was to be deliuered out for paiment of the armies,or other like great occaſions of the ſtate;the moſt effectual meanes for the furtherance of his ſecret practiſes,and the readieſt way to effect that which hee had ſo long before plotted: for hauing in his fingring ſuch a maſſe of treaſure,as he might wel haue wiſhed,but neuer reaſonably hoped for,he poured it out as it were by buſhels,among the nobilitie and martial men,and ſuch others as he thought were able to do moſt with the people; amongſt whom were many of the Clergy alſo. Of which his fauorits were made many meetings, E and by them was the Patriarch continually ſolicited,but yet in general terms, without delay (according to the neceſſitie of the time) to take order for the good gouernment of the ſtate,which now as a great ſhip in the midſt of the ſea without a maſter,was (as they ſaid) in danger to periſh,and being once loſt,was not again to be recouered. At which time alſo the name of Paleologus was in euery mans mouth, as the only man for his wiſdom and experience fit to take vpon him the charge and gouernment of the Empire vntil the yong Emperor were come to age. Vnto which common good liking the Patriarch alſo (ſeeing no more, or peraduenture not ſo much as the reſt) gaue his conſent; and ſo without longer ſtay, to the great content both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him Gouernor of the empire, and Tutor to the yong Emperor, wanting nothing now of an Emperor himſelfe,more than the title F and Imperial ornaments. This was the firſt ſtep whereby the aſpiring man (twice before in diſgrace with the two late Emperors, Iohn Ducas and his ſon Theodorus) mounted at laſt to the Empire.

Michael Paleologus aſpireth.

It was not many days after but that his fauorits held another councel,wherein it was alledged, That it was not ſeemly for him that was Tutor vnto the Emperour, Gouernor of the ſtate and empire, and to giue audience vnto the Embaſſadors of forrein Nations, to want the honour G next vnto the Emperor, as well for the magnificence of the ſtate, as for the credit of his place. Whereupon he was both by the Patriarch and the yong Emperor honored with the title of the Deſpot, another ſtep vnto the Empire. But what contentment find the Ambitious euen in the greateſt honours, ſo long as there is one aboue them? Little ſure, or none at all, more than that it ſerueth them to ſtep at next vnto the higheſt: as did this new made Deſpot, who was ſhortly after by certain of the Nobility his great Fauourits, neere vnto Magneſia, with the great applauſe of the people, hoiſed vp and ſaluted Emperor. Whereof Arſenius the Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the yong childe the right heir of the Empire. And firſt he was about to haue excommunicated as well him that was made Emperor, as them that had ſo made him. But afterward changing H his purpoſe, for fear of greater troubles, he thought it better, by ſolemne Oath to binde both him and the reſt, that they ſhould not ſeek after the life of the Child, or by any force or colour go about to depriue him of the Empire; which was ſo done. Yet it was not a ful moneth after, but that euen he that had ſo great a care of the yong child, and ſo prouided for his ſafety, (perſuaded by them of the Nobility and Clergy) with his own hands, and all the accuſtomed ceremonies, ſet the Imperiall Crown vpon this Vſurpers head; yet not as vpon him that ſhould ſtill enjoy the empire, but as vpon a man according to the preſent neceſſity of the time and ſtate, thought fitteſt for ſo great a charge vntill the yong Child came to age; vnto whom then he was to giue place and reſigne the empire. All which being by more ſolemne oath than before confirmed, good news (as the certain ſign of his fortunat gouernment) were I brought vnto him, of a great victory obtained by his captains againſt Michael Angelus deſpot of Ætolia and Epirus; who hauing maried the late Emperors daughter, and hearing of his death, with the troubles in Aſia, aided by the King of Sicily and the Prince of Peloponeſus and Achaia his ſon in law, had thought in that hurly and perturbation of the ſtate, to haue taken to himſelfe the greateſt part of the Emperors Territories in Macedonia and Thracia; and for the ſame purpoſe was with a great Army entred into them, burning and ſpoiling the country before him: wherof Michael Paleologus (then but newly made Deſpot) vnderſtanding, ſent his brother Iohn with ſome other his beſt captains, with a great army againſt him, by whom he with his Complices were put to the worſe, and not without great loſſe inforced to retyre: the joyfull newes whereof he receiued euen as he was crowned. Which was ſhortly K after confirmed by the comming of the great Commanders themſelues, bringing with them the Prince of Peloponeſus and Achaia, by them taken priſoner; who for his ranſome was afterwards glad to giue vnto the Emperor Paleologus, Monembaſia, Main, and Sparta, three of the beſt cities of Peloponeſus: whereinto he put ſtrong gariſons vnder the command of Conſtantinus his brother by the mothers ſide, a right valiant captain: by whoſe good ſeruice, and the commodious ſcituation of the places, hee gained diuers other townes and Cities, and at length the greateſt part of Peloponeſus, out of the hands of the Latines. For the vtter rooting out of whom, he ſhortly after with a great army paſſed ouer into Thracia, with purpoſe (as was thought) to haue beſieged Conſtantinople: but finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was before ſuppoſed, he left that, and laid ſiege to the caſtle of Pera ouer againſt L it on the other ſide of the hauen, in hope by winning of that caſtle to haue become maſter alſo of the towne; where he was notably repulſed, and inforced with loſſe to retyre. So riſing with his army, he fortified diuers caſtles and ſtrong holds in the country about Conſtantinople, and putting into them ſtrong garriſons, charged them with continual incurſions, to trouble the Conſtantinopolitans, and to cut them ſo ſhort (if it were poſſible) as that they ſhould not dare to look out at the gates of their city. Which they ſo well performed, that in ſhort time the Latines in the city were driuen to ſuch extremity, that for want of wood they were fain to burn many of the faireſt houſes in the city, in ſtead of fuel. Which done, he returned again to Nice, the chief ſeat of the Greeke Emperors euer ſince that Conſtantinople was taken by the Latines.

Now reigned in Conſtantinople the Latine Emperor Baldwin the ſecond (as is before declared) M a man of ſmal courage and leſſe power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeks or Latines: who for the maintenance of his ſtate was glad to ſell the publique Ornaments of the City, and to pawn his ſon vnto the Bruges merchants for money; by whom he was

A was left at Venice to be brought vp: which gaue occaſion for ſome writers to report, That he was pawned vnto the Venetians.

Haalō the Tartar ſent with a great Army againſt the Turks.

About this time Mango the great Cham of Tartary, ſtirred by Aitonius the Armenian King, (by whoſe perſuaſion he had alſo receiued the Chriſtian Religion) ſent his brother Haalon with an exceeding great Army againſt the Turks and Saraſins in Syria and the land of Paleſtine. This Haalon (conuerted alſo to the Chriſtian faith by his wife) ſetting forward with a world of people following him, in the ſpace of ſix moneths ouer-ran all Perſia with the countries adjoyning, excepting one ſtrong place in the mountains (which ſome ſay was Samarchand, afterward the royal ſeat of the great terror of the world, the mighty Tamerlane) which beſieged by ten thouſand horſemen by him appointed for that purpoſe, and ſo continued by B the ſpace of ſeuen and twenty years after, was then at length (as Aiton himſelfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, only for want of cloaths to couer their nakedneſſe. Haalon (in whoſe Army thoſe ten thouſand left behind were not miſſing) marching on, and as a violent tempeſt bearing all down before him) entred at length into Aſſyria, and there layd ſiege to the great city of Babylon, then the Seat of the great Calyph; whom all the Mahometane Princes honoured aboue all others, as the true ſucceſſor of their great Prophet Mahomet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their Law as moſt diuine Oracles. Which great City Haalon won, and putting to ſword al he found therin, men, women and children, with the ſpoil therof and the rich treaſures of the Calyph inriched his ſoldiers. The Caliph himſelfe (reſerued for that purpoſe) he commanded to be ſet in the midſt of the infinite Treaſure which C he and his predeceſſors had moſt couetouſly heaped vp together, and that hee ſhould of that gold, ſiluer, and pretious ſtones, take what it pleaſed him to eat; ſaying by way of deriſion, that ſo gainfull a gueſt ſhould be fed with nothing but things of greateſt price, whereof hee willed him to make no ſpare. In which order the couetous wretch kept for certain dayes, miſerably died with hunger in the middeſt of thoſe things whereof he thought he ſhould neuer haue had enough: which though they were in value great, and with care layd together, yet ſerued they him not now to ſuffice nature, beſt contented with a little. Babylon thus ſacked and almoſt raſed, the Tartar marching on thorow Meſopotamia, took the City Rhoais: where Aiton the Armenian King, and author of this the Tartars expedition, came to him with twelue thouſand horſemen and forty thouſand foot, as reporteth Aiton the Armenian D Kings Nephew then there preſent. So entring into Syria, he in few dayes took Aleppo, which Towne hee ſacked and raſed, in the yeare of our Lord 1260: with diuers other ſtrong towns ſomtime belonging vnto the kingdom of Antioch. Then was one Malacneſar Sultan of Damaſco, commanding ouer all Syria and the land of Paleſtine: who terrified with the loſſe of his Cities, and the feare of further danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himſelfe before the Tartar Prince, in hope ſo to haue ſaued to himſelfe ſome good part of his Kingdom: wherin he was much deceiued, being (as ſome ſay) caried away afar off into exile, becauſe he ſhould not hinder the Tartars further proceedings. Or as others report (and haply with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his priſoner, and afterwards to the terror of his ſon, cut in pieces in his ſight vnder the walls of Damaſco, after that it had in vaine E bin twice aſſaulted by the Tartars. Which ſtrong City for all that, hee afterwards tooke by ſtrong hand, and ſacked it, and by the perſuaſion of his Wife, ouerthrew all the Mahometan Temples, as he had before done in euery place where he came. But purpoſing to haue gon on forward to Ieruſalem, and to haue conquered the whole land of Paleſtine, newes was brought him of the death of his brother Mango the great Cham. Whereupon he ſtayd his journy, and returned back again, in hope of that great Empire, hauing in this expedition ſpent almoſt ſix years.

Aleppo raſed by the Tartars.

Damaſco won.

Thus by the Tartars was the Kingdom of the Turks at Damaſco ouerthrown. At which time the broken affairs of the Chriſtians in Syria and the land of Paleſtine might eaſily haue bin repaired, and thoſe two goodly kingdomes againe reſtored vnto the Chriſtian F Commonwealth, had the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt then in time put to their helping hand on the one ſide, as did the Tartars on the other. But they then at fatall diſcord among themſelues, and buſied with their Wars at home, let ſlip that ſo fair an opportunity, the like wherof they ſeldom or neuer had ſince. Haalon the Tartar Prince, in token of his good will towards the Chriſtians and their affairs, at his departure from Damaſco left his ſonne Abiga there with twenty thouſand horſemen to aid them in the Wars, if they ſhould come (as was expected) G for the recouery of the Holy land; who hauing there ſtayd ſome while, and hearing of his fathers troubles at home, followed himſelfe after him; but yet left behind him Guirboca a valiant captain, with ten thouſand of his horſemen, to like purpoſe as his father had him. Who by the inſolencie of certain Chriſtian ſoldiers in garriſon about Sidon, was of a friend, together with his Tartars made a foe. Theſe garriſon ſoldiers hauing by chance ſet in ſome bootie out of the Tartars territory, not only refuſed to reſtore the ſame again, but alſo foulely intreated ſuch as the Tartar had ſent for the demanding therof. Wherupon further quarels ariſing, it fortuned a nephew of Guirboca's, a valiant yong gentleman, to be ſlain: in reuenge wherof he beſieged Sidon, and hauing taken it, ſacked it, and burnt it down to the ground. After which time he and his Tartars became vtter enemies vnto the Chriſtians, doing them all the H harm they could deuiſe.

The Egyptian Sultan inuadeth Syria.

This diſcord betwixt the Tartars and the Chriſtians gaue occaſion to Melech the Egyptian Sultan, now jealous of the Tartars neerneſſe, with a great army of his Mamalukes & others to enter into Syria and to ſpoil the countrey of Damaſco. Againſt whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in ſtrength and number far inferior, went out. But joining battel with him at too much ods, and the victory inclining to that ſide where moſt ſtrength was, he there valiantly fighting was ſlain, with moſt part of his Tartars: ſuch as eſcaped fled into Armenia vnto the friendly King. By this victory, all Syria with the land of Paleſtine, excepting ſome few places holden by the Chriſtians, fel again into the hands of the Egyptian Sultans, as did ſome of them ſhortly after alſo. For Bandocader ſucceeding Melech in the Mamaluke Kingdom, I comming into Syria with a great army, tooke Antioch from the Chriſtians, and with it moſt of the places before by them defended. The city he burnt, and raſed the caſtle down to the ground; and afterward entring into Armenia, did there great harm alſo.

Whilſt the Turks kingdom thus goeth to wrack in Syria, ruinated by the Tartars, but poſſeſſed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the leſſer Aſia, now the whole hope of that Nation, went not at that time much better. For Iathatines the Turks Sultan, there alſo inuaded by the Tartars, and hauing loſt Iconium his regall City, fled with his brother Melech to the Greeke Emperor Michael Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieued for the kindneſſe he had not long before ſhewed him in like caſe, when as he fled from the late Emperor Theodore; wherof now putting him in remembrance, he requeſted him either with ſome conuenient force to aid him K or els to aſſigne him ſome corner in his large Empire, where he might in ſafety reſt, with his wife and children, and other followers, whom with much wealth he had brought with him in great number. The Emperor on euery ſide himſelfe incumbred with wars, thought not good in ſo great newneſſe of his empire to diminiſh his owne forces; and to aſſigne vnto him any place to inhabit, ſeemed no leſſe dangerous: for that he hauing bin a great Prince, and commanding ouer many great Countries, and brought vp in all princely royalty, was not like to content himſelfe with a little: beſides that, his nobility diſperſed by the Tartars, were likely enough to reſort vnto him as vnto their head, ſo ſoon as they ſhould once heare that hee was ſeated in any place: and vnkindely to caſt him off, that had ſo nobly vſed him in like extremitie, the Emperor was loth. And therfore feeding him vp with fair words, and foording him L on from time to time with delayes, he held him a great while as a man in ſuſpence, betweene hope and deſpair. At length in the abſence of the Emperor (though haply not without his priuity) he was commanded with all his train, in number about twelue hundred, to get him to Ænus a city of Thracia ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt: where he much diſcontented, liued like an honorable priſoner at large; but with the watchfull eies of ſo many vpon him, as that hee could by no means, as he deſired, eſcape. In which caſe we will for a while leaue him, to feed vpon his own melancholy thoughts.

1261 Now had Michael Paleologus the emperor reigned at Nice two years, when new troubles began again to ariſe in the Weſt part of his Empire on Europ ſide, by the treachery of Michael Angelus Deſpot of Epirus. For the ſpeedy repreſſing wherof he ſent one Alexius Strategopulus, M a worthy captain, and a man of great nobility (who for his good ſeruice againſt the ſaid Deſpot, he had in the beginning of his reign made Cæſar) with little aboue 800 Bithynian Souldiers, and Commiſſion for the taking vp of ſo many more as he ſhould want for that ſeruice, in Macedonia and Thracia. Commanding him when hee had paſſed the ſtreight with

thoſe

A thoſe ſoldiers, to take his way through the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, to terrifie the Latines whom he was loth to ſuffer too long to liue in reſt and quiet, and to ſtirre too far out of the gates, but to keep them as priſoners coupt vp within the walls of the City. This warlike captain with this handfull of men paſſing ouer Propontis, incamped at Rhegium not farre from Conſtantinople; where by chance lighting vpon certain labouring men, Greeks born in the City, and there dwelling, he diligently inquired of them the ſtate therof, and of what ſtrength the Latines were, with many other things ſuch as he was deſirous to know. Who not onely told him that the ſtrength of the Latins was but ſmall, but alſo that the greateſt part therof was gon to the ſiege of Daphnuſia, a Town not far off, vpon the ſide of the Euxine ſea. And withall (as Greeks euill affected to the gouernment of the Latines, and deſirous of the liber-B ty of their Countrey) offered of themſelues to ſhew him a means how to giue him entrance into the City. Theſe poore men dwelt within the City, cloſe by one of the Gates, neere vnto which place by an old ruinous mine almoſt ſwarued vp, was a ſecret vnſuſpected way into the City, not known to any but to themſelues. By this blinde hole they promiſed him by night to receiue in fifty of his beſt ſoldiers, which ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Watch faſt by, and diſpatching them out of the way, might preſently breake open the gate, and ſo let in the reſt of the Army. Wherunto they promiſed themſelues with their friends to put to their helping hands, aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof. This plot for the betraying of the City thus laid and agreed vpon, Alexius and Caſar well rewarding the men, and filling them with greater promiſes, ſent them away. Who as if they had bin about their countrey work, C were after their wonted maner receiued into the city without ſuſpition at all. And within a few dayes after, according to their promiſe, at an appointed hour receiued in by night the a-foreſaid fifty ſoldiers; who aided by them, preſently ſlew the watch, and brake open the gate, wherby Alexius entring a little before day, in conuenient place put his men in order of battel, and afterward to the greater terror of the Latines, cauſed the city to be ſet on fire in four places, which increaſing with the wind burnt in moſt terrible maner, and was in ſhort time come almoſt to the Emperors palace. Who ſcarſe well awaked, and ſeeing the city all on a fire about his ears, and the enemy comming on, was about at the firſt with thoſe few Latines that he had (for Greeks he had none) to make reſiſtance. But better aduiſed, and perceiuing it to be now to no purpoſe, he (the laſt of the Latine Emperors that euer reigned in Conſtantino-D ple) with Iuſtinian the Latine Patriarch and ſome other of his friends, fled by ſea into Eubœa, and ſo from thence afterwards to Venice, and afterwards to Lewis the French King, in hope to haue bin by him and the Venetians relieued. After whom fled alſo all the reſt of the Latines. Thus the Imperial city of Conſtantinople by great fortune fell again into the hands of the Greekes, in the yeare 1261, after that it had bin in the poſſeſſion of the Latines about 58 years.

The joyfull newes of the recouery of the Imperial City was in ſhort time carried vnto Michael Paleologus the Greeke Emperour at Nice, who at the firſt beleeued it not, as thinking it ſcarſe poſſible, ſo ſtrong a city to haue bin by ſo weak a Power ſurpriſed; whereas he himſelfe not long before was not able with a right puiſſant Army and much other like prouiſion, to E win the Caſtle of Galata ouer againſt it. But afterwards aſſured of the truth therof, with his hands and eyes caſt vp towards heauen gaue moſt hearty thanks vnto God therefore, cauſing Hymns and Pſalms of thankſgiuing to be ſolemnly ſung in euery Church, with all the other ſignes of joy and triumph that could be deuiſed. So ſetting all other things apart, he wholly buſied himſelfe in making preparation for his going vnto Conſtantinople, now once againe the ſeat of the Greek Empire: wherin and in trauelling hauing ſpent many daies, he at length with the Empreſſe his wife, and Andronicus his ſon, then but two years old, as if it had bin in ſolemn proceſſion, on foot entred into the City by the Gate called the Golden Gate; and ſo after prayers and thankſgiuing went to the place prepared for him neere vnto the Tilt-yard: for the other Imperial Palaces of far greater beauty (ſomtime the ſtately dwellings of the F greateſt Emperors of the Greeks) had now of long during the reign of the Latines lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And ſhortly after, becauſe Vertue and true Deſert ſhould not want their due honour, he cauſed the aforeſaid Alexius Caſar (by whoſe means the Citie was recouered) in ſolemn triumph in his robes of honour, with a Crown vpon his head not very much inferior vnto the Imperiall Crowne, with great pomp to bee carried thorowout all the City:

city: and further commanded, that his name for one year next following, in all ſolemn prayers and hymns of thankſgiuing, ſhould be joined with the name of the emperor himſelf. And yet not thinking to haue done him honour enough, cauſed his liuely image afterward to be moſt curiouſly made, & as a trophy to be ſet vpon a fair marble pillar before the great church of the holy Apoſtles, in perpetuall remembrance of him and that he had don for the deliuery of his Country; which ſhortly after ouerthrown by an earthquake, was by his ſon againe reſtored.

Now was this great and famous city, ſomtime the beauty of the world, by theſe ſtrange and fatall mutations wonderfully defaced, and brought to great deſolation. In euery place was to be ſeen great heaps, or rather (to ſay the truth) great hills of rubbiſh, the eternall witneſſes of the ruin therof: the houſes ſtood, ſome quite fallen down, ſome ready to follow after, & ſome other great and ſtately buildings now the ſmall reliques of great fires: for the chiefe beauty therof was before, at ſuch time as the Latins took it, moſt defaced with fire; who all the time they had it, ceaſed not night and day to deſtroy ſome part or other of it, as if they had known they ſhould not long keep it. Neither did this laſt fire, raiſed by the Greeks themſelues to terrifie the Latins, a little deform it: for which cauſe the Emperors chief care now was to clenſe the city, in beſt ſort he could to reform ſo great a confuſion of things, not to be all at once amended: firſt beginning wirh the Churches, which ruinous or ready to fall he repaired: and next to that, filled the empty houſes with new inhabitants. And albeit the chiefe of the Latines were together with the emperor fled and gon, yet was the moſt part of the artificers and tradeſmen in the city, Venetians and them of Piſa mingled together; vnto whom alſo to join the Genoa's, and ſo to fill the city with Latines, he thought it not altogether ſafe, although that by them he reaped great profit: wherfore he aſſigned to them the city of Galatia, now called Pera, on the other ſide of the hauen, for them to inhabit, granting them great priuiledges, and euery of thoſe companies to be gouerned by a Conſul or poteſtate of their own. As for the Imperial city it ſelfe, he ſtored it as neer as he could with natural Greeks born.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperor could himſelfe haue wiſhed, yet could he not reſt ſo contented, for fear leſt thoſe which now did eat their own hearts, and with great griefe ſmouldred their anger, ſhould at length as the rightfull heires of the Empire by him vſurped, break out into open force, and ſo breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps work his confuſion. For ſuch is the tormenting ſtate of vſurping Tyrants, neuer to thinke themſelues ſafe ſo long as any one liueth whom they may ſuſpect. Wherfore at once to rid himſelfe of this feare, he thought it beſt ſo to diſpoſe of the children of the late Emperour Theodorus Laſcaris, as that he ſhould not need of them to ſtand in doubt. To take them out of the way, beſides that it was a thing odious, he ſaw it likewiſe to be vnto him dangerous; Mary and Theodora (two of the eldeſt daughters) being before by their father maried to two great Princes (the Deſpot of Epirus and the Prince of Bulgaria) with whom he had before much to do, and of them yet ſtood in ſome doubt; but theſe were ſafe enough out of his reach. Other two yonger ſiſters there were in his cuſtody, Theodora and Irene, with their brother Iohn, the onely heir of the Empire: Theodora he maried to one Belicurt a gentleman of Peloponeſus; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of Genoa: both Latines, men of no great birth or power, ſuch as he needed not to ſtand in doubt of. Theſe two Ladies, the daughters of ſo great an Emperour as was Theodor, thus baſely beſtowed; there remained only their brother Iohn ſole heir of the empire, then but ten years old, whom Paleologus long before, euen in the beginning of his reigne, had ſent vnto Magneſia, there to be ſafely kept far off from the court, for fear leſt in his right and quarrell ſome diſcontented perſons deſirous of innouation, ſhould now begin ſome new ſtirs which might bee dangerous vnto his eſtate. Which indignitie done vnto the yong Prince, Arſenius the Patriarch (put in truſt by his father for the bringing of him vp) took in ſo euil part, that he forſook the Court with all his Eccleſiaſticall dignity, and as a man weary of the world, retyred himſelfe vnto a little Monaſtery of Paſcaſius in the country, there to ſpend the remainder of his dayes. From whence for all that, he was after the taking of Conſtantinople from the Latines, almoſt againſt his will drawn thither by Paleologus the Emperor, and made Patriarch therof, there together with ſo great an honour to find his greater diſcontent. For Paleologus the Vſurper, altogether vnmindfull of his faith ſo ſolemnly before giuen for the ſafety and preſeruation of the yong Prince, and the reſtoring vnto him of his Empire; and now

Paleologus cauſeth the yong Emperors eys to be put out.

now fully reſolued to eſtabliſh to him and his poſteritie the ſoueraignty of ſo great an Empire, howſoeuer it was got, cauſed the yong Princes eyes moſt cruelly to be put out: the vſual practiſe of the Tyrants of the Eaſt vpon ſuch as they are loth or feare to kill, and yet would make them vnfit for gouernment. Of which barbarous cruelty his ſiſter Theodora (maried to Conſtantinus Prince of Bulgaria) hearing, ceaſed not with tears and prayers, and all other Womanly perſuaſions, to ſtir vp her husband in reuenge thereof. Whereunto alſo Iathatines the Turks Sultan gaue no ſmall furtherance; who weary of exile, and to be ſo into a corner confined as into a priſon from whence he might not ſtart; by ſecret meſſengers intreated the Bulgarian Prince to make war vpon the vſurping Emperor: promiſing him a great ſum of mony, if by his help he might recouer his former libertie. Wherwith he the rather moued, with a B great power of his own, and aboue twenty thouſand Tartars which then lay by the riuer Iſter, ſuddenly brake into the Emperours territories, and in ſhorter time than was to haue beene thought, ouer-ran all the Countrey of Thracia, euen vnto the ſea ſide, leauing neither man nor beaſt in all the Countrey as hee went: in good hope alſo to haue by the way ſurpriſed the Emperor himſelfe, euen then returning from his Wars againſt the Deſpot in Theſſaly. Who hearing of his ſpeedy comming, beeing got vnto the ſea ſide, and hauing no way left to haue eſcaped by land) ſhipped himſelfe into a Galley of the Latines, which with another her conſort bound for Conſtantinople, by good hap put in there for to water, and ſo within two days after arriued in ſafety at the Imperiall City. Thus diſappointed of the Emperour, all his care was for the deliuery of the Turks Sultan. Wherfore marching in haſt to Ænum, he ſo C terrified the Citiſens with his comming, that they without further delay deliuered him into his hands, that they might therby redeem their owne peace. In his returne you might haue ſeen the Souldiers, eſpecially the Tartars, driuing before them infinit numbers both of men and Cattel, in ſuch ſort as that in the open Countrey of Thrace for a ſpace was hardly to bee ſeen either Countryman or beaſt, it was ſo clean ſwept both of inhabitants and likewiſe of Cattell.

Iathatines dieth:

Iathatines the Sultan by the Tartars caried ouer Iſter, and ſo by them ſet at liberty, ſhortly after died. In whoſe kingdom ſucceeded not his ſon Melick (as ſome write) but two others (as the Turks themſelues report) the one called Meſoot, the ſon of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades the ſon of Feramcine, born alſo of the Selzuccian Family, as were all the other D Turks Sultans; but how neer in bloud they were vnto the late Sultan Iathatines they make no mention. Betwixt which two as his Vaſſals, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (by whom they were ſo preferred) for the paiment of a yearly tribute diuided the Turks Kingdom; apportioning vnto Meſoot the Cities of Amida, in antient time called Amiſus, and Aminſus, in Galatia; Melatia, otherwiſe called Meletine, in the leſſer Armenia; Siuaſte, in antient time Sebaſtia, and Harbarie, before Satabria, both in Cappadocia, with all the Countrey about them. And vnto Kei-Cubades, Iconium the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all Rumilia Aſiatica, or the Countries of the leſſer Aſia alongſt the ſea Coaſt: Which theſe two Princes held as the Tartars Tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill ſuch time as he was by the ſame Tartars again expulſed. So that the Turks kingdom, which E had of long time formerly flouriſhed in the Selzuccian Family, in Perſia, Syria, Paleſtine, and Ægypt, were quite ouerthrown by the Mamalukes and the Tartars (as is before declared) and now brought vnder foot in the leſſer Aſia likewiſe, where only reſted all the hope of that Nation, was now at a low ebbe, diuided betwixt two weak Princes reigning but at the deuotion of the Tartar Chan. In which confuſion of the Turkiſh Empire, ſo rent, not only diuers men of great power and authority mongſt them, ſhared vnto themſelues, ſome one corner of the declining kingdome, and ſome another; but many of the obſcure and baſeſt people alſo, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the ſtrait paſſages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incurſions, did much harme in the countries of the Chriſtians ioyning vpon them: which was no great matter for them to doe, the F garriſons which were wont to defend the ſame, beeing for want of pay quite diſbanded, and the Caſtles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the firſt, as a thing of ſmall importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cauſe of the ruine and decay of the greateſt part of their eſtate in Aſia. Theſe miſchiefes vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turks ſtill gaining vpon the Greekes what they loſt vnto the Tartars. Whoſe inuaſions (the glory of the kingdom only excepted) was not ſo hurtfull to them, as the cauſe G of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned that a great power of theſe aduenturous Turks meeting together in Paphlagonia, were about to haue inuaded the territories of the Chriſtians: againſt whom Michael Paleologus the Emperor ſent out a ſtrong and puiſſant army to ſtay their further comming on, leſt breaking in that way, they ſhould without reſiſtance at their pleaſure forrage the country before them. Which army conducted by vnſkilful captains, incountring with the Turks, was by them in a great battel ouerthrown and vtterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude eſcaping: for whilſt the Greeks vnaduiſedly purſued the Turks, retyring of purpoſe before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a great power lying in ambuſh for them, and ſo intrapped, were ſlain with an exceding great ſlaughter. After which ſo great a victory (the beginning of the miſery of the H Chriſtians in the leſſer Aſia) the Turks without let or ſtay ouer-ran all the country vnto the riuer Sangarius; vpon the banks wherof the Greek Emperor was glad to fortifie diuers towns and forts to keep them out of Bithynia. Neuertheleſſe they in ſhort time after ſubdued all the countries from Pontus and Galatia, vnto the Lycian and Carian ſea, and the riuer Eurymedon, which they diuided among them into diuers Toparchies; little or nothing acknowledging the ſoueraigntie either of Meſoot or Kei-Cubades.

Whilſt the Turks in the leſſer Aſia thus win from the Chriſtians on the one ſide, and loſe to the Tartars on the other, many an hard conflict in the mean time paſſed betwixt the Ægyptian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the ſouerainty of Syria: the poor remainder of the Chriſtians all that while there in doubt both of the one and the other; from I whom and from the Armenians (then alſo much infeſted with the Mamalukes) diuers Embaſſadors were ſent vnto the Pope and the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to craue their ayd and help in that their hard eſtate. Whoſe prayers little preuailing with the reſt, yet ſo mooued Lewis the French king, and Henry the third then reigning in England, that they both promiſed them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of great deuotion, and alwaies forward in that ſeruice againſt the Infidels, took vpon him the Croſſe, the cogniſance of the ſacred War; cauſing his three ſons, Philip that ſucceeded him in the kingdome, (ſyrnamed the Faire) Peter County of Alanſon, and Iohn County of Neuers, ſyrnamed Triſtan (for that his mother was in her greateſt heauineſſe for the taking of her husband, deliuered of him in Egypt) and moſt of the Nobilitie of France to do the like. Vnto whom alſo Theobald King of Nauar his K ſon in Law, Alphonſus his brother, and Guido Earl of Flanders, joined themſelues. And ſo hauing put all things in readineſſe, took his way to Marſeilles, and from thence embarking himſelfe with his Army in the Genoa ſhips hired for that purpoſe, ſet forward the firſt day of 1270 March, in the year 1270. But being at ſea, he was by force of weather conſtrained to land in Carthage beſieged by K. Lewis Sardinia, and there to ſtay a while. Departing thence, he at length arriued at Carthage, the place by him deſired: where in the entrance of the hauen he ſurpriſed certain of the Enemies ſhips; but landing his men, and aſſaulting the town, he was notably repulſed. This is not that antient, great, and famous City, which ſomtime ſtroue with the proud Miſtres of the World for ſoueraigntie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at leaſt not far from the ruines of the ſame. In the beſieging wherof the Frenchmen found ſuch reſiſtance, as wel put them L in remembrance of the antient glory of the Carthaginians. One day it hapned as the king lay thus at the ſiege, that the defendants made a great and fierce ſally out vpon the Frenchmen; who before commanded ſo to doe, by little and little retyred, to draw their enemies further on. Betwixt whom and the City the Conſtable with a great power comming and charging them behinde, and they which were before retyred, now ſtanding cloſe vnto them, they were on both ſides hardly beſet; who for all that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themſelues, and made there a great fight, though not without extream perill. Which they in the City beholding, gaue out a moſt hideous and pittious cry, a certaine ſigne of their hard eſtate within; aſtonying with the ſuddenneſſe thereof both their friends and enemies. But whileſt they of the Towne betwixt hope and deſpair ſtood thus beholding the fight at land, M the French-men by ſea aſſaulting a Bulwarke on that ſide of the Towne, tooke it without whom the greateſt part caſting away their weapons, were by the Kings commandment receiued vnto mercy. And they likewiſe of the Town vpon promiſe of their liues, yeelded the

A ſame vnto the King. Carthage thus won,the King layd ſiege vnto Tunes, the chiefe City of that Kingdom,being not far off. Where by the way he was encountred by the King of that Countrey,who hauing there loſt ten thouſand of his Moores, betook himſelfe to flight with the reſt. Who thus ouerthrowne,reſolued no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himſelfe ſafe within the walls of his city, if happely ſo he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying ſtill and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpoſe King Lewis perceiuing,reſolued not to ſtir from thence vntill that hee were become maſter of the City,which as it ſeemed could not hold out for want of victuals, conſidering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuertheleſſe thus beſieged both by ſea and land,and ſo ſtreitly hemmed in on euery ſide,as that no reliefe could poſſibly bee B brought vnto it, yet held it out by the ſpace of ſix moneths. After which time, wants dayly more and more encreaſing amongſt the beſieged, Embaſſadors were ſent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace. But whileſt theſe Embaſſadors go to and fro,and reaſon vpon the capitulations of the deſired peace, behold, a great and furious plague aroſe in the French Camp,which began to cut them down by heaps: There died Iohn Triſtan County of Nevers, the Kings yongeſt ſonne, born in the firſt expedition that the ſaid King his father made into the Holy land,euen at ſuch time as he was taken priſoner; which Triſtan died the twenty fiſt day of Auguſt, in the year of our Lord 1270. The good King hauing ſcarſely performed the obſequies of his ſon,fell ſick of the bloudy flix,whereof he there ſhortly after died alſo. About which time arriued there Charles King of Sicilie,the French Kings brother,with a great C number of freſh ſoldiers; whoſe comming ſomwhat lightned the Frenchmens hearts (heauy for the death of their King) and daunted the Moores,before brag of the ſame. Shortly after whom arriued there alſo Prince Edward, King Henry the third his eldeſt ſon; who trauelling thorow France,and taking ſhipping at Aqueſmort, not far from Marſeilles, was now in ten dayes with a braue company of Engliſh men come to Tunes;and there of the other Chriſtian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of Sicilie,and of the two Kings of Navar and Arragon, ioyfully receiued. But theſe princes had a little before his arriuall concluded a peace with the Moores King and the Infidels,vpon condition that he ſhould pay a yearly tribute of forty thouſand Crownes vnto the King of Sicilie, and to ſuffer the Chriſtian Religion to bee freely preached within his D Dominions, by ſuch deuout perſons as ſhould be there left for that purpoſe: and that vnto ſuch as ſhould by their preaching be conuerted vnto the Faith in Chriſt Ieſus,it ſhould be lawful for them to be baptiſed,and to profeſſe the Chriſtian Religion.

Of which Peace Prince Edward vnderſtanding,did what he might to haue diſſuaded them from the ſame; ſaying, That the War was by them all taken in hand againſt the Infidels, as enemies vnto the Croſſe of Chriſt (with whom they were not to haue peace) and for the recouery of the Holy City. But ſay what he would,and do what he could,the peace to his great diſcontentment was now concluded,which they might not (as they ſaid) again break. And therupon with the firſt fair wind hoiſed ſail and returned towards Sicilie, with purpoſe the next Spring to haue gon into Syria. Which their determination was ſhortly after by the E hand of God diſappointed: for beeing come vpon the Coaſt of the Iſland not far from Drepanum, moſt of the great Princes and other Nobilitie in their long boats went on land, the reſt of the Fleet lying at Anker about a league off; for that being for the moſt part ſhips of great burthen, they were not able to put into the Harbor. But as they ſo lay,by force of a violent and ſudden Tempeſt then ariſing, ſome were eaten vp with the rough ſea; ſome falling foule one of another,there periſhed together; others driuen vpon the Main, were there beaten in pieces. So that of that great Fleet, before the ſtorme ceaſed, periſhed about an hundred and twenty ſail,with all the people as well mariners as ſouldiers left in them, and great ſtore of Armour and munition. In ſuch ſort that moſt of the common Souldiers and Mariners which had eſcaped the Plague at Tunes, there vpon the Coaſt of Sicilie periſhed by F ſhipwrack. Only Prince Edwards fleet, beeing in number but thirteene ſhips, eſcaped free without loſſe either of ſhip or man. Neither were they that were got to land at Drepanum in much better caſe,the plague ſtill following them; wherof died Theobald King of Navar, and Iſabel his wife,King Lewis his daughter, Elizabeth the French queen,with a maruelous number of Noble Gentlemen and other common Soldiers; in ſuch ſort,that Philip the French King diſcouraged with the greatnes of the mortalitie, and the miſerable loſſe at ſea, reſolued there G to make an end of the intended war, and ſo returned into France, as did the reſt that were left, euery man into his own country. Only Prince Edward hauing paſſed that Winter in Sicilie, with the firſt of the next Spring ſet forward again on his voyage, and in 15 dayes arriued with his fleet at Ptolemais: where after he had by the ſpace of a month reſted himſelf and his ſoldiers after their long trauel, and fully inquiring of the ſtate of the country, he with ſix or ſeuen thouſand ſoldiers marching from Ptolemais about twenty miles into the land, took Nazareth, and put to ſword all them he found therein, and ſo again returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at ſome aduantage, he vnderſtanding thereof, turned back vpon them, and killing a great number of them, put the reſt to flight. And after that about Midſummer, vnderſtanding that the Saraſins were again making head at a place called H Cakhow, about forty miles off, he ſet forwards toward them, and comming vpon them early in the morning before they were aware, ſlew aboue a thouſand of them, and diſperſed the reſt. Aided alſo by the Nobilitie of Cyprus, he with like ſucceſſe as before, made a third expedition againſt the Turks and Infidels: inſomuch that his fame began to grow great amongſt them, and they to ſtand of him in no little dread. But whilſt he thus preuailed, he was by foul treacherie almoſt taken out of the way. The Admirall of Ioppa feigning himſelfe deſirous to become a Chriſtian, and willing to further the princes proceedings, had by a ſecret meſſenger and letters ſundry times intelligence with him, as well concerning his own good entertainment, as the effecting of that which hee had promiſed. This meſſenger by the Admirall thus employed, was (though to the Prince vnknown) one of the Aſſaſines, a company of moſt I deſperat and dangerous men amongſt the Mahometans, who ſtrongly deluded with the blind zeal of their ſuperſtition, and counting it meritorious, by any meanes to kill any great enemy of their Religion; for the performance therof, as men prodigall of their liues, deſperately aduenture themſelues vnto all kinds of dangers. So now this meſſenger being reſolued to die, comming the fift time vnto the Prince, and being ſearched for hauing any weapon about him (as the manner was) had acceſſe vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his jerkin bare headed, becauſe of the heate of the weather. Where after due reuerence done, hee pulled out certain letters from his Lord to the Prince, which hee read with great delight, as penned of purpoſe for to pleaſe. But as hee was further queſtioning with him of many matters, and all the company voided, the deſperat meſſenger making as though hee would haue K pulled out ſome other ſecret letters, ſuddenly pluckt out an inuenomed knife which hee had ſecretly hidden about him, thinking to haue ſtruck him into the belly as he lay, for the auoiding of which ſtroke the Prince lifting vp his arm, was therein grieuouſly wounded. But as the Villaine was about to haue doubled the ſtroke, the Prince with his foot gaue him ſuch a blow that he felled him to the ground; and with that ſtarting vp, caught him by the hand, where in ſtrugling with him for the knife, in wreſting it out of his hand, hee hurt himſelſe therwith in the forhead: but getting it from him, preſently thruſt it into the murtherers belly and ſo ſlew him. The Princes ſeruants being not far off, and hearing the buſtling, came running in; where finding the meſſenger dead on the floor, one with a ſtool beat out his brains; wherat the Prince took ſome diſpleaſure for ſo ſtriking a dead man. This danger of the prin- L ces much troubled and grieued all the Chriſtians in Syria; and the more, for that the wound in his arm, after it had bin certain daies well dreſſed by the skilfull Surgeons and Phyſitians, began to mortifie and grow blacke, inſomuch that they and others about him began to mutter amongſt themſelues, and to looke heauily vpon the matter, as not without great danger. Which Prince Edward perceiuing, ſayd vnto them, Why whiſper ye thus amongſt your ſelues? What ſee you in me? Can I not be healed? Tell me the truth and feare not. Wherunto one of them anſwered, May it pleaſe your Highneſſe, we doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painfull for you to ſuffer. If ſuffering (ſayd hee) may again reſtore my health, I commit my ſelfe vnto you, worke on me your skill and ſpare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poiſoned fleſh that was in his arm, and within fifteene dayes M after perfectly cured his wound, to the great rejoicing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himſelfe of this ſo diſhonorable a treacherie, ſent three of his Noblemen vnto the Prince, calling to witneſſe his falſe Prophet Mahomet, That the ſame was done neither by him nor his conſent. Which his Embaſſadours the Prince honourably vſed, but ſuffered them not to come nigh him. So hauing tarried eighteene moneths at Ptolemais, and no ayd comming from the other Chriſtian Princes, as was expected, he tooke ſhipping, and returning homeward, landed firſt in Sicilia, and from thence croſſing ouer into Apulia, and ſo trauelling to Rome, was there honourably entertained by Gregory the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of France arriued in England, where he was ſhortly after crowned King, in the yere 1272, his father the old King, Henry the third, being a little before his returne dead.

Rodulph the Emperour taketh vpon him the Croſſe.

The yeare following, Gregory the tenth, not ignorant of the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, (as hauing there beene of late himſelfe with Prince Edward, at which time he was in his abſence elected Pope) and now deſirous to procure them ſome reliefe, ratified the election of Rodulphus of Hapſpurge vnto the Empire; vpon condition, That he ſhould promiſe to take vpon himſelfe the Croſſe, and to giue them reliefe: for the performance whereof he offered vnto the Emperour two hundred thouſand crownes, with the tenths both of the Clergie and Temporaltie for ſix yeres: and many goodly bleſſings were in his name alſo, by the preachers of that time, promiſed vnto all ſuch as ſhould with him take vpon them that ſacred warre. Whereupon the Emperour with all his family tooke vpon them the Croſſe, the ſigne of the ſacred expedition intended: as did alſo the Duke of Lorraine ſhortly after, with ſome others. Neuertheleſſe the Emperour, otherwiſe buſied in warres againſt the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying ſtill the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him ſo long and dangerous a iourney, and the Pope ſtill threatning his high ſentence of excommunication, the time paſſed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Vntill that at length the Emperour hauing C happily finiſhed his warres in Bohemia, and finding himſelfe at ſome good leiſure in ſome part to diſcharge his vow, and to ſatisfie the expectation the world had of long conceiued of him, ſent Henry Prince of Megapolis, or as the Germanes call it, Meckelbourg, with a ſtrong power into Syria, to performe what himſelfe had promiſed. Who comming to Ptolemais, made many notable incurſions into the country about Damaſco, with fire and ſword deſtroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length he was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken priſoner, and ſo carried vnto the Sultan at Caire, where he remained in ſtrait priſon ſix and twenty yeares after; vntill that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) being choſen Sultan, cauſed him to be brought before him, and at his comming demanded of him, If it would not do him good to D celebrate the remembrance of the natiuity of his Chriſt with his friends in Germany? (for now that time of the yere was at hand) And I know (ſaid the Sultan) that thou art ſo addicted vnto thy ſuperſtition, that thou reſpecteſt the ſame more than thy liberty. Truth (ſaid Henry) mighty Prince; for liberty would auaile me nothing, if Chriſt by his moſt mild incarnation had not taken away our captiuity: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, ô King, didſt alſo vnderſtand; which as I moſt heartily wiſh, ſo I would I could thereof perſuade thee. God forbid (ſaid the Sultan) for I remember that when as I was a chiefe enginer vnto thy father at Kneſe-Fenicke in Liuonia, and there did him good ſeruice, I was altogether of the Chriſtian perſuaſion; but now hauing left that common error, haue therewith alſo changed my priuate fortune. But as for thy Reli- E gion I haue nothing to ſay, my talke is onely concerning thy liberty: Wouldeſt thou therefore gladly be free, and ſo returne home to thy friends? That, Nature craueth (ſaid Henry) although my fortune gaineſayeth, which yet dependeth of your pleaſure: I deſire indeed to returne home, which if you ſhould deny me, I muſt as I haue done, take it in good part; aſſuring my ſelfe, that my wife Anaſtaſia, with my beloued ſons, Henry, Leo, and Iohn, haue long ſince celebrated my funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceiued (ſaid the Sultan) for I am ſure that they know thou yet liueſt, and pray moſt heartily for thy returne. Truly I owe much vnto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day giue thee thy liberty. And hauing ſo ſaid, furniſhed him with all things neceſſary, and gaue him leaue to depart with one Martin his ſeruant, who taken with him, had borne him company all the long time of his captiuitie. F So taking his leaue of the Sultan, he came to Ptolemais: but ſhipping himſelfe for Cyprus, he was by the way, by certaine Pyrats taken at ſea, and as a fugitiue Captiue brought backe againe vnto the Sultan: who pittying his hard fortune, ſet him againe at liberty, and by a ſhip ſet out for that purpoſe, tranſported him into Cyprus: where he was by the Queene of that

Iſland his aunt (as ſome ſay) honourably entertained, and ſo furniſhed of all things fit for his eſtate. Departing thence he came to Marſeilles, where after he had ſome few daies refreſhed himſelfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his own Country: where at the firſt he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being growne old in priſon, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found againe, and by them knowne, he was of his children joyfully receiued as their father, and of his ſubjects as their Prince. Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Dobran.

Thus in the whole courſe of this Hiſtory it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions euen the greateſt Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to their immortal glory, from time to time vndertooke againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and his moſt ſacred word, & for the reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria and in the land of Paleſtine: whereof as diuers of them had right glorious ſucceſſe, vnto the great profit of the Chriſtian Commonweale; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too ſmall ſtrength, or otherwiſe ouerthrowne by the diſcord or malice of the Chriſtians themſelues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleſſe, how vnfortunatly ſoeuer they fel out in the hands of ſuch worthy men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the Son of God, Chriſt Ieſus, and the defence of his verity, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, and his moſt blaſphemous doctrine; ſo honorable and juſt a quarrel as might well beſeeme the greatnes of the greateſt Prince, yea, of all the Princes of Chriſtendome. Yet could not the worthines therof, euen in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian commonweale, euen then like to periſh, (as ſome others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out vnto their Chriſtian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Chriſtian Princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any ſuccor or reliefe: for they little feeling thoſe harmes ſo far off, and more regarding their owne hereditary quarrels, employed thoſe forces one againſt another, vnto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian bloud, as might haue ſufficed not for relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria onely, but alſo to haue regained whatſoeuer had beene before from them taken by the Turks or Saraſins. The German Princes were ſtill at a jarre about the choice of their Emperors: the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low-countries: neither the Engliſh with the Scots: the Arragonians were at odds with the French: and in Italy were almoſt as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſtians (the greateſt occaſion of their ruine and decay) Melechſares the Egyptian Sultan vnderſtanding by his eſpials, raiſed a great army of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpoſe to haue vtterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriſtians in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, and ſo to haue entirely joyned thoſe two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had ſo miſchieuouſly deuiſed, hee liued not to bring to paſſe, being in the midſt of thoſe his great deſignes taken away by ſudden death. After whom Alphix (or as ſome call him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the kingdome, & with a puiſſant army entring into Syria, laid ſiege to Tripolis, which he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to ſword all the Chriſtians therein (except ſuch as by ſpeedy flight had in time got themſelues out of the danger) & raſed the city down to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Chriſtians the ninth of Aprill in the yeare 1289. Preſently after, he had the ſtrong caſtle of Neleſine yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building again the late deſtroied city. In like manner alſo he took the cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he ſacked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, he remoued to Tyre, which after three moneths ſtrait ſiege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart. With like good fortune hee in good time, and as it were without reſiſtance, tooke all the reſt of the ſtrong Townes and Caſtles which the Chriſtians yet held in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, excepting onely the Citie of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poore Chriſtians fled as vnto a Sanctuarie, to be there defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hoſpitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that ſtrong City, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the ſpace of fiue yeares, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Chriſtian

Princes of the Weſt, if he ſhould at once haue then vtterly rooted out all the Chriſtians in thoſe countries together.

The Chriſtians affaires thus brought to the laſt caſt in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the laſt obtained peace; Peter Beluiſe maſter of the Templars, with the grand maſter of the Knights Hoſpitallers, ſuddenly paſſed ouer (as Embaſſadors from the reſt) into Europe, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, crauing his fatherly aid. Who moued with ſo great miſeries of the poore afflicted Chriſtians, ſolicited the other Chriſtian Princes to haue ſent them reliefe; eſpecially Rodolph the German Emperour, who then buſied with the affaires of the Empire, and his troubles neerer home, (as were the other Chriſtian Princes alſo) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet ſome of them vnder the colour thereof, got from their ſubjects great ſummes of money, which they employed to their other worſe vſes: onely the Pope ſent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout perſuaſion, and much earneſt preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that ſacred expedition, & entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom alſo many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, joyned themſelues as voluntary men: who meeting together at Brunduſium, and there imbarked with the two grand maſters of the Templars and Hoſpitallers, in ſafety at length arriued at Ptolemais. There was then in the City a great number of people of all ſorts: of able men there was about fifty thouſand, and about forty thouſand of the weaker ſort: amongſt whom, diuers murders, felonies, rapes, and ſuch other ſhamefull outrages, (all haſting the dreadfull judgements of God) were dayly committed, and let paſſe vnregarded, more than of them that were injured. For all the chief commanders were then at variance among themſelues, euery one of them laying claime (not worth a ruſh) vnto the vain title of the kingdome of Ieruſalem. Henry King of Cyprus comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer him the Crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he ſaid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy his Anceſtors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embaſſadors laid claime vnto the title of that Kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Iſland: and vnderſtanding it to be giuen vnto Henry King of Cyprus, cauſed all the reuenues of the Templars within his dominion, to be brought into his Treaſuries, and their lands and houſes to be ſpoyled. Hugh alſo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and naile, to defend the ouerworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loſt kingdome. And the County of Tripolis layd in for himſelſe, that he was diſcended from Raymund of Tholous; and that beſide himſelſe, remained no Prince of the antient Nobility, which had woon that Kingdome out of the hands of the Saraſins, and that therefore that regall dignity did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himſelſe. Neither did theſe foure Princes more ſtriue for the title of the loſt Kingdome, than for the preſent gouernment of the City, ſtraightway about to periſh. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right alſo; for that King Iohn Brenne had before ſubjected it vnto the See of Rome. As for the claime vnto the City of Ptolemais, the Patriarke of Ieruſalem challenged vnto himſelſe the preheminence, for that the Metropoliticall city of Tyre (vnder which the City of Ptolemais was the third Epiſcopall Seat) was vnder his juriſdiction, euen by the Decree of the Weſt Church. The Templars alſo, and the Knights Hoſpitallers, whoſe power in the City was at that time farre the greateſt, pretended the gouernment thereof of beſt right to belong vnto them, as the juſt reward of their bloud, already and afterward to bee ſpent in the defence thereof: promiſing great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither ſpared the French King, or the King of England, by their meſſengers to claime the ſoueraigntie of the city, by their predeceſſors ſometimes won. And they of Piſa hauing ſtill a Conſull therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants, grown into great affinity with them, did what they might to get the gouernement into their hands. The Venetians alſo by their authoritie and great wealth, laboured to gaine the good will of the people, ſparing therein no coſt. And they of Genoa, no leſſe cunning than the reſt, ſupplanted the ſtrongeſt factions, by giuing aid both apertly and couertly vnto the weaker; that ſo hauing weakned the faction they moſt doubted and hated, they might by the joynt fauour of the weaker, aſpire vnto the gouernement of the ſtronger, and ſo conſequently of the city it ſelſe. The Florentines alſo by their continuall trafſique thither, were not out of hope, by one fineneſſe or other, amongſt ſo many competitors,

Iſland his aunt (as ſome ſay) honourably entertained, and ſo furniſhed of all things fit for his eſtate. Departing thence he came to Marſeilles, where after he had ſome few daies refreſhed himſelfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his own Country: where at the firſt he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being growne old in priſon, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found againe, and by them knowne, he was of his children joyfully receiued as their father, and of his ſubjects as their Prince. Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Dobran.

Thus in the whole courſe of this Hiſtory it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions euen the greateſt Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to their immortal glory, from time to time vndertooke againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and his moſt ſacred word, & for the reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria and in the land of Paleſtine: whereof as diuers of them had right glorious ſucceſſe, vnto the great profit of the Chriſtian Commonweale; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too ſmall ſtrength, or otherwiſe ouerthrowne by the diſcord or malice of the Chriſtians themſelues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleſſe, how vnfortunatly ſoeuer they fel out in the hands of ſuch worthy men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the Son of God, Chriſt Ieſus, and the defence of his verity, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, and his moſt blaſphemous doctrine; ſo honorable and juſt a quarrel as might well beſeeme the greatnes of the greateſt Prince, yea, of all the Princes of Chriſtendome. Yet could not the worthines therof, euen in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian commonweale, euen then like to periſh, (as ſome others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out vnto their Chriſtian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Chriſtian Princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any ſuccor or reliefe: for they little feeling thoſe harmes ſo far off, and more regarding their owne hereditary quarrels, employed thoſe forces one againſt another, vnto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian bloud, as might haue ſufficed not for relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria onely, but alſo to haue regained whatſoeuer had beene before from them taken by the Turks or Saraſins. The German Princes were ſtill at a jarre about the choice of their Emperors: the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low-countries: neither the Engliſh with the Scots: the Arragonians were at odds with the French: and in Italy were almoſt as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſtians (the greateſt occaſion of their ruine and decay) Melechſares the Egyptian Sultan vnderſtanding by his eſpials, raiſed a great army of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpoſe to haue vtterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriſtians in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, and ſo to haue entirely joyned thoſe two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had ſo miſchieuouſly deuiſed, hee liued not to bring to paſſe, being in the midſt of thoſe his great deſignes taken away by ſudden death. After whom Alphix (or as ſome call him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the kingdome, & with a puiſſant army entring into Syria, laid ſiege to Tripolis, which he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to ſword all the Chriſtians therein (except ſuch as by ſpeedy flight had in time got themſelues out of the danger) & raſed the city down to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Chriſtians the ninth of Aprill in the yeare 1289. Preſently after, he had the ſtrong caſtle of Neleſine yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building again the late deſtroied city. In like manner alſo he took the cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he ſacked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, he remoued to Tyre, which after three moneths ſtrait ſiege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart. With like good fortune hee in good time, and as it were without reſiſtance, tooke all the reſt of the ſtrong Townes and Caſtles which the Chriſtians yet held in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, excepting onely the Citie of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poore Chriſtians fled as vnto a Sanctuarie, to be there defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hoſpitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that ſtrong City, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the ſpace of fiue yeares, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Chriſtian

Princes of the Weſt, if he ſhould at once haue then vtterly rooted out all the Chriſtians in thoſe countries together.

The Chriſtians affaires thus brought to the laſt caſt in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the laſt obtained peace; Peter Beluiſe maſter of the Templars, with the grand maſter of the Knights Hoſpitallers, ſuddenly paſſed ouer (as Embaſſadors from the reſt) into Europe, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, crauing his fatherly aid. Who moued with ſo great miſeries of the poore afflicted Chriſtians, ſolicited the other Chriſtian Princes to haue ſent them reliefe; eſpecially Rodolph the German Emperour, who then buſied with the affaires of the Empire, and his troubles neerer home, (as were the other Chriſtian Princes alſo) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet ſome of them vnder the colour thereof, got from their ſubiects great ſummes of money, which they employed to their other worſe vſes: onely the Pope ſent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout perſuaſion, and much earneſt preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that ſacred expedition, & entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom alſo many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, joyned themſelues as voluntary men: who meeting together at Brunduſium, and there imbarked with the two grand maſters of the Templars and Hoſpitallers, in ſafety at length arriued at Ptolemais. There was then in the City a great number of people of all ſorts: of able men there was about fifty thouſand, and about forty thouſand of the weaker ſort: amongſt whom, diuers murders, felonies, rapes, and ſuch other ſhamefull outrages, (all haſting the dreadfull judgements of God) were dayly committed, and let paſſe vnregarded, more than of them that were injured. For all the chief commanders were then at variance among themſelues, euery one of them laying claime (not worth a ruſh) vnto the vain title of the kingdome of Ieruſalem. Henry King of Cyprus comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer him the Crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he ſaid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy his Anceſtors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embaſſadors laid claime vnto the title of that Kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Iſland: and vnderſtanding it to be giuen vnto Henry King of Cyprus, cauſed all the reuenues of the Templars within his dominion, to be brought into his Treaſuries, and their lands and houſes to be ſpoyled. Hugh alſo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and naile, to defend the ouerworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loſt kingdome. And the County of D Tripolis layd in for himſelfe, that he was diſcended from Raymund of Tholous; and that beſide himſelfe, remained no Prince of the antient Nobility, which had woon that Kingdome out of the hands of the Saraſins, and that therefore that regall dignity did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himſelfe. Neither did theſe foure Princes more ſtriue for the title of the loſt Kingdome, than for the preſent gouernment of the City, ſtraightway about to periſh. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right alſo; for that King Iohn Brenne had before ſubiected it vnto the See of Rome. As for the claime vnto the City of Ptolemais, the Patriarke of Ieruſalem challenged vnto himſelfe the preheminence, for that the Metropoliticall city of Tyre (vnder which the City of Ptolemais was the third Epiſcopall Seat) was vnder his juriſdiction, euen by the Decree of the Weſt Church. The Templars E alſo, and the Knights Hoſpitallers, whoſe power in the City was at that time farre the greateſt, pretended the gouernment thereof of beſt right to belong vnto them, as the juſt reward of their bloud, already and afterward to bee ſpent in the defence thereof: promiſing great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither ſpared the French King, or the King of England, by their meſſengers to claime the ſoueraigntie of the city, by their predeceſſors ſometimes won. And they of Piſa hauing ſtill a Conſull therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants, grown into great affinity with them, did what they might to get the gouernement into their hands. The Venetians alſo by their authoritie and great wealth, laboured to gaine the good will of the people, ſparing therein no coſt. And they of Genoa, no leſſe cunning than the reſt, ſupplanted the ſtrongeſt factions, by giuing aid both apertly F and couertly vnto the weaker; that ſo hauing weakned the faction they moſt doubted and hated, they might by the joynt fauour of the weaker, aſpire vnto the gouernement of the ſtronger, and ſo conſequently of the city it ſelfe. The Florentines alſo by their continuall trafſique thither, were not out of hope, by one fineneſſe or other, amongſt ſo many competitors, to find a meane to ſtep vp aboue the reſt. But the greateſt part of the people for all that were G moſt inclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars,as both for their neerneſſe and power moſt like of all other to ſtand them in ſtead. All theſe aimed at one marke,which was, the gouernment and command of the City; and moſt of them had in the ſame their owne proper lawes and courts,to decide their cauſes and controuerſies in. Whereby it came to paſſe,that euery man might without checke or controlement almoſt do what he liſt, the offendors from one court to another remouing their ſuits as beſt ſerued their turnes. Thus were murders (as is before ſaid) dayly committed in the ſtreets,men abuſed,houſes robbed, ſhops broken vp,and many other outrages done,to the haſtning of the wrath of God, and griefe of all good men.

1291 Diuiſion and diſſention(the ruine of all Common-weales) thus raigning in the City, the ſouldiers of late ſent thither, or in zeale come of themſelues for the defence thereof, gaue H occaſion for the more ſpeedy deſtruction of the ſame: ſuch is the power of the Almightie, in his wrath and iudgements for ſinne, euen by thoſe things werein we moſt truſt and ioy, to worke our vtter ruine and deſtruction. Theſe ſouldiers, for want of ſuch pay as was promiſed them, were enforced to ſeeke abroad; and therefore contrary to the league before made with the Ægyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties vnto the frontiers of his territories,taking the ſpoile of ſuch things as they light vpon. Whereof the Sultan vnderſtanding, demanded by his Embaſſadors, That reſtitution might be made,and the offendors deliuered vnto him to be puniſhed, according vnto the League. But in that ſo ſicke a ſtate of a dying Common-weale,neither was reſtitution made,as reaſon would, or yet the Embaſſadors courteouſly heard. With which inſolencie the Sultan prouoked, ſent Emilech Araphus a nota- I Ptolemais beſieged. ble Captaine, (and as ſome ſay, his ſonne) with an hundred and fifty thouſand men, to beſiege the City: who comming thither, and hauing made his approches, had by a mine in ſhort time ouerthrowne a piece of the wall; but in ſeeking to haue entred by the breach, he found ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, that he was glad with loſſe to retyre. Whileſt Araphus thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, Alphir the Sultan died at Damaſco: in whoſe ſtead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan; who more deſirous of nothing than of the glory of the vtter rooting vp of the Chriſtians in Syria, was ſo farre from raiſing of his ſiege, (either for the death of the Sultan,or the newes of his Kingdome) that he more ſtraitly beſet the city than he had in the three moneths ſpace that he had there lien before. Now had they in the city choſen Peter the maſter of the Templars,their gouernor,a man of great expe- K rience and valour: vnto whom, and the reſt of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and vnto the ſoldiers their pay, with free liberty to depart, ſo that they would without more adoe yeeld vnto him the city,which they could not long hold.Which his offer the maſter reiected,and flatly told him, that he had not learned of his anceſtors, to ſell for mony vnto the Infidels a City bought with ſo much Chriſtian bloud; either did ſo much regard his vaine threats,as therefore to forget his ſeruice due vnto his Sauior Chriſt and the Chriſtian Commonweale. With which anſwer the tyrant inraged, the next day with all his forces aſſaulted Ptolemais in vain aſſaulted by the Sultan. the city, and that in ſuch deſperat and furious manner, as if he would euen then haue carried it; hauing before filled the ditches, and promiſed the ſpoile vnto his ſouldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet hauing done what he could,and loſt a number of his men,ſlaine both in L the aſſault, and in a ſally which the Chriſtians made out at the ſame time, he was inforced to retyre backe againe into his trenches.In this ſo terrible an aſſault,not repulſed without ſome loſſe alſo of the Chriſtians, the grand maſter and gouernour of the city was wounded with a poiſoned dart,wherof he in three daies after died. With whom the courage of the Defendans fainted alſo, no man being left like vnto him to vndertake ſo great a charge, although many there were,that ouerweening of themſelues deſired the ſame. In the beginning of this ſiege the Chriſtians had ſent away all their aged and weak people vnfit for ſeruice, into Cyprus,where they in ſafety arriued. But now many of the better ſort both Captains and others diſcouraged,one after another conueyed themſelues away out of the City. Of whom a great number in paſſing thence to Cyprus, were vpon the Coaſt of the Iſland together with the M Patriarch drowned. In the City remained only twelue thouſand, which were thought ſuf-ficient for the defence thereof. Who afterwards (as ſome report) fled alſo by ſea after their Fellowes, and ſo left the City empty vnto the barbarous Enemie. Some others reporting of them more honorably, as that they ſhould right valiantly defend the city againſt the aſſault of their enemies, vntill ſuch time as that moſt of them being ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt by force driuen from the wals into the market place, and there for a while notably defending themſelues, in flying thence vnto the ſhips, were by the way all cut in ſunder, or els drowned. But how ſoeuer it was, the Sultan entring the city (by the Chriſtians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers; who after they had rifled euery corner thereof, by his commandement ſet it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground: and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, Churches, and other publike or priuate buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no ſigne of any city at all; but purging the place euen of the very heapes of the ſtones and rubbidge left of the raſed city, made it a fit place for huſbandmen to plow and ſow corne in; which he did both there, at Sydon, Beritus, and other Townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, becauſe they ſhould neuer more ſerue for a refuge vnto the Chriſtians, or giue them footing againe into thoſe Countries. Thus together with Ptolemais was the name of the Chriſtians vtterly rooted out of Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, in the yeare 1291, about 192 yeares after the winning of Ieruſalem by Godfrey of Buillon and the other Chriſtian Princes his confederates.

This loſſe, as tending to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtians in generall, moued not a little euen the greateſt of the Chriſtian Princes; wronged all or moſt part of them in the perſons of the Templars or Knights Hoſpitalers, their ſubjects, ſo ſhamefully now quite caſt out of Syria and the land of Promiſe; howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home or with their neighbour Princes not farre off, none of them once ſtirred for the redreſſe or reuenge thereof. Onely Caſſanes the great Tartar Prince, hauing of late ſubdued the Perſians, and married the daughter of the Armenian King (a Lady of great perfection, and of a Mahometane became a Chriſtian) at the requeſt of his wife and his father in law, tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpoſe hauing raiſed a moſt puiſſant army of two hundred thouſand fighting men, and ayded by the Armenians and Georgians, paſſing ouer the mountaine Amanus into Syria, not farre from the City Hama met with Melcenaſer, the Ægyptian Sultans Lieutenant, with a mighty army, whom he ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherin forty thouſand of the Ægyptians are reported to haue beene ſlaine, and ſo draue him quite out of Syria: ſending Molais, one of his Captaines, with part of his Army to purſue him, who neuer left him vntill he had chaſed him ouer the deſart ſands into Ægypt. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the City of Hama, where lighting vpon the great treaſures of the Sultan, hee bountifully diuided it, together with the ſpoile, amongſt his ſouldiers; reſeruing nothing thereof vnto himſelfe, more than a ſword and a casket full of ſecret letters. The Ægyptian thus put to flight, he without reſiſtance tooke in moſt of the Cities of Syria, with the City of Ieruſalem alſo; which in many places by the Turks and Ægyptians defaced, he againe repaired: and together with the Temple of our Sauiour gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Chriſtians, repairing thither out of Cyprus, Creet, and other places, to inhabit. And hauing himſelfe honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his army to Damaſco, which was forthwith deliuered vnto him. But lying there, with purpoſe in Autumne following to haue gone into Ægypt, and to haue vtterly deſtroied that kingdome, he was certified of new troubles ariſing in Perſia, and ſome other parts of his Empire: for repreſſing whereof, he with the greateſt part of his Army returned himſelfe into Perſia, leauing one Capcapus gouernour of Damaſco; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans Army had reuolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee haue before ſpoken) Gouernour of Ieruſalem: commanding them at his departure to re-edifie the City of Tyre, and to ſend Embaſſadors vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to joyne in league with them, for the more ſure holding of thoſe new gained countries. And ſo Tyre was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and deliuered to the Chriſtians, with a conuenient garriſon for the keeping thereof: but the Embaſſadors comming to the proud Biſhop Boniface the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it beſeemed to haue furthered their buſineſſe, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For hee at the ſame time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his excommunications, diſcharging his ſubjects of their loyaltie, and ſo much as in him was, depriuing him of his Kingdome, had giuen the ſame vnto Albertus Duke of Auſtria, whom he had declared Emperour: whereof ariſe great troubles. Beſides that,he being of the Guelphes faction,was not in any thing more G carefull, than of the vtter extinguiſhing of the contrary faction of the Gibellines, eſpecially of the moſt honorable family of the Columnij, of whom ſome he had ſlaine, ſome he had depriued of their honours, ſome he had impriſoned, and driuen otherſome into exile ; ſo that thus wickedly buſied for the maintenance of his owne proud eſtate, he had no leiſure to further the good of the Chriſtian commonweale : which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulneſſe of duty long eſcaped not the reuenging hand of God ; being when he thought leaſt, ſuddenly taken priſoner at his fathers houſe in the city of Anagnia (where he was borne) by Sara Columnius his mortall enemy ; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirats gally, the French King had ſent for that purpoſe, with one Longaret (or as ſome call him, Nogaret) a French Knight : by whom the proud Prelat brought to Rome, in the caſtle of S. Angelo, within fiue and H his teeth, and deuouring his owne fingers. This worthy Tartar Prince Caſſanes (by whom the Chriſtian commonweale might haue againe riſen in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, had not the pride of the great Biſhop, and the diſſention of the Chriſtian Princes hindred the ſame) was (as Aitonus writeth, who was preſent in this war, following his vncle the Armenian King) a man of a very ſhort ſtature, and exceeding hard fauor ; but with valor, bounty, and other vertues of the minde, plentifully recompencing what wanted in the feature of his body. After whoſe departure into Perſia, Capcapus Gouernour of Damaſco, conſidering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt ; to recompenſe his former treaſon of reuolting from the Sultan, I with a new reuolt from the Tartar, roſe vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not onely the city of Damaſco, but the greateſt part of Syria alſo. Whereof Molois gouernor of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding, was about to haue gone againſt him with his Tartars ; but aduertiſed by his eſpials, that Capcapus in this his conſpiracie had compacted with the Ægyptian Sultan alſo, perceiuing himſelfe too weake to withſtand ſo great a power, retyred with his Tartars into Meſopotamia, there expecting new ſupplies both from Caſſanes and the King of Armenia. Of The city of Ieruſalem, with all Syria again recouered by the Ægyptian Sultan. whoſe departure out of Syria the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding, came directly with his army to Ieruſalem, which he tooke, (being forſaken of the inhabitants) and prophaned the temple, ſparing onely the Sepulchre of our Sauiour, at the humble ſuit of the religious, making there a greater ſhew of deuotion, than of cruelty. After that, he woon all the other leſſer K townes, which the Tartars had either kept for themſelues, or giuen to the other Chriſtians, and vtterly raſed all the forts of the Hoſpitallers and Templars, which valiant men, without other helpe, for the ſpace of almoſt a yeare held out againſt the tyrant, in which time moſt of them were honorably ſlaine : the reſt that were left aliue being taken by the enemy, had neuertheleſſe leaue giuen with bag and baggage in ſafety to depart, hauing before by ſolemne oath for euer abiured the country of Syria : and ſo theſe worthy men, the great ornaments of the Chriſtian commonweale, the Hoſpitalers and Templars, which to the vtmoſt of their power had by the ſpace of 300 yeres right worthily defended both the Chriſtians and the Chriſtian religion, againſt the Infidels in Syria and the Holy-land, were now for euer driuen out thence 1300 about the yeare of our Lord 1300, to the great diſhonour of all Chriſtendome. L

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of Syria and the Holy-land, leauing the ſame in the poſſeſſion of the Ægyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were ſhortly after like enough to haue bin againe recouered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Caſſanes, and their domeſticall troubles letted : we will againe returne to the troubled affaires of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, whither the courſe of the time had ſomewhat before called vs, with the occurrents thereof, more proper to our purpoſe and the argument we haue in hand, but that all cannot be at once told : and for the better vnderſtanding of the deſirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the courſe of the aforeſaid Hiſtory, drawing ſo neere to an end, but to make him partaker of the heauineſſe thereof.

Now had the Turks no kingdome left in the leſſer Aſia, and that alſo at the pleaſure of Gazan M the great Tartar Chan diuided betwixt Meſoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vaſſals, bound vnto him by a yerely tribute, as is aforeſaid: who both kept in awe by the greatnes of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance, but as they liued, ſo alſo died, almoſt buried in obſcurity.

Of theſe two, Meſoot died without iſſue ; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behind him his ſonne

A Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the ſecond ſucceeding in the Kingdome, vnited againe the ſame before diuided, yet paying ſtill tribute vnto the Tartar his Soueraigne, as had his father with the other late Sultans of the Turks before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, and not to lie ſo heauy vpon the Turks as before. He was a man of a quiet ſpirit, and therefore much delighted in peace: a great friend vnto Othoman the firſt founder of the glorious and mighty Othoman Empire, as in his life ſhall appeare. But this Aladin, the laſt of the Turks Sultans of the Selzuccian family, dying without iſſue; one Sabib his Veſir-Azemes or chiefe Counſeller, and then a man of greateſt authority, aſpired vnto the kingdome, which he had for moſt part himſelfe ſwaied all the reigne of the late Sultan his maſter: which vſurped ſoueraigntie, no way vnto B him due, he could neither himſelfe long hold, or deliuer vnto his poſterity; for that many others of the nobility, men of great power, and borne of greater families than he, enuying at his honour, and diſdaining to be gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themſelues, layed hold ſome vpon one country or prouince, ſome vpon another, where they were able to do moſt, erecting vnto themſelues greater or leſſer Satrapies, according to the meaſure of their owne ſtrength and power, without reſpect of any ſuperioritie one ſhould haue ouer another, but euery one of them abſolutely commanding ouer ſo much as he was able by ſtrong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that the great Monarchies deſtitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preyes vnto ſuch as could firſt lay ſtrong hand vpon them; euen ſo fell it now out in the great kingdome of the Turks, euery one C of their great Princes, meaſuring the greatneſſe of his territory, not by the meaſure of his right, but by the ſtrength of his owne power. Wherein they ſhared ſo well for themſelues, that Sahib at firſt in poſſeſſion of all, was in ſhort time thruſt quite out of all: and ſo the great kingdome of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, brought into a meere Anarchie; no King now left among them, the whole kingdome being now diuided into diuers Satrapies, or other leſſer Toparchies. The greateſt of thoſe Princes that thus ſhared the Turks kingdome amongſt them, was one Caraman Aluſirius; who as ſtrongeſt tooke vnto him the city of Iconium, the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all the great country of Cilicia, and ſome part of the frontiers of the countries of Lycaonia, Pamphylia, Caria, and the greater Phrygia, as farre as Phyladelphia, and the city of Antioch vpon the riuer Mæander: all which large territory, D was of him afterward called Caramania, and by the ſame name is commonly at this day knowne, and by our late Geographers deſcribed. Of this Caraman alſo deſcended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after vnfortunately ſtroue with the Othoman Sultans for the Soueraigntie of their Empires; vntill that at length they with their Kingdome, and all the reſt of the Turkiſh Satrapies, were in the fatall greatneſſe of the Othoman Empire, ſwallowed vp and deuoured, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory ſhall (if God ſo will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Sarchan, of whom the Countrey of Ionia-Maritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Ili, and Saruchania, that is to ſay, Saruchans Countrey. The greateſt part of Lydia, with ſome part alſo of the greater Myſia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calumus and his ſonne Caraſius, of whom it is E called Caraſia, or Caraſi-Ili, (or as we might ſay) Caraſius his Countrey. The greateſt part of the antient Miſia, with ſome part of Lydia, was poſſeſſed by Aidin, and was of him called Aidinia, or Aidin-Ili, as his Country. Some part of the great Countrey of Pontus, with the Cities of Heraclea-Pontica, Caſtamona, Synope, and others neere vnto the Euxine, and the Countrey of Paphlagonis, fell into the hands of the ſonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him, Amur: of whom that Countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of ſuch Princes as poſſeſſed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a City in that Countrey by the Turkes ſo named. As was alſo Mendeſia, or as ſome call it Menteſia, a Countrey in the leſſer Aſia, ſo by the Turkes called of Mendos or Myndus, a City in Caria. There were beſide theſe, diuers other places and Toparchies in the leſſer Aſia, which in the renting of this F great Kingdome, from the Turkes receiued names, before vnto the World vnknowne; all which to proſecute were tedious. Sufficeth it vs, for the manifeſting of the Turkes Anarchie, and the ruine of their Kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, as in part alſo for the more euidence of the heauy Hiſtory following, to haue remembred theſe as the chiefeſt; eſpecially ſuch as tooke their names from ſuch great Princes or Captaines as in that ſo great a confuſion of the Turks kingdome, by ſtrong hand firſt ſeiſed vpon them, and ſo left them to their poſteritie of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter. Theſe Princes one and all that thus ſhared the late Aladinian kingdome, were deſcended of the better ſort of the Turks, which with the Selzuccian and Aladinian Sultans driuen out of Perſia by the Tartars, had vnder them ſeated themſelues in the leſſer Aſia, as is before at large declared. Now among theſe great men that thus diuided the Turks kingdome, moſt of them that write of the Turks affaires, both Greeks and Latines, reckon vp Othoman (the raiſer of his houſe and family) for one, who indeed in the latter time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flouriſh, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily fauoured (as in this Hiſtory ſhall appeare) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordſhip, called Suguta in Bythinia, not farre from the mountaine Olympus, (long before giuen vnto his father Erthogrull, for his good ſeruice) with ſuch other ſmall holds thereabout, as he had himſelfe gained from the weake Chriſtians his neighbours. For although he were a Turke borne, yet was he not of the Selzuccian family, as were the reſt, but of another houſe and tribe, and therefore not of them fauoured or thought to haue ſo good right to any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who being of his houſe, and holpen with the preſcription of time, enuied at the ſudden riſing of this Oguzian Turk, being to them as it were a meere ſtranger: whoſe fortune for all that (I know not by what ſecret foreknowledge) they ſeemed to feare, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their poſteritie; wherein they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be ſaid hereafter: leaue we him now therefore with the reſt vnto their fortunes in this the Turkes Anarchie, and ſo conclude this part of our Generall Hiſtory: Glad when I looke backe to haue waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; ſuch a ſea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toile, and that in long time to be paſſed through.

Othoman none of the Selzuccian family.

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EMPIRE OF THE TVRKES VNDER OTHOMAN, FIRST FOVNDER THEREOF: WITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

WHAT ſmall aſſurance there is in mens affaires, and how ſubject vnto change euen thoſe things are wherein we for the moſt part repoſe our greateſt felicitie and bliſſe, (beſide that the whole courſe of mans fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainly manifeſt the ſame, than the heauy euents and woefull deſtructions of the greateſt Kingdomes and Empires: which founded vpon great fortunes, increaſed with perpetuall ſucceſſe, exalted by exceeding power, eſtabliſhed with moſt puiſſant armies, wholeſome lawes, and deepe counſels; haue yet grown old, and in time come to nought: So that euen as men, all things elſe belonging vnto man, are ſubject vnto the ineuitable courſe of deſtinie, or more truly to ſay, vnto the fatal doome of the moſt Higheſt, prefining vnto euery thing that in time begun, a time alſo wherein to take heed, being himſelfe without time, the great commander thereof, and of all things elſe done therein. The fame of the firſt Aſſyrian Monarchy, is very antient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuertheleſſe found an end; and the more to put vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was neuer with ſo much glory and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with ſhame and cowardiſe by Sardanapalus ſubuerted. With like neceſſitie fell the great empire of the Medes and Perſians, the time thereof being come. And after them, the Macedonians alſo. Neither hath the great Roman Empire, or the proud City of Rome it ſelfe (ſometime the miſtreſſe of the world) herein found any exemption, but run the ſame courſe with the reſt: which grown great with continuall triumphs, and ſo ſtrong as that it was not with forrein power to be ſhaken; conuerted the forces of it ſelfe vpon it ſelfe, to the ouerthrow of the antient liberty thereof, together with the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſtate. After which time that mighty Monarchy (of all that euer yet were, the greateſt) vnder the Romane Emperors felt many an hard and perillous ſtorme, and by little & little ſtil declining (though ſometime like a ſicke aged body, by the valor or vertue of ſome one or other her worthy Emperors, a little relieued, and by and by againe caſt downe by the folly or negligence of ſome others ſucceeding) it became at length a prey vnto a fooliſh, rude, & barbarous nation, which it had before oftentimes ouercome, and ouer which many the Roman captains had triumphed, and thereof taken their glorious ſurnames: which now again without compaſſion, burning and ſacking it, cauſed it to ſtoop, and to yeeld vnto the ſeruile yoake which it had in former time proudly impoſed vpon the necks of others: wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then ſitting at the helm (although that may alſo much help the matter as a meane) but the inſtabilitie of wordly things neuer permanent, but alwaies changeable, and the ſooner for their height; and that ſo forcibly, as that no man knoweth how to remedy the ſame, either if he did, were he able to performe it; the greateſt means that men could poſſibly deuiſe for the ſtay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from aboue, conuerting vnto the more ſpeedy effecting of that, againſt the which they were by mans wiſedome prouided. The like might be ſaid of the Athenians, the Lacedæmonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What maruell then, if the ancient kingdomes of the Turks likewiſe in Perſia, and the leſſer Aſia, in Syria, Paleſtina, and Ægypt, hauing run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Chriſtians, oppreſſed on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themſelues rent in ſunder (their deſtiny ſo requiring) loſt at laſt their wonted majeſty, and ſo fell into a meere Anarchy, as in the former part of this Hiſtory is at large declared? Yet in this far more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes, ſtraightway out of themſelues ariſe another, namely, this Othoman monarchy, the chiefe object of this Hiſtory: which at the firſt ſcarce of the world perceiued, or of themſelues regarded, in ſhort time ſo proſpered, as that the power and glory thereof obſcured not their former kingdomes only (nothing, in compariſon of this) but euen the greateſt monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which, it now ſo proudly triumpheth, as if it ſhould neuer haue end: at the beauty wherof the world wondereth, and at the power thereof quaketh: within the greatneſſe whereof are contained no ſmall portions of Aſia, Europe, and Africke, but euen the moſt famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but America onely; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than in that ſhe is ſo farre from ſo great and dangerous an enemy. The foundation of this ſo great a kingdome (and now ſo mighty an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was firſt laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, Oſman; not deſcended of the Selzuccian family, as were al the former Turks Sultans, but of the Oguzian tribe & kindred: in whoſe line this glorious empire hath euer ſince, by the ſpace of three hundred yeares and three, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, wonderfully flouriſhed; and ſo yet doth at this day, vnder the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now raigneth thirteenth in deſcent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himſelfe. But foraſmuch as both his greatneſſe, and the greatneſſe of the reſt of the Othoman Kings and Emperors his progenitors, tooke their beginning from this worthy and warlike Othoman, with whoſe life and doings we purpoſe to begin this part of our Hiſtory, it ſhall not be amiſſe both for the continuation of that we haue in hand, with that we haue already written, and for the more manifeſting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fetch his race and deſcent alſo: not meaning with a long and faigned pedegree to ſet him out of Noah his arke, (which continuall ſucceſſion of Princes, no nation of the world, be it neuer ſo antient, the Iewes only excepted, and they alſo by writings and Hiſtories as much as was poſſible eternized, could truly and juſtly chaledge) but onely ſo farre as ſhall be pertinent vnto our purpoſe, and by the authority of good Hiſtories to be auerred.

All wordly things ſubject to change.

The greateſt kingdoms haue in time taken end, & ſo come to nought.

At ſuch time as the Turks kingdom founded by Tangrolipix in Perſia, flouriſhed in the Selzuccian Princes his ſucceſſors, there was alſo another kingdome of theirs at the city of Machan, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other either in glory or power. In this city, and ouer this ſmall kingdom, raigned one Solyman, by his ſubjects honored alſo with the name of a Sultan or King; at the ſame time that the Tartars vnder the leading of old Zingis their great Captaine, leauing their own countrey, and beating downe the world before them, hauing conquered the fartheſt parts of the Eaſt, and there ſeated their kingdome, turned their forces into Perſia, and there ouerthrew the Turkes kingdome at Balch in Coraſan, and draue the Turks with Curſumes their laſt King, out of the country: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix reigned about an hundred and ſeuentie two yeres.

This Solyman of whom we ſpeake, then raigning at Machan, was not of the Selzuccian family (as were all the other Turks Sultans, the ſucceſſors of Tangrolipix) but of the Oguzian tribe, a family famous alſo amongſt the Turks; who ſeeing the Selzuccian Sultan Curſumes (or as ſome call him, Cuſſumes) his countryman, beaten out of his kingdom by the Tartar, and his country ouerrun, and the great Caliph of Babylon alſo ouerthrowne; thought it not good longer to ſtay in that countrey which he could not hold, but by ſpeedy flight betimes to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and of ſuch his ſubjects as would follow him: and hearing that Aladin the ſon of Kei-Huſreu, or as the Greeks call him, Cai-Coſroe (a great man of the Selzuccian family, & neere of kin vnto the late Sultan Curſumes) who for feare of the Tartars but lately come into Romania Aſiatica, had there by force of armes moſt honourably ſeated himſelfe and the Turks his followers, among the Chriſtians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his ſuperſtition (accounting all wel gotten that was gained from the Chriſtians) took his way after him, with ſuch of his kinſmen and ſubiects as would accompany him in his new aduentures. And comming to Artezerum, a city in the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, thereabout in the countrey according to the ſeaſon of the yeare ſeated himſelfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wiues and children, after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their anceſtors, in poore tents and carts couered with a courſe kind of cloth, had followed him, being indeed nothing els but a very rude and rough kind of ſturdy heardſmen, not wedded to any place, but ſtill remouing with their tents and carts vp and downe, as beſt ſerued for their purpoſe and the feeding of their cattell, as do the Turcoman nation, the true diſcent of the Turks, in many places of Aſia at this day, and were thereof not only called Nomades, that is to ſay, Herdſmen, (by which name the proud Ianizaries will oftentimes in contempt call euen the greateſt of the naturall Turks) but Hamaxophoreti, and Hamaxobij, that is to ſay, people carried or liuing in carts. Solyman hauing ſtaid a while about Erzerum, remouing thence came to Amaſia; and there ſpoyling the country, then inhabited by the Chriſtians, did them much harme, oftentimes encountring them in the plaine field, and ſometimes ſeiſing vpon their towns and cities, vntil he had ſubdued vnto himſelfe a right large territory: yet at length hauing in ſo many battels by him fought, and cities by him beſieged, loſt a great number of his people, and ſo wearied the reſt, as that they were not willing further to follow him; and fearing alſo with ſuch ſmall power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the country by him already gotten, in the midſt of ſo many enemies, he thought it beſt to depart thence, and to ſeek his better fortune elſewhere. At the ſame time it was rifely reported, that the affairs of Perſia, after ſo long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow again to ſome good quiet, the fury of the Tartars being now well abated, and that ſtorm ouerblown: wherefore Solyman reſolued now to returne home again, and to viſit his natiue country, of him and his people aboue all others deſired. So paſſing through Syria, (for thas was now his way) neer Aleppo he ſeiſed vpon a caſtle called Ziaber-Cala, and there ſtaid a ſpace for the refreſhing of his people. Afterward ſetting forward again, he came at length to the great and famous riuer Euphrates, ouer which he muſt needs paſſe, but finding there neither bridge nor foord, or other meanes to get ouer, he ſtood ſtill as a man diſmaid, not knowing what to doe. Stay there he would not, and go further he could not: his deſire bid him go, but the great riuer ſaid not ſo. In this perplexity Solyman himſelfe with his horſe oftentimes taking the riuer, in hope to haue found ſome paſſage; but finding none, aduenturing too far, was with the force of the ſtreame carried away, and ſo together with his horſe drowned. His body after long ſeeking being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried neere vnto the caſtle Ziaber, not long before by him taken: whereof they ſay the place is now in their tongue called Meſari-Zuruc, (viz.) the Turks Graue. Some of theſe Oguzian Turks, after the death of their Sultan, weary of their long trauell, ſeated themſelues in the countrey thereabouts, vnto whom the Turks that now hold that caſtle do refer their beginning. The reſt of that great tribe and family diuerſly diuided, went vnto diuers places as their fortunes led them; ſome of them into the waſt ground and deſarts of Arabia and Syria, and are at this day called the Damaſcene Turcomans: other ſome returned back againe into Romania, the ſame way that they came, of whom are diſcended the Turcomans of Iconium, and Anatolia: who yet with their wiues and children, as heardſmen in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their anceſtors.

Romania Aſiatica.

Solyman thus loſt, left foure ſons, Sencur Teken, Iundogdis, Ertogrul, of ſome called Orthobules (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turks empire that now is) and Dunder. With theſe foure brethren, moſt part of theſe Oguzian Turks that were left, returning into Romania (as is aforeſaid) after they had there reſted themſelues a while, marching vp along the riuer Euphrates, came to a place called Paſin-Ouaſi, about ten miles aboue Arterum, where Ertogrul and his brother Dunder, with foure hundred families, not willing to goe any further, ſtayed with their tents and carts, their beſt dwellings. Sencur and Iundogdis their other two brethren in the meane time paſsing the riuer, returned with the reſt into Perſia : whom we there leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brother and his three ſons ſtaid a while, and had diuers conflicts with the country people therabout, vntill that at length he thought it beſt to returne again into Romania. So ſetting forward, he came to Ancyra, and from thence vnto the blacke mountaines, and ſo to a plaine called of the Turks Sultan Vngi, about 75 miles Eaſtward from the city of Nice in Bithynia, where he had many skirmiſhes with the Chriſtians.

Now a great while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom we haue before ſpoken in the former part of this hiſtory) fled out of Perſia, had ſubdued diuers great prouinces and countries in Romania Aſiatica, or the leſſer Aſia, for ſo it is more truly called : ſo that he was of all the people thereabouts accounted a great Prince, and of the Turks themſelues honored with the name of their Vlu Padiſchach, viz. their great King or Emperor. Hauing placed his regall ſeat firſt at Sebaſtia, and afterwards at Iconium; which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein reigned, as did ſome few of his poſterity after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the honor, glory, and power of this great Sultan : but hauing three ſons, namely Iundus, Serugatin, and Othoman, ſent Serugatin his ſecond ſon (a bold well ſpoken man) to him, to requeſt him in that his ſo large a kingdome, as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to grant vnto them his poor exiled countrymen, of long time oppreſſed with diuers fortunes, ſome ſmall corner for them with their families and cattell to reſt in. Which his requeſt, the Sultan not forgetfull of his owne diſtreſſe ſometime in like caſe, graciouſly heard, and with great courteſie vſed the meſſenger. Now for the furtherance of his ſuit it fortuned that this Sultan before driuen out of Perſia by the Tartars, and by them alſo much troubled in theſe his new gotten countries in the leſſer Aſia, had with them diuers hot skirmiſhes and ſharpe conflicts : in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himſelfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beſet by his enemies, and in danger to haue loſt the day: when as Ertogrul, but newly come into the country, and willing to do the Sultan ſeruice, and awaiting all opportunities for the commending of himſelfe and his followers; vpon the ſudden vnlooked for, with foure hundred men came vpon the backs of the Tartars, then almoſt in poſſeſsion of a great victory, and ſo forcibly charged them, that vnable to endure the charge, and to maintaine the fight againſt the Sultan (whoſe men encouraged by this vnexpected aid, as by ſuccour ſent from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage, being both before and behind hardly beſet) they as men in diſpair of the victory they had before aſſured themſelues of, turned their backs and fled. After which good ſeruice, the Sultan honorably welcommed this new come Turke, giuing him his hand to kiſſe, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valor, commanded a rich cloake to be caſt vpon him (amongſt thoſe Eaſtern nations a great honor) and all his ſouldiers to be bountifully rewarded ; and preſently after gaue vnto Ertogrul and his Turks a country village called Suguta, betwixt the caſtle Belezuga and the mountain Tmolus in the greater Phrygia : in which village they might liue in Winter, and vpon the aforeſaid mountain, and the mountain Ormenius, betwixt the riuers Sangarius and Licus, feed their cattell in Summer. And yet not ſo contented thus to haue honored him, in whom he ſaw ſuch approued valor, committed to his protection that ſide of the countrey wherin he dwelt, being in the very frontiers of his kingdome : which his charge he ſo well looked vnto, that all the countrey thereabout, before much infeſted with the often incurſions of the enemy, was by his vigilant care and proweſſe well ſecured.

The Chriſtians of Cara Chiſar fall out with the Turks.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely heardſmen, become a petty Lord of a country village, and in good fauour with the Sultan : whoſe followers, as ſturdy heardſmen, with their families, liued in Winter with him in Suguta; but in Summer in tents, with their cattell vpon the mountains. Hauing thus liued certaine yeres, and brought great peace to his neighbors, as wel the Chriſtians as the Turks, before much troubled with the inuaſion of the Tartars; it fortuned that the Chriſtians of Cara-Chiſar (a caſtle thereby, called by the antient Greeks, Melanopyrgon, and of later time Maurocaſtron, that is to ſay, the blacke tower or caſtle) weary of their owne eaſe, and of the peace they had by his cares enioyed, fel out with him, and euill intreated both him and his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euil part, thereof and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turkes, ſo grieuouſly complained vnto the Sultan, that hee therewith mooued, raiſed a great army, and ſo himſelfe in perſon came and beſieged the caſtle. But lying there at the ſiege,news was brought him, that the Tartars with a great army,vnder the leading of one Baintzar,were entred into Caria,and there ſpoiling the country, had taken Heraclea. For the repreſſing of whom,the Sultan was glad to riſe with his army ; yet leauing a ſufficient ſtrength behind him for the continuing of the ſiege,vnder the charge of Ertogrul Beg,for ſo the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountring with the Tartars at Baga,ouerthrew them in a great battell:whilſt Ertogrul in the mean ſpace hardly beſieged Cara-Chiſar,wherein fortune ſo much fauoured him, that at length he took the caſtle,the ſpoile whereof he gaue vnto the ſouldiers,reſeruing only the fift part thereof,as due vnto the Sultan;which he ſent him for a preſent,together with the Captain of the caſtle, who he had taken aliue:which Captaine the Sultan afterward inlarged,and reſtored again to him his caſtle,for the payment of a yerely tribute, which he truly payd during the life of the Sultan ; but he dying about two yeares after, he refuſed any more to pay it, and ſo reuolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdome(for ſo the Turks call it)being dead at Iconium, after him ſucceeded Azatines his eldeſt ſon, and after him Iathatines his yonger brother : who ſlaine by Theodorus Laſcaris the Greeke Emperor, (as is before declared) after him ſucceeded in that kingdome another Iathatines, the ſon of Azatines, who was by the Tartars expulſed, and his kingdome ſubdued,as in the former part of this hiſtory it appeareth. After which time alſo the Selznocian family there by the Tartars in the leſſer Aſia depreſſed, retained ſcarce the name and ſhadow of their former maieſty and glory. In which troubleſome C times,and confuſion of the ſtate,Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe at Suguta,as well contented therewith as with a kingdome ; ſeeking by all means to keep peace on euery ſide with his neighbours,as well Chriſtians as others. In which quiet kind of life he ſweetly paſſed ouer the troubleſome times of Meſoot the ſon of Kei-Cubades,and of Kei-Cubades the ſon of Feramuzin,both Sultans,but the great Tartars tributaries, and reigning but at their pleaſure,vntill the time of the ſecond Aladin, the ſole and laſt heire of the Iconian kingdome,before by the Tartars diuided,which was no few yeares. All which time Ertogrul liued quiet at Suguta, as one amongſt many other of the Iconian Sultans ſub-iects,wiſely conſidering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in Perſia and at Iconium ; as alſo the ruine of his own houſe and family,both from royall ſtate brought almoſt to nothing: D and therfore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of neceſſity,contenting himſelfe with a little,bare himſelfe kindly towards al men. In which contented kind of life he grew to great yeares, with his three ſons, great beloued and honored of their neighbors,as well Chriſtians as Turks;and no leſſe fauoured by the ſecond Aladin then Sultan,than he had been of all the Sultans before him:whom the young men his ſons,after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with empty hands to ſalute their Princes) oftentimes viſited with one preſent or other. In all which his ſons were many good parts to be ſeen,yet ſo,as that in Othoman was eaſily to be ſeene a greater courage and ſpirit than in the other two his brethren:which was the cauſe that he was the more of them of his tribe regarded, but eſpecially of the youthfull and warlike ſort,which commonly reſorted vnto him when he went to hawke E or hunt,or to other delights of the field(the counterfeits of war)and was of them commonly called Oſman Gazi,viz.Oſman the Warlike.

Smal things in time of trouble yeeld vnto the Wiſe great content.

In this frontier countrey neer vnto Suguta,the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin diuers lieutenants and captaines, gouernors of his caſtles and ſtrong holds vpon thoſe frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and vnto whom he for friendſhip ſake oftentimes reſorted:but eſpecially to the captain of In-Vngi, for that he knew himſelfe to be of him well beloued,and therfore vnto him very welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as O-thoman,being yet but yong,was going to make merry with the gouernor of Eski-Chiſar(a ca-ſtle about 24 miles off, called of the Greekes, Palaocaſtron) by the way as he went, at a place called Itburne(a towne in Phrygia)chanced there to ſee, and afterwards to fall in liking of a F faire maiden, called Malhatun : vnto whom his affection dayly increaſing, he without his fathers knowledge ſent a ſecret friend of his to intreat with her of marriage. Which after long diſcourſe to her made concerning Othomans affection and requeſt, gaue him anſwer, that betwixt Othoman and her was great inequality, a thing eſpecially to be regarded and eſchewed of ſuch as wiſhed to liue a happy life in wedlock bands:ſhe was (as ſhe ſaid) but meanly born, and therefore was not to expect ſo great a match : whereas he could not want choice of other maids of more worth, & in all reſpects more anſwerable vnto himſelfe. But among other cauſes why ſhe gaue him this anſwer, one was, for that ſome that wiſhed her wel, had put into her head, that Othoman meant not indeed to marry her, but vnder that color to obtain of her ſome few days pleaſure, and ſo hauing diſhonored her, afterward again to caſt her off: which was indeed far from his thought ; for he the more inflamed with her modeſt deniall, the more deſired her for his wife. In the mean time Othoman going againe to the gouernor of Eski Chiſar, and courteouſly by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in ſpeech of his Loue, with greater affection than diſcretion, commending her beauty, her feature, and gracious perfections, not diſſembling alſo, to her greater praiſe, the repulſe by him receiued at her hands: which the gouernor hearing, ſeemed greatly to like of his choice, ſaying, that ſhe was by the diuine prouidence (for ſo the Turks religiouſly vſe to ſpeake) appointed only for him to haue. But in the meane time ſecretly inflamed with the immoderat commendation of Othoman, without reſpect of friendſhip, hee began to grow amorous of her himſelfe, whom he had neuer ſeen ; ſo light is that fooliſh affection: and that ſo farre, as that being otherwiſe a man of good diſcretion, he was not able to conceale or couer theſe new conceiued flames, but that Othoman by certain coniectures & tokens perceiued the ſame: and yet diſſembling the matter, as if he had ſuſpected nothing, being riſen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his truſty ſeruants, ſecretly ſent him away to certain of the maids friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, preſently to ſend her away to ſome place further off, for feare ſhe were not ere long taken from them by a great man more amorous of her perſon, than reſpectiue of her honour. And by and by after taking leaue of his vnfaithfull friend, and bidding him farewell, tooke his way to the Captain of In-Vngi, whom he knew to be his deere friend. But whilſt he there ſtayd certaine days, paſſing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthful diſports, with the captain his friend, the gouernor of Eski-Chiſar, who commanded all the country therabout called Sultan-Vngi, ſent one of his truſty ſeruants to Iburne, to ſee faire Malhatun, and how all things went there. Who comming thither, and vnderſtanding of her ſecret departure, and that by the aduertiſement from Othoman ſhe was conueighed to certaine of her friends afar off, at his returne, from point to point certified his maſter thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting aboue meaſure to ſee himſelfe ſo deluded by Othoman, preſently ſent vnto the Captaine of In-Vngi, (being within his iuriſdiction) to command him without delay to deliuer Othoman vnto him. But he louing of him well, as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreaty be perſuaded ſo to do. Wherefore the gouernour in a great rage preſently raiſing the greateſt power he was able to make, came to the caſtle of In-Vngi, requiring to haue Othoman forthwith deliuered vnto him. Where among the ſouldiers there in garriſon with the captaine, began to ariſe diuers opinions ; ſome wiſhing, for the auerting of the preſent danger for which they were now vnprouided, to haue him deliuered ; and other ſome abhorring ſo treacherous a fact, willing rather to indure all extremities. In the end, after much conſultation honeſty preuailed, and it was generally reſolued, that he ſhould be defended, who could not without their great infamy be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diuerſity of opinions, which had euen at firſt ſhewed it ſelfe; and thinking it not for his ſafety, to commit himſelfe to the truſt of ſuch wauering men, entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great aduenture, which was, by a ſudden ſally to make himſelfe way through the midſt of his enemies. Wherewith hauing made his brother Iundus and thoſe few his followers there preſent acquainted, & thereupon reſolued; he fiercely ſallyed out, and by plain force brake through the midſt of them, and ſo took his way towards Suguta, ſtil notably repulſing them that were ſent to purſue him: but being come into the frontiers of his fathers territory, & the report of his dangers known, and that being but weakely accompanied, he was by a great number of his enemies purſued; preſently all the luſty youths and ſuch as loued him well, tooke horſe to come to his reſcue: who meeting with the gouernors ſoldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a ſharp conflict ſlew diuers of them, and put the reſt to flight. Of whom ſome were alſo taken priſoners, & among the reſt one Michael Coſſe a Chriſtian, Captain of a little caſtle in that country, called Hirmen-Caia, or the rocke of Ormeni : Of whom Othoman taking compaſſion, freely pardoned him that offence. him,and did him great ſeruice in his wars:whoſe poſterity hath euer ſince euen vntil this our age continued,next vnto the Othoman family,moſt honourable and famous among the Turks; by the name of Michael Oglies, viz. the ſons or poſterity of Michael.

Ertogrul,now ſpent with age,ſhortly after died,in the yere of our Lord 1289. hauing liued 93 yeares,and thereof gouerned the Oguzian family after the death of his father Solyman,52. His death was of all his tribe and kinred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkiſh manner honorably buried at Suguta,where he had of long time liued.

After whoſe death, theſe plaine Oguzian Turkes, in a generall aſſembly conſulting whom they might chuſe for their Lord and gouernor in ſtead of old Ertogrul,caſting their eyes eſpecially vpon two, ſtood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although moſt men were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of body as mind, was to be preferred before the reſt of his brethren the ſons of Ertogrul;yet were there ſome, and they alſo men of great grauity and experience,who had in ſuſpect the yong mans age,as of it ſelfe ſlippery,and for the moſt part prone to vice,eſpecially in the liberty of great power,and therfore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls brother and Othomans vncle) a man of far greater grauity, iudgement, and experience. But Dunder himſelfe being indeed a wiſe man,and far from all ambition,perſwaded them in that choice not to haue any regard at all to his honor or preferment,but to conſider what were beſt for their ſtate and welfare in generall. For he prouidently foreſaw in what danger the Oguzian ſtate ſtood, expoſed on the one ſide to the mortall hatred and trecheries of the Greeks,grieued to ſee themſelues ſpoyled by the Turks,and naturally hating them for the Mahometan religion:and on the other ſide not ſurely backt by the Sultans of Iconium,brought in thraldome to the Tartars,and dayly grown weaker & weaker. Vnto which inconueniences and dangers (he ſaid) an old, weake and ouergrown body (as his was) could giue no help or remedy at al,but required the help of a wiſe,politick, vigilant,ſtirring, and valiant man, ſuch as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers ſonne. Thus before he came vnto the election, he in priuat declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Oguzian family: and afterward at their requeſt comming to the generall aſſembly, all mens minds and eyes now fixed vpon Othoman, he firſt of all (by his example to encourage the reſt) for the good of the Oguzian tribe, his ancient houſe and family, ſaluted him their great Lord and Gouernour,promiſing vnto him all loyalty,with the vtmoſt of his ſeruice: whereunto by and by enſued the great applauſe of the reſt of the people,as vnto a Gouernor ſent vnto them by God,vnto whom they ioyfully wiſhed all happy ſucceſſe, with long life, and a proſperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernour of the Oguzian Turks,and ſo became among them a great commander, and honoured with the title of Æſman-Beg,or the Lord Oſman. Yet was this his honor included in a ſmall circuit,plain and homely,without any great pomp or ſhew,as commanding amongſt rough & rude heardſmen and ſhepheards,not acquainted with the courteſie of other more ciuil nations:for as yet they were the ſame homely Scythian Nomades that they were before,and could not as yet be perſwaded to forſake their woonted rude and vnciuill manners, by long tradition receiued from their anceſtors,and ſo beſt agreeing with their nature & calling. Amongſt which rude E herdſmen,this new gouernor himſelfe, not too far exceeding the reſt in ciuility,commanded much like to another Romulus, of whom alſo the Turks report many ſuch things as do the Romanes of their founder, which for breuity I thought good to paſſe ouer.

For which cauſe Othoman was inforced to requeſt the captain of Bilezuga (another caſtle therby, alſo his neighbor and friend) that his people in paſſing that way to the mountains,might with their goods and cattel,as occaſion ſhould require,take the refuge of his caſtle,which the courteous captain (wel acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans F father) eaſily granted;yet with this prouiſo, that none ſhould with ſuch goods or cattell haue acceſſe into his caſtle:but the Turks women only:which his courteſie Othoman refuſed not:ſo was the caſtle of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge to the Turks women, who paſſing that way,and there ſhrouded with their goods and cattell,vſually preſented the captain with ſome one homely countrey Preſent or other, which afterwards was the loſſe of the caſtle.

Now it fortuned that Othoman euen in the beginning of his gouernment fell firſt at oddes with one Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicholas (captaine of Einegiol, a caſtle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpoſe troubled and moleſted theſe Oguzian heardſmen, in paſſing to and fro with their cattell by his caſtle. For which cauſe Othoman was inforced to requeſt the captain of Bilezuga (another caſtle therby, alſo his neighbor and friend) that his people in paſſing that way to the mountains, might with their goods and cattel, as occaſion ſhould require, take the refuge of his caſtle; which the courteous captain (wel acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans father) eaſily granted; yet with this prouiſo, that none ſhould with ſuch goods or cattell haue acceſſe into his caſtle: but the Turks women only: which his courteſie Othoman refuſed not: ſo was the caſtle of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge to the Turks women, who paſſing that way, and there ſhrouded with their goods and cattell, vſually preſented the captain with ſome one homely countrey Preſent or other, which afterwards was the loſſe of the caſtle.

F

Yet was not Othoman vnmindfull of the wrong done vnto his people, by his euill neighbor G the captain of Einegiol:but purpoſing to be thereof reuenged,made choice of ſeuenty of his beſt and moſt able men, whom he appointed ſecretly to paſſe the mountain Ormenius,and ſo if it were poſſible, to ſurpriſe or ſet on fire his enemies caſtle. Of which his deſignement the wary Captaine hauing intelligence by one of his eſpials, in place conuenient vpon the mountain laid a ſtrong ambuſh for the cutting off of ſuch as were by Othoman ſent to haue ſurpriſed his caſtle:whereof Othoman (no leſſe wary than he) before warned by his ſcouts,and augmenting the number of his men,marched directly to the place where the enemy lay. Where betwixt them (for ſo ſmall a number) was fought a right bloudy and cruell battell, and many ſlain on both ſides; amongſt whom Hozza, Othomans nephew was one. The victory neuertheles fell vnto Othoman : after which time his people in much more ſafety, fed their cattell in the H Summer time on the mountains,as the manner was, and ſo in quiet paſſed to and fro.

The Caſtle of Chalce ſurpriſed by Othomã.

The Chriſtians complain of the wrong don vnto them by the Turks.

Shortly after,Othoman by night ſurpriſed the little caſtle of Chalce,not far from Einegiol; and there without mercy he put to the ſword all the Chriſtians he found therein,and ſo afterward burnt the caſtle:which outrage was the beginning,and occaſion of great troubles thereof enſuing :for the Chriſtians of the countries adioyning, much grieued therewith, and aſſembling themſelues together,complained vnto the Captaine of Cara-Chiſar the greateſt commander thereabout,That theſe Turks,which not many yeres before were of meer pitty receiued as poore heardſmen into that country,began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands vpon the antient lands and poſſeſſions of the Chriſtians ; which inſolency (as they ſaid)if it were longer winked at, and ſuffered by him, and other ſuch men of account and authority as I were to reforme the ſame, they would no doubt in ſhort time driue both them and all the reſt of the Chriſtians out of their natiue countries : wherefore it were now high time, and more than neceſſary for him,and all the reſt,to awake (as it were) out of the dead ſleep wherein they had long time drowſily ſlept; and ioyning their forces together, to expulſe thoſe vnthankfull, incroching,and mercileſſe ſtrangers out of their countries:the miſchief(they ſaid)being now ſpred far,therefore needed ſpeedy remedy ; and that repentance would come too late when it was paſt cure. The Captaine moued with the indignity of the late fact,and iuſt complaint of the poore country people,ſent with all ſpeed a ſtrong company of ſouldiers,vnder the leading of Calanus his brother;with commandment that they ſhould march to the caſtle of Einegiol, and there to ioyne with the reſt of the Chriſtian forces. K

Othoman vnderſtanding of this preparation made againſt him,gathering his ſoldiers together,marched to a place called Opſicium, neere to mount Tmolus in Phrygia;where between him and the Chriſtians was fought a ſharp battell,wherein he loſt his brother Sarugatin(whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day)with many other of his ſoldiers. In this battell was alſo Calanus ſlaine, whoſe belly Othoman cauſed to be ripped, and his intrals to be pulled out,naming the place where he was buried, Meſari-Repec,viz. the Dog-graue,by which name the place is at this day known. The body of his brother Sarugatin he carried to Suguta, and there honorably buried it neer to the body of his father Ertogrul. Aladin Sultan of Iconium vnderſtanding of this conflict,was very ſorry for the loſſe happened vnto Othoman,being a Mahometan of his owne religion:wherefore in token of his good wil and fauour,he gaue vnto L him the city of Paleopolis,with all the territority thereunto belonging;giuing vnto him alſo leaue to beſiege,take or ſpoile,the ſeigniory and caſtle of Cara-Chiſar:for accompliſhment whereof he ſent vnto him both ſouldiers and munition. Othoman incouraged with this great bounty of the Sultans,ſtraightly beſieged the caſtle of Cara-Chiſar, which at laſt he woone, and ſlew all the Chriſtians therein:the captain he tooke aliue,whom he cruelly executed:the ſpoile of the caſtle he gaue vnto his ſoldiers,reſeruing only the fiſt part therof,which he ſent for a preſent to the Sultan. All this hapned in the yeare of our Lord 1290. This caſtle of Cara-Chiſar,with the reſt of Einegiol,Bilezuga,Chalce, and others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned,were all ſcituate in the borders of the greater Phrygia, or els neere therunto in the confines of Bithynia and Myſia:In which pleaſant countries (but lately M part of the Conſtantinopolitan empire)the Chriſtians the antient inhabitants thereof,as yet dwelt,intermingled with the Turks at the riſing of the Othoman empire ; with whom they liued at continuall jarres, vntill that at length they were by them altogether vtterly oppreſſed and extinguiſhed.

Othoman conſulteth with his brother Iundus what courſe to take for the oppreſſing of the chriſtians his neighbors.

Othoman encouraged with this good ſucceſſe, and ſupported by the great Sultan of Iconium, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit great matters, for the further increaſe of his honor and territory: yet not truſting altogether to his owne aduice, he entred into conſultation with his brother Iundus, which way was beſt to take to diſtreſſe and bring in ſubiection his neighbous the Chriſtians. In which caſe, Iundus a man of greater courage than diſcretion, aduiſed him with al celerity to vrge his good fortune, and preſently to inuade the Chriſtians already diſcouraged with the loſſe of Cara-Chiſar. But this counſell altogether pleaſed not Othoman; for (ſayd he(the caſtles and forts by vs gained, muſt be kept with ſtrong garriſons, otherwiſe they will againe be recouered of the enemy; which garriſons cannot be maintained and kept, if we ſpoyle or diſpeople the countries adioining vpon vs, for in ſo doing we ſhal (as it were) with our hands cut our owne throats: wherefore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amity and friendſhip with the Chriſtians round about vs; which league we will keep with ſome, and break with others, as ſhall ſerue beſt for our purpoſe. And according to this reſolution, he made peace indeed with all the Chriſtians, but ſpecially with Michael Coſſi, captain of Hirmen-Caia caſtle, of whom we haue before ſpoken, who afterward ſerued him to great vſe in the managing of his wars, and became alſo a renegat of the Mahometan religion. All this Othoman did the rather, becauſe he was then at great variance with one Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selzuccian family) who enuying at the riſing of Othoman, ſought by all means poſſible to hinder his greatnes, as did alſo the others his quietneſſe: which diſcord the Chriſtians liked well, as a meane for them to liue in more reſt by.

C In the meane time, Othoman deuiſed with all carefulnes to beautifie and ſtrengthen his new common people: and for the greater concourſe of people, built a faire temple in Cara-Chiſar for the exerciſe of the mahometan religion; appointed markets to be kept in al peaceable manner, in his great townes, granting great priuiledges to ſuch as reſorted thither, as well Chriſtians as Turks: vſing therein ſuch iuſtice, that all ſorts of people without feare, in hope of gaine reſorting thither, furniſhed his countrey and towns with all things neceſſary: yet this care of ciuill policy and gouernment, could not ſo withdraw him, but that according to his aſpiring mind, he had alwaies a greater deſire and care to inlarge his poſſeſſions and territory. Wherfore intending to make a rode into Bithynia, he requeſted Michael Coſſi, the Chriſtian captain before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was beſt to be done: who ſo politickly directed D him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great ſpoyle and more honour. This road ſo terrified moſt of the Chriſtians therabouts, that they were loth to giue Othoman any cauſe of offence, for feare leſt they ſhould by him be ſpoyled.

It fortuned about this time, that the captains of Bilezuga and Cupri-Chiſar falling at ods, he of Cupri-Chiſar firſt taking vp armes fiercely inuaded the captain of Bilezuga: who thereupon ſent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which he eaſily granted, and ſo without further delay preſently came to him with certaine companies of luſty tall ſouldiers. By whoſe comming, the captaine of Bilezuga not a little incouraged and ſtrengthened, ſet vpon his enemy: where betwixt them was made a ſharp conflict, and diuers on both ſides ſlaine: but the victory by the help of Othoman the Turke, at length inclining to the Bilezugian, the other vanquiſhed Cap- E taine in all haſt fled vnto his owne caſtle. After whom Othoman following, layd ſiege vnto the Caſtle, which at length he tooke together with the Captaine, whom he cauſed to be preſently ſlaine. It is ſtrange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezuga was, to haue ſo reuenged himſelf of his enemy, and to haue gained the victory: although it were indeed gotten, not ſo much by his owne valour as by the proweſſe of the Turke: for whom and his followers in token of his thankfulneſſe, he cauſed a great feaſt to be prouided in the countrey there, whereby he honourably entertained them: and in the end of the feaſt, cauſed garments of great price (according to the manner of the Eaſterne nations) to be giuen to Othoman, in token of his fauour; and his ſouldiers to be alſo bountifully rewarded: but this was done with ſuch a preſumptious ſtate and grace, as if he had been ſome great Prince, offering vnto the common ſouldiers F of the Turkes, in paſſing by them, his hand to kiſſe, as a great fauour. With which exceeding inſolency, Othoman was ſo much offended, that he had much adoe to hold his hands from him: yet repreſſing his anger, hee in ſecret imparted his diſcontentment vnto his couſin Dunder, his vncle Dunders ſonne, grieuouſly complayning of the intollerable pride of the Chriſtian captain, and of the diſgrace by him done to the Turks, in offering them his hand to kiſſe; requiring his opinion how he were for the ſame to be corrected: who but a little before, G being by the ſaid captaine made his lieutenant, franckely told his kinſman, That as then nothing was to be attempted againſt him: firſt, for that on the one ſide they had Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Selzuccian Turks) their enemy, and round about them beſides they were enuironed with the Chriſtians, whom he ſhould haue al in his neck at once if he ſhould offer the Bilezugian captaine any wrong. By which anſwer, Othoman perceiuing his coſins great affection towards the Chriſtian captain, and doubting to haue the miſchiefe he had imagined againſt him, by him reuealed, or at leaſtwiſe hindered; without more ado ſuddenly taking vp his bow in his hand, with an arrow ſhot him quite through, and ſo ſlew him.

Not long after, Michael Coſsi the captaine of Hirmen-Caia, Othomans great friend, hauing concluded a marriage between a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the H Chriſtian captaines of the caſtles thereabouts, requeſting them to come to the marriage, and the rather, that ſo they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whoſe power began now to grow dreadfull vnto them: hoping that ſuch means might be found at that merry meeting, that all being made friends, euery man might in more ſecurity poſſeſſe his own without feare of being ſpoiled by him. Vnto this mariage came all theſe bidden gueſts, bringing with them ſuch preſents as they thought good to beſtow vpon the new married folkes, according to the maner of the country: but Othomans gifts far exceeded al the reſt, who beſides many other rich things, gaue vnto them whole flocks and droues of ſheep and cattel: which thing drew all the Chriſtian captains into no little admiration of his bounty; inſomuch that they began to ſay among themſelues, that Othomans wealth and good fortune did portend ſome greater matter, I to their vtter ruin and fall: which to preuent, they thought it beſt by ſecret means to compaſſe his death. The execution of which deuice they referred to the captaine of Bilezuga, as vnto one with him beſt acquainted. This captain was of great wealth, credit, and authority among the Chriſtian rulers thereabouts, but very full of craft and diſsimulation: which his euill diſpoſition, Othoman of long time well perceiued; yet hauing occaſion to vſe him, in ſubtill manner gaue him (in outward ſhew) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debaſing himſelfe as plaine and poore in compariſon of him. But to giue a beginning to this trecherous deuiſe, the captaine meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him, how that he intended ſhortly to marry the daughter of the Captaine of Iar-Chiſar, earneſtly requeſting him to honour that his marriage with his preſence, of the time whereof, he ſaid he would giue K him farther knowledge afterwards: and all was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his danger, not fearing any ſuch treaſon. Othoman vnderſtanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, ſent thither a preſent of certain fat oxen and ſheep, in the name of his brother Iundus, for the captains prouiſion againſt the marriage; certifying him, that Othoman himſelfe, with his ſimple retinue, would be preſent at the marriage; and then preſent him, not with ſuch preſents as were agreeable vnto his honour, yet ſuch as his poore ability could afford. This meſſage with the Preſents were wonderfull welcome to the Captaine, hoping aſſuredly that his deuiſed trechery would take ſuch effect as he wiſhed: and therefore calling vnto him Michael Coſsi, in whom he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt, declared to him his whole deuiſe (whereof he was not before altogether ignorant) requeſting him to take the pains to go vnto Othoman to bring L him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed & at hand; which he knew Coſsi might eaſily do, being of his familiar acquaintance: and in token of great friendſhip, he ſent to Othoman by the ſame meſſenger, a preſent of gilt plate. Coſsi tooke vpon him this meſſage, which when he had deliuer'd to Othoman, he found him very willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Coſsi inwardly grieuing to ſee ſo braue a man, and his kind friend, by ſuch trecherous maner to be brought to his end, moued with compaſsion, diſcouered vnto him the whole conſpiracy of the captaine againſt him, and of the plot laid for his deſtruction, willing him to take heed vnto himſelfe: for which verture, Othoman gaue Coſsi great thankes, as to his friend for ſauing his life; and withall richly rewarded him, promiſing greater matters if he would continue that his faithfull friendſhip. Now concerning the captain of Bilezuga (ſaith M he) at your return recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my ſelfe much bound vnto him for many courteſies, but eſpecially for that he hath heretofore diuers times in moſt friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the ſafegard of his caſtle: which his friendſhip I moſt humbly requeſt him to continue for one yeare more, inforced thereunto by reaſon of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the Prince Germean-Ogli, as he well knoweth: wherfore if it might ſo ſtand with his good pleaſure, I would preſently ſend vnto his Caſtle ſuch things as I make moſt reckoning of, requeſting him once more to be the faithful keeper therof, as he hath bin before: and telling him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, deſire nothing more than to find opportunitie to be acquainted with the honourable Lade his mother; for which cauſe, if it pleaſe him, I will bring them both with mee to the mariage. This Othomans requeſt when the Captain of Bilezuga vnderſtood by Michael Coſſi, he ſent the ſame Coſſi back again to haſten his comming, willing him to bring with him what gueſts he pleaſed; appointing the certain time and place when and where the mariage ſhould be ſolemniſed. And becauſe the caſtle of Bilezuga was thought to be too little, conueniently to receiue the multitude of people that were expected at the mariage, there was another open place of greater receit appointed in the country for that purpoſe, about 3 miles diſtant from the caſtle. The mariage day drew nigh, wherunto Othoman muſt repaire for his promiſe ſake: and therfore prepared with all diligence to ſet forward, and to put in execution what he had deuiſed for his own ſafety, and deſtruction of his enemy. Othoman had of long accuſtomed in dangerous times to ſend by cariage the beſt of his things made vp in packs, to be kept in ſafety in the caſtle of Bilezuga: vnder colour wherof he now made great packs in form as he was wont; but in ſtead of his rich houſhold-ſtuffe and other things of price he thruſt in armed men, couering thoſe packs with homely couerings; ſending them by cariages to the caſtle of Bilezuga, charging that they ſhould not come thither before twilight. After that, he apparelled certain of his beſt ſoldiers in womans attyre, as if it had bin his wife & mother in law with their women: ſo caſting his journy, that he with theſe diſguiſed ſoldiers and the other ſent in packs, might at one inſtant meet at the caſtle aforeſaid. The captain being now in the country, & vnderſtanding that Othoman was comming in the euening with a great train of gentlewomen; thought the cauſe of his late comming to be, for that the Turkiſh women vſe to ſhun the ſight of Chriſtian men by all means they can. Othoman being now come to the place in the country where the mariage was the next day to be ſolemniſed, hauing done his humble reuerence to the Captain, requeſted him to do him the honor, that his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be ſent to his Caſtle, there to haue ſome conuenient lodging, where they might alight and beſtow themſelues apart from others, according to the homely manners of their nation, leſt peraduenture the preſence of ſo honourable a company of noblemen and gallants might put them out of countenance: Which the Captain granted, & hauing ſaluted them afar off after the Turkiſh maner, commanded them to be conueied to his caſtle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the ſame time that theſe diſguiſed ſouldiers arriued at the caſtle, came thither alſo the other ſoldiers couered in packs in the cariages; who ſo ſoon as as they came into the caſtle, ſuddenly leaping out of the packs and drawing their ſhort ſwords, with the help of their diſguiſed fellows ſlew the warders of the caſtle, and without more ado poſſeſſed the ſame; the greateſt part of the Captains people being before gon out of the caſtle to the place of the mariage. Othoman hauing taried ſo long with the Captaine, as he ſuppoſed the Caſtle at that time was by his men ſurpriſed; ſo ſoon as the Captain had taken his chamber, ſuddenly took horſe with all his followers, accompanied alſo with Coſſi, taking his way directly to the caſtle of Bilezuga. Of whoſe ſudden departure the Captain vnderſtanding, preſently took horſe and purſued him with all his train (which were for the moſt part drunk) and ouertaking him before he came to the Caſtle, ſet vpon him; in which conflict he was by Othoman ſlain, and the reſt put to flight.

The captaine of Bilezuga treacherouſly ſeeking the death of Othoman, is by him, himſelf ſlaine.

The ſame night Othoman vſing great celeritie, early in the morning ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Iarchiſar, where alſo he took priſoner the Captain therof, with his fair daughter Lulufer (who ſhould haue bin maried vnto the Captain of Bilezuga the next day) with all her friends, as they were ready to haue gon vnto the mariage: which fair Lady he ſhortly after maried vnto his eldeſt ſon Orchanes, who had iſſue by her Amurath third King of the Turkes, and Solyman Baſſa.

Othoman omitting no opportunitie, preſently ſent one of his Captains called Durgut-Alpes, a man of great eſteem and valor, to beſiege the caſtle of Einegiol. Wherin he vſed ſuch celeritie, that preuenting the fame of that was done at Bilezuga, hee ſuddenly enuironed the Caſtle in ſuch ſort that none could paſſe in or out; vntill ſuch time as that Othoman hauing brought his priſoners and prey to the caſtle of Belizuga, and there hauing ſet all things in good order, came with the reſt of his men of war to Einegiol, which he preſently by force took promiſing the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers. The captaine called Hagio Nicholaus his antient enemy, he cauſed to be cut in ſmall pieces, and all the men to be ſlaine; which crueltie he vſed, becauſe they a little before had vſed the like tyranny againſt his Turks.

Othoman by adminiſtration of iuſtice ſtrengthneth his gouernment

When Othoman had thus got into his ſubiection a great part of the ſtrong caſtles and forces of the greater Phrygia, with the territory to them belonging, he began with all carefulnes to make good lawes, and to execute iuſtice to all his ſubiects as well Chriſtians as Turkes; with great indifferencie ſtudying by all means to keep his countrey in peace and quietneſſe, and to protect his ſubiects from the ſpoile of others, as well Chriſtians as Turks: whereby it came to paſſe, that the old inhabitants which had for the moſt part forſaken the countrey, by reaſon of the great troubles therein, repaired now againe to their antient dwellings; and not only they, but many other ſtrangers alſo, ſupplying the places of them whom the late warres had conſumed. So that by his good gouernment, that waſted countrey in ſhort time grew to be againe very populous.

The city of Nice beſieged by Othoman.

The ciuill gouernment of his countrey well eſtabliſhed, he beſieged the city of Iſnica, in antient time called Nice, a city of Bithynia, famous for the generall Councell there holden againſt Arius in the time of Conſtantine the Great. This city he brought into great diſtreſſe, by placing his men of war in forts new built vpon euery paſſage and way leading to the ſame, ſo that nothing could be brought out of the countrey for the reliefe of the poore citiſens. They in this extremity by a ſecret meſſenger certified the Emperour of Conſtantinople (vnder whoſe obedience they were) in what diſtreſſe the city ſtood; and that except he ſent them preſent reliefe, they muſt of neceſſity either periſh with famine, or yeeld themſelues into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The Emperor moued with the pittifull complaint of this meſſenger, with all expedition embarked certain companies of ſouldiers from Conſtantinople to relieue his beſieged city. But Othoman vnderſtanding by his eſpials, where theſe ſouldiers were appointed to land, in ſecret manner withdrawing moſt of his forces from the ſiege, lay in ambuſh neer to the ſame place where the Emperors ſoldiers (caſting no perill) landed; who before they could put themſelues in order of battell were by Othoman and his Turks in ſuch ſort charged, that moſt part of them were there ſlaine, and the reſt driuen into the ſea, where they miſerably periſhed. Othoman hauing thus politickely ouerthrown the Conſtantinopolitan ſouldiers, returning to the ſiege, continued the ſame in ſtraiter maner than before. The beſieged citiſens driuen into great penury, and now diſpairing of al help, yeelded themſelues with the great and rich city of Nice into the hands of Othoman, with the ſpoile wherof he greatly inriched his men of war.

Aladin the great Sultan of Iconium, glad to heare of the good ſucceſſe of Othoman againſt the Chriſtians, in token of his fauour and loue, ſent vnto him a faire enſigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a ſword and princely robe, with large charters, That whatſoeuer he took from the Chriſtians ſhould be all his owne; and alſo that publicke prayers ſhould be ſaid in al the Turks temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and proſperous eſtate; which two things properly belonged to the dignity of the Sultan. Theſe extraordinary fauours gaue occaſion for many to think, that Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptiue ſon and ſucceſſor in his kingdome.

The preſents and charters ſent him, Othoman humbly accepted, ſending to Aladin the fifth part of the ſpoile of Nice, taken from the Chriſtians; but the princely honors due to the Sultan only, he vſed not during the life of Aladin: intending not long after to haue gon himſelfe in perſon to viſit the Sultan, and ſo to haue grown into his further fauor. But hauing prepared all things for ſo honourable a iourny, at what time as he was about to ſet forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin; and that Sahib (one of his great counſellors) had taken vpon him the dignity of the Sultan (as is before declared:) which newes much diſcontented the aſpiring mind of this Oguzian Turk, in good hope to haue ſucceeded him in the kingdom, or at leſtwiſe to haue ſhared the greateſt part thereof vnto himſelfe, whereof he was now altogether diſappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honours before graunted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modeſty ſake had forborn, Aladin yet liuing; wherefore he made one Durſu ſirnamed named Fakitche, (viz. a man learned in the Turkiſh law) Biſhop and Iudge of Cara-Chiſar, commanding the publick praiers which were wont to be made for the health and proſperous reigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his owne name; which was firſt openly done by the ſaid Biſhop in the pulpit of Cara-Chiſar. At the ſame time alſo he began to coin money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or a King: which was about ten yeares after the death of his father Ertogrul, and in the yere of our Lord 1300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turks is vnder the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

Neapolis the firſt regall city of the Othomā Kings.

When Othoman had thus taken vpon him the maieſty of a King, hee made his ſon Orchanes Prince and gouernor of Cara-Chiſar; promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours of other ſtrong caſtles and forts, diuers of which places retaine the name of thoſe captains at this day. He himſelfe made choice of the city Neapolis, about twenty miles from Nice, to ſeat his regall Palace in; where alſo diuers of his nobility built them houſes, and changed the name of the city, calling it Deſpotopolis, as who ſhould ſay, the city of the Lord or Prince. For all this, Othoman ceaſed not to deuiſe by all meanes he could, to augment his kingdome: and for that cauſe being accompanied with his ſon Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning vpon him, ſurprizing ſuch places as might beſt ſerue his purpoſe, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearſe were tedious.

Pruſa beſieged by Othoman.

The Chriſtian Princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing leſt the greatnes of Othoman might in ſhort time be their vtter confuſion, agreed to ioyne all their forces together, and ſo to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne eſtates with his: according to which reſolution, the Chriſtian confederate Princes, which were for the moſt part of Myſia, and Bithynia, leuying the greateſt forces they were able to make, with fire and ſword inuaded Othomans kingdome: who hauing knowledge before hand of this great preparation made againſt him, had in a readineſſe all his captains and men of warre: and hearing that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with him in the confines of Phrygia and Bithynia, fought with them a great and mortall battell, wherein many were ſlain on both ſides, as well Turks as Chriſtians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloudy victory. In this battell Caſtelianus, one of the greateſt Chriſtian captains was ſlain: another called Tekenſis of the countrey which he gouerned in Phrygia, chaſed by Othoman vnto the caſtle of Vlubad, not farre diſtant from the place where the battell was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the ſame caſtle, and was afterward by Othomans commandement moſt cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his chiefe caſtle: which Othoman afterward ſubdued, with all the country thereabouts. The other Chriſtian Princes and captaines ſaued themſelues by flying into ſtronger holds farther off. The Prince of Bithynia chiefe author of this warre, fled into the ſtrong city, Pruſa, which the Turks now call Buruſa, whether Othoman not long after led his army, in hope to haue woon the ſame: but finding it not poſſible to bee taken by force began preſently at one time to build two great and ſtrong caſtles vpon the chief paſſages leading to the city, which caſtles he with great induſtry finiſhed in one yeare: and in the one, placed as captaine Actemeur his nephew; in the other one Balabanzuck, both men of great courage, and ſkilfull in feats of warre: and in this ſort hauing blocked vp the city of Pruſa, ſo that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he ſubdued the moſt part of Bithynia; and ſo returned home, leauing the two caſtles well manned with ſtrong garriſons, vnder the charge of the captaines before named.

Othoman returning home to Neapolis, honorably rewarded his ſoldiers, according to their deſerts, eſtabliſhing ſuch a quiet & pleaſing gouernment in his kingdom, that people in great number reſorted from far into his dominions, there to ſeat themſelues: whereby his kingdom became in few yeares exceeding populous, and he for his politick gouernment moſt famous. And ſo liuing in great quietneſſe certaine yeares, being now become aged and much troubled with the gout; his old ſoldiers accuſtomed to liue by the wars, abhorring peace, came to him, requeſting him as it were with one voice, to take ſome honourable war in hand, for the inlarging of his kingdom, with great cheerfulnes offring to ſpend their liues in his ſeruice, rather than to grow old in idlenes: which frowardneſſe of his men of war greatly pleaſed him, and ſo giuing them thanks, for that time diſmiſt them, promiſing that he would not be long vnmindfull of their requeſt. But yet thinking it good ro make all things ſafe at home before he took G any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Coſſi the onely Chriſtian Captain whom for his great deſerts he had at all times ſuffred to liue in quiet with his poſſeſſions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire means (if it might be) to perſuade him to forſake the Chriſtian Religion, and become a follower of Mahomets, ſo to take away all occaſion of miſtruſt: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then forgetting all former friendſhip, to make war vpon him as his vtter enemy. Wherupon Coſſi was ſent for, being perſuaded by the meſſenger, that Othoman had ſent for him, becauſe he had occaſion to vſe his wonted faithfull counſell & ſeruice in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Coſſi thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which enſued, came accompanied with ſuch ſoldiers as he thought to vſe in that ſeruice: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnder- H ſtanding the very cauſe why he was ſent for, and ſeeing danger eminent on euery ſide, kiſſing Othomans hand, after the maner of the Turks, requeſted him in courteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometan religion, which he promiſed euer after to embrace: And ſo ſaying certaine words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the contentment of Othoman & his nobility. For which his reuolting, Othoman preſently gaue him an enſigne and a rich robe, tokens wherby the Mahometan Sultans aſſure their vaſſals of their fauour and the vndoubted poſſeſſion of ſuch land and liuing as they then hold.

Michael Coſſi turneth Turk.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his ſouldiers, inuaded the countries bordering vpon him, tooke many ſtrong caſtles and forts, ſubdued the moſt part of Phrygia, Miſia, and Bithynia, and other great regions, vnto the Euxin ſea: and being now very aged and I diſeaſed as is aforeſaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to go into the field in perſon himſelfe, oftentimes ſent his ſonne Orchanes againſt his enemies; who to the imitation of his father atchieued many great enterpriſes, Othoman his father yet liuing.

Now happily might the conſiderate reader (and not without iuſt cauſe) maruel, what dead ſleep had ouerwhelmed the Greeke Emperors of thoſe times; firſt Michael Paleologus, and afterwards his ſonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and ſtill reſiant at Conſtantinople, thus to ſuffer the Turks (not Othoman for he as yet bare no ſway; but others the ſharers of Sultan Aladins Kingdome) to take their cities, ſpoyle their countries, kil their ſubiects, and daily to incroch vpon them in the leſſer Aſia, and eſpecially in Bithynia, ſo neere vnto them, and as it were euen vnder their noſes: But let him with me, here as in a moſt conuenient place but K breathe a little, and conſider the troubled ſtate of that declining Empire, now haſting to an end; and he ſhal plainly ſee the cauſes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diſeaſed body quite ouerthrown and ſicke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the aſpiring Turks. Michael Paleologus hauing by great trechery obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune recouered alſo the city of Conſtantinople from Baldwin the Emperor (as is in the former part of this Hiſtory declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the Weſt, but eſpecially of Charles king of Sicilia, then a prince of great fame and power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late Emperor) ceaſed not to ſolicite for the reſtitution of him againe into his Empire, and to haue alſo ioyned with him a neere bond of affinity, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his ſonne: to auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, by his Embaſſadors offe- L red vnto Gregory the tenth, then Biſhop of Rome, to vnite and confirme the Greeke Church vnto the Latine, and to acknowledge the Biſhops ſupremacy, in ſuch ſort as that it ſhould be lawful for any man to appeale vnto the Court of Rome, as vnto the higher and moſt excellent Court; of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promiſing to performe what he had before requeſted, for the keeping of Charles otherwiſe buſied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of Religion in the Greek Church ſhould be made, Ioſeph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gaue vp his place, and ſhortly after forſaking the city, retired himſelfe into a monaſtery neer vnto the ſtreit of Boſphorus, where he at quiet deuoutly ſpent the reſt of his life. The reſt of the clergy alſo diſcontented with this innouation, in their ſermons openly inueighed againſt it, perſuading the people not to receiue it; crying out, That M now was come the time of their trial, the time of their martyrdome, and the time wherin they were to receiue the glorious crown of their painfull ſufferings; inſomuch, that great tumults were therupon raiſed, and all the city and country in an vproare: for it was not the clergy only, and the vulgar people by them moued, which diſliked & abhord theſe the Emperors proceedings,

ings, & made theſe ſtirs, but many of the better ſort, yea, of the chiefe magiſtrats themſelues lſo. So that Michael Paleologus the Emperor leauing all other forrein buſines, was enforced to onuert all his power and ſtudy vnto the appeaſing of theſe domeſticke troubles, as deeming hem of greater danger than thoſe abroad. And firſt to perſuade his diſcontented ſubjects, he old them, That this alteration was made not for any good liking he had thereunto, but in reſpect of the dangerouſnes of the time: and that it was a point of wiſedome, to foreſee dangers hanging ouer our heads, & not to delay, if any thing were to be altred, for the auerting therof: for if the enemies (as he ſaid) ſhould come, the city yet in many places rent, or but lately repalred, and as it were but newly raiſed from death to life, the preſent miſchiefs would be far greater than thoſe forepaſſed, and that then their enemies would become lords not of their religion and ceremonies only, but of all at once, their wiues, their children, & whatſoeuer els they had: where their liberty changed into bondage, they ſhould be conſtrained to conforme themſelues not with their bodily ſeruice only, but euen with their minds alſo, vnto the wills of the Latines their enemies. And that ſo it would come to paſſe, that no man ſhould be able to keep the old cuſtoms and maners of their anceſtors, but ſhould ſee euen their moſt ſacred rites and ceremonies changed & quite ouerthrown. Which he carefully foreſeeing, had not (as he ſaid) refuſed to yeeld vnto neceſſity, and as wiſdome would, neglected a little harme in reſpect of a greater benefit; and in the leſſe to haue yeelded vnto his enemies, to enjoy the benefit of the greater. With which the emperors perſuaſion ſome were moued, and ſo held themſelues contented: and ſome others not; againſt whom he was inforced to vſe other more ſeuere remedies, as againſt his rebellious ſubjects: of whom ſome he impriſoned, ſome he baniſhed, ſome he tormented, ſome he diſmembred, ſome he bereft of their ſight, or confiſcated their goods, vſing (in briefe) all the means whereby the minds of the reſolute or the weake were to be moued. All which things, they whoſe zeale was grounded vpon knowledge (in number feweſt) with patience indured: but the greater part void of judgement, and the refuſe of the people in ſimple attire, ranne rogueing abroad, ſome into Peloponeſus, ſome into Thracia, ſome into Achaia, & ſome as far as Colchos, as men perſecuted for their conſcience, not regarding greatly whither, ſo it were out of the emperors juriſdiction, and ſomthing fitting their own humors; neither conforming themſelues vnto the religion then commonly by the emperor eſtabliſht, neither yet agreeing among themſelues, but taking vnto them diuers names, ſome as the diſciples of Arſenius, ſome of Ioſeph, and ſome of others; ſome of them, themſelues deceiued, and deceiuing others alſo. Thus for the auoiding of forrein danger out of the Weſt, was the Empire at home no little indangered, and the ſtate therof ſhaken. Wherewith the Emperor was ſo encombred, as that he had no leiſure to prouide for the tempeſt ariſing by the Turks out of the Eaſt, but was inforced wholly to imploy himſelf & al his indeauors to the keeping of his people & ſubjects in their due obedience at home. All whoſe deep deuiſes, firſt in aſpiring to the empire, no way vnto him due, & great trauels afterwards for the aſſuring of the ſame to himſelfe and his poſterity, againſt all right, euen with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeelding him in the winding vp of all, not ſo much as credit of an honorable ſepulture: but dying in theſe troubles not far from Liſymachia, as he was making preparation againſt the prince of Theſſalie, was there by his ſon Andronicus his commandement (for whoſe aduancement he had ſtrained both his faith and honor) obſcurely buried in a field, a good way from his camp, as vnworthy of a better ſepulture, for reuolting from the antient religion of his anceſtors, although his obſequies were for faſhion ſake afterward with ſome ſolemnity celebrated. This was the end of the great emperor Michael Paleologus, in whoſe time the Turks, the ſucceſſors of Aladin, greatly incroched vpon him in the leſſer Aſia, as is in part before declared: a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the body and the mind, had he not for the aduancement of himſelfe and his poſterity, ſtained the ſame with foule treachery and apoſtacie: for which (as ſome ſay) he euer after liued in conſcience troubled, and dying was euen by his own ſon not thought worthy of an honorable funerall. A notable example vnto all ſuch as with agreedineſſe ſeeke after vaine glory, and fooliſhly expoſe themſelues vnto ſuch aduentures, as oftentimes ouerwhelme their deepeſt deuices, hauing in themſelues no certainty, preferring their inordinate deſires (either for themſelues or their poſterity) before that which is good and vertuous. Twice wretched in ſo doing; firſt in their folly, and then in their indeauors: who beſide that they finde God himſelfe againſt their deſignes and purpoſes, they by and by alſo euidently meet with other things than what they had for- caſted, contrary vnto them; and ſo themſelues oftentimes, contrary to their expectation, caſt headlong into extreame miſery: for lo, euen he of whom we now ſpeake, otherwiſe a man of great wiſedome, and happie in his doings, ouercome with his affection towards his children, in deſiring to leaue vnto them the Empire, when as he ought to haue caſt all the care both of himſelfe and of them, eſpecially vpon the prouidence of God; he like a blind man following his owne deepe conceits, not grounded vpon the feare of God, but vpon mans wiſedome onely, caſt himſelfe before he was aware, into miſerable troubles, and became odious euen vnto his ſubjects, and them alſo for whom he had forgot himſelfe. For whereas God had euen from his childhood allotted vnto him the Empire (as was by many euident ſignes and tokens to haue beene gathered) if he could haue moderated his vntimely deſires, kept his tongue from perjury, and his hands from blood, and not turned out of the way after ſtrange doctrine; he had by many degrees excelled euen the beſt Emperors his predeceſſors: whereas now he lieth obſcurely buried, ſhrouded in the ſheet of defame, H the report of his foule and faithleſſe dealings far exceeding all his other worthy vertues.

Andronicus Paleologus ſucceeding his father in the Empire, and thinking by reſtoring again the gouernment of the church, together with the rites and cuſtomes of the Greeks, to haue appeaſed all ſuch troubles as were before by his father raiſed, by bringing in thoſe of the Latines; found himſelfe therein much deceiued, and his troubles no leſſe than his fathers: they which had before receiued the Latine cuſtomes, and well liking of them, with great obſtinacie defending the ſame; and the other of the contrary faction now countenanced by the Emperor, without modeſty or meaſure inſulting vpon them: whereof aroſe exceeding great ſtirs and troubles, eſpecially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the incroching Turks, who in the mean time ceaſed not by all means to increaſe their territories in Aſia; and I not only there, but in the Iſlands of the Mediterranean ſea alſo. For Andronicus by the death of Charles King of Sicily, deliuered of the greateſt feare for which both he and his father before him had to their great coſt and charge both built and maintained a ſtrong fleet of gallies; now perſuaded by ſome, whoſe action and ſpeeches were after the manner of the Court, all framed vpon the Princes appetite, (as the readieſt way to thriue, without reſpect of the common good) to ſpare that needleſſe charge (as they termed it) which yerely coſt him more than any thing elſe; had diſcharged all his mariners and ſea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laid vp, ſome in one creeke, ſome in another; where neglected and not looked vnto, they in time for the moſt part rotted and periſhed. As for the marriners, they went ſome one way, ſome another, as their fortunes led them, to ſeeke for their liuings in forrein countries, euen K with the Emperors enemies; and ſome gaue themſelues to husbandry, thinking it better by doing ſomething to liue, than by ſitting ſtil to periſh. Which good husbandry at the firſt ſeemed to be very profitable vnto the Emperour, but eſpecially vnto ſuch as being neere vnto him, and couetouſly giuen, made ſmall reckoning of all other the moſt neceſſary defences of the empire, in compariſon of hoording vp of mony, vntill that it was afterward too late by experience found hereof to haue ſprung many great miſchiefes, vnto the great weakning of the Greeke Empire. For beſides, that the Turks without let did great harme on the ſea; the Pyrats now out of feare of the Emperours gallies, at their pleaſure tooke the ſpoile of the rich Iſlands in the Mediterranean, and robbed the towns all along the ſea coaſt, to the vnſpeakable griefe of the poore country people: and yet not ſo contented, came with their gallies, ſome- L time two, ſometime three, and ſometime moe, as it were in contempt, euen cloſe vnto the Imperiall city. Yea, the Venetians were ſo bold, as vpon a right ſmall diſpleaſure to rifle and afterward to ſet fire vpon the ſuburbs thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the Emperors fleet been preſerued and maintained in the wonted ſtrength.

At the ſame time alſo Andronicus the Emperor (to the great hindrance of the affaires of the empire, and aduantage of the forrein enemy) was not a little troubled with a jealous ſuſpition of his brother Conſtantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had ſought to haue aſpired vnto the empire; ſeeking by all means to win vnto himſelfe the loue and fauor of all men, but eſpecially of the nobility both at home & abroad, and ſo by that means to mount vnto the height of his deſires: All which (as moſt men thought) were but meere ſlanders, maliciouſly M deuiſed by ſuch as enuying at his honor, & taking occaſion by the emperors ſuſpition, ceaſed not to increaſe the ſame, vntill they had wrought his vnworthy deſtruction. The firſt ground of this falſe ſuſpition in the Emperors head, was, for that, that this Conſtantine euen from his childehood, was for many cauſes, better beloued of the old Emperour his father, than Andronicus, dronicus, as better furniſhed with thoſe gifts of nature which beautifie a Prince, and of a more urteous behauior than was his brother: inſomuch that had he not bin the yonger brother, his father could willingly haue left him his ſucceſſor in the empire. This was one and the chiefeſt cauſe of the emperors grudge, and the ground of his ſuſpition. Yet was there another alſo, and that not much leſſe than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue ſeparated from the empire a great part of Theſſalia & Macedonia, and to haue made him abſolute Prince thereof; and had haply ſo done, had he not bin by death preuented: which thing alſo much grieued Andronicus, and the more inſenced him againſt his brother. Which his ſecret hatred he for all that, according to his wiſedome, cunningly diſſembled, not only during the time that his father liued, but three yeres after his death alſo, making ſhew of the greateſt loue and kindeneſſe towards him that was poſſible. Conſtantine in the meane time, of ſuch great reuenues as were by his father aſſigned vnto him, reaping great profit, moſt bountifully beſtowed the ſame vpon his followers and fauorits, and others that made ſute vnto him, as well the meaner ſort as the greater, and with his ſweet behauiour woon vnto him the hearts of all men: for affability and curteſie in high degree eaſily allureth mens minds, as do faire floures in the ſpring the paſſengers eies. This was the precept of the wiſe Indians, That the higher a Prince was in dignity, and the more curteous he ſhewed himſelfe vnto his inferiors, the better he ſhould be of them beloued. He therfore that ſhould for the two firſt cauſes blame Conſtantine, ſhould do him wrong; as both proceeding not of himſelfe, but of his fathers too much loue: but in the third he was not altogether blameleſſe; for if for want of experience he prodigally gaue ſuch gifts, as for the moſt part might haue beſeemed the Emperor himſelfe, he ignorantly erred, yet did he no little offend: but if he knew, that for his too profuſe bounty he could not be vnſuſpected of his brother, and yet without regard held on that courſe, he was greatly to be blamed therein. For if nothing elſe might haue moued him, yet he ſhould haue conſidered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had ſorted, and how many it had brought to vntimely end. So although perhaps that Conſtantine meant no harme vnto his brother, or any way to ſupplant him, yet did not theſe things a little increaſe and aggrauate the former ſuſpitions, and open the eares of the Emperour his brother vnto ſuch calumniations as commonly attend vpon immoderate bounty. But to returne to our purpoſe, this honorable Conſtantine then liued in Lydia, but lately married, and in good hope long to liue, being not paſt thirty yeres old: but pleaſantly ſpending the time with his wife at Nymphea in Lydia, at ſuch time as he was thus ſecretly accuſed vnto his brother, the Emperour thought it good, as vpon other occaſions of buſineſſe, to paſſe ouer into Aſia himſelfe, but indeed with a ſecret reſolution, vpon the ſudden to oppreſſe his brother vnawares, as by proofe it fell out. For at his comming ouer, Conſtantine fearing nothing leſſe, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greateſt fauorits, of whom one Michael Strategopolus (ſomtime a man in great authority with the emperor his father, and of all other, for wealth, honot, and noble acts moſt famous) was chiefe: who together with Conſtantine were faſt clapt in priſon, where we will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiſcated. But theſe worthy men, eſpecially Conſtantine and Strategopulus, thus laid faſt: who many times in great battels diſcomfited the Turks, and notably defended the frontiers of the Empire a long the Eaſt ſide of the riuer Meander; they now finding none to withſtand them, forraged not only all the rich country beyond the riuer, but with an infinit multitude paſſing the ſame, did there great harme alſo: ſo that there was no remedy, but that the Emperor muſt of neceſſity make chice of ſome other worthy captaine for the defence of thoſe his cities and countries, by the incurſion of the Turks then in danger in that part af Aſia.

There was then in the Emperours court one Alexius Philanthrepenus, a right valiant and ronowned captaine, and then in the floure of his youth; of him the Emperour thought good to make choice for defence of thoſe frontiers of his empire in the leſſer Aſia (againſt the Turks) which were before, the charge of his brother Conſtantine and Strategopulus, ioyning to him one Libadarius, an old famous captain, and a man of great experience alſo: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the cities of Ionia; and vnto the other the frontiers along the winding bankes of Meander. Where Alexius hauing now gotten a charge worthy his valor, and in many great conflicts with the Turks ſtill carrying away the victory, became in ſhort time of great fame: beſides that, he was exceeding bountifull and curteous vnto all men; a coſtly, but a ready way vnto dangerous credit and renown. Thus at the firſt all things proſpered in his hand according to his hearts deſire: yea the Turks themſelues, bordring vpon him, hardly beſet on the one ſide by the Tartars, & on the other by himſelfe; and yet not ſo much feared with their enemies behind them, as moued with his courteſie, came ouer to him with their wiues and children, and ſerued themſelues (many of them) in his camp. But as they ſay, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of bliſſe, but that he muſt taſte alſo of the tun of wo: ſo fell it out with this great captain, who hauing but taſted of the bitter tun, had the worſe all poured full vpon his head. For Libadarius ſeeing all to proſper with him, and ſomewhat enuying thereat, began to feare & ſuſpect, leſt he, proud of his good fortune, and now grown very ſtrong, caſting off his allegiance, ſhould aſpire vnto the empire, and ſo firſt begin with him, as the neereſt vnto him: which thing many of the nobility ſecretly ſurmiſed alſo, but how truly many doubt. But this enuious plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked vp in the aſhes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certaine companies of Cretenſians, whom for their good ſeruice and fidelity he both honored and truſted aboue others, vſing them all for the gard of his own perſon. Theſe men proud of their credit, hearing of the ſurmiſed aſpiring of their Generall, & in hope by his aduancement to raiſe their own fortunes alſo, ceaſed not continually to ſuggeſt vnto him high conceits of himſelf, and to perſuade with all ſpeed to take the matter vpon him; the very conceit whereof (as they ſaid) would be vnto him no leſſe danger, than if he ſhould enter into the action it ſelfe, as he might well ſee by the wofull examples of the noble Conſtantine and Strategopulus, both in extreame perill but for the jealous conceit ſurmiſed againſt them. Which quicke ſuggeſtions wrought in his great mind diuers, & thoſe moſt contrary motions, ſo that he ſcarce knew himſelfe what he would or would not. For they which are vnto themſelues in conſcience guilty of any grieuous crime, if any miſchiefe hang ouer their heads therefore, it happeneth vnto them as foreknowing and expecting the ſame euen from the time that they offended: vnto whom, if nothing elſe, yet that ſame very foreknowledge eaſeth not a little the griefe and miſery: whereas contrariwiſe, they which are with ſudden miſchiefes, and vnlooked for, ouerwhelmed, not knowing any juſt cauſe why, muſt needs ſtand as men diſmaid, and almoſt beſide themſelues. But at length after diuers great conflicts with himſelfe, the euill perſuaders of rebellion preuailed with him. Yet did he at the firſt forbid any mention to be made of him in the army as Emperor: which cauſed the Cretenſians, the chiefe authors of his rebellion, almoſt to force him forthwith to take vpon him the imperiall ornaments, therby to confirme the minds of his followers and fauorits: for that ſuch reſolutions were (as they ſaid) forthwith to be put into execution; neither that any thing required ſo joynt celerity and dexterity both of the mind and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his ſoldiers heads with doubts, and diſcourage them with the feare of the vncertainty of the euent: all which for all that moued not him ſo to do; but whether for feare of the greatnes of the danger, or for that he ſecretly thought how firſt to circumuent Libadarius, of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt is vncertaine. The report of all which his doings and deſignes were in ſhort time carried firſt vnto Libadarius, as the neereſt, and ſo in poſt vnto the emperor: who were therewith not a little both diſquieted. And had Alexius (as ſome perſuaded him) at the firſt ſet vpon Libadarius, then vnprouided, no doubt but he had done much: but God, by whom all Princes reign, and whoſe power confoundeth the deuiſes of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppreſſed, to follow after Theodorus the Emperors brother, of whom he was to haue feared no harme. This Theodorus, the firſt man that Alexius ſhot at, warned by his brother Conſtantines harme, liued a pleaſant priuat life in Lydia, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore ſo much the more beloued of the Emperor: but Alexius fearing leſt in that hurle many ſhould reſort vnto him, as vnto the Emperors brother, and ſo hinder his proceedings, thought beſt firſt to make him ſure, and afterward to oppreſſe Libadarius: not aware, that in ſtead of the body, he followed but after the ſhadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his ouerſight, and knowing mony to be the ſinewes of warre, gathered together all the coyne he poſſibly could, both of his owne and his friends, ſending alſo for the Emperours Treaſures to Philadelphia, and with all ſpeed raiſed the greateſt power he poſſibly could out of Ionia, which he furniſhed with all things neceſſary, promiſing vnto his ſouldiers great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten daies he would with a great army meet the Rebell in the heart of Lydia, and there dare him battell. But withall conſidering that the Cretenſians, men but of a mercinary faith, had always the gard of Alexius his perſon, he thought good to make prooſe if they might with gold be woon to betray him: and ſo well wrought the matter by great ſums of mony preſently giuen, and promiſes of greater preferments with the Emperor, that they (ſomwhat before diſcontented with Alexius his ſlacknes, and now doubting alſo his ſucceſſe) yeelded vnto his deſire, promiſing in the beginning of the battel to deliuer him into his hands, which they ſhortly after in the very ioyning of the battell accordingly performed, deliuering him faſt bound vnto Libadarius his enemy. Who not a little proud thereof, vſed him with great inſolency, and within three daies after put out his eies, for feare the Emperor according to his curteous nature ſhould haue giuen his pardon; and ſo kept him in priſon vntill the Emperors pleaſure were further knowne. Thus through falſe ſuſpect and ambition were the greateſt champions of the Greeke Empire brought to confuſion.

Andronicus the Greeke emperor repoſing more truſt in forreine aid, than in his owne Subiects greatly hurteth his ſtate.

Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became ſo jealous of his own people, as that he wiſt not whom to truſt, repoſing greater confidence in ſtrangers, than in his own ſubiects, to the great hurt of his eſtate. At the ſame time it fortuned, that the Meſſagetes (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond Iſter, being Chriſtians, but oppreſſed by the European Tartars, weary of their ſlauery, ſent ſecretly vnto the Greeke Emperor Andronicus, offring that if he would aſſigne vnto them a conuenient place for them to dwell in, they would come ouer vnto him with ten thouſand of their families, and faithfully ſerue him in his wars againſt the Turks (who then grieuouſly waſted his countries in Aſia, deſtitute of good captains and commanders:) which their offer he gladly excepted, as ſtanding then in need of aid, & not greatly truſting his own people. But when theſe Maſſagets, in number aboue 10000, comming ouer with their wiues and children, were to be furniſhed with all things, and ſpecially the men with horſes, armor, and pay, (all which the Emperor could not of himſelfe doe) the ſubiects were therewith hardly charged, and Commiſſion ſent out into euery country and prouince, for the taking vp of horſes and armor; euery city, euery country towne and village, euery gentlemans houſe and poore mans cottage, was ſearched and ranſacked, and all things taken from them, that was there found fit for ſeruice, to their great diſcontentment, euery man murmuring and grudging to haue his armes taken from him, and giuen to ſtrangers: but when they were alſo to be contributers vnto their pay, they then openly curſed and banned them euen vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with much ado) theſe ſtrangers well furniſhed with all things neceſſary, were with ſome other forces alſo, ſhipped ouer into Aſia, vnder the leading of Michael Paleologus the Emperors eldeſt ſon, and then his companion in the Empire. Who marching alongſt the country, came and incamped about Magneſia. Where the Turks at the firſt, after their wonted manner retyred themſelues into the high mountains and thick woods, that from thence they might more ſafely learne what ſtrength their new come enemies were of, and what diſcipline of war they kept: for they knew that vpon the comming of great armies many falſe reports did run, and that things were made far greater than indeed they were, as did of theſe alſo, as of a people inuincible: and therefore they thought it beſt ſo to protract the time, vntill they might ſee in what ſort beſt to deale with them. But ſo houering ouer their heads, and perceiuing them oftentimes without order to roame abroad in the country ſeeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercinary men ſpoiled their friends no leſſe than if they had beene their enemies) they came downe in good order from the mountaines, from whence at the firſt they aduentured but a little; but afterwards they came on further, and with greater confidence, in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed they would ere long aſſault the yong Emperor in his camp. Wherewith he with the reſt diſcouraged, without any ſtroke giuen retyred; the Turks ſtill following him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the reſt, any thing conſidered the ſmall number of their enemies: but as drunken men, whoſe heads filled with groſſe vapors, are deceiued in the greatneſſe of the obiect that they ſee, and oftentimes think one thing to be two; ſo were they alſo in like manner with their owne feare blinded. Beſide that, moſt commonly it falleth out, that the army which inſolencie and injury forerunneth, is appointed to deſtruction, and by the fearefulneſſe of it ſelfe ouerthrowne before the enemy ſet vpon it, they themſelues becomming enemies to themſelues and Gods juſt vengeance appointing vnto them ſuch an end as their deeds haue deſerued: neither was it like that they ſhould doe any great good, that at their firſt ſetting forth, in ſtead of prouiſion, carried out with them the bitter curſes and execrations of their friends. Michael the Emperor ſeeing the Maſſagets fly, and not daring with thoſe few hee had left, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt his G enemies,retyred himſelfe into the ſtrong caſtle of Magneſia, there to expect what would become of theſe miſchiefes. But the Maſſagets ſpoiling the country of the poore Chriſtians as they went, marching directly to the ſtreit of Heleſpontus, and there againe paſſed ouer into Europe,as if they had beene therefore only ſent for ouer the riuer Iſter,to ſhew the Turks the ſooner the way vnto the ſea in Aſia. For it was not many daies after,but that Michael the Emperor being returned to Conſtantinople,the Turks comming downe with a great power,ſubdued all the Countries,euen vnto the coaſt of Lesbos,to the great ruine and weakening of the Greeke Empire.

It was not long after theſe great ſtirs made by the Maſſagets,but that one RonZerius (ſometime a notable pirat,but as then a moſt famous Captaine) hearing of the great entertainment H that the Greeke Emperor gaue vnto ſtrangers, by meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe offred vnto Ronzerius what he was. him his ſeruice in his wars againſt the Turks,as had before the Maſſagets. This Ronzerius of whom we ſpeake, had out of Catalonia a Prouince of Spaine, and out of that part of France which is called Narbonenſis,aud ſome other places alſo, gathred together a great number of baſe needy naked men, yet luſty able bodies, and fit for ſeruice either by ſea or land: with whom he manned foure tall gallies, and ſo as a notable pirat long time robbed, not onely the merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean,but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Iſlands, carried away thence much rich ſpoile alſo; vntill at length by the miſchiefe he did being become famous, and great wars then ariſing betwixt Charles King of Naples, and Theodorus King of Sicilia, he was by Theodorus ſent for and requeſted of aid: which he (liuing of I the ſpoile) eaſily granted, and ſo came vnto him with a thouſand horſe and as many foot, all old expert ſoldiers,whoſe good ſeruice ſtood the King in thoſe wars in great ſtead. But as the end of war is peace,ſo at length vpon the euill ſucceſſe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two Kings,and confirmed by a marriage betwixt their children; RonZerius liuing altogether by his fortunes, was to ſeeke for new entertainment, both for himſelfe and his men, as hauing neither houſe nor certain dwelling place to repaire to;but being as needy men met together, ſome out of one place, ſome out of another, in hope of booty as their fortune led them. In which caſe RonZerius their Generall thought it beſt to offer his ſeruice to the Greeke Emperor in his wars againſt the Turks, whereof he gladly accepted,and ſo ſent for him: vnto whom he ſhortly after came with two thouſand good ſoldiers,called (after the proud Spaniſh K manner) by the name of Catalonians, for that they were for the moſt part Spaniards of the country of Catalonia. Of whoſe comming the Emperor rejoycing more than he had cauſe (as afterward by proofe it fell out) in token of his great fauor, honored him with the name of the Great Captaine,and afterwards gaue him his neece Mary in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tenſa another Catalonian Captaine ſent for by Ronzerius,was come thither alſo with more aid,the Emperor to gratifie them both,gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cæſar, and vnto the other,the name of the Great Captaine. But when theſe new Captains with their followers were to be tranſported into Aſia, it is not to be ſpoken what harme they did by the way vnto the country people, and in the villages alongſt the ſea coaſt; abuſing the men and women as their ſlaues, and ſpending their ſubſtance at their pleaſure, for which they had many L a bitter curſe: and this was their firſt yeares entertainment. The next ſpring they ſet forward to relieue the great City of Philadelphia, being as then long beſieged by the Turkes, and hardly beſtead without with the enemy; and within, with extreame penury and famine: which good ſeruice they moſt valiantly performed, and raiſed the ſiege. For the Turks beholding the good order of theſe Latine ſouldiers, their bright armour, and couragious comming on,roſe preſently and departed, not only from the city, but quite out of the Emperours territorie. Beſides that, in this army were joyned vnto theſe Catelonians great numbers of the beſt ſouldiers of the Greeks, and all the power of the Maſſagets: ſo that had not the Emperor expreſſely before commanded, not to purſue them too farre, it was by many thought, all thoſe cities and countries might then againe haue beene in ſhort time recouered from M the Turks, which they had before taken from him. But in Kingdomes appointed vnto ruine, faire occaſions helpe not for the ſtay thereof; yea the greateſt helpes prouided by the worldly wiſe,by a ſecret commanding power aboue,being oftentimes conuerted to the deſtruction of that they were prouided for the ſafegard of; as it now fell out with the Emperour and theſe Spaniſh ſouldiers: for this ſeruice done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Maſſagets alſo. But theſe Catalonians with Ronzerius their Generall, roaming vp and downe the Emperours territories in Aſia, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon them whom they were ſent for to relieue: alleadging that they had not their pay according to the Emperors promiſe; and that therefore they muſt liue vpon them that had ſent for them and deceiued them. So were the poore people in euery place ſpoiled, their wiues and daughters rauiſhed, their Prieſts and aged fathers tortured to confeſſe ſuch ſecret ſtore as they had: all was ſubiect to theſe diſſolute ſoldiers rage and luſt; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themſelues, vpon the greedy ſoldiers imagination, hauing their hands or feet, or ſome other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high waies ſide begging an halfepenny or a peece of bread, hauing nothing left to comfort themſelues with, more than their miſerable voice and fountaines of teares: with which their wrongs and miſeries, worſe than thoſe they had ſuſtained by the Turks, the Emperor much grieued, and well the more, for that they were done by him by whom he had entertained to relieue them: but what remedy, his coffers were ſo bare as that he was not able to do any thing for the redreſſe thereof. Ronzerius hauing thus ſpoiled the Emperors country in Aſia, and left nothing that pleaſed either him or his, with all his power paſſed ouer into Europe: and leauing all the reſt his army at Calipolis, with two hundred of his men went to the young Emperour Michael (then lying with a ſmall power at Oreſtias in Thracia) to demand of him his pay, or if need were to extort it from him with threats: with whoſe inſolencie at his comming, the Emperor more offended than before, his ſouldiers there preſent perceiuing the ſame, with their drawne ſwords compaſſing him in, faſt by the court, ſlew him, with certaine of his followers, the reſt fled in all haſte to Calipolis to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Ronzerius for want of pay ſpoileth the Emperors ſubiects.

Ronzerius ſlain.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the young Emperor had thought to haue diſcouraged the Catalonians and abated their pride, as like enough it was to haue done: yet in proofe it fell not out ſo, but was the cauſe of far greater euils. So when God proſpers not mens actions, the beſt falleth out vnto the worſt, and their wiſeſt deuiſes turn to meere follies: for the Catalonians at Calipolis hearing of the death of Ronzerius their Generall, firſt ſlew al the citiſens in the city, and notably fortifying the ſame, tooke that as their refuge. Then diuiding their ſoldiers into two parts, with the one part of them manned with eight gallies, which vnder the leading of the great captain Tenza, robbed and ſpoiled all the Merchants ſhips, paſſing the ſtreits of Helleſpontus, to or from Conſtantinople: the other part left in the city, in the mean time forraging the country all about them. But Tenza ſhortly after encountering with a fleet of the Genowaies, well prouided for him, was by them ouerthrown, and moſt of his gallies ſunk, and himſelfe taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellows, and ſo againe inlarged. Now the Catalonians at Calipolis ſomwhat diſcouraged with the loſſe of their fleet and ſo many of their men, for certain days kept themſelues in quiet within their wals, not knowing wel what courſe to take, for they feared both the Maſſagets and Thracians: them for that they had vpon light cauſes abuſed them, and ſlain diuers of them in the late Aſian war; and theſe, for that they had but euen the other day burnt their houſes and ſpoiled their labors in the country there by: for E which and other their outrages, they vtterly deſpaired of the Emperors fauor, whom they had ſo highly offended. But that which moſt of al terrified them, was, for that they looked for euery day, when Michael the yong Emperor, who as then lay not far off, ſhould with a great power come to aſſault them: for feare of whom they caſt a deepe ditch about the city, with a ſtrong counterſcarfe, ſo preparing themſelues, as if they ſhould haue beene euen preſently beſieged. But the time ſo paſſing, and the Emperor delaying his comming, they began to think of other matters: for being brought to that ſtreit, that they could not wel tell which way to turn them, but that they were on euery ſide beſet with danger, they vpon a malicious reſolution, and vnto the Greekes moſt fatall, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, craued aid of the Turks that dwelt on the other ſide of the ſtreit ouer againſt them, in Aſia; who preſently ſent them fiue hundred F good ſoldiers, after whom followed alſo many other fugitiues and looſe companions, in hope of ſpoile; with whom the Catalonians for the preſent ſtrengthned, and being themſelues three thouſand ſtrong, iſſued out of the city, and forraged the country therabouts, bringing in with them great heards and flocks of ſheep and other cattel, together with their keepers: wherwith both the Emperors & their ſubiects incenſed, prepared themſelues for reuenge. This was the firſt calling in of the Turks into Europe (that I read of) and the beginning of thoſe endleſſe miſeries wherewith the Chriſtian commonweale hath beene euer ſince moſt grieuouſly afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none grieuing thereat, but ſuch as themſelues feele the heauineſſe thereof, whom God in his mercy comfort.

The Turcopuli.

The vnfortunat battell of Michael the Emperor againſt the Catalonians and Turks.

The Catalonians and Turks now lying about Cypſella and Apri in Thrace, Michael the Emperor with his Macedonian and Thracian ſouldiers, the Maſſagets and the Turcopuli encamped at Apri. Theſe Turcopuli were Turks, alſo in number about a thouſand (who as is in the former part of this Hiſtory declared) beeing fled with their Sultan Iathatines vnto the Greeke Emperor, and left behind him at ſuch time as he was by the Europian Tartars deliuered, had forſaken their Mahometane ſuperſtition, and ſo being become Chriſtians, were inrolled amongſt the Greeke ſoldiers. Shortly after the Emperor (aduertiſed by his ſcouts of the approch of his enemies) commanded euery man to be in readineſſe, and his captaines to put his army in order of battell: who ſeeing the enemies battell diuided into three parts, put theirs alſo in like order, placing the Turcopuli & Maſſagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choice horſemen in the right wing, and the reſt with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the Emperor himſelfe riding from place to place, with comfortable ſpeeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly againſt their enemies. The Sun riſing, the enemies battell began to come on, in number much inferiour vnto the Emperors, yet in like order; the Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians well armed in the midſt. But the ſignall of battell being giuen on both ſides, the Maſſagets, whether it were by agreement ſo before made with the enemy, or vpon a ſudden conceiued treaſon, preſently withdrew themſelues aloofe off, and ſo ſtood as idle beholders, giuing aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did alſo their Turcopuli their companions; which greatly diſmaid the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes diſmaied with that ſudden defection of their fellowes, were euen in the joyning of the battell diſcouraged. Which the Emperour perceiuing, with great inſtancy intreated the captaines and commanders of his army, calling them oftentimes by name, not to be ſo ſuddenly diſcouraged: but they in ſo great a danger little regarding his words, and ſtil ſhrinking from him, when as the greateſt part of the footmen were troden vnder foot and ſlaine, turning himſelfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, he ſaid, Now worthy men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more better than death. And hauing ſo ſaid valiantly charged the enemy: in which charge his horſe was ſlaine vnder him, and he in danger to haue bin taken, had not one of his faithfull followers remounted him vpon his owne horſe, and ſo ſaued his life with the loſſe of his owne. The Emperor flying to Dydimotichum, where Andronicus his father then lay, was of him joyfully receiued, but ſharpely reproued for aduenturing his perſon ſo far. The enemies purſuing the chace, ſlew ſome, tooke others, vntil that by the comming on of the night, and weary with the long fight they retired: and the next day diuiding the ſpoile, afterwards at their pleaſure forraged the country. The renegat Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few daies after reuolting to the Catalonians, were of them joyfully entertained, and inrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall.

Shortly after this victory, the Catalonians began to mutiny among themſelues, the great captaine Tenza, and Pharenza his companion, diſdained to be commanded by Recafort their Generall: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes Tenza was ſlaine, and Pharenza for ſafegard of his life glad to fly vnto the Emperor Andronicus; of whom he was, contrary to his expectation, right honourably entertained. About this time alſo the Maſſagets hauing done the Greekes more harme, than the Turks againſt whom they were entertained, and enriched themſelues with the ſpoile of their friends both in Aſia and Europe, were about with their wiues and children, and wealth, to returne again vnto their old dwellings beyond Iſter. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians vnderſtanding, and bearing vnto them a ſecret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had of them oftentimes beene wronged in the diuiſion of the ſpoile of the Greekes, lay now ſecretly in wait for them, as they ſhould paſſe the ſtraits of the great mountain Hemus, which bounded the Greeke Empire from thn Bulgarians: where ſetting vpon them, fearing no ſuch danger, they ſlew them almoſt all; and with the ſpoile of them, recompenced themſelues for all the wrongs they had from them before receiued.

The Catalonians proud of their victory at Apri, and well ſtrengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli with continuall rodes ſpoiled not onely all alongſt the Sea coaſt of Thracia, but

A but all the inland country alſo,as far as Maronea, Rhodope,and Bizia, laying all waſte before them. And hauing forraged moſt part of Thracia, brake into Macedonia, and there wintred about Caſſandria,ſomtime a famous city,but as then all deſolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come,they remoued thence, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled the cities of Macedonia, and eſpecially the rich city of Theſſalonica,where the empreſſe Irene then lay: wherein they were by the Emperors good care and foreſight preuented; who doubting ſuch a matter,had fortified his cities in that country,and furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons, and all other things needfull for their defence:which they quickly perceiuing,and finding the country al deſolate and forſaken by the inhabitants,were about to haue againe returned into Thracia:but as they were thereupon reſoluing,they were informed by one that was with them captiue,how that the B Emperor by a mighty ſtrong wall built at a place called Chriſtopolis, from the ſea ſide euen vnto the top of the mountains,had ſo ſhut vp the paſſage,as that it was not poſſible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected news they were at the firſt exceedingly troubled, as foreſeeing,That if they ſhould there long ſtay in that ſpoiled country,they ſhould in ſhort time be driuen to exceeding wants (for they were now in number aboue 8000 fighting men) and afraid alſo by a generall conſpiracie of the people about them, to be oppreſſed. Thus beſet, and not well knowing what to doe, or which was to turne themſelues, they deſperatly reſolued, no longer there to ſtay,but forthwith to ſet forward, and to breake into Theſſaly, with the plentifulneſſe thereof to relieue their wants, or into ſome other country further off, towards Peloponeſus,and there to ſeat themſelues, and to end their long trauels:or at leaſtwiſe, C if they could not ſo do, to enter into league with ſome that dwelt vpon the ſea coaſt, and ſo returne againe into their owne country. Wherefore leauing Theſſalonica,and deliuering the Emperour of a great feare, they in three daies came to the Theſſalonian mountaines, Olympus, Oſſa,and Pelius; where they at the foot of them found ſuch plenty of all things neceſſary for their reliefe,that they there wintred. But Winter paſt,and the Spring being come,they paſſed ouer thoſe high mountaines and the pleaſant vallies called Tempe, and ſo at laſt came downe into the fruitfull plaines of Theſſaly, where they ſpent that yeare at their pleaſure without reſiſtance, deuouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of whatſoeuer thing came in their way: for as then the ſtate of that country was but weake, the Prince thereof being but young, and withall very ſicke and like to die, and the ſucceſſion D ſo ending in him,as that it was feared,who after his death ſhould lay hand thereon; and every man therfore more carefull of his own priuat than of the common good. Yet to auert theſe forreine enemies, who like a conſuming fire deuoured the country before them; the nobility thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their Captains and Commanders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into Achaia and Bœtia, Countries more pleaſant and fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in:promiſing alſo to giue them aid for the ſeating of them there,if they ſhould ſo need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted,as thinking it better with their hands full of gold ſo eaſily gotten,to go ſeek their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and ſtrong, and help alſo if need were, than to hazard all vpon the ſucceſſe of a doubtfull victory,and ſo fooliſhly to preferre an vncertain E hope before a moſt certaine benefit. So making peace with the Theſſalians,and the Spring being come, receiued of them their promiſed rewards, and guides to conduct them, paſſing ouer the Mountaines beyond Theſſaly, and the ſtreits of Thermopile, they encamped neere vnto Locris and the riuer Cephiſus: which riſing out of the Mountaine Pernaſſus, and running towards the Eaſt, hath on the North ſide of them Locris and Opus; and on the South the inland country of Achaia and Bœtia: and being a great riuer vntill it come to Lebadia and Haliartes, is there diuided into two riuers; the one called Æſopus, and the other Iſmenus; whereof the former runneth thorow the Country of Attica, vntill it come into the Sea; and the other neere vnto Aulis (where the noble Græcians, as they ſay, being about to goe vnto Troy, met, and their ſtaied) falleth into the Eubœan Sea. But the Duke of Thebes and F Athens, and of all that Countrey, hearing of their comming, and (as he thought) well prouided alſo for them (as hauing all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readineſſe) with great pride and contempt denied them paſſage thorow his Countrey, at ſuch time as they asked the ſame;making no more reckning of them,than as of a ſort of looſe wandering rogues that could find no place to reſt or thriue in: wherewith they inraged, reſolued among themſelues, either there to ſeat themſelues in his country, or to die therefore. And ſo G paſſing the riuer into Beotia, not far from the ſame encamped themſelues, being in number about 3500 horſe, and 4000 foot. But ſo lying and expecting the comming of their enemies, they cauſed all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed vp, which they with certaine ſmall cuts out of the riuer ſo watered, as that it differed but a little from a deepe mariſh or bog. Hither about the middle of the Spring commeth the Prince of the Countrey, with a gallant army raiſed out of Athens, Thebes, Platea, Locris, Phocis, and Megara, in number about 6400 horſe, and 4000 foot, an army too ſtrong he thought for ſo contemptible an enemy. But the weakeſt enemy not feared, doth oftentimes the greateſt harme, as here by proofe was to be ſeene: for the Prince comming into the aforeſaid plaine, now growne greene with graſſe, and caſting no perill, encouraging his men, came brauely on H with all his horſemen to haue charged his enemies: who ſtood faſt vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches, as ready to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine, his horſes ſinking deepe into the rotten and new plowed ground, and there intangled as in a marſh, lay for the moſt part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders; or elſe plunging in the deepe, and hauing caſt them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; otherſome ſticking faſt, ſtood with their riders vpon their backs, as if they had bin very images, not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, ouerwhelmed them with all manner of ſhot, and ſlew them at their pleaſure, vntill they had almoſt made an end of them: and with their horſemen ſo ſpeedily purſued the reſt in chace, euen vnto the cities of Thebes and Athens, that they without more adoe euen at that I inſtant ſurpriſed them both, with all that was in them. So the Catalonians hauing as it were at a caſt at dice won a moſt goodly country, garniſhed with faire towns and cities, which they neuer built; and ſtored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer ſweat for, there ended their long trauels, and ſeated themſelues: not ceaſing (as ſaith Nicephorus Gregorias, the reporter of this hiſtory, ſpeaking of the time wherein theſe things were done, and wherein he himſelfe liued in Conſtantinople) vnto this preſent day, by little and little to extend the bounds of their territory. Where leauing them, with whom we haply haue too long ſtraied from our purpoſe, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

In the army of the Catalonians, at ſuch time as they were about to haue beſieged Theſſalonica, were three thouſand Turks, of whom eleuen hundred were of them (as we ſaid) which K remained with Melech at Ænum, after the flight of Iathatines their Sultan vnto the Tartars, and renouncing their ſuperſtition, became Chriſtians; and ſo being baptized, and hauing wiues and children, were enrolled among the Emperors ſouldiers; but at the battell of Apri reuolted vnto the Catalonians, and were commonly knowne by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were ſuch Turks, as with Chalel their captaine came out of Aſia, being ſent for by the Catalonians. Now all theſe Turks, as well the one as the other, at ſuch time as the Catalonians were about to inuade Theſſalia, and to ſeeke their new fortunes in the countries more Weſtward, and ſo farther off from Aſia: partly diſtruſting the ſociety of them, as dangerous vnto them; and loth alſo further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into countries farther off, amongſt people to them vnknowne, began to riſe in mutiny, and to refuſe to L go. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requeſted of the Generall of the Catalonians to giue them leaue with quietneſſe to returne: which their reqneſt he eaſily granted, (as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the Emperors dominion) and ſo they gladly departed; proportionally diuiding all the captiues and ſpoiles they had taken in that long war, according to the number of both parts.

The Turks diuided into two factions.

Theſe Turks after their departure from the Catalonians, diuided themſelues into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turks following Melech, and the reſt Chalel their General. But Melech being before becom a Chriſtian, as were his followers alſo; & after that hauing receiued moſt honorable entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet again moſt ſhamefully breaking his faith before giuen, and violating his religion, had reuolted to his enemies; deſpairing of the M Emperors further friendſhip, which he had ſo euill deſerued, made choice rather to goe vnto Charles Prince of Seruia, by whom he was ſent for, than to come again into the ſight of Andronicus the Greeke Emperour. And ſo going vnto him with a thouſand horſe, and fiue hundred foot, was there of him well entertained himſelfe: but his ſouldiers all commanded to deliuer

A vnto the Prince both their horſes and armour, and to fall to other trades, and not to beare armes but at ſuch time, and ſo many of them as ſhould ſeeme good vnto the Prince, that had receiued them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turkes his followers, in number about 1300 horſe and eight hundred foot, ſtaying at Macedonia, offered vnto the Greeke Emperour quietly to depart his country, ſo that he would giue him paſſage by the ſtreits of Chriſtopolis by him fortified; and in ſafetie transport him and his ſoldiers with all their ſubſtance, ouer the ſtreit of Helleſpontus into Aſia: vnto which his requeſt, the Emperour conſidering the great harme done in his prouinces, and deſirous alſo to be diſcharged of ſo great a burthen, eaſily granted; and ſo ſent Sennacherib, one of his moſt valiant captaines, to conduct them out of Macedonia into Thracia, vnto B the ſtreits of Helleſpontus. Where the Greeke captaines and ſouldiers ſeeing the great multitude of horſes, and abundance of money and other ſpoiles, which they hauing taken from the Greekes, were now about to carry away with them into Aſia; they thought it a great indignitie to ſuffer them ſo to do: and allured alſo with the hope of ſo rich a prey, as had bin of long in gathering, they entred into a deuice far different from that which was vnto the Turks before promiſed; neither prouiding them of ſhipping, neither carefull of their ſafety, but purpoſing vpon the ſudden by night to deſtroy them. Whereof the Turks hauing got vnderſtanding, ſuddenly riſing, ſurpriſed a caſtle in the country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themſelues, to the great aſtoniſhment of them that had purpoſed their deſtruction; who now not able to force them, were glad to get them farthar off, and to C certifie the Emperor what had happened: who (after I wot not what receiued cuſtome of the Greek Emperors his predeceſſors) ſlowly diſpatching things requiring greateſt haſt, careleſly delaid the time, to the great trouble of his ſtate, and aduantage of his enemies. For they wiſely conſidering the danger and diſtreſſe they were in, by ſpeedy meſſengers ſent ouer the ſtreit, craued aid of the Turks their countrymen in Aſia, which they preſently ſent them; wherwith they not a little both encouraged and ſtrengthned, with their often & ſudden incurſions grieuouſly waſted the country round about them, to the great diſcontentment of the Greeke captains, not able without greater help to remedy the ſame. Who thereof certified the yong Emperour Michael Paleologus, requeſting him with all the power he could make, to come and beſiege the caſtle, and to ſuppreſſe theſe ſo dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof D not only the captains with their ſoldiers, but the country people in generall with their ſpades and mattocks came flocking to the Emperor; not as if they would haue beſieged the caſtle, but haue digged it downe and ouerthrowne it together with the Turks their enemies.

The vnfortunat battell of the Emperour Michael Paleologus with the Turks in Cherſoneſus.

Now the Emperor with his captains and ſouldiers, and a multitude of thoſe country people, being come thither, who all gladly followed him, moſt part of them fooliſh, thinking of nothing but of the ſpoile of their enemies; not conſidering with what danger the ſame was to be gained: ſo that the more the enemies prouided for the neceſſary defence of themſelues, as in number but few, and ſhut vp in their enemies country, the more careleſly & negligently, and without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their ſiege, for that they were in number far more, and better prouided of all things than their enemies: not reputing with themſelues, nothing in E this world to be firm and ſure; and al worldly things (as ſaith the diuine Philoſopher) to be but the mockery of God, and to be haſtily turned vp-ſide downe, and with moſt vncertaine courſe this and that way to wander. But their enemies, who before feared euen the very fame of their comming, accounting themſelues rather among the dead than the liuing, ſeeing their confuſed and diſordered raſhnes; therewith much more than before encouraged, beſtowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnneceſſary for battell, in good ſafety within their trenches: but themſelues, with eight hundred choſen horſemen onely, and they very well armed, ſallied out euen to the place where the imperial enſigne ſtood; being neither of any great ſafety, neither guarded with any ſuch ſtrength or carefulnes as beſeemed: with which ſudden and deſperat eruption of the enemies, the Grecians terrified, eſpecially that ruſtical and vplandiſh F company, began to fly: after whom by little and little others followed, vntill at length all the reſt without further reſiſtance fled alſo: which the Emperor ſeeing, did what he might to haue ſtaid their flight: but in ſo generall a confuſion and feare, when euery man was to ſhift for one, who regarded him? wherefore wearied and ſeeing no other remedy, he was glad to take the ſame courſe and to fly with the reſt: yet many of the more expert captaines, aſhamed of ſo foule a flight, made diuers ſtands: and ſo ſtaied the barbarous enemy from further purſuit of G the Emperour and the other flying Greekes. In which doing, many of them incloſed by the Turks, were of them taken priſoners: vnto whom all the Emperors treaſure became a prey alſo, and whatſoeuer honourable enſignes of the Empire elſe that were found in the Emperors tent; yea, the Imperiall crowne it ſelfe, richly ſet with pearle and pretious ſtones, was there taken alſo, which (they ſay) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleaſantly ſcoffed at the Greeke Emperor that but late before wore it.

Thracia ſpoiled by the Turks.

After this victory, the Turks with great pride ſpoiled almoſt all Thracia, in ſuch ſort as that the people for two yeres together durſt ſcarcely go out of their ſtrong walled townes to plow and ſow their land; which exceedingly grieued both the Emperors, the father and the ſon: for in their owne power they had no great confidence, God hauing (as it were) taken from H their people, both their hearts and courage, ſo that all their hope was to entertaine forrein aid (the miſerable ſhift of the great diſtreſſed ones) wherin alſo they found many difficulties and lets, whilſt they conſidered the greatnes of their charge, their coffers being then, if euer, empty by reaſon their territories were ſo long and grieuouſly by their enemies waſted: yet need admitted no law, Andronicus the old Emperour was glad to ſend to Charles Prince of Seruia, his ſon in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no haſt (as men in relieuing others commonly do) and the miſery more and more increaſing, it pleaſed God to ſtir vp the heart of one Philes Paleologus the Emperours neere kinſman, to vndertake the protection and deliuerance of his Prince and Countrey; and was afterward for his great valour by the Emperour worthily made Lord great martiall of the empire. This Philes of whom we now ſpeake, had all I his life time bin brought vp in the court, and was for his vpright dealing and integrity of life beloued of all men, but ſpecially of the old emperor his kinſman, whom he with like affection honored; but was a man altogether vnskilful of the wars, as being by nature of a weake conſtitution of body, and ſo very ſickly, and withall more giuen to deuotion and the ſeruice of God, than the affaires of the world, oftentimes ſpending moſt part of the day at his praiers in the church. He now grieued to ſee the perplexed Emperor, and the miſery of his country, requeſted of him that he might with ſome ſmall power, and ſome few captains of his owne choice, goe out againſt theſe proud Turks: hoping (as he ſaid) by Gods grace to reuenge the wrong by them done, and to returne to him againe with victory. Vnto which his requeſt, the Emperor eaſily yeelded, ſaying, that God was iuſt, which delighted not in many legs, neither in the K greatnes of any mans ſtrength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind: not ſo giuing his help vnto Michael the Emperour, his ſon, for the offences of his parents: as happily he might vnto this ſo vpright and deuout a man, regarding more his integrity of life, than his skill in armes: for turning me about, I haue ſeen in this world (ſaid he) I haue ſeene, the ſwift not to gaine the prize, neither the valiant the victory; wiſe men to want bread, and men of vnderſtanding, wealth; the ſimple to gain fauor, and the ſubtill to fall into diſgrace: ſuch alteration worldly things in time find. So the emperor (as is aforeſaid) yeelding to his requeſt, furniſhed him with mony, horſes, and armor, and ſuch a conuenient power, as he himſelfe deſired. Which he hauing receiued, firſt of all incouraged his captains and ſoldiers with all manner of courteſie and kindnes, giuing vnto them mony, horſes, armour, jewels; yea, ſometime he gaue vnto one his L purſe, vnto another his cloke, his rapier, or ſome other ſuch thing, as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardnes: after that, he perſuaded them to an honeſt temperate courſe of life, and valiantly to play the men, promiſing according to their deſerts to reward euery one of them, the war once happily ended: and before his ſetting forth, vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Chalel with a thouſand foot & two hundred horſe was forraging the country about Bizia, he haſted his departure, that ſo he might by the way encounter them, laded with the ſpoile of the country: and ſo ſetting forward, came the third day to a little riuer, which the inhabitants call Xerogipſum, and there in a great plain neer vnto the ſame, encamped. Where after he had ſet all things in order fit for battel, he with cheerfull ſpeeches as a great commander, encouraged his captains and ſoldiers; leauing nothing vnſaid or vndone, that might ſerue for the animating M of them to fight. But he had not ſo lien two daies, but that his ſcouts about midnight comming in, brought him tidings, that the enemy laden with ſpoile, was euen faſt by at hand: who by the riſing of the Sun were come within ſight, and had themſelues a far off alſo diſcouered the Chriſtian army, all gliſtering in bright armor. Wherfore ſtaying a while to prepare them-

A themſelues for battell: and firſt of all compaſſing themſelues round with their waggons and other cariages, they beſtowed in them all their captiues faſt bound together, with their booty taken; and afterwards as their manner was, caſting duſt vpon their heads, and their hands vp toward heauen, they came on. And now the Chriſtian Army came on forward alſo; Philes ſtill encouraging borh the horſemen and the footmen, and right well conducting them, as the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing of the army, gaue the firſt charge vpon a ſquadron of the enemies, and at the firſt onſet vnhorſed one of the enemies, and after him another. But hauing his horſe ſore wounded vnder him, he haſtily retyred out of the battell: which ſomewhat troubled the Chriſtians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcry began moſt fiercely to preſſe vpon the retyring B Chriſtians: Philes in the mean time with many cheerful words and comfortable perſuaſions ſtil encouraging them to play the men; and with his eies oftentimes caſt vp to heauen, with tears running down his face, moſt heartily beſought God, the giuer of all victory, no longer to ſuffer thoſe his enemies, and the miniſters of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did alſo the poor captiues which lay bound, doubtfully betwixt hope and feare expecting the euent of the battell. The Chriſtian footmen at the ſame time encountring hand to hand with the Barbarians, aſſailed them, and were aſſailed; ſlew of them, and were themſelues ſlain by them: ſo that there was a cruel fight made on both ſides. But Philes with the multitude of his men hauing almoſt incompaſſed the Barbarian horſmen, with a company of his moſt valiant ſoldiers broke in vpon the ſide of the enemies battel, and ſo made way thorow the midſt C of it: which ſo troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to ſtay, or what to do. So being on euery ſide circumuented and hardly charged, moſt of them there fell, except ſome few horſmen, whom the Greek horſmen purſued vnto the entrance of Cherſoneſus, with purpoſe there to ſhut them vp. Philes comming thither alſo, there vpon thoſe ſtreits incamped.
At which time the Emperor preſently ſent out fiue gallies to keep the ſtreit of Helleſpont, ſo that no aid might be brought vnto theſe Turks out of Aſia. Whilſt theſe things thus went, two thouſand choice horſmen came to the aid of Philes out of Servia: and the Poteſtate of Pera came by ſea alſo with eight gallies more into Heleſpontus, to the aid of the Chriſtians.
Wherefore when the Grecians and Servians had thus on the one ſide ſhut them vp by land, and they that were in the gallies on the other ſide by ſea; Philes with all his power came and D camped about the town and trenches wherin the Turks lay; planting his battery againſt the caſtle, wherwith he greatly ſhook the ſame, and made great ſlaughter of the Turks and their horſes, and that not only by day, but by night alſo. But the Turks ſeeing death now preſent before their eies, and no way left for them to eſcape, for that they were on euery ſide both by ſea and land incloſed, thought good thus to aduenture their liues, reſoluing by night to ſet vpon the Grecians, rather than vpon the Servians, whom they had hitherto accuſtomed to ouercome, and whom they had with often ſlaughters much terrified; that ſo the reſt by them alſo haply diſcouraged, might ſo delay the aſſault. But in attempting the ſame they perceiued themſelues much deceiued, finding them euen at their firſt ſallying out ready in arms to receiue them: wherfore hauing in vaine giuen the attempt as againſt a ſtrong fortreſſe, they E were ſhamefully inforced to retyre. Yet were they not therwith ſo diſcouraged, but that the ſtreit ſiege ſtill continuing, they made the like attempt vpon the Servians: but being alſo by them in like maner with loſſe repulſed, they began now vtterly to deſpair. Wherfore the next day about midnight caſting away their arms, they with their boſoms and pockets ful of coin ran down to the ſea ſide towards the Gallies, with purpoſe to yeeld themſelues vnto the Genowaies that were therin, as fearing of them leſſe harm, as of men whom they had neuer hurt: but the night being dark and miſty, and the Moon giuing little light, many of them vnawares came unto the Greek gallies, and there flying the ſmoke, fell into the fire: for being lightned of their mony, they were by them forthwith without any pitty ſlain alſo. But the Genowais ſlew not all their priſoners, but only ſuch as had brought with them the moſt coin; leſt afterward F bewraying the ſame, it ſhould haue bin ſought after by the Greeks. The reſt they caſt into bonds, of whom ſome they ſent vnto the Emperor, otherſome they kept to themſelues as their own priſoners. Thus by the valor and good conduct of this worthy deuout Captain, the Turks were for that time again chaſed out of Europ, and the country of Thracia deliuered of a great fear.

The battell betwixt Philes and the Turks.

The Turks ouerthrowne.

The cauſes of the decay of the Greeke Empire.

Now by that we haue already written is eaſily to be ſeen the chief cauſes of the decay and G ruin of the Greek Empire to haue bin, firſt, The innouation and change of their antient religion and ceremonies by Michael Paleologus, wherof enſued a world of wo. Then by Couetouſneſſe, couered with the name of good husbandry, the vtter deſtruction of the chief ſtrength of the Empire. Next to that, by Envy, the ruin of the Great: by falſe Suſpect, the loſer of friends; Ambition, Honors ouerthrow; Diſtruſt, the great minds torment; and Forrein aid, the Empires faithleſſe porter, opening the gate euen vnto the Enemy himſelf: wherunto foul diſcord joined (as ſhall be forthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemy could deſire, for the helping of them in the ſupplanting of ſo great an empire? But again to our purpoſe.

Michael companion with his father Andronicus in the Empire, had by his Wife Mary two ſons, Andronicus who had afterwards the Empire, and Michael ſyrnamed the Deſpot, and two H daughters, Anne maried to Thomas prince of Epirus, and Theodora maried to the prince of Bulgaria. Of all theſe, the old Emperor Andronicus their grandfather ſo intirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in compariſon of him he ſeemed little to regard either his own children, or the reſt of his nephews, wiſhing them all rather to periſh than him. Which many ſuppoſed him to do, as purpoſing by him the better to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the empire in his houſe, as alſo for his excellencie of wit, and comlineſſe of perſon; the likeneſſe of name alſo haply furthring his kind affection. For which reaſons he cauſed him to be honorably brought vp in his court, as not willing to ſpare him out of his ſight either day or night. But when he was out of his childhood, and grown to be a luſty youth (at which time mens hot deſires are commonly moſt vehement) he began to contemn all chaſtiſement and gouernment, eſpecially I in ſo high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Beſides that, his Companions became vnto him the miniſters and perſuaders of all thoſe vain delights which vnſtaid youth moſt deſireth; and at the firſt began to lead him forth to walk the ſtreets, to hawk, to hunt, and haunt playes, and afterwards to night walks alſo, not wel beſeeming his ſtate. Which riotous courſe of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine ſpare allowance for his conuenient maintenance; he acquainted himſelfe with the rich merchants of Genoa which dwelt at Pera. Hereof aroſe hard taking vp of mony, great debt, fine deuices how to come by Coin, with ſecret conſultations and purpoſes of flight. For when he ſaw his grandfather old Andronicus long to liue, and his father Michael like to ſucceed him, he had no hope of aſpiring to the Empire: wherupon his ambitious thoughts and impotent K deſires long time tormenting his haughty heart ſuggeſted vnto him ſuch purpoſes. For when as he would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens counſels, as a child, he ſought after the Imperial liberty, and abundance of wealth, that he might haue that was ſufficient for himſelf, and wherwith to reward others as the followers of an Emperor. Which ſeeing he could not do, his grandfather yet liuing, and his father reigning, he ſought after the ſoueraignty of other Principalities and Countries: one while after Armenia, as belonging vnto him in the right of his mother the King of Armenia's Daughter: Another while after Peloponeſſus; and ſomtimes he dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnus, and other the fruitful Iſles of the Ægean ſea. Which when it was ſecretly told, ſomtime to his Father, and ſometime to his grandfather, he was now croſſed and reprooued of the one, and afterwards of the other. L And to paſſe ouer many other his youthfull prancks, he vſed in his night walks ſecretly to repaire vnto a certaine Gentlewomans houſe, more honourably borne, than honeſtly qualified; which woman, a certaine Gallant (and another Adonis) no leſſe affected than himſelfe. Wherewith he highly offended, as with his Riuall, appointed certaine Ruffians and Fencers to watch her houſe. But vpon a certain time about midnight, Manuel the Deſpot (his yonger brother) ſeeking after him, chanced to paſſe that way where theſe Watchmen lay; who ſeeing him haſten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and ſuppoſing him to haue bin the man which they looked for, the Gentlewomans beſt beloued, ſet vpon him, and ſo wounded him that he fell down for dead from his horſe: but beeing by and by after known by others comming in, he was taken vp and halfe dead caried vnto the Court. Which outrage in the morning M beeing knowne vnto the Emperour, caſt him into a great heauineſſe, as beholding not the time preſent only, but wiſely conſidering what was like to inſue in the time to come alſo. But Manuel the Deſpot being dead of the wounds there receiued, and the report thereof brought vnto Michael the yong Emperor his father, then lying at Theſſalonica, ſtrooke him

A to the heart with ſo great a griefe, that falling ſick with the conceit thereof, he ſhortly after died.

Andronicus the vnſtayd Youth neuertheleſſe holding on his wonted courſe, with a ſecret purpoſe to haue fled, became thereby ſtill more and more ſuſpitious to his aged grandfather, not a little carefull vnto what end thoſe his violent paſſions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgiannes, a man of great credit and authority in the Court (in whom as in a reconciled enemy, he had vnaduiſedly repoſed too much truſt) to inſinuate himſelfe into the youthfull Princes acquaintance and fauor; that ſo ſounding him and his ſecret deſignes, he ſhould not poſſibly be able without his knowledge to ſtep aſide: which of all things the old Emperor feared moſt, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiannes beeing a B man of great place, and of a ſubtill wit, was ſomtime himſelf ſuſpected of aſpiring, and therfore as vpon the miſpriſion of treaſon, was by the old Emperor impriſoned: but afterwards by him againe inlarged and receiued into fauour, was now by him put in truſt, warily to obſerue the doings of the yong Prince. But he not vnmindefull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the State, either to aſpire vnto the empire himſelfe, or at leaſtwiſe to ſome good part therof; thought now a fit occaſion to be miniſtred vnto him, for him to work vpon, both for the one and the other, by ſetting the old Emperour and his ambitious yong Nephew together by the ears. Which opportunitie he not minding to let ſlip, taking the yong Prince one day aſide, diſcouered vnto him all his Grandfathers deuices, in briefe as followeth.

Syrgiannes his craſty ſeditious ſpeech vnto yong Andronicus.

Your Grandfather, Noble Prince (ſaid he) *hath ſet me as a Watch ouer your actions, or more truly to ſay, as a Bloud-hound, to ſeeke after not your doings only, but if it were poßible, euen after your moſt ſecret thoughts alſo: and ſo whilſt he maliciouſly prepareth for you ſnares and fetters, you not aware thereof, fooliſhly follow your ſhallow and childiſh conceits. For what ſhall it auaile you ſecretly to fly away? wheras if the beſt chance, yet muſt you (as the common ſaying is) put your feet vnder another mans table, and liue at his charge; if it fall not out worſe, that you be ſlain or made away by them you fly vnto for reliefe, or els fall into the ſnares by your Grandfather layd for you. But if ſo be that caſting behind you theſe your fond deuices, you will hearken to my counſell, I will ſhew you a ready way, how you ſhall in ſhort time, and without any danger, aſpire vnto the Imperiall ſeat and dignitie: The only way whereunto D is this, If you leauing the City of Conſtantinople, ſhall flie out into the Cities and Prouinces of Thracia:
For ſeeing men are commonly by nature deſirous of change, and the miſerable Thracians are by often exactions grieuouſly vexed; if you ſhall but once proclaim a redreſſe of their grieuances, with immunity for euer, they will all with one accord follow you whitherſoeuer you will, your grandfathers long and heauy yoke being caſt off, as if it were* Siſiphus *his heauy ſtone, which they had long rolled, and neuer the neere.
If you like of this aduice, I will be vnto you both the Author and leader of this exploit, and will eaſily bring to good effect the whole matter · ſo that you again on the other ſide promiſe vnto mee vpon your Faith, to reward this my trauell according to my deſert therin. But what rewards ſhall theſe be? Honourable preferments, large poſſeßions, great reuenues, the firſt place in your fauor, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my conſent and knowledge. For you ſee how willingly I make my ſelfe partaker E of your calamity, and companion of your dangers, no neceßity inforcing me therunto; forgetting euen my very faith, in compariſon of the loue and Zeal I bear towards you; wherin if any miſhap ſhall by the mutabilitie of fortune betyde me, I haue ſet down my ſelfe with patience to endure it: all which conſidered, you need not to grudge to yeeld to my requeſts, if you tender your owne ſafety. And foraſmuch as the ſhortneſſe of time will ſuffer no long conſultations, and that delay bringeth extream danger; let vs ſpeedily impart the matter vnto ſuch others as for the hatred of the Emperor are like to keep our counſell, and may yet much further our deſignes.*

The yong Prince mooued with this ſpeech as if it had bin with a Charm, eaſily conſented to his deſire, confirming the ſame by his Oath conceiued in writing. At which time were preſent F ſuch as were eſpecially to be acquainted with the plot of the conſpiracie, namely John Catacuzenus and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honor, and the old Emperors antient ſuppoſed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himſelfe) and Alexius Apocaucus the third (not of like honor with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a moſt ſubtill and deep wit) who all vnderſtanding the matter, ſhewed themſelues not as miniſters, but as Ringleaders and captains of the intended rebellion. This conſpiracy with moſt ſolemn oaths and G promiſes on euery part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter: and to begin withall, Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus, by corrupting diuers of the great and moſt gratious courtiers, procured to themſelues the gouernment of ſuch cities and prouinces in Thrace, as they thought fitteſt for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes hauing the gouernment of the ſea coaſt, and the inland country euen from the ſea ſide to the top of mou͂nt Rhodope; and Catacuzenus the gouernment of the country about Oreſtias. In all which places they muſtred ſouldiers, prouided armor, entertaining alſo ſtrangers and other vagrant and maſterleſſe men, as for ſome great War. Beſides that, in the gouernment of the Cities they placed their truſtieſt friends, remouing ſuch others as they had in ſuſpect. All which they colored by rumors falſly raiſed, one while of the comming of the Europian Tartars from Danubius, and another H while by the comming of the Turks out of Aſia: againſt whoſe inuaſions theſe preparations were giuen out to be made, for auoiding of ſuſpition; and the traitors for their prouident care highly commended euen by the Emperor himſelfe, againſt whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably diſſembled, oftentimes withall certifying the yong Prince, what he had done, and what was likewiſe of him to be performed.

But the old Emperor ſeeing his youthful Nephew not to hearken to his graue aduice, but ſtil to proceed in his diſſolute kind of life, was about ſolemnly to haue reproued him before the Patriark and ſome others of the chiefe nobility, if haply ſuch open reproofe might haue wrought in him ſome change of maners; if not, then to haue committed him to priſon. And like enough he was to haue ſo done, had he not bin otherwiſe perſuaded by Theodorus Mitochita I (who of all others was able to do moſt with him) by reaſon of the liberty of the time; for then it was almoſt Shrouetyde, when as the people diſtempered with the exceſſe of meat and drink, were of all other times moſt fit, vpon any light occaſion to be drawn into a tumult or vprore: for fear wherof, he was contented at that time to let him alone. But Shrouetyde paſt, and a good part of Lent alſo; the old Emperor ſeeing no amendment in his Nephew, calling vnto him Geraſimus the Patriark, and the reſt of the reuerend Biſhops then preſent in the city, ſent for his Nephew, openly before them all to chide and ſchoole him for his diſorderly life, but eſpecially for his purpoſed flight; that aſhamed of ſuch open reproof before ſuch Reuerend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leaſtwiſe of all men be thought iuſtly puniſhed for the ſame, if he ſhould ſtill proceed therin. So the yong Prince being ſent for, came, K accompanied with many of his fauorits and followers, moſt of them being ſecretly armed, and he himſelfe not altogether vnprouided: for it was agreed among them, that if the Emperour ſhould vſe gentle and fatherly admonitions toward him, that then they ſhould bee quiet, without any ſhew of inſolency or diſcontent: but if he ſhould in anger reproue him, or threaten to puniſh him, then vpon a ſign giuen, forcibly with their ſwords drawn to break in vpon him, and to kil him in the Imperial ſeat, and without more ado to place yong Andronicus his nephew in his ſtead. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next his aged grandfather, his deſperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuouſly blamed and reproued for his former follies and euil courſe of life; yet with ſuch moderation and grauity, as all ſeemed (as it did) to come of a moſt fatherly care and regard: ſo that then no L ſuch outrage was committed as was by diuers his followers wiſhed; but the aſſembly quietly diſmiſſed, and a ſolemn oath taken on both ſides: of the grandfather, That he ſhould not appoint any but his nephew to ſucceed him in the Empire: and of the young Prince, That hee ſhould neuer ſeeke to attempt any thing to the ſhortning or hurt of his Grandfathers life or empire. But the conſpirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted and fumed at him as if he had broken his faith and oath before giuen them; ſaying, What greater wrong couldeſt thou do vs, than being by vs made ſtrong, and become dreadful to thine enemies, to diſpoſe of thine affairs at thy pleaſure, to thine own ſafety, and to leaue vs thy moſt faithfull friends and ſeruants in the Diuels mouth to be deuoured? For now they both doubted & feared leſt their conſpiracie was diſcouered. With which ſpeeches he both diſcouraged and aſhamed, ſent for Theodorus Metochita M his Grandfathers chiefe Counſellor, requeſting him to deal with his Grandfather for the pardoning of all his Followers, as he had done for himſelfe. Of which motion he diſliking, told him, That he was to giue God thanks, for that he himſelfe had eſcaped ſo great a danger; and to him alſo, as a mean for the ſafegard of his life: although hee treated not for ſuch

A traiterous perſons, with whom if he were well aduiſed he would haue nothing to do, either thinke that they would euer be faithfull to him, who reſpecting neither God nor man, had ſo fouly broken their faith before giuen vnto the Emperour his Grandfather. With which vnexpected anſwer of ſo great and graue a Counſellor the Prince not a little troubled, & with-all diſcontented, ſtood a while as in a muſe all ſilent, reaſoning as it were with his own paſſions: but afterwards commanding him without further reply to depart, and the old companions of his follies reſorting vnto him, he by their perſuaſions entertained again his former diſ-loyall thoughts and deſignements: which his grandfather vehemently ſuſpecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would (as if it had bin by inſpiration) oftentimes in his heauineſſe ſay vnto them that were about him, In our time is loſt the Majeſty of our Empire, and the deuotion B of the Church. Yet to preuent the worſt, he thought it good betimes to lay hands vpon his ſuſpected Nephew, and ſo to detain him in ſafe keeping: acquainting none therwith but Gera- ſimus the Patriarch, and his Ghoſtly Father; who preſently acquainted the Prince therwith, and was the cauſe that he haſtned his flight, flying himſelf before. For he now certainly vn-derſtanding the danger he was in, the night before he ſhould haue bin apprehended, with all the reſt of the conſpirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the City, by the gate called Gyrolimnia; which Gate (all the reſt being ſhut) was ſtill at his command, for that he vſed commonly therby at his pleaſure very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to do; but the next day after, came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus Camp, who then both lay with a great power at Hadrianople, expecting his comming. The old Empe-C ror before the riſing of the Sun aduertiſed of the flight of his nephew, the ſame day commanded him to be proclaimed Traitor, and proſcribed, with all his Conſpirators, and whoſoeuer els ſhould take his part. And for the more ſurety, euery man in the city was ſworn to be loy-all and faithfull vnto the old Emperor, and enemy vnto his Nephew and his adherents. But he on the other ſide proclaiming liberty and immunitie abroad in all the Cities and Villages in Thracia, ſo won the hearts of the Countrey people in generall, that they reſorted vnto him from all places in great numbers, ready armed to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command them.
And to begin withall, they firſt layd hands vpon the Collectors of the Emperors mony (then abroad in the Country) whom they ill intreated, taking from them their money. After that, and yet not ſeuen dayes expired, almoſt an incredible number of horſemen, footmen, archers D and others departed from Hadrianople toward Conſtantinople, vnder the leading of Syrgian- nes, in hope at their firſt comming to take the City, being at diſcord within it ſelfe, and moſt part of the meaner ſort, in hope of gain, fauoring their rebellious proceedings, ſuch as the ſeditious find in ſuch rebellious tumults. So hauing marched four days, they came and incam-ped at Selyrbia: but as they were about to haue gon on farther, the old Emperour doubting leſt the citiſens ſeeing ſo great an army before the City, ſhould therein raiſe ſome tumult or ſtir to the indangering therof; thought good before to ſend Embaſſadors vnto his Nephew, to proue if haply theſe ſo dangerous troubles might by their means in ſome good ſort be appeaſed. The chief of theſe Embaſſadors was one Theoleptus Biſhop of Philadelphia, a man no leſſe famous for his vertue than his wiſdom, and yet for both of all men honored; & with him E alſo was ſent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all others fitteſt to appeaſe her ſon, and to perſuade him not to approch the city, for that therof might enſue much bloud-ſhed, and the deſtruction of the city, or at leaſtwiſe the vtter vndoing of many: wherof if he ſhould bee the author, how could he euer after liue in conſcience quiet, but that the torment therof would follow him euen into his graue; and therfore to requeſt him to retyre a little, and ſo to come to talk and to demand what he pleaſed. Syrgiannes moued as well with the preſence of the reuerend Biſhop, as the prayers of his mother, retyred to the yong Prince which then lay about Oreſti-as; whither the Emperors Embaſſadors came alſo: with whom, after long debating, it was agreed, That the yong Prince ſhould in all royall maner hold all Thracia, from Criſtopolis to Rhegium, and the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople: and withal, that ſuch lands as the yong prince F had already giuen vnto his followers, in Macedonia, ſhould ſtill remaine vnto them (which were ſuch as yearly yeelded vnto them a right great reuenue:) And that the old Emperour ſhould hold vnto himſelfe the Imperiall City, with all the Cities and Prouinces of Macedonia beyond Criſtopolis: and that he alone ſhould haue the honour to heare Embaſſadors ſent from forrein Princes, and to giue them their diſpatch; for that the yong Prince took no plea-

Articles of Agreement betwixt the old Emperor and his Nephew.

The Greeke empire in Europe diuided.

Whilſt the Grecians are at diſcord among themſelues, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turkes Empire, & the other Turks incroach vpon them alſo.

The Iſland of the Rhodes was by the Knights Hoſpitallers recouered frō the Turkes in the yeare 1308.

ſure in thoſe weighty affairs, as by nature more delighted in hawking, hunting, and his other G youthfull pleaſures. Vpon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the yong Prince than of the old Emperour, who although he was deſirous otherwiſe to haue redreſt ſo great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to what his nephew would requeſt. Thus was the Greeke empire in Europe (as then all or the moſt part incloſed within the bounds of Macedonia and Thracia) now diuided betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: Aſia in the meane time (wherein the Greek Emperors their predeceſſors ſomtime held great kingdoms) being left for a prey to the greedy Turks. Othoman on the one ſide euen in the heat of theſe troubles laying the foundation of his empire in Phrygia & Bithynia; and the other the Turks Princes the ſucceſſors of Sultan Aladin encroching as faſt vpon the emperors territories and countries on this ſide the riuer Mœander. And not ſo contented, at the ſame time alſo built H great ſtore of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Chriſtian Merchants trading to Conſtantinople, and ſpoyled the coaſts of Macedonia and Thracia, and the Iſlands of the Ægeum, and among others took the famous Iſland of the Rhodes; which they held not long, before they were againe driuen out of the ſame by the Kings Hoſpitallers, vnder the conduct of William Willaret, aided by the Genowaies and the King of Sicilia, which they from that time held (to the great honor and benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale) by the ſpace of 214 yeres, known by the name of the Knights of the Rhodes: vntill that in the memory of our fathers it was (I ſay no more, but grieue therefore) ſhamefully loſt vnto the Turke, for want of reliefe; neuer place being more honorably defended, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory ſhall appeare: euer ſince which time thoſe honorable men (the flower of chiualry) haue ſeated themſelues in the I Iſle of Malta, which they to their immortall glory, and the comfort of all good Chriſtians, haue moſt notably defended againſt the mighty Sultan Solyman, and all the fury of the Turks, as ſhall be alſo in due place declared.

But to turne againe vnto the troubled eſtate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the Greeke captain & author of all the aforeſaid ſtirs betwixt the old emperor and his nephew, had euen from the beginning thought, as a companion to the yong Prince, to haue ruled al with him at his pleaſure, and that nothing either great or little ſhould haue bin don without him: but ſeeing it now to fall out far otherwiſe than he had before expected, and the Prince to be wholly ruled by Catacuzenus, and himſelfe of all others leſt regarded, & not ſo much as called to any counſell; inwardly tormented with griefe and enuy, he began ſecretly with himſelfe to deuiſe K how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull Prince, which vnmindfull of his former promiſes, had ſo vnthankfully caſt him off. Wherefore he reſolued again to reuolt to the old Emperor, not doubting but ſo in ſhort time to ouerthrow all the councels and deuices of the young Prince, together with his ſtate alſo, by himſelfe before raiſed. For he, as worldly wiſe, excluding God from his councels, had ſuch an opinion of himſelfe, that which way ſoeuer he went, thither muſt all things follow alſo. Wherfore by one of his truſtieſt friends he ſecretly made the old Emperor acquainted with his purpoſed reuolt, and how all things ſtood: for the greater credit thereof alleadging, That he could not abide the ſight of him that ſought to corrupt his wife, meaning the young Prince. This newes from Syrgiannes was vnto the old Emperour moſt welcome: for it grieued him (as an old man of a great ſpirit) to ſee himſelf ſo contemned L and deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old ſeruitors of all ſorts, by him ſpoyled of their lands and poſſeſſions in Macedonia and Thracia. So a ſolemne oath in ſecret paſſed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer ſtay ſecretly fled to Conſtantinople: which there bruted abroad, reioyced many, now well hoping the whole gouernment would againe come vnto the old Emperour, and that ſo they ſhould againe recouer their poſſeſſions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not ſeeing it ſo good, all this hope was but in vaine, as ere long it appeared: for the yong Prince, who of long knew how much he was beloued of the Conſtantinopolitans, and by them ſecretly ſent for, taking occaſion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the city: and being come within ſight therof, incamped, laying ambuſhes vpon euery way and paſſage therabout, M for to haue intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at Perinthus, and the third night after, with three hundred ſelect ſoldiers, deceiuing them that lay in weight for him as if they had bin all aſleepe, before the riſing of the Sun came to Conſtantinople: and if the old Emperor would haue giuen him leaue, he had ſuddenly charged them that did lie in wait for him, before they

A were aware of his comming. But as ſoon as it was day, the Prince hearing of the eſcape of Syrgiannes, and no ſuch tumult in the city as he had expected, preſently without more ado retyred with his army the ſame way he came, back again into Thracia.

By and by after, Conſtantine the Deſpot was by the old Emperor his brother ſent by ſea to Theſſalonica, to take vpon him the gouernment of Macedonia, and by the way to apprehend Xene the Empreſſe, the yong Princes mother; and after, with all the power he could make, to inuade the yong Prince in Thracia: that ſo ſetting on him on the one ſide out of Macedonia, and Syrgiannes with the Turks (for the emperor in this ciuil diſcord was glad to vſe their help alſo) and the Bithynian ſoldiers on the other, they might ſo ſhut him vp betwixt them and take him. According to which reſolution, the Deſpot comming to Theſſalonica, there took B the Empreſſe, whom with all her family he thruſt into a gally, and ſo ſent her to Conſtantinople, where ſhe was in the palace kept cloſe, as too much fauouring the Princes proceedings. And afterward raiſing all the power he could in Macedonia, inuaded the Prince in Thracia, breaking by force thorow the walls of Criſtopolis.

The yong Prince ſeeing himſelfe by this means now like to be driuen to a great ſtreit, ſent Synadenus with his Thracian army to defend the frontiers of his empire toward Conſtantinople, againſt Syrgiannes with his Turks and Bithynians: in hope himſelfe by many ſubtle deuices and ſleights to be able to incounter his vncle the Deſpot. And firſt he cauſed diuers Edicts and proſcriptions to be written in haſt, wherin great rewards and preferments were with great ſolemnitie of words promiſed to whomſoeuer could bring vnto him the Deſpot either C quick or dead: which were of purpoſe giuen to the country people paſſing to and fro, to be diſperſed abroad in the highways, and about in the country neer the Deſpots camp. And after that, he cauſed the death of the Emperor his grandfather to be euery where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Conſtantinopolitans in a tumult ſlain: which the deuiſers thereof in euery place reported. Yea ſome there were that ſwore they were themſelues preſent at his wofull death, and ſaw it with their eies: other ſome, more certainely to perſuade the matter, ſhewed long white goats hair, or ſuch like gathered out of white wool, as if they had been by the furious people pluckt from the old Emperors head or beard, at ſuch time as he was ſlaine. Which things being commonly reported in euery town and village, but eſpecially in the Deſpots camp, wonderfully filled mens heads with diuers ſtrange and doubtfull thoughts. Then D diuers alſo of the diſperſed edicts being found and brought to the Deſpot, ſtruck him, and not without cauſe, into a great fear; inſomuch that by the perſuaſion of his beſt friends, he without longer ſtay retyred in haſt to Theſſalonica: whither ſhortly after came a gally from Conſtantinople, with ſecret letters from the Emperor to the Deſpot, for the apprehenſion of twenty fiue of the chiefe citiſens, vehemently ſuſpected for the ſtirring vp of the people to rebellion, and ſo to haue deliuered the city to the Prince. All which perſons the Deſpot ſhould haue ſent bound in that Galley to Conſtantinople. But they in good time perceiuing the danger they were in, ſecretly ſtirring vp the people, and by and by after ringing out the bells, (the ſignal appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a ſhort time raiſed a wonderfull tumult within the city, inſomuch that all the citiſens was vp in armes, who running headlong E vnto the houſe of the Deſpot, found not him (for he forewarned of their comming, was fled into the caſtle) but ſlew all they met of his, or els robbing them, caſt them in priſon. As for the Deſpots houſe, they pillaged it, & afterward pulled it down to the ground. Then comming to the caſtle they fired the gates: which the Deſpot ſeeing, and not able to defend the place, took horſe and fled to a monaſtery not far off, where being taken by them that purſued him, he ſore againſt his will, for the ſafegard of his life, tooke vpon him the habit of a Monk. Neuertheles he was from thence caried priſoner to the yong Prince his nephew, who ſhewed himſelf much more curteous to him than all the reſt of the Nobilitie and Waiters; for they as if they would haue eaten him vp, were euen forthwith ready to haue torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms ſaued his life. Yet the next day after, by perſuaſion F of his Counſel, he ſent him to Didimoticum, where he was caſt into a moſt lothſome priſon, being very deep and ſtreit in manner of a Well, no body to attend vpon him but one boy; where he lay in miſerable darkneſſe and ſtink: they which drew vp his ordure from him and the boy oftentimes (either by chance or of purpoſe) pouring it vpon his head. Where after he had lien a great while in moſt extreme miſery (wiſhing to die, and could not) hee was at length by the Princes commandement, intreated thereunto by certain Religious men, remoued G into a more eaſie priſon, where we will for euer leaue him.

Andronicus the old emperor ſeeks counſel of the Pſalter, as of an heauenly Oracle, and ſo maketh peace with his Nephew.
Pſal. 68. v. 14.

Things falling out croſſe with the old Emperor, and although they were neuer ſo well deuiſed, ſtill ſorting out vnto the worſt, he became very penſiue and doubtful what to do. So it fortuned, that one day in his melancholy minde hauing a Pſalter in his hand, to reſolue his doubtfull mind he opened the ſame, as if it were of that heauenly oracle to ask counſel: wherin the firſt verſe that he light vpon was, Dum cœleſtis diſſociat Reges, nive conſpergentur in Salmon:
When the Almighty ſcattered Kings (for their ſakes) then were they as white as ſnow in Salmon. The which he applying to himſelfe, as if all thoſe troubles and whatſoeuer els had happened, proceeded from the will of God, although for cauſes to him vnknown: hee by and by ſought to reconcile himſelf to his nephew, contrary to the mind of Syrgiannes, who deſired nought but H trouble. For (as we haue before ſaid) the yong Prince, although he was deſirous of the power and liberty of an empire, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof vnto his grandfather: and had he not oftentimes and erneſtly bin egged forward by his companions to affect the whole Empire, haply could and would haue contented himſelfe with the former Pacification. For being now ſent for, he came firſt to Rhegium, and there viſited his mother (now ſet at liberty, and ſent thither for the furtherance of the deſired pacification) where he with her and by her counſel did whatſoeuer was there done. So within few daies the matter was brought into ſo good terms that an attonement was made, and he himſelfe went and met the Emperour his grandfather before the gates of the city; the old Emperor ſitting then vpon his horſe, and the Prince alighting from his a good furlong before he came at him. And although his Grandfather I was very vnwilling, and forbad him ſo to do, yet he came to him on foot, and kiſſed his hand and foot as he ſate on horſeback; and afterward taking his horſe, embraced him, & there kiſſed each other, to the great contentment of the beholders. And ſo hauing talked ſome few words, departed; the old man into the city, and the yong man into his campe, which then lay neer to Pega: where ſtaying certain days, he came diuers times into Conſtantinople, and ſo went out again; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her ſon, lay at Pega.

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and his nephew, walked vp and down ſick in mind, with an heauy countenance, eſpecially for that in time of peace his buſy head ſtood the Commonweal in no ſtead. Wherfore in all meetings and aſſemblies K he willingly conuerſed with them who moſt diſliked of the preſent ſtate, & ſpake hardly as well of the Emperor as of his nephew, wronged (as he thought) by both; wheras in the time of their greateſt diſtreſſe, he had (as hee ſaid) ſtood them in good ſtead. But ſeeing one Aſanes Andronicus walking melancholy vp and down as a man with heauines oppreſſed; who hauing don good ſeruice to the yong Prince, and not of him regarded, had fled to the old Emperor, and there found no ſuch thing as he expected, for the eaſe of his grief, although hee were a man honorably born, and otherwiſe endued with many good parts: with him Syrgiannes acquainted himſelfe, as grieued with the like griefe that hee himſelfe was, with whome as with his friend, without diſſimulation he plainly diſcourſed of all ſuch things as his grief deſired.
But Aſanes handling him with great wiſdom, did himſelf with like words ſpeak hardly L both of the Emperor and his nephew; but yet curiouſly noted whatſoeuer Syrgiannes ſayd, for he had before hated him for his ambition, and as then took it in diſpleaſure, that hee was enemy to Catacuzenus his ſon in law, who was all in all with the yong Prince, & did oftentimes comfort him. But the ſong being thorowly ſet, Aſanes came ſecretly vnto the old Emperour, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he in time layd hold on Syrgiannes, affecting the empire, he ſhould in ſhort time be by him brought to his end. Wherupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapt faſt in priſon: whoſe houſe with all his wealth the common people took the ſpoil of; and not contented to haue raſed it downe to the ground, conuerted the ſite therof, together with the pleaſant Vineyards adjoining vnto the ſame, into a place to feed goats and ſheep in: a worthy reward for his manifold treacheries. The yong Prince ſhortly M after going to Conſtantinople, was there crowned Emperor, as fellow in the Empire with his grandfather: vnto which ſolemnitie in the great temple of Sophia, both the Emperors riding, it fortuned the old Emperor by the ſtumbling of his horſe to be ouerthrowne and fouly berayed in the mire; the ſtreets being then very foul by reaſon of much rain but a little before fallen:

A fallen; which many took as ominous, and portending the euill fortune which ſhortly after befell him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the yong Prince was a hunting in Cherſoneſus, ſeuenty Turks aduenturers were by force of weather driuen on ſhore: who before they would yeeld themſelues priſoners, made a great fight with the Emperors men, and ſlew diuers of them: in which conflict the yong Emperor himſelfe was wounded in the foot, wherwith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged Grandfather, held not himſelfe long ſo contented, but after the maner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his aſpiring fauorits) longed to haue the whole gouernment to himſelfe, which hardly brooketh any partner. And therfore weary to ſee his grandfather liue ſo long, reſolued B no longer to expect his naturall death (although it could not by courſe of Nature be far off) but by one deuice or other to thruſt him from the gouernment: or if that might not bee effected, at once to diſpatch him both of life & ſtate together. And the ſurer to lay the plot wheron ſo foul and horrible a treaſon was to be built, he by the counſell of his mother and others, by whom he was moſt directed, ſent for Michael the Prince of Bulgaria his brother in law (although before to him vnknown, as was his wife his ſiſter alſo) to make with him a firm league, to the intent by him to prouide, that if the Prince of Servia (who had but lately maried the old Emperors nigh kinſwoman, and ſo to him much deuoted) ſhould take part with him, hee ſhould by the Bulgarian his neighbor be intangled. Who ſo ſent for, with his wife the old Emperors daughter, came to Didymoticum, where they were many dayes honorably entertained C both by the yong Emperor and his mother. For why, this meeting plotted vpon great treaſon, was finely colored with the deſire the yong Emperor had to ſee his ſiſter and her huſband, as before to him vnknown; and the Empreſſe her daughter, whom ſhe had not ſeene in 23 years before: but the ſecret concluſion betwixt them was, That the Bulgarian prince to the vttermoſt of his power ſhould aid the yong emperor againſt his grandfather, and he likewiſe him againſt the Servian, as he ſhould haue need. And further, That if his grandfather being depoſed, he ſhould recouer the whole empire, then to giue him a great ſumme of mony with certain ſpeciall cities and prouinces confining vpon him, as in dowry to his kind brother in law and companion in his labors. So Michael the Bulgarian prince honorable entertained by the yong Emperor and the old Empreſſe his mother in law, loded with rewards, and promiſes D of greater, returned home into his own country.

A trecherous meeting.

This matter thus diſpatched, the yong emperor therwith incouraged, & knowing alſo the Conſtantinopolitans, beſides the other cities of Thrace, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings (by whom alſo he was ſecretly inuited to haſten his comming thither) as weary of the long life and lazines, as he termed it, of his grandfather, thought it beſt cunningly to go about the matter, that ſo his grandfather being with as little ſtir as might be depoſed, hee himſelfe might alone enjoy the Empire. But needing mony for the effecting of ſo great matters, he by force took all the mony from the collectors, whom the old Emperor had ſent into Thracia for the taking vp of mony there; telling them, that he was an emperor alſo, & in need of money, and that the common charge was likewiſe by the common purſe to be diſcharged.
E After that he took his way toward Conſtantinople, pretending vpon ſpeciall cauſes hee had occaſion to ſend Embaſſadors to the Sultan of Egypt, for the tranſporting of whom hee was there to take order for the ſetting forth of a great ſhip & other things neceſſary for the journey.
Neither went he ſlenderly appointed, but with a great power, the Cities of Thracia before well aſſured vnto him, ſuch as he ſuſpected being thruſt out of office, and others more aſſured vnto him being placed in their ſteads. But whileſt he thus beſtirred himſelfe, one of thoſe that were moſt inward with him, deteſting ſo foul a treaſon, ſecretly fled from him to his Grandfather, from point to point diſcouering vnto him all the intended trecheries; and withall, that his nephew had determined to depoſe him from his empire, or otherwiſe to bereaue him of his life, if he ſhould ſtand on his gard: but if in the attempt he ſhould find eaſy F ſucceſſe, then to ſpare his life, and depriuing him of the Imperiall dignity, to thruſt him as a Monk into a Monaſtery. And therfore aduiſed him to beware how he ſuffered him after his wonted manner to come into the City (for fear of a generall reuolt) but rather by force to keep him out. Which the Emperour hearing, and comparing with other things which hee had heard of others, yet ſounding in his ears, deeming it to be true, ſtood vp, and in the ananguiſh guiſh of his ſoul thus complained vnto God: Reuenge my quarrell, ô God, vpon them that do mee G wrong, and let them be aſhamed that riſe vp againſt me: and preſerue thou vnto me the Imperial power, which by thee giuen vnto me, he commeth to take from me, whom I my ſelfe begot and aduanced. After, he began to conſider what courſe to take for the aſſurance of himſelf and his ſtate in ſo great a danger. And firſt he ſent vnto his Nephew (come half way) to forbid him from entring the City; and to tell him, that it was a great folly for him, being ſo manifeſt a traitor both vnto his Grandfather and the State, to think his traiterous purpoſes to be vnknown to the World.

And beſide, in way of reprooſe to rehearſe vnto him, how many occaſions he had giuen for the breaking of the League with his Grandfather; firſt, in taking away the money from the Collectors, wherof the State neuer ſtood in more need, by reaſon of the diuiſion of the Empire, which required double charge. Then, in that hee had in the City euery where diſplaced H ſuch gouernors and magiſtrats as his grandfather had ſent thither, and placed others at his pleaſure. With many other like facts declaring his treacherous aſpiring mind, for which he was, not without cauſe, by his grandfather forbidden to enter the city. After that, the old emperor by ſecret letters craued aid of Charles Prince of Seruia, and Demetrius the Deſpot his ſon, who was then Gouernor of Theſſalonica and the countries adjoyning, commanding him with Andronicus and Michael his nephews (gouernors of Macedonia) with all the forces they were able to raiſe, and ſuch aid as ſhould bee ſent them out of Seruia, with all ſpeed to joine together, and to go againſt the yong Emperor. But theſe letters thus written vnto the Prince of Seruia, the Deſpot, and others (as is before ſaid) were for the moſt part intercepted, by ſuch as the yong emperor had for that purpoſe placed vpon the ſtreits of Criſtopolis and the other I paſſages, eſpecially ſuch as were written in paper; yet ſome others in fine white linnen cloth, and ſecretly ſowed in the garments of ſuch as caried them, eſcaped for all their ſtreit ſearch, and ſo were deliuered. And in truth nothing was done or about to be don in Conſtantinople, but that the yong Emperor by one or other was aduertiſed thereof: Wheras the old Emperor on the other ſide vnderſtood nothing what his Nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their own accord inclined to him, ſome openly both in body and ſoul, as they ſay, and ſuch as could not be with him in perſon, yet in minde and good will were euen preſent with him: and that not only the common ſort of the citiſens of Conſtantinople, but the chief Senators, the great Courtiers, yea and many other of the Emperors neereſt kinſmen alſo: Who curiouſly obſeruing whatſoeuer was done in the city, forthwith certified him therof. Among K whom there was alſo Theodorus the Marquis, one of the old Emperours own ſons, who many years before by the Empreſſe his mother ſent into Italy, and there honorably maried, was by his prodigall courſe of life there grown far in debt; ſo that leauing his wife and children behind him, he was glad after the deceaſe of his mother, to fly vnto his father at Conſtantinople and there now liued; who beſide that he moſt honorably maintained him in the Court, and beſtowed many great things vpon him, payd alſo all his debts, which were very great. All which fatherly kindneſſe he forgetting, went about moſt Iudas like to haue betrayed his aged father. For he alſo dreaming after the Empire, and for many cauſes (but eſpecially for that he was in mind, religion, manners and habit become a Latine) by him rejected, thought hee could not do him a greater deſpight, than by reuolting vnto the yong Emperor. So that the L neerer he was in bloud, the more he was his fathers vnnaturall enemy. Shortly after, Demetrius the Deſpot hauing receiued the Emperors letters at Theſſalonica, called vnto him Andronicus & Michael his Nephews, gouernors of Macedonia; with whom joining all his Forces, and daily expecting more aid out of Seruia, he firſt ſpoiled the yong Emperors Friends and Fauorits in Macedonia, giuing the ſpoil of them in all the Cities and towns of Macedonia, vnto their ſoldiers, who made hauock of whatſoeuer they light vpon: and whoſoeuer ſeemed any way to withſtand them, or diſlike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they confiſcated, and draue the men themſelues into exile. Neither was the yong Emperor Andronicus in the mean time idle, but ſecretly ſent out his Edicts into all parts of the Empire, yea into the very Cities of Conſtantinople and Theſſalonica, and ouer all Macedonia: wherby M he proclaimed to the people in generall, a releaſment of them from all tributes, impoſitions and paiments; and franckly promiſed vnto the Souldiers and men of War, the augmenting of their penſions and pay. Which newes no ſooner bruted abroad, but that moſt men were therwith moued both in word and deed to fauour his proceedings, doing whatſoeuer they

A they could to further the ſame, and by ſecret letters inuiting him to haſten his comming into the City. Who thereupon comming to Rhegium, by his Embaſſadours ſent from thence requeſted the old Emperor, either to giue him leaue according to the League made betwixt them, to come into the City, or elſe to ſend him certain of the chiefeſt of the Nobilitie and Clergy, with ſome of the better and more vnderſtanding ſort of the Bourgers and Citiſens alſo, vnto whom hee might franckly ſpeake his minde, for them faithfully to deliuer the ſame again vnto the Emperor his Grandfather, and the people. Which requeſts the old Emperour perceiuing to be full of deceit and treacherie, for a good ſpace anſwered thereunto nothing at all, but ſtood all ſilent, as doubting which to grant. For, to ſuffer his Nephew to come into the City, he ſaw was dangerous, the citiſens, as hee well knew, being for the moſt B part inclined to reuolt to him ſo ſoon as they ſhould once ſee him within the gates. And to ſend any forth to him (as he deſired) might be, as he feared, an occaſion of ſome tumult to be after raiſed in the City: for hee knew that his Nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and ſecretly with great gifts and large promiſes, firſt to gain them, & by them the reſt of the Citiſens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the eaſier, and ſent forth vnto him two of the moſt noble Senators, two of the moſt reuerend Biſhops, two other graue Prelates, and foure of the chiefe Burgeſſes of the City: vnto whom at their comming vnto him, hee in the open heating of all there preſent, deliuered this premeditated and crafty ſpeech:

The yong emperor ſends Embaſſadors to his grandfather.

The yong emperours ſpeech to his Grandfathers Embaſſadors.

C *It is not vnknowne vnto the world, you my Subjects to haue alwayes been more deare vnto mee than I haue been vnto my ſelfe; and how that I haue not vpon any ambitious conceit, or deſire of the ſole Gouernment againſt my Grandfathers good will, gon out. For you ſee that I neither ſpare myne own life, or attend my pleaſure, for the care I haue of you: I come not vnto you compaſſed about with a gard of armed men, as is the manner, not of Kings only, for the envy of their High place, but of others alſo of farre meaner Calling, whom diſaſter fortune, baniſhed from their Parents and Kindred, hath inforced to wander here and there, with death alwayes before their eyes. Let any man tell me how I came by theſe wounds which I yet beare in my body, but in fight with the Enemies of my Countrey which paſſe ouer out of Aſia into Thracia: as alſo dwelling neere vnto Iſter, do with their incurſions from thence miſerably waſt that ſide of Thracia which is next vnto them. For I (to tell you the very truth) ſeeing the old Emperour by D reaſon of his great yeares to become ſloathfull and blockiſh, and not poſsible to be awaked out of his drowſie ſleepe, neither any whit to grieue, when as the poore Chriſtians his Subjects were both by day and night, ſome as Sacrifices ſlaine by the barbarous Enemies, ſome carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie, and the reſt poore and naked to be violently driuen out of their Houſes and Cities: not to ſpeake in the meane time of the greater miſchiefes in Aſia, and how many Cities haue been there loſt through the old Emperours ſloath and negligence. When I ſaw theſe things (I ſay) ſtrucken with a piercing grief which my heart could not endure, I went out for two cauſes, either by ſome kinde of honourable death to end my griefe together with my life, or elſe to the vttermoſt of my power to ſtand my Countrey in ſome ſtead. For by no meanes it can come to paſſe, but that a man, and he that hath of long time reigned, muſt at length become loathſome vnto his Subjects, and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath E made nothing in this life immutable and firme; whereby it commeth to paſſe, as we ſee, that all worldly things ioy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force Fortune to his deſire, and ſtriue to binde things vnto a certain firm and conſtant courſe, he ſhall but loſe his labour, and in vain ſtriue againſt Nature. But whatſoeuer is contrary vnto Nature, or exceedeth the iuſt bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that cauſed the wiſe men to ſay, and to leaue vs as rules, Not to dwell too long vpon any thing; and, A meaſure to be the faireſt vertue. For you ſee how that my grandfather beeing grown vnto great yeares, and hauing reigned ſo long, I may almoſt ſay, as neuer did any but he, is become hatefull euen vnto all his People: and yet he regardeth not, either how to diſcharge himſelf of ſo great a burthen, or how to relieue the declining ſtate of the Empire, or ſo much as grieueth to ſee the Succeſſors of the Empire die before him. For my father is dead without any fruit of the Empire, except F the bare title only; and others alſo neereſt to him of bloud, and far yonger than hee, are dead likewiſe; and haply I my ſelfe may die alſo before I ſhall receiue any profit therof: for what can more eaſily happen, eſpecially to a man that ſhunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But ſome perhaps will ſuſpect me of ambition, for departing from the Emperor my Grandfather, and refuſing to be ruled by him:
Which thing I neither flatly deny, nor altogether confeſſe; for might I ſee the Empire encreaſe, and the* bounds thereof inlarged, I would willingly content my ſelfe, and at my eaſe take my reſt; cheering my ſelfe vp with ſuch hope as do they that beare with their Cooks, making them to ſtay long for their dinner, in hope therby to fare the better. But ſeeing the ſtate of the Empire daily to decline from euill to worſe, and the miſerable people carried away Captiues, or ſlain by their enemies euen at the gates, and vnder the walls of the Imperiall City; what deem you me then to thinke? For moſt men eaſe their preſent grief with the hope of future good, although the ſame be but vain. But vnto me is not left euen ſuch vain hope vnto my falſe comfort. And can you maruell at the impotent affection of the great Alexander of Macedon, grieued and diſpleaſed to ſee his Father heap victory vpon victory, and to cut off all hope of his ſons glory, by leauing him ſo few occaſions of Warre; and not thinke me (to whom the quite contrary is chanced, and from whom not only the hope of the Empire is cut off, for the waſting thereof, but euen the courſe of a quiet life) to fret and grieue therat? Moued herwith, and not able longer to indure it, at length I aroſe vp, and requeſted of the Emperour my Grandfather but a thouſand men at Armes, promiſing him by the power of God, with them to preſerue the Cities in Bithynia, and to driue his Enemies farther off, before that (hauing them) they ſhould paſſe ouer the Streight, and beſiege the Imperial City of Conſtantinople. Which ſo ſmall a requeſt he not only denied mee, but hath euer ſince taken mee for his mortall Enemy. But this and many other things let paſſe: I haue now another requeſt vnto him by you, which is, That he would giue me eight thouſand Ducats to content my Souldiers withall, who of long time haue from place to place roamed vp and down with mee, following myne vncertaine fortune. Which granted, I will no more be vnto my Grandfather troubleſome, but diſmiſſing my Forces, hold my ſelf right wel contented.

G H I

Hauing thus ſaid, he roſe out of his ſeat, and taking them apart one after another, curteouſly diſcourſed with them, and ſo filling them with great hopes, ſent them away. Who departing from him, and comming into the City, became as it were the open proclaimers of his praiſes, inflaming the people with a greater deſire of him than before. Which the old Emperor hearing, and perceiuing almoſt all his friends in the City to be in heart reuolted from him; and withall fearing to be of them in ſome ſudden concourſe ſlain, was therewith exceedingly perplexed. Yet he thought it beſt before any ſuch thing ſhould happen, to proue their mindes, and to heare the counſell of the Patriarch and Aſanes, and the other Biſhops alſo: Vnto whom, being by one of the Senators called together, hee declared his minde as followeth: K

The ſpeech of the old Emperour vnto the Patriarch and the reſt of the Biſhops and Nobilitie, concerning the young Emperour his nephew.

Were I aſſured, that hauing depoſed my ſelfe of the Imperiall dignitie, I ſhould my ſelfe liue in ſafetie, and ſee my people well gouerned, I would I ſhould neuer be of the company of the Faithfull, if I did not by much prefer a pleaſant quiet contented life before an Empire. For if a man would ſeeke for the pleaſure of the minde, what can be more pleaſant than to be diſburthened of all cares, and free from ſuch dangers as attend high eſtates? But if for my ſinne and the ſinnes of my people, as alſo for the ſinne of mine anceſtors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempeſt raging againſt vs, ſubuerteth our Empire: and I yet but a youth, by the helpe of God reformed and quieted the ſtate of the Empire, grieuouſly troubled with diſcord in the Church, and the often inuaſion of the enemy; and taught by long experience, know not how in ſo great hurle and tempeſt which way to turne my ſelfe: How can I with ſafety commit vnto my nephew ſo great a charge, who as yet is both an vnſtaied youth, and ſo careleſſe of his owne good, as that hee knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne priuate affaires? For giuing ouer his power to young vnskilfull men, and hauing flung away his imperiall poſſeſſions amongſt them, he himſelfe liueth in penury and want; neither regarding any thing more than his dogges and kites, of whom hee keepeth few leſſe than a thouſand curres, and as many hawkes; and not much fewer men to looke vnto them. Wherefore vnto ſuch a man, how may I ſafely commit either my life, or the adminiſtration of mine Empire, by God committed vnto mee? But I will neuer witting and willingly caſt away either my ſubjects or my ſelfe. For my nephew I haue loued, not onely more than my wife and children, but (to ſay the truth) more than my ſelfe alſo; as you well know how tenderly I haue brought him vp, how carefully I haue inſtructed and aduiſed hem, as purpoſing to haue left him the heire and ſucceſſour both of my wiſedome and mine Empire, that ſo hee might the better pleaſe both God and man. But hee, contemning my good counſell, hath ſpent whole nights in banqueting, and riot, and brothelhouſes; wherein hee hath alſo ſlaine his owne brother: and to bee briefe, hee hath riſen and lifted vp his hand againſt mee his grandfather, and a grandfather that had

A had of him ſo well deſerued, attempting ſuch a villany as the Sun neuer ſaw. Wherfore you ought alſo to hate and deteſt his wickedneſſe, and to riſe vp to reſtrain his impudent diſloyaltie, and by your Eccleſiaſticall cenſure to denounce him vnworthy of the Empire and the communion of the faithfull, as one ſeparated from God; that ſo aſhamed and corrected, he may louingly thither return, from whence he is ſhamefully departed, and again bee made heire both of myne Empire and ſtaidneſſe: for there is no man aliue, whom I had rather haue promoted vnto the Empire, ſo that he would hear my precepts, and obey my counſell. As for the concluſion vſed in his former ſpeech, it was altogether feigned, crafty and malicious: for you haue heard how many reproches hee hath giuen me in all that ſpeech, wherewith his concluſion agreeth not; but the more to ſtirre vp the hearers thereof againſt mee, did of purpoſe ſo conclude his ſpeech.

Vpon this, moſt of the foreſayd graue and learned Biſhops agreed, That the yong Emperor ſhould no more be named in the prayers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed himſelf. Howbeit the Patriarch and ſome others ſecretly fauouring both him and his proceedings, liked not therof, and therfore ſaying nothing therunto, returned home vnto their owne houſe. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the Patriarchs houſe, they there conſpired againſt the old Emperor: with whom alſo diuers of the nobilitie conſented, and therupon an oath was conceiued in writing, wherby they bound themſelues to continue conſtant in that their wicked reſolution. Wherupon about three days after, the Patriarch cauſing the bels to be rung, and a great number of the common people flocking together, pronounced the ſen- C tence of excommunication againſt all ſuch as ſhould in their publique prayers omit the name of the yong Emperor, or refuſe to do him all honor due vnto an Emperor. Which thing not a little grieued the old Emperor, as appeared by his ſpeech in ſaying, If the Doctor of peace be ſo mad againſt vs, in hope of reward promiſed by my Nephew, that caſting off all ſhame and grauitie, he doubts not to be the author of ſedition; who ſhall repreſſe the raſh attempts of the vulgar people againſt vs, if we reſpect but mans help? for the Patriarch ſo much as in him lieth, is (I ſee) the murtherer of vs. So the Biſhops of the contrary faction, moued with the notable inſolencie of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewiſe, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authors of ſedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the State: for which cauſe alſo he was by the Emperors commandment committed vnto ſafe keeping in the Monaſtery D called Manganium. But about two days after, the yong Emperor came to the wals of Conſtantinople, to know how his grandfather had accepted the meſſengers ſent vnto him, erneſtly requeſting, that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the City, to doe his duty to his grandfather. But neither he nor his words were any whit at all regarded, but was by ſuch as ſtood vpon the walls himſelfe with ſtones driuen away: who could not abide to heare him ſpeak, but ſhamefully railed at him, ſaying all his talk to be nothing els but deceit & fraud: and ſo for that time he retyred a little from the walls. But night beeing come, certain buſie heads amongſt the common people, and they not a few, ſecretly meeting together, gaue him knowledge, that about midnight when as all the citiſens were aſleep, and the watchmen in ſecuritie, he ſhould come vnto the walls, where they would be ready to draw him vp with ropes, E vnto the top of the bulwarks: which done, the matter (as they ſaid) were as good as diſpatched; for that they were perſuaded, that the Citiſens ſo ſoon as they ſhould once ſee him in the midſt of the city amongſt them, would forthwith all reuolt vnto him. So he according to this appointment, about midnight approching the wals, found there no ſuch matter as he had well hoped, for the receiuing of him into the city; but contrariwiſe, the watchmen carefully watching all alongſt the wall, and calling one vnto another. Wherfore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus his chief counſellors, leauing the South ſide of the city, in a little boat rowed ſoftly all along the wall that is toward the ſea, if haply they might there find their friends, and ſo be receiued in. But there the Watchmen alſo deſcrying them from the walls, and calling vnto them, but receiuing no anſwer, began to caſt ſtones at them, and to F make a noiſe. So that deceiued of their purpoſe, and out of hope, they were glad to get them farther off, and to depart as they came.

The Patriarch with other Biſhops conſpire againſt the emperor.

But the euil ſucces of this exploit was ſhortly after with his better fortune recompenced: for by and by after, ſecret letters were ſent vnto him from Theſſalonica, requeſting him with all ſpeed to come thither; aſſuring him in the name of the Biſhop, with diuers of the Nobilitie Theſſalonica yeelded to the yong emperor.

tie, and the good liking of the people in general, at his comming to open the gates of the city G vnto him: wherupon he leauing a great part of his army with Synadenus, to keep the Conſtantinopolitans ſhort, hee himſelfe with the reſt of his power ſet forward toward Theſſalonica, where in the habit off a plain country man he entred the city vnſuſpected: but being got within the gate, and there caſting of that ſimple attyre, wherwith he had couered his rich & royal garments, and preſently known to be the yong Emperor, the people came flocking about him and with many ioyfull acclamations receiued him as their Lord and Soueraign: yet ſome few more fauoring the old emperor, fled into the caſtle, and there ſtood vpon their gard, which after they had for a ſpace notably defended, was at length taken from them.

Theſſalonica thus yeelded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Aſan Michael, the old Emperors chief captains, then lying with his army not far off, and not well truſting one another, fled; moſt of H whoſe ſoldiers preſently went ouer vnto the yong Emperour: who departing from Theſſalonica, came to Serre, which by compoſition was deliuered vnto him alſo, but not the caſtle, for that was by Baſilicus Nicephorus the captain therof, ſtil holden for the old Emperor. This Baſilicus was a man honorably deſcended, but of no great capacity or wit, as the finer ſort ſuppoſed; and therfore not of them much regarded, or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old Emperor for his plain ſincerity, more than for any thing elſe, had made captain of that caſtle, and gouernor of the Countrey therabouts, which he yet ſtill held, and in theſe moſt troubleſome times ſhewed himſelfe wiſer than them all that had ſo thought of him; of whom ſome died in deſpair, ſome fled, ſome were taken priſoners, and ſo ſuffered a thouſand euils; the reſt with the loſſe of their honor traitrouſly reuolting from the I old Emperour to the young: wheras he alone, looking but euen forward vpon his allegeance, with his truſt in God, ſo long as the old Emperor liued, oppoſed himſelfe againſt theſe troubles, and ſtood faſt, and was not to be moued with any faire promiſes or cruell threats of the yong aſpiring Emperor, wherof he lacked none. But hauing ſtrongly fortified the Caſtle committed to his charge, there kept himſelfe, vntil that hearing of the death of the old Emperor, he then reconciling himſelf vnto the yong, as vnto his right Soueraign, deliuered vp to him the caſtle; who in reward of his fidelitie gaue it him again to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it for his grandfather. (For wiſe men honor vertue euen in their enemies, as did King Philip in Demoſthenes, when as he ſaid, If any Athenian liuing in Athens doth ſay that he preferreth me before his country, him verily would I buy with much mony, but not thinke K him worthy my friendſhip: but if any for his countries ſake ſhall hate me, him will I oppugne as a caſtle, a ſtrong wall, or a Bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue, and reckon the city happy in hauing ſuch a man.
And ſo in few words to conclude a long diſcourſe, the Emperor in ſhort time hauing romed thorow all Macedonia, and without reſiſtance taken all the ſtrong towns and cities therin, he there took alſo Demetrius the Deſpots wife & children, with all his treaſure, as alſo the wiues of Andronicus and Aſanes, and of all the Senators that followed them: after whom, the great commanders their husbands were alſo for the moſt part taken & caſt in priſon, ſome at Theſſalonica, ſome at Didymoticum, ſome of the reſt afterward moſt miſerably periſhing in exile.
Wherwith the old Emperor diſcouraged, was about to haue ſent Embaſſadors to his nephew for peace, whilſt he was yet thus buſied in Macedonia; and had indeed ſo done, had not L another hope ariſing in the mean time quite altered that his better purpoſe. It fortuned at the ſame time, whilſt the old Emperor was thus thinking of peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to ariſe, ſecretly offered his aid vnto him againſt the young Emperour his Nephew. Of which his offer the old Emperour gladly accepted, and Embaſſadours were ſent to and fro about the full concluſion of the matter, no man being acquainted therewith, more than two or three of the Emperor his moſt ſecret friends and truſty Counſellors. Yet in the mean time diſdaining to be ſo coupt up as he was by Synadenus one of the yong Emperor his Nephews chiefe Captaines, euen in the Imperial city of Conſtantinople; ſent out one Conſtantinus Aſſan with the greateſt part of his ſtrength againſt him: who incountring him at the riuer Maurus, was there by him in plain battel ouerthrown M and taken priſoner, the reſt of his diſcomfited army flying headlong back again to Conſtantinople.
All things thus proſperouſly proceeding with the young Emperour, and the countries of Macedonia and Thracia now almoſt al at his command, hee returned in haſt with all his power, vnto Conſtantinople, to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither, as fearing leſt

A leſt that they finding the city weakly manned, ſhould trecherouſly kil the old Emperor, with ſuch as were about him, and ſo ſeiſe vpon the city themſelues; or at leaſtwiſe giue him ſuch aid as might keepe him out, and ſo cut off all his hope for obtaining of the ſame. At which time alſo there was great want of victuall in the City, he with his army hauing ſhut it vp on the one ſide by land, and the Venetians with their gallies on the other ſide by ſea: who then at ods with the Genoa's dwelling at Pera, kept all that ſtreit ſea betwixt Europ and Aſia, in ſuch ſort as neither victuals nor merchandiſe could be brought that way, either to Conſtantinople or Pera. The yong Emperor comming to Conſtantinople, attempted ſtraitway to enter the city, in hope without any great reſiſtance to be receiued: but being repulſed by the Deſendants, he was glad to get him farther off. About this time came alſo to the city 3000 horſmen, B the appointed aid of the Bulgarian Prince, vnto the old Emperour: who although hee wanted men, and was right glad of their comming: yet remembring the harms he had before receiued by forein aid, & not now daring to truſt them too far, ſuffered them not to come into the city, more than their Generall and ſome few others of the Commanders with him. Now the yong Emperor vpon the comming of this aid, leſt ſome great harm might betyde either the old Emperor or himſelf, to the vtter ſubuerſion of their ſtate; ſecretly ſent vnto his grandfather, requeſting him to be well aduiſed how he truſted thoſe forrein people too far; offering himſelfe to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command, rather than ſo great a harme ſhould happen vnto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the truſt the old Emperor had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had ſo confirmed his mind, as that he little liſtned vnto his Nephewes C requeſt: Beſides that, how could he well truſt him that had ſo often deceiued him. Wherwith the yong Emperor much grieued, and now again almoſt deſpairing of his further ſucceſſe, diſlodged, and drew neer vnto the place where theſe Bulgarian horſemen lay incamped: from whence he ſent certaine Embaſſadors with great gifts and preſents vnto the Generall and the reſt of the chief Commanders, promiſing them far greater, if they would without further troubling themſelues returne home again. Whereunto they willingly granted, and ſo were of him honourably feaſted, and the next day after conducted vpon their way homewards.

Conſtantinople betrayd to the yong Emperor.

It fortuned that the yong Emperor returning back again from the Bulgarians, and incamped in the ſame place where he before lay; two of the Watchmen of the City, the one called D Camaris, and the other Caſtellanus, both ſmiths, fled ſecretly vnto him. Who admitted to his preſence, and all others commanded to depart, except Catacuzenus, offered to betray the City vnto him, ſo that he would vnder his hand writing aſſure them of ſuch a ſum of mony, & ſuch poſſeſſions as they required. Which he eaſily granting, and the hour and maner of performing the ſame being by them declared and agreed vpon, they by and by without longer delay, for fear of ſuſpition, returned again into the city. But the Emperor ſtaying four days in the ſame place, cauſed certain ladders to be made of great ropes, ſuch as they vſe in great ſhips. But the appointed night beeing come, the two Traitors hauing before prouided great ſtore of good wine, liberally gaue the ſame by way of curteſie vnto the Watchmen their companions neer vnto them: who drank ſo plentifully therof, that not able any longer to hold vp their heads, E they fell into ſo ſound a ſleep, as that but for breathing, they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certain ſoldiers of the yong Emperors, with the foreſaid ladders, which the traitors by and by drawing vnto them by a rope caſt downe, and making them faſt vnto the top of the wall, receiued by the ſame 18 armed men: who being got into the City, without more ado brake open the Roman gate, wherby the yong Emperor with his Army preſently entred, no man letting him. But it is worth the marking, how things appointed to befall vs, are by no means to be auoided, although we be thereof before neuer ſo plainly forewarned: for the ſame night the city was ſurpriſed, immediatly after the ſetting of the Sun, the gates being ſhut, a certain countryman came running in al haſt from out of a village therby, and knocking hard at the gate called Girolimna, required to ſpeak with ſome of the ſoldiers; F who beeing come, hee told them that a little before, hee had ſeen a great number of the yong Emperours men marching towards the City, by the way that leadeth vnto the Roman gate. Which being told vnto the old Emperor, did not a little trouble him: and therefore thought it good to ſend forth certaine Scouts, to ſee if all were cleere along the Walls towards the land, from ſea to ſea. Which his purpoſe Metochita his chieſe Counſellor letted, ſaying, it not to beſeem a couragious mind to be vpon ſo light an occaſion ſo much moued; for that G either the rumor was falſe, or the indeauor of ſo few vain, the wals and gates of the city being ſo filled with armed men: which haply he ſaid not ſo much vpon ignorance of martial affairs, as blinded by a certain commanding power; that the ſupernall decree giuen by God himſelf againſt the old Emperor, might at length take place. And again, the third part of that night yet ſcant paſt, diuers other countrymen came running vnto the ſaid gate Gyrolimna, and told the watchmen vpon the walls, that a great number of men were met together at the Romane gate. Wherof the Emperor hearing, was therewith much more troubled than before; inſomuch that ſharply rebuking Metochita, he ſaid vnto him, Thou ſeemſt to be ſtrangely metamorphoſed into a man of iron, which art become ſo ſecure as not to haue any feeling of the danger wherwith we are incloſed: Seeſt thou not that the matter requireth, that wee ſhould H not thus ſit ſtill and take our reſt? For the noiſe of my nephew ſoundeth in myne ears as the ſound of a great drum, and diſquieteth my mind: I feel a ſea of calamitie broken out againſt me, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuertheles he, firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of thoſe reports, and therfore roſe to go to bed, to ſhew indeed that he accounted nothing of them but as falſe alarms. But the Emperor left alone, and no body with him to whom he might breake his griefe, laid him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his cloaths, but as if he had together with them put on extreame deſperation, lay tumbling to and fro, as a man in mind troubled with diuers ſad and heauy thoughts. In the mean time he heard a great noiſe at the Court gate, and the report of the entring of the yong Emperor his Nephew, with a great clattering of armour, for there were aboue eight hundred I ſoldiers entred with him; and withall, they of the City on euery ſide ſaluted him with moſt joyfull acclamations. But the old Emperour hearing the great tumult and outcry, roſe from his palat, exceedingly troubled; and deſtitute of all help from his captains and ſoldiers (for why, his palace was altogether deſolate, except of ſuch as were his ordinary waiters) betooke himſelfe vnto his prayers, beſeeching God not to forſake him in ſo great a danger, but in his mercy to defend him from the fury of theſe wicked men. Who preſently heard him, & ſent him preſent relief; for whilſt he was thus praying in the palace, the yong Emperor without, calling together all his Captains and lieutenants, ſtreitly charged them vpon pain of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the majeſty of the old Emperor his grandfather, nor any K other about him: for this victory (ſaid he) God hath giuen vs, and not we our ſelues: his will ordereth all things, wherunto all things obey; the ſtars, the air, the ſea, the earth, men, flouds, tempeſts, plagues, Earthquakes, ſhours, dearth, and ſuch like, ſomtime to our blis, & ſomtime to our correction and deſtruction: wherfore vſing vs as the inſtruments of his chaſtiſement, he hath giuen vnto vs this preſent victory, which peraduenture to morrow hee will giue vnto others to vſe againſt vs, and then as we haue bin vnto them we haue ouercome, ſuch will they alſo ſhew themſelues vnto vs again. Wherfore if neither nighneſſe of bloud, nor that we bee all of one country, will moue vs, yet in reſpect of our ſelues let vs vſe mercy, that we feele not the hand of God vpon vs in like caſe. In the mean time a Courtier opened a wicket vnto the yong Emperor, with this meſſage from his grandfather:

The pittifull ſupplication of the old Emperor to his Nephew.

Foraſmuch as God this day (my ſonne) hath giuen vnto thee the Imperiall Scepter, taken from mee, I requeſt of thee this one good turne, for many which I haue euen from thy birth beſtowed vpon thee, (for in this my hard eſtate I let paſſe, that I next vnto God haue been the author of thy natiuitie and increaſe) giue me my life, ſpare thy fathers head, and with violent weapon ſpil not that bloud from which thou thy ſelfe haſt taken the fountain of life. Man truly beholdeth heauen and earth, and heauen and earth behold mens actions: wherefore make not the heauens and the earth beholders of ſo wicked an outrage as neuer any man euer committed. If Brothers bloud long agoe cried out vnto the Lord againſt Cain, how much louder ſhall the fathers bloud cry vnto the Lord, and declare ſo great a wickedneſſe vnto the earth, the Sunne, and Starres, and make it abhorred of all the Princes of the world? Regard my miſerable old age, which of it ſelfe promiſeth vnto me ſhortly death, but vnto thee a reſt after long M cares. Reuerence the hands which haue oftentimes moſt louingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy ſwathing Clouts. Reuerence thoſe lips which haue oftentimes moſt louingly kiſſed thee, and called thee my other ſoule: Haue pitty vpon a bruiſed reed, caſt downe by fortune, and do not thou againe tread vpon it. And ſeeing thou art thy ſelfe a man, be not too proud of thy preſent fortune, but conſider the vn-

certainty

A certaintie and varietie of worldly things,taking by me example : ſee in me the end of long life,and maruell,how one night hauing receiued me an Emperor of many years, leaueth mee now ſubiect vnto another mans power for euer.

The yong Emperor Andronicus mooued with this ſpeech, and taking great care of his grandfathers ſafety, ſcarſe abſtaining from tears,entred the palace, and comming to his grandfather,humbly ſaluted him,embraced him and with cheerful words comforted him. Streitway after,he went vnto the monaſtery Manganium,where(as is aforeſaid) the Patriark Eſaias was by the old Emperors commandement kept ſafely : whom the yong Emperor now tooke from thence,and carying him away in one of the Emperours richeſt Chariots,reſtored him B again vnto his Patriarchal dignity; wherin he afterwards ſpared not to reuenge himſelf to the full,and moſt cruelly to perſecute the old Emperours friends. That day from morning vnto night,a man might haue ſeen the riches and wealth of ſuch noblemen as had taken part with the old Emperor,caried away,and their goodly houſes ouerthrowne and made a ſcorn of the baſe common people : but eſpecially the houſe and wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greateſt fauor with his Prince,and of all others next vnto the Emperor himſelf,of greateſt authority and credit; whoſe whole wealth (not that only which was found in his houſe, but that alſo which he had put in truſt with his friends, diſcouered by notes found in his ſtudy)became moſt part a prey vnto the common people, and the reſt confiſcated vnto the Prince. Thus he which erſt of all others next vnto the Emperor was accounted moſt C fortunat,was now vpon the ſudden with his wife and children brought to extream beggery; and after many years felicity,in one day caſt into the bottome of deſpaire and miſery. Where a man might haue heard many complaining ſay,all that wealth and treaſure to haue beene the bloud and tears of the poor oppreſſed Subiects,brought to him by them whom hee had made rulers and gouernors of the prouinces and cities of the Empire; to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people, as with their ſlaues, hee might ſtop them for comming to complain of their griefs vnto the Emperor : and that the Reuengers eye had not always ſlept, but was now at length awaked,and had of him yet ſcarſly taken ſufficient puniſhment:which euery where to hear,increaſed not a little his grief. As for himſelf,he was confined to Didimoticum,as the place of his exile and baniſhment; where after he had a certain time poorly D liued,hee was ſent for backe againe to Conſtantinople, where hauing nothing left to relieue himſelfe(for his houſe at the comming of the young Emperour,was in the fury of the people pluckt down to the ground,and the very pauement therof digged vp)he went vnto the Monaſtery of Chora there by,which long before built by the Emperour Iuſtinian, and become ruinous,he in the time of his proſperity had with great charge repaired,and therin now (hauing made ſhipwrack of al that he had) quietly ſhrouded himſelf,to the great comfort both of his body and afflicted mind,where he not long after died.

But to return again vnto the old Emperor,as yet in doubt what ſhould become of himſelf: it fortuned that the ſame day the city was taken, the yong Emperor at night returning to the Palace,by the way met with Niphon ſometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to E deal with his grandfather. Wherunto the yong Emperor anſwering, that he would deal with him honorable and Emperor like,he was by him therfore blamed and reproued. For this Niphon being of a crafty ſubtill wit and malicious nature,beſides that he ſecretly hated all them vpon whom Fortune greatly either fauned or frowned, bare an eſpeciall grudge againſt the old Emperor : firſt, For that at ſuch time as he was right worthily,for his ſhameful couetouſneſſe and extortion,by the reſt of the Biſhops and Clergy thruſt out of the Patriarkſhip, hee was not by him(as he looked for)defended:and ſecondly, For that dreaming again after the Patriarchal dignity,he thought it one good ſtep therunto,to haue him,as his greateſt enemy, taken out of the way. Wherfore he ſaid now vnto the yong emperor, If thou deſire to reign without fear,giue not thine honor vnto another; but taking all the ornaments of the empire from the old man, F caſt hair cloath vpon him,and ſo clap him vp faſt in priſon,or elſe thruſt him out into exile. This miſchieuous counſell this wicked man gaue againſt the poore old diſtreſſed Emperour, not remembring how vnworthily hee had by him beene before preferred vnto the higheſt degrees both of honour and wealth, if he could there haue kept himſelfe. Vnto which vngracious counſel diuers others of the Nobility alſo conſenting,ſo wrought the matter amongſt them, that although they could not quite draw the yong Emperors mind from his grandfather, yet they much changed the ſame, ſo that he could no longer endure to take him for his companion in the empire. Wherupon after many meetings & conſultations had, it was decreed, That the old man ſhould ſtill retain the name and ornaments of an Emperor, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to ſit ſtill quietly in his chamber, with the yearly maintenance of 10000 ducats, for the maintenance of himſelfe and ſuch as tended vpon him; to be raiſed of the fiſhing before the city of Conſtantinople; a poore penſion for the maintenance of ſo great an Emperor. Of which ſo ſhameful a decree Eſaias the Patriark was alſo a furtherer: who ſeeing an Emperor that had reigned ſo long, caſt down, and ſhut vp as it were in priſon, was ſo far from grieuing thereat, that fooliſhly rejoicing, hee in token thereof abſurdly wreſted this text of Scripture, ſaying in his merriment, Lætabitur juſtus cum viderit ultionem; The Iuſt ſhall rejoice when he ſeeth the reuenge; calling himſelf juſt, and the Emperor Reuenge. But the old Emperor thus ſhut vp in his chamber (differing in nothing but in name from a priſon) not long after, the ſtate of his body ouerthrown with griefe, and corrupt humors diſtilling out of his head, firſt loſt one of his eies, and ſhortly after the other alſo; and ſo oppreſſed with eternall darknes, mingled (as ſaith the Scripture) his drink with teares, and ate the bread of ſorrow, being oftentimes to his great griefe moſt bitterly mocked & derided; not by them only which were by his enemies ſet to gard him, but of his owne ſeruants alſo. Not long after, the yong Emperor falling ſicke, in ſuch ſort as that it was thought hee would not recouer, Catacuzenus and the reſt of his greateſt fauorites and followers, carefull of their own eſtate, & yet doubtfull of the old blind Emperor, deuiſed many things againſt him, but al tending to one purpoſe, for the ſhortning of his daies. But in the end, all other deuiſes ſet apart, they put him to his choice, either to put on the habit of a Religious, and ſo for euer to bid the world farwel, or els to take what ſhould otherwiſe enſue, the beſt wherof was either death, exile, or perpetual impriſonment in the loathſom caſtle of obliuion. For the putting wherof in execution, Synadenus (of all others to him moſt hatefull) was appointed. At which hard choice the old emperor, as with a world of woes ſuddenly oppreſt, lay a great while vpon his bed as a man ſpeechles: for what could he do els, except he had had an heart of ſteel or adamant? being then compaſſed about with many barbarous and merciles ſoldiers, and his domeſticall ſeruants took from him, and no man left that would vouchſafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go, or where to ſtand. But to make the matter ſhort, would he, would he not, they made choice for him themſelues, polling & ſhauing him, & caſting a Monks habit vpon him, changed his name after the maner of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthony the Monk. Glad was Eſaias the falſe Patriark of this the hard eſtate of the old Emperor, for that now that he was profeſſed a religious, there was left no hope for him to recouer again the Empire, either cauſe for himſelf to fear. Yet hee thought it good to be aduiſed, in what ſort remembrance ſhould be made of him in the Church prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Wherof to be by the old Emperor himſelfe reſolued, he (ſeeming to be very ſory for that which was don, but purpoſing indeed therin to deride him) ſent two Biſhops vnto him, to know what his pleaſure was to haue done therein. Vnto which their demand, he (oppreſſed with heauineſſe, and fetching a deep ſigh from the bottom of his heart) anſwered:

The old Emperor becommeth blind.

Andronicus the old Emperor againſt his will made a Monk, & named Anthony.

The notable anſwer of the old Emperor to the catching queſtion of the proud Patriark.

As in poore Lazarus appeared a double miracle, that being dead hee roſe, and being bound, walked; euen ſo was it to be done in mee, though in quite contrary manner. For lo, beeing aliue I am dead, as ouerwhelmed with the waues of calamitie and wo: And beeing looſe, I am bound, not my hands and feet only, but my tongue alſo; wherewith vnable to do any thing elſe, I might yet at leaſt bewaile my woes and wrongs vnto the aire, and ſuch as by chance ſhould heare mee, and vnto this moſt wofull darkeneſſe wherin I muſt for euer ſit. But ſhame hath cloſed my mouth; my Brethren abhor me, and my Mothers ſons account me as a ſtranger vnto them, and the very light of myne eye is not with him. My Friends and Neighbours ſtood vp againſt me, and all that ſaw me laughed mee to ſcorne. My feet had almoſt ſlipped, and my foot-ſteps were almoſt ouerthrown: for I fretted againſt the Wicked, when I ſaw the peace of the vngodly. The Emperors long ago gaue great priuiledges vnto the Church, euen thoſe which it at this day enioyeth: and the Church gaue to them again power to chuſe whom they would to be Patriarks. Now concerning him that ſent you, I not only nominated him vnto the Patriarchall Dignitie, but I my

A ſelfe made choice of him, and preferred him before many other right worthy and famous men, being himſelf a man grown old in a poore priuat life, neuer before preferred, or for any other thing famous. I will not ſay how often I haue holpen him and don him good: but now when he ſhould again haue relieued me in my calamity, he joineth hands with myne enemies againſt me, more cruell vpon me than any other bloudy handed executioner; not aſhamed to ask me how I would be remembred in the Church: feigning himſelf to be ignorant and ſory for myne eſtate, much like vnto the Egyptian Crocodile of Nile, which hauing killed ſome liuing beaſt, lieth vpon the dead body & waſheth the head therof with her warm tears, which ſhe afterwards deuoureth together with the dead body. But what to anſwer him vnto this his catching queſtion I know not: for if I ſhall ſay, As an Emperor I ſhall forthwith be ſlaine by them which for that purpoſe haue me in hold: but if I ſay, As Anthony the Monke, it ſhall bee taken as the free confeſsion of B my eſtate, by them who haue craftily contriued myne ouerthrow; as if I had not by compulſion, but euen of mine own free will put on this monaſticall habit, which God knowes was neuer in my thought.

Hauing thus ſaid, he ſent them away without any other anſwer; but ſitting down vpon his bed ſide, ſaid, My ſoul return again into thy reſt, for the Lord hath dealt well with thee: and ſpake no more in declaration of his grief, his tongue there ſtaying by his ſingular wiſedome, or elſe with the greatneſſe of his ſorrow, and ſo againſt his wil in ſilence paſſing ouer his heauineſſe; his mind with the greatneſſe of his woes ouercome, and as it were aſtoniſhed, before the humors gathered into the brain could be diſſolued into tears. For as the Sun ſending forth his moderat beams, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but caſting them forth more C plentifully, doth with his immoderat heat conſume the ſame before they can be drawne vp: ſo the moderat affections of the mind may haue their griefs by words and tears expreſt; but ſuch as exceed all meaſure, and with their vehemencie as it were ouerthrow the mind, vſually make men to ſtand ſtil mute and ſilent, or if they ſpeak at all, to ſpeak idly and nothing to the purpoſe, as men beſide themſelues or in an extaſie. But for the reſolution of the queſtion by the Biſhops demanded, the deuout Patriark decreed, That in the church praiers he ſhould be remembred before the Emperor his Nephew, by the name of the moſt religious and zealous Monk Anthony: which was done (God wot) for no good zeal to the poor blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if he weary of the world, had voluntarily taken vpon him that ſilly profeſſion. Neuertheles within 4 days after, Synadenus vnder- D ſtanding them in euery place to whiſper amongſt themſelues, and ſecretly to mutter againſt the hard dealing with the old Emperor, who had long reigned ouer them, and ſo was by right again to do if his nephew ſhould chance to die; and that the Eccleſiaſticall laws inforced no man againſt his wil to enter into religious orders: he therwith inraged, ſent to him certain of his own confederacie to exact of him an oath in writing, That he ſhould neuer after that time ſeek after the empire, or yet accept of the ſame if it were offred him, neither to ſubſtitute any other: which if he refuſed to do, to put him in fear of his life. And the more to terrifie him, ſet a gard of inſolent barbarous ſoldiers ouer him; for fear of whom he yeelded to do whatſoeuer they required: and ſo his oath being ſolemnly conceiued in writing (another man leading his hand becauſe he was blind) he ſigned the ſame with a red croſſe aboue, and a black croſſe be- E neath, after the maner of the Religious. Hauing thus liued in darknes diſgraced, ſhut vp in his chamber as a man forſaken of the world, with a ſure gard euer to attend him, by the ſpace of two years, it fortuned that the twelfth of February towards night (a day in the Greeke church dedicated to the vigil of S. Anthony, whoſe name they had giuen him) certaine of his friends that were ſuffered to haue acceſſe vnto him, going as their maner was once in three or four daies to viſit him (among whom was his daughter, ſomtime the Prince of Servia his wife, but as then a widow, and Nicephorus Gregoras author of this hiſtory) he entred with them as with his friends, into a familiar diſcourſe of many matters, wherin he ſo deceiued the time that it was paſt midnight before they perceiued how the time paſſed. But the cocks crowing he brake off the talk, and bidding them farwell, gaue them leaue to depart, pleaſantly ſaying, F that to morrow they would make an end of their diſcourſe. Who all thereupon tooke their leaue and departed, no ſign of any ſicknes as then appearing vpon him: who after they were gon, called for meat and did eat: the meat he eat was certain ſhel fiſh, for it was with them a faſting day, & he had not eat any thing. After which when as he ſhould haue drunk a cup of wine for the comforting of his cold ſtomacke, & diſgeſting that ſo hard meat, he drank cold water, water,as his maner was when he felt any inward heat, to drink the ſame immoderatly:which hurtfull kind of diet he then vſing alſo,began by and by to feel a great paine in his ſtomacke, and ſo preſently after became very ſick,falling withall into a great looſnes of body,ſo that in the ſpace of one quarter of an hour he was glad oftentimes to ariſe,and to go vnto an homely houſe of office in an inner chamber,therby to diſcharge natures burden : where after many euacuations,ſitting down vpon an homely bed faſt by,and not able to recouer his own bed,hauing as then none to help him,there before it was day died,after he had reigned 43 years. His death was by many ſtrange ſigns and accidents as it were foretold : firſt a great eclipſe of the Sun appeared iuſt ſo many daies before his death as he had liued years : and after that, another eclipſe of the moone, and with it an earthquake, the day before hee died at night,beeing Saint Anthonies euen, whoſe name his enemies had thruſt vpon him : at which time alſo the ſea with a great tempeſt ariſing aboue the wonted bounds, made diuers breaches in the walls of the city toward the ſea,as if it had bin ſome violent enemy, & ouerflowed alſo diuers houſes in the city. Many croſſes and pinacles were then alſo from the tops of churches and other high buildings ouerthrown;and with them a great pillar, ſometime one of the ornaments of the city,ſtanding before the church commonly called the Church of the 40 Martyrs ; which being very high,and below burnt & worn away with time,had put many in a fear as they paſſed by it,leſt it ſhould haue fallen vpon them : inſomuch that the Emperor vpon a time paſſing that way,was requeſted by ſome of the nobilitie there preſent,to ride farther from it, for fear of falling vpon him : who ſmiling at their vain fear, by chance anſwered, O would to God I might liue ſo long as this pillar will ſtand. Which now falling out according to his ſpeech, gaue many of them that had heard him ſo ſay,occaſion to maruell. His dead body was honorably buried in the monaſtery of Libe,which his mother Theodora the Empres had not long before new built,and his obſequies there(after the maner of that time) yearly ſolemnly kept by the ſpace of nine daies.

The Turkes kingdom founded by Othoman in Aſia,at ſuch time as the Greek Emperors were at variance betweene themſelues in Europe.

Thus at length hauing paſſed through the troubled ſtate of the Greek empire,during the long reign of the old Emperor Andronicus,the conſiderat Reader may eaſily ſee the cauſes of the declining and ruin alſo of this famous empire: and how that the Greek Emperors, troubled with their tempeſtuous affairs neerer home in Europe, yea in the very Imperiall City it ſelf,and in their own palaces,were not at leiſure to look ouer the ſtreit into Aſia, but glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weak defence of themſelues. At which time,and euen in the midſt of the foreſaid trouble, Othoman on the one ſide with great induſtry layd the foundation of his Empire in Phrygia and Bithynia, (now the greateſt terror of the World) and then did thoſe things which we now haue written of him. The other Princes of the Turkes alſo,the ſucceſſors of Sultan Aladin, at the ſame time on the other ſide alongſt the riuer Meander incroching as faſt : vntill that at laſt amongſt them they had thruſt the Greeke Emperours quite out of Aſia ; and in fine became themſelues, together with the Greeke Empire, a prey vnto the Othoman Kings;as in the further proceſſe of this hiſtory ſhal more at large appeare.

Pruſa yeelded to the Turks.

But again to return to Othoman himſelf,who all this while that Andronicus the Greek Emperor was thus troubled,had with his ſon Orchanes ſought by all meanes on euery ſide to enlarge his kingdom. The garriſons by him left in the two late built caſtles neer to the great city of Pruſa,vnder the charge of the two valiant Captains Actemur and Balabanzuck (as is before declared) hauing now continued there certain years,had by ſhutting vp the paſſages,and ſpoiling of the country,brought the city into ſuch diſtres and penury,that many of the Citiſens and other the poor Chriſtians fled into the city,died of famin. The reſt now out of all hope to be relieued by the Greek Emperor,not then able to relieue himſelf,came to compoſition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then ſick of his old diſeaſe the gout) couenanting with him, that they might in ſafety with life & liberty depart, and ſo much of their goods as they themſelues could carry ; and ſo yeelded to him the city. Which conditions (as moſt write) were on the Turks behalf wel and faithfully performed : yet ſome there be that report them to haue bin in moſt part by Orchanes broken. Thus was Pruſa,one of the greateſt cities of that part of Aſia,yeelded vnto the Turks, in the year of our Lord 1327:and was afterwards by Orchanes made the royal ſeat of the Othoman Kings.

About this time,or very ſhortly after,Othoman in the eight and twentieth year of his reign died, A died at the age of 69, Anno Dom. 1328. and lieth buried at Pruſa, where his Tombe is yet at this day to be ſeen in a certain chappell of an old Monaſtery, in a caſtle ſtanding in the midſt of the city; couered with a mantle of greene Chamlet, and a little tulipant or Turkiſh hat (ſuch as he vſed to wear) lying ouer his head, differing from thoſe which the Turks now wear, eſpecially the better ſort of them, being ſo great that they can ſcarſe therewith come in at a dore. There is alſo another monument of him to be ſeene at Suguta, faſt by the ſepulchre of his father Ertogrul, there made by his ſons in remembrance of him, whereof ſome haue reported him to haue bin there buried. Howbeit the Turks themſelues generally ſuppoſe the true monument wherin he is interred, to be at Pruſa, as is aforeſaid. He was wiſe, valiant, politick and fortunat, but ful of diſſimulation, and ambitious aboue meaſure; not raſh in his attempts, B and yet very reſolute: what he took in hand he commonly brought to good effect. He was bountifull and liberall to all men, but eſpecially to his men of War, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloath with his own hands. Of a poor lordſhip he left a great kingdom, hauing ſubdued a great part of the leſſer Aſia: and is worthily accounted the firſt founder of the Turks great kingdom and empire. Of him, the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors haue euer ſince bin called the Othoman Kings and Emperors, as lineally of him deſcended: and the Turks themſelues Oſmanidæ, as the people or ſubjects of Othoman or Oſman, for ſo he is of the Turks commonly called.

Note, that in the reckoning vp of certain of the great Chriſtian Princes and Prelats of the ſame time, at the end of euery the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors liues, the firſt and greateſt number following their names, ſheweth the year of our Lord, wherin ſuch an Emperor, King, or Biſhop, began to reign or ſit; and the number following, how long he reigned or ſate. As for example, Andronicus the elder began to reign in the Eaſt in the year of Grace 1282, and reigned 43 years. And ſo of the reſt. Wherin we ſeek not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day, (as not much materiall to our hiſtory, or any part of our purpoſe) but only the reaſonable view of the great Princes of the forepaſſed times, as they liued in ages together.

✠ ORCHANES OTHOMANNI FI SECVNDVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT ANNO 1328 1603

Suſcipit Orchanes defuncti Sceptra parentis:
Major ut ingenio, ſic magis arte valens.
Bithynos, Phrygiamque domat, Pruſamque ſuperbam:
Et populos late (Marte favente) premit.
Sic lætus tantis Aſiam turbaſſe ruinis; Tranſit in Europam, Callipolimque capit.
Rident interea Græci ſua damna: ſed ecce, Dum ſua contemnunt, in ſua fata ruunt.

RIC. KNOLLEVS.

His father dead, Orchanes takes his Scepter vp in hand,
As one of deeper wit and reach his foes for to withſtand.
The Phrygians and Bithynians he by force of arms brought low; Proud Pruſa, with fair Nicomede, and many cities moe.
And glad in Aſia to haue made ſuch hauock and ſuch ſpoil, His Forces into Europ ſends, the Grecians there to foil.
Who mean while laughing at their loſſe, did make thereof a game,
Not thinking what a world of wo was to enſue the ſame.

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TVRKES.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two ſons, Orchanes (whom the Turks call Vrchan) and Aladin his brother, hauing with great ſolemnitie interred their father at Pruſa, immediatly ſummoned a Parliament; whereunto both the C brethren came, accompanied with the chiefe of their nobilitie.
This parliament was called eſpecially for the eſtabliſhing of the ſucceſſion in this new kingdom, and for the diuiſion of Othomans treaſure & goods betwixt them two his ſons. But vpon view taken, there was no money, plate, or jewels found in the Kings coffers, for that he had in his life time moſt bountifully beſtowed it vpon his men of war: ſo that all the wealth hee left vnto them his ſons, was the honorable remembrance of his life for them to imitate, large dominions for their poſſeſſions, ſtore of ready horſes & armor fit for ſeruice, D with great herds of beaſts and cattel for houſhold prouiſion. Wherupon Orchanes demanded of his brother Aladin, what order he thought was beſt to be taken with thoſe things by their father ſo left? To whom Aladin anſwered, That it was moſt requiſit firſt to eſtabliſh a King in their fathers Kingdome; which like a good Sheepheard might gouerne and defend his people, rule and maintaine his men of War, and prouide all things meete and neceſſarie for defence of his kingdom: and that vnto him of right belonged all theſe other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his ſucceſſor, for the common good; and maintenance of his eſtate. As for myne own part (ſaid Aladin) I claime no intereſt therein, you being my elder brother, and ſo vnto me in ſtead of a father; by whom alſo you haue bin theſe two years as it were already put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, all things being committed to your gouernment E during the time of his late ſicknes. This modeſty of Aladin was greatly commended of all the antient counſellors; by means wherof the kingdom in all peaceable maner deſcended to Orchanes. In regard of which curteſie, Orchanes would gladly haue made Aladin his brother Preſident of his Councell. Which honor hee would in no wiſe accept, but requeſted rather that he would giue him the lordſhip of Fodore in Tekences country; which Orchanes freely granted. In which lordſhip of Fodore Aladin for moſt part liued a priuat and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an abby at Pruſa, there yet at this day to be ſeen.

The wealth Othoman left to his two ſonnes, Orchanes and Aladin.

Some Latine Hiſtoriographers otherwiſe report this beginning of Orchanes his reigne; as that Othoman ſhould haue three ſons, and that Orchanes the yongeſt obtained the kingdom by F murthering his other brethren. A practiſe of late much vſed amongſt the Turkiſh Princes, but not before the time of Bajazet the firſt of that name, who firſt of the Turkiſh Monarchs embrued his hands with his brothers bloud. Where before they vſed all brotherly loue one vnto another, as the moſt probable hiſtories collected out of the Turks own Chronicles do affirm.

When the barbarous murdering of their brethren firſt began amongſt the Turks Sultans.

The city of Nice with diuers other caſtles recouered from the Turks after the death of Othoman.

The Chriſtian princes and captains preſently vpon the death of Othoman recouered the city of Nice,with diuers other caſtles and forts,out of the Turks hands: as it commonly chanceth,that dominions lately won with great perill,are ſoon again loſt,the conqueror dying before there be a firm gouernment eſtabliſhed. Amongſt other ſorts by the Chriſtians repoſſeſſed,the caſtle of Tzuprichiſer,ſcituate vpon the paſſages of the riuer Sangarius,moſt grieued the Turkes, for thereby their paſſage into that part of Bithynia was much impeached. Wherfore Orchanes deſirous to recouer this caſtle,diſguiſed himſelfe with a few other of his beſt ſoldiers,in the apparell of Chriſtian merchants, and came to the caſtle, crauing leaue to paſſe as merchants. The warders of the caſtle verily ſuppoſing them by their attire to be merchants,opened the gates and let them into the caſtle: who preſently drew their ſwords, ſlew the warders,and ſo by force poſſeſſed the caſtle,to the great benefit of the Turks,and the hurt of the poor Chriſtians yet left in the country of Bithynia: for they hauing now opened a way ouer the riuer Sangarius, and as it were broken down the ſtrongeſt defence of that ſide of the Greek empire,at their pleaſure forraged the countrey in ſuch ſort,as that the great city Nice for want of victuals to relieue ſo great a multitude as for fear of the Turks was fled out of the country into it, was brought to great extremitie and want. For the relief wherof,and for the repulſing again of the Turks, Androvicus the yong Emperor, who then commanded all, with ſuch an army as he was then able to raiſe, paſſed himſelf in perſon ouer the ſtreit of Conſtantinople,into Aſia: the greateſt ſtrength of his army conſiſted in 2000 choice horſemen, the reſt,as well horſe as foot,being for the moſt part artificers taken vp in the City, men altogether vnacquainted with arms (who in token of their cowardiſe,& that they were more mindfull of flight than of fight,caried ouer with them almoſt as many long boats and ſuch other ſmall veſſels,as they were men,to be ready to receiue them at ſuch time as they ſhould flie) or els abject raſcals taken vp here and there,men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others moſt vnfit for ſo great a Prince as was the Emperour, to commit the defence of his perſon and honor vnto. But Orchanes hearing of his comming, ſent certain of his moſt expert Captains to forelay the ſtreit paſſages of the countrey wherby the Emperour was to paſſe; following alſo himſelfe after with his army,of purpoſe to incounter the Emperor:who in three days march after his landing in Aſia, being come to Philochrene a little town in Bithynia,and vnderſtonding that Orchanes hauing before taken the ſtreits,lay not far off incamped with his army; he there at Philochrene pitched his tents,and ſtaid that night alſo. But the next morning,the Sun as yet ſcarſely riſen,he ſeeing diuers companies of the Turks comming down from the mountains faſt by,put his army in order of battell,and ſo ſet forward to meet them: where to begin the fight,the Turkes archers freely beſtowed their piercing ſhot among the Chriſtians,ſtill keeping themſelues aloof off,ſo to do the more harm. Which the Emperor miſtaking,and ſuppoſing that their keeping off to haue proceeded of fear, incouraged therwith,commanded certain looſe companies diſorderly to march forward,and to skirmiſh with them. Which his more expert Captains not liking,would haue otherwiſe perſuaded him,as to haue kept his ſtrength together againſt the danger of the battel. Neuertheleſ ſuch was his youthful heat,as that he could by no means be otherwiſe intreated,but that forward needs they muſt. But all the forenoon ſpent in this light and tumultuary kind of ſkirmiſhing,and the Sun at the higheſt now ſhining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the mountains perceiuing the Chriſtians well wearied with the heat of the day and long ſkirmiſhing, came down from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a moſt hideous cry charged the Chriſtians on euery ſide,ſome afar off with their arrowes,and ſome hand to hand with their ſwords and other weapons: whoſe aſſault the Chriſtians at the firſt moſt valiantly receiued,and a great while right worthily defended themſelues, hauing wounded and ſlain a number of their enemies. Which hard fight was on both ſides courageouſly maintained till the approching of the night,with great ſlaughter on both ſides;at which time the Chriſtians weary of the long fight, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, diſorderly retyring toward their trenches,and hardly purſued by the Turkes, receiued there a great loſſe as well of their horſmen as of their foot:but by the comming on of the night the battell was at length ended with uncertain victory. Among others there hurt,the Emperour himſelfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night hapned a ſad miſhap,and a manifeſt token of Gods wrath:for Orchanes hauing to his coſt made proof of the ſtrength and valor of the Chri-

The Emperor wounded.

A ſtians and doubting they would the next day come on further into the country, left three hundred horſemen as ſcouts, to attend the enemies remouing: and himſelfe with his army retired before hand to take aduantage of ſuch places as the Chriſtians were to paſſe by. But the Emperor in the euening leauing his campe, and going to Philocrene, a little town faſt by, the better to haue his wound dreſſed; the reſt of the army vnderſtanding of his departure, and ſuppoſing him to haue fled for feare (as if Orchanes with a great army would that night haue ſlaine them all) fled themſelues alſo out of the campe, euery mothers ſon; ſome to their long boats and other little veſſels they had for that purpoſe brought ouer the ſtreit; ſome haſting toward the town gates, were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, ouerborne and trodden to death; otherſome hanging one at anothers taile, like a chain, got ſome part of them B vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; otherſome drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling downe together by heaps, and trod vpon by others, there periſhed; ſome (as is reported) died there for very feare, no man either chaſing or hurting them, ſo weake is mans courage, when God withdraweth from him his ſtrength. But in the morning the Sun ariſing, the three hundred Turks left for ſcouts, perceiuing the flight of the Chriſtians, entred the forſaken campe, where they found horces, armor, and empty tents, yea the Emperours owne furniture, and his horſes ready ſadled: of all which, two hundred of theſe Turks tooke the ſpoile at their pleaſure, and the other hundred purſuing the diſperſed Chriſtians, like heartleſſe men wandring here and there, ſlew a great number of them. The Emperor himſelf ſeeing his army thus (as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrown and diſperſed, tooke ſhipping alſo, and ſo C returned to Conſtantinople. After whoſe departure, the Turkes ſeiſing vpon many ſea townes alongſt the coaſt of Bythinia, and there ſeating themſelues, layd heauy tributes vpon the other country townes and villages; for the benefit whereof they ſpared to deſtroy them, together with the inhabitants, which they might at their pleaſure full eaſily haue done.

Now lay the great city of Nice in the ſuds, the enemy commanding all the country about it, liuing as ſicke men do by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thouſand horſemen which the Emperor (notwithſtanding his late diſcomfiture) had promiſed forthwith to ſend, there to lie in garriſon for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. Of which aid ſo promiſed Orchanes vnderſtanding, furniſhed eight hundred of his horſemen after the manner of the Chriſtians; and fetching a great compaſſe about, came at length into the high way that leadeth from D Conſtantinople to Nice, and ſo trouped directly toward the city, as if they had come from Conſtantinople. At the ſame time he ſent 300 of his other horſemen in the habit of Turks, to forrage and ſpoyle the country as much as they could within the view of the city, now for want of victuals brought into great extremity; which whileſt they were a doing, the other eight hundred horſemen in the attire of Chriſtians, following vpon them, as if it had bin by chance, charged them, and in the ſight of the citizens put them to flight: which done, theſe counterfeit horſemen returned directly againe towards Nice. The citizens which with great pleaſure had in the meane time from the wals ſeen the moſt part of the skirmiſh, and how they had put the Turks to flight, ſuppoſing them to be the Conſtantinopolitan horſemen, whom they dayly expected, with great joy opened the gates of the city to receiue them as their friends. But E they being entred the gates, preſently ſet vpon the Chriſtians, fearing no ſuch matter: & being ſeconded with the other three hundred, which in diſſembling manner had fled before, & were now ſpeedily returned, bringing alſo with them other companies of Turkes, before laid in ſecret ambuſh not far off, they won the great and famous city of Nice, which they haue euer ſince vntill this day poſſeſſed: the ſpoile whereof was giuen to the ſouldiers for a prey, and the citizens all led away into miſerable captiuity and thraldome. Whileſt Orchanes was thus buſied, his other captains did with great courage & ſucceſſe inlarge his dominions on al ſides, dayly incroching vpon their weake neighbors the Chriſtians. Cunger-Alpes one of his valiant captains, ſubdued the country of Mudurn, or Modrin, in Phrygia; and Bolli in Paphlagonia: appointing one Abdürachman a man of great valour, to gouerne the country. And at the ſame F time another of his old captains called Accecozza, brought Candara in Paphlagonia, and Ermeni, a country neer vnto the mountain Horminius, into the Turkiſh ſubjection; placing garriſons in all the Caſtles and forts which he had won, of whom ſome part of thoſe Countries was after his name called Cozza Ilini, that is to ſay, The old mans country. So that Orchanes his kingdom grew daily greater & greater, as wel by the induſtry of his chieftains, as of himſelfe.

The Citie of Nice ſurpriſed by the Turks.

About this time it fortuned, the captains ſon of Scamandria (a town not far from the ruins G of the antient city of Troy, and about a daies journy from the renowned caſtle of Abydus) to depart out of this world: vnto whoſe funerals, being kept in the country, whileſt his wofull father the captaine with his friends out of Scamandria reſorted, the old crafty Turke Accecozza lying alwaies in wait, as a fox for his prey, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe heauy Chriſtians, whereof he ſlew the moſt part, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Amongſt whom he alſo tooke the Captain of Scamandria, with his caſtle and country: whom he afterwards led priſoner vnto the caſtle of Abydus, which is one of the moſt famous caſtles ſcituate vpon the ſea coaſt of Aſia, ouer againſt Seſtus in Europe; where the ſea of Helleſpontus by the narrow ſtreit falleth into the ſea of Ægeum: two caſtles much renowned by reaſon of their nigh ſcituation, and yet placed in diuers parts of the world; eterniſed alſo by the euer-liuing wits of Poets, for the aduenturous H paſſage of Leander ouer that fret of the ſea, to his loue Hero: which caſtles are now called Dardanella. Accecozza hauing brought the captiue Captaine of Scamandria (lately a man of great account in that countrey) ſo neere as he could vnto the caſtle of Abydus, offered to ſet him at liberty if they would ſurrender their Caſtle, otherwiſe they ſhould ſee him cruelly ſlain before their faces. Theſe Turkiſh threats nothing moued them of Abydus, more than to ſay, That they might if they would cut off his head, ſeeth him and eat him, but the caſtle they intended not to deliuer. The ſame Captaine was afterward by the commandment of Orchanes profered to the Emperor of Conſtantinople to be redeemed, which he refuſed: yet at the laſt he was ranſomed by the gouernor of Nicomedia, and againe ſet at liberty. Accecozza of long time held the caſtle of Scamandria; yet ſo contiuually moleſted with the gariſon of Abydus, I and men of war ſent from Conſtantinople, that he with his followers were glad for the moſt part to liue on horſback, to be alwaies in more readines againſt the attempts of their enemies.
The captain of the caſtle of Abydus had at that time a faire yong gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as ſhe ſaid) chanced to dream (what ſhe had happily waking for the moſt part wiſhed) That being fallen into a deep myry ditch, out of which ſhe could by no means help her ſelfe, a luſty yong gallant comming by, did not only help her out, but alſo in friendly manner made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coaſtly attire. The danger of this dream much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the young gentleman was ſo well phantaſied in her brain, that waking, ſhe thought ſhe ſtil ſaw him, and ſleeping longed ſore for what ſhe ſaw not. Thus whileſt this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this K imaginary man, the old gray headed Turke Accecozza came, and with a ſtrong company beſieged her fathers caſtle of Abydus. During which ſiege, this gentlewoman oftentimes went vp into the high turret of the caſtle, from whence ſhe might at pleaſure ſee the martiall deeds on both ſides, and take ful view of all the enemies camp. But ſee the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage and no leſſe brauery, approched neere to the ſiege of the caſtle, ſhe thought (vpon the firſt ſight of him) that he was the very man whom ſhe had before dreamed of, and whoſe Idea was in her heart ſo deepely imprinted: wherefore ſhe fully reſolued to performe what ſhe had without witneſſe with her ſelfe determined. And waiting another time when Abdurachman approched the caſtle, ſhe caſt downe to his feet a letter written in Greeke, and made faſt vnto a ſtone: which letter he taking vp, deliuered the ſame to the generall Accecozza. L Wherein after ſhe had diſcouered her paſſionate affection, ſhe promiſed to deliuer the caſtle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turks would raiſe their ſiege, and Abdurachman himſelfe with ſome few would ſecretly returne to the caſtle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Accecozza like an old foxe, which is ſeldome taken in the trap, gaue ſmall credit to theſe louing lines, for feare of treaſon; yet for ſo much as you are the man (ſaid hee to Abdurachman) whom ſhe vpon ſpeciall liking hath made choice of for the purpoſe, wil you aduenture your perſon? And he armed with a manly courage, a ſurer defence than any armor of proofe, incited alſo with hope of honour, riches, and beauty, all worthy prizes for martiall minds; ſaid, he would vndertake the atchieuement of that exployt, if it were his pleaſure ſo.
Whereupon Accecozza, becauſe nothing ſhould be ſuſpected by his ſudden departure, gaue M a ſharpe aſſault to the caſtle, as if he would haue taken it by fine force, yet in the end retyred, and preſently brake vp his ſiege, as deſpairing of the winning thereof. The defendants of the Caſtle thinking themſelues deliuered of a great danger, greatly rejoyced: and as in the like caſe it oftentimes falleth out, in their great jolity ſurcharged themſelues that night with exceſſe

Abydus beſieged by the Turks.

A exceſſe both of meat and drink. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed, put himſelfe vpon the way with certaine ſelect ſouldiers, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the caſtle, where the yong gentlewoman was attending his comming: and he by her means was conueyed into the caſtle, and ſo by her directed to the porters lodge; where hee ſlew the porter being faſt aſleepe, and opening the gates, let in his followers; which went directly to the captains lodging, and there took him priſoner, being before their comming ouertaken with wine, and faſt aſleep. Thus was the caſtle of Abydus ſurpriſed by the Turks, from whence they had a faire proſpect out of Aſia into Europe. The captaine with his faire daughter, and the greateſt part of the rich ſpoile of the caſtle, was deliuered to Abdurachman, to be preſented to Orchanes at his court, then lying at Neapolis. Who wonderfull glad of ſo good B news, gaue the faire gentlewoman, with the greateſt part of the prey to Abdurachman. The poſteritie of this man (as they ſay) yet remaine among the Turks. Amongſt others of the warlike captaines there was alſo one Cararachman, whoſe name was ſo dreadfull to them of Conſtantinople, that when their children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by ſaying, Cararachman comes. Not long after, the two valiant aforenamed worthy captaines, Cunger-Alpes, and Accecozza died. After whoſe death, Orchanes made his ſons, Solyman and Amurath, lords and gouernors of thoſe countries and prouinces. And intending (by the perſuaſion of Abdurachman) to beſiege Nicomedia, he leuied a great army, wherwith he tooke diuers ſmall caſtles and forts as he marched towards the city. Nicomedia was at that time gouerned by an honorable lady, kinſwoman vnto Andronicus the Emperor of Conſtantinople: C but ſhe ſeeing her city beſieged by the Turks, and doubting her own forces not to be able to hold out the ſiege, by a truſty meſſenger offered to yeeld the city vnto Orchanes, vpon condition, That ſhe with ſo many citiſens as would, might in ſafety depart with their liues, liberty, and goods: which being granted, ſhee with ſo many as would follow her, departed out of the city by night, taking ſhipping for Conſtantinople.

Nicomedia yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Orchanes hauing taken Nicomedia, made his ſon Solyman gouernor of the ſame. The churches of the Chriſtians he conuerted vnto Turkiſh Meſchitas or temples. The greateſt church (being of wonderfull beauty) he conuerted into a colledge or ſchoole, for the learned profeſſors and ſtudents of Mahomets law, which is yet called in Nicomedia, Orchanes his ſchoole or colledge. And becauſe the Countrey neere vnto Nicomedia, lying vpon the ſea, was euer in D danger to be ſpoiled by the gallies of Conſtantinople, he placed in thoſe countries diuers of his moſt experienced ſoldiers to defend the ſame, appointing to euery of them poſſeſſions and penſions, according to their degrees and merit. After this, Orchanes by the councell of his brother Aladin, commanded all his men of war to weare white caps, thereby to be knowne from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vſe at this day. The Turks alſo in Orchanes raigne, and long time after, vſed not to cut or ſhaue their beards, but did weare them long: ſo that if the King would diſgrace any man, hee would in his diſpleaſure command his beard to be cut or ſhauen. The maner of cutting and ſhauing their beards which they now vſe, they learned of the Italians; of whom they haue alſo borrowed many other faſhions, not only differing, but quite contrary to their antient manners and cuſtomes. Orchanes E about this time remoued his court to Nice, where he lay a long time after. There he built a ſumptuous church, appointing a preacher to preach to the people euery Fryday: he erected in Nice alſo two faire abbies, in the one of which, he with his own hands ſerued the ſtrangers and poore the firſt dinner. He was the firſt that builded abbies or monaſteries among the Turks; whoſe example moſt of his ſucceſſors haue imitated, and is amongſt them vſed vnto this day.

Orchanes remoueth his Court to Nice.

The gouernment of Nicomedia Orchanes committed to his eldeſt ſon Solyman (as is beforeſaid) a Prince of great towardlineſſe; giuing him in great charge to haue a vigilant eie to the towns of Taraxa, Gouinuca, and Mudurne, which were nigh vnto Nicomedia, yet in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians: all which townes, with the countries adjoyning, Solyman in ſhort time got without force, by compoſition. This Solyman was of a princely diſpoſition, ſo tempring juſtice F with clemencie in his gouernment, that many Chriſtians allured with his vertues, became of his religion, and gladly put themſelues vnder his ſubjection: the politicke lawes of the country he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had been of antient time accuſtomed, whereby he greatly woon the hearts of the people. Amurath his younger ſonne, Orchanes made lord and gouernor of Pruſa, after he had remoued his court to Nice. And the caſtle of Chara-chiſar, with the ſeigniorie thereto belonging, he gaue to his couſin Artemure, the ſonne of his vncle Iundus.

Orchanes inuadeth the Country of Caraſina.

The country of Caraſina yeelded vnto Orchanes.

There was at this time in Orchanes court a noble yong gentleman called Turſon-beg, the ſon of Dharaſis King of Charaſia; by whoſe perſuaſion Orchanes in perſon himſelfe with a ſtrong army, made an expediton into that country: for that his fathers ſubiects after the death of the King his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, wiſhing rather to haue Turſon for their ſoueraign. In whoſe behalfe Orchanes taking that iourny, ſurpriſed by the way many caſtles and townes to his owne vſe. Orchanes was no ſooner entred the country of Charaſia, but Turſons elder brother fled to Pergamum, whither the Turks ſhortly purſued him: where Turſon deſirous to ſpeake with his brother, vnwarily approching the city, was wounded with an arrow ſhot from the wals, and there ſlaine. With whoſe death Orchanes was ſo greatly offended, that he threatned to deſtroy the whole countrey with fire and ſword, if they did not by a day prefixed, generally ſubmit themſelues to his mercy. The people terrified with this proclamation of ſo great a Prince already in armes, yeelded themſelues vnto his ſubiection. The Kings ſonne alſo that was fled into Pergamum, vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded himſelfe vnto Orchanes, who ſent him to Pruſa, where after he had there liued two yeares, he died of the plague: after whoſe death Orchanes made his ſon Solyman Prince of Caraſina. Neither is this taking in of the country of Caraſina to be accounted a ſmall conqueſt; one of the greateſt houſes of the Turks the ſucceſſors of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now therby taking end, and their dominions (which were not ſmall, as containing almoſt Lydia, with ſome good parts of Miſia, Troas, and the leſſer Phrygia) now vnited vnto the Othoman Kingdome. Orchanes vpon his returne, for the good ſucceſſe of this iourney, built a Church and Monaſterie at Pruſa, placing therein religious men, with all diligence ſought for out of all his kingdome: of which religious the Turks write many fables, better worth the ſmiling at, than the ſerious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Othoman and Orchanes his ſon, was contained within the bounds of the leſſer Aſia, which the Turks call Anatolia.

Now it reſteth to be ſhewed, vpon what occaſion Orchanes, or rather his ſon Solyman Baſſa, as it were fatally, with a ſmall power firſt paſſed ouer Helleſpontus into Europe; where they and their ſucceſſors haue by little and little ſo enlarged their dominions, that they haue now long ago quite ouerthrown the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdomes, and are at this preſent a terror to all Chriſtian Princes bordering vpon them: to the perpetuall infamie of the Greekes, who for want of courage, and buſied with ciuill diſcord, neuer ſought in time to impeach their greatneſſe.

Orchanes hauing now ſo augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts thereof out of Aſia take view of the pleaſant borders of Europe, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow ſea of Helleſpontus; and continually incited with the inſatiable and reſtles deſire of ſoueraignty, began to deuiſe how he might poſſibly paſſe that ſtreit ſea, and ſet foot into Europe another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his ſon Solyman: who preſently anſwered his father, That if it would pleaſe him to giue him leaue, he would not doubt to paſſe the ſtreit of Helleſpontus, and in time to plant the Mahometan religion in thoſe countries of Europe poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians. Which anſwer of Solyman much pleaſed his father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his country, & in that matter to proceed further as he thought beſt, & as occaſion ſhould beſt ſerue. Solyman taking leaue of his father took his iourny into Caraſina, where riding vp and downe the country, as it had bin for his pleaſure onely, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous city of Troy ſometime ſtood; where yet (as the Turks and ſome others ſay) are to be ſeen the wonderfull ruins of that vnfortunate city by the ſea ſide. In this place Solyman ſtood ſtill a great while, as it were in a ſtudy, forecaſting (as it ſeemed) ſome great matter, without ſpeaking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chieftains called Ezes-beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts, boldly ſaid vnto him, My lord and great ſoueraign, what ſtrange thing is this, that you are ſo deeply drowned in theſe your melancholy thoughts? vndoubtedly it is ſome great matter that you are ſtudying vpon. Truth it is (ſaid Solyman) for I was thinking how it were poſſible to paſſe ouer this ſea of Helleſpontus into the borders of Europe, and to take view of that country, and ſo to returne vndiſcouered. If this be the matter, (ſaid Ezes-beg, ioyning vnto him one Fazil-beg, a man of no leſſe valour than himſelfe) we two will by the power of God performe vnto

A vnto you this enterpriſe. Then was Solyman deſirous to know of them, about what place they would paſſe ouer: which they well knowing the ſea coaſt, ſhewed him not far off. Wherefore Solyman giuing them leaue, they departed: and ſhortly after making a little boat, or rather as ſome ſuppoſe a raffe, paſſed ouer Helleſpontus by night, and arriued in Europe ſide, neer vnto a caſtle, of the Turks called Zemenic or Zembenic, but of the Greeks Coiridocaſtron, that is to ſay, the hogs caſtle, not far from Seſtus: where going aſhore, they tooke priſoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the caſtle, whom they finding to be a good ſenſible fellow, without delay put him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, preſented him to Solyman. This Chriſtian captiue Solyman entertained courteouſly, giuing him great gifts, and rich apparell, to diſcouer vnto him the eſtate of his country: and in fine, learned of him a means to take the B caſtle Zembenic, before the Chriſtians ſhould thereof be aware. For atchieuement whereof, certaine boats were ſpeedily made ready by Solymans commandement, and he with eighty choſen ſoldiers eaſily paſſed ouer in them by night, with their Chriſtian guide the Greeke: for in that place, the ſtreit betwixt Aſia and Europe, is not paſt an Italian mile ouer. This guid brought Solyman directly to the aforeſaid caſtle, where was a great dunghill, ſo high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his ſoldiers eaſily got into the caſtle, which they won without any great reſiſtance; for it was then harueſt time, and moſt part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne all night, as the vſe of thoſe countries is. Solyman thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle of Zembenic, vſed no extremity againſt the inhabitants thereof, ſeeking rather by courteſie to gaine their good wils, than by extremity to force them to his: yet ſuch C gentlemen as he tooke, with ſome others alſo of the better ſort, he ſent by ſhipping into Aſia, and by the ſame ſhips returned ſoldiers as faſt as he could into Europe: ſo that he had in one day two hundred ſouldiers more brought ouer vnto him: and manning ſuch ſmall veſſels as he had left about the caſtle, ſent Ezes-beg, alongſt the coaſt on Europe ſide, to burn ſuch ſhipping or veſſels as he could finde, leaſt the Chriſtians ſhould by them hinder his paſſage vpon the ſtreit of Helleſpontus. So in a few daies Solyman had tranſported into Europe two thouſand good ſouldiers of the Turks, whom he ſo gouerned, that they did not in any violent ſort iniurie the vulgar Chriſtians, by reaſon whereof the common people began to like reaſonable well of the Turks, and to conuerſe with them without feare. This was the firſt comming ouer of the Turks into Europe, with purpoſe there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the D Othoman kings. For albeit that ſome of that nation had at ſundry times before come ouer, as men ſeeking after ſpoile, or otherwiſe ſent for, yea ſomtimes by the Greeke Emperors themſelues, yet neuer ſtaid they long, but hauing done what they came for, or els loſt themſelues, returned backe againe into Aſia; vntil that now conducted by Solyman, and poſſeſſed of the little caſtle of Zembenic (as is aforeſaid) they there tooke ſo faſt footing, as that they and their poſterity after them, were neuer thence to be ſince that time remoued, but ſtil more and more encroching vpon the Chriſtians, haue vnto their Aſian Kingdome ioyned a great part of Europe alſo, to the terrour of the reſt that yet remaineth, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory ſhall (if God will) at large appeare.

About two miles from Zembenic in Cherſoneſſus was another caſtle called Maito, or more E truly Maditus, which Solyman alſo tooke: ſo that now he had gotten two caſtles in Europe, both which he ſtrongly manned. After which time, the Turks in great numbers came out of Aſia into Europe ouer that narrow ſtreit of Helleſpontus, to dwell in Cherſoneſſus: and Solyman in ſtead of them to make roome for his Turks, ſent Chriſtians out of Europe to be placed amongſt the Turks in Aſia. The report of this comming ouer of the Turks into Cherſoneſſus, and of the taking of the caſtle of Zembenic, carried in poſt to Conſtantinople, was ſufficient to haue ſtirred vp any prouident or carefull men, preſently to haue taken vp armes for the recouery of the loſt caſtle, and the driuing out againe of the barbarous enemies out of Europe, before they had gathered any greater ſtrength, or ſetled themſelues in thoſe places: but ſuch was the careleſſe negligence and great ſecurity of the proud Greekes, that inſtead thereof, F they to extenuate the greatneſſe of the loſſe, commonly ſaid, that there was but a hogſtie loſt; alluding vnto the name of the caſtle: and vainely (as ſaid a graue father of their owne) ieaſting at that was not to be ieaſted at, and laughing at that was not to be laughed at, but lamented for, as in few yeares it proued; their fooliſh laughter being not without good cauſe conuerted into moſt bitter teares.

The Caſtle of Maditus taken by the Turks.

Callipolis taken by the Turks.

Solymans ſtrength ſo ſtill increaſing by the dayly comming ouer of the Turks, he proceeded G further to ſpoile the country of Cherſoneſus, almoſt as far as Callipolis, diſtant from the caſtle Zembenic about two and twenty miles: after which pleaſant city the proud Turk began now to long. Which the gouernor thereof perceiuing by the Turks continuall incroaching vpon him, raiſed what power he was able to make, and ſo went out againſt them; all the reſt of the Greeks in the mean time lying ſtill, as if they had bin aſleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them: but meeting the Turks, he was by them (after a great conflict) ouerthrown, and for ſafegard of his life glad to fly into his city: after whom the Turks following, ſpoiled the country round about, and in their returne, by plaine force tooke the city, together with the caſtle alſo, which hapned in the yeare of our Lord 1358. Where the madneſſe of the Greeks was againe more than before to be wondred at; for the news of the loſſe of Callipolis H being brought to Conſtantinople, the people there made ſmall account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loſſe, and much concerned the ſtate: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke thereof, in ieaſting wiſe commonly ſaid, That the Turks had but taken from them a pottle of wine. But by taking of ſuch hogſtyues and pottles of wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few yeres after had gone ſo far in Thracia, that Amurath (the ſame Solymans nephew which now tooke from the Greeks the city of Callipolis) euen in the heart as it were of the Greeke Empire, placed his royall ſeat at Hadrianople: and immediately after him, Bajazet his ſonne (hauing ſubdued all the country euen to the wals of Conſtantinople) for certaine yeres laid hard ſiege vnto the Imperiall city it ſelfe; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expectation of the mighty Tartar Prince Tamerlane (vnto Bajazet fatal) I in the meane time happened: whereby (God ſo appointing it) the proſperous ſucceedings of the Turks were for a ſpace well ſtaied, that they ſhould not before the time by him prefined, deuoure the reliques of the Greeke Empire. And it were to be wiſhed, that the Chriſtians of our time alſo (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead ſleep: who of late hath loſt vnto the ſame enemy, not the caſtle of Zembenic, or the city of Callipolis, but whole kingdomes, as Hungary and Cyprus, and are ſtill faire in the way: I ſay no more for griefe, and foreboding of euill fortune. But againe to our purpoſe: Solyman hauing made this proſperous entrance into Europe, and there got ſtrong footing, by ſpeedy meſſengers certified his father what hee had done, and that it was expedient for him with all ſpeed to ſend vnto him a great ſupply of men of warre, as well for the ſure defence and keeping of K thoſe caſtles and forts by him already gotten, as for the further inuaſion of the Countrey. This meſſage was wonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Saraſins at that preſent were come into the country of Caraſina, to poſſeſſe the dwelling and places of them, which in hope to better their eſtate were before gone ouer into Europe; all theſe Saraſins he commanded to paſſe ouer into Europe likewiſe: which they did accordingly, ſeating themſelues for a time in the country neere to Callipolis. In the meane time Solyman omitted no opportunity to enter further into the country, winning ſmall forts and holds, and ſtill peopling the ſame with his Turks. And on the other ſide, they of Caraſina paſſed ouer into Europe, placing themſelues as it were in a new world. For which cauſe, and for the great deſire they had to extend the Turkiſh Dominion and Religion, they refuſed no paines of L warre: ſo that all things at that time proſpered with the Turks, and went backeward with the Chriſtians.

In the time of theſe wars, not far from Callipolis was a little caſtle called Congere, the captain whereof was by a Greeke name called Calo Ioannes, a valiant and painfull man: this captain continually moleſted and troubled the Turks which lay on that ſide of Callipolis, vnder the leading of Ezes beg, many of whom he ſlew and tooke priſoners, as he could finde them at any aduantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by crafty and ſecret eſpials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his caſtle to do ſome exployt vpon the Turks. Whereupon he preſently ſo beſet the Caſtle with ſouldiers, that he could by no meanes returne thither, but he muſt firſt fall into their hands; and for more aſſurance placed others alſo in by-waies, M leſt he ſhould by any way eſcape. The Captaine ignorant of all this, proſecuted his enterpriſe, and hauing taken a Turke priſoner, thinking to returne to his caſtle, was haſtily purſued by Fazil-beg; for which cauſe making the more haſte, he ſuddenly fell into the danger of the Turkes layd in ambuſh: where his men were all ſlaine, and himſelfe taken and brought

A before his own caſtle, and had there his head preſently ſtrucke off: whereupon the caſtle was forthwith by them that were therein (hauing now loſt their captaine) ſurrendred, and Chazi Ili beg, a valiant captaine of the Turks placed therein: who from thence neuer ceaſed to trouble the country, euen to the wals of Didymotichum, as did Solyman out of Callipolis.

Thus in the ſpace of one yere the Turks got ſtrong footing in Europe, poſſeſſing diuers caſtles and towns, with the country about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captains and ſoldiers, as appeareth by the graues and tombes of Ezes-beg and Fazil-beg, the two which firſt came ouer into Europe, which are there yet well knowne.

About this time it fortuned, that as this martial Prince Solyman was for his diſport hawking in the fields of Bolayre on Europe ſide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horſe ouer-B throwne in a ditch, of which fall he being ſore bruiſed, ſhortly after died. The newes of his death being brought to Orchanes his father, gaue vnto him (then being ſicke) iuſt occaſion of great ſorrow; ſo that within two moneths after he died alſo, being foureſcore yeres old, when he had raigned thereof 31 yeres; and died about the yere of our Lord 1359. Some hiſtories report otherwiſe, both of his death, and of the time werein he liued: as that he ſhould be ſlain in a battell againſt the Tartars: or as others write, with an arrow at the ſiege of Pruſa, in the yere of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunclauius in his hiſtory collected out of the Turks owne chronicles (whom we follow as moſt probable) reporteth it as before.

The death of Solyman Baſſa, Orchanes his eldeſt ſonne.

The death of Orchanes.

This Orchanes was wiſe, curteous, and bountifull, more ingenious than his father in deuiſing warlike engines. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cels, and was in C his ſuperſtitious religion very zealous: in ſo much that he appointed penſions to all ſuch as could in the Church ſay the book of Mahomets law by heart: and appointed competent maintenance for all Iudges of his Courts, becauſe they ſhould not take any thing in reward of his ſubiects, for the peruerting of iuſtice. He greatly inlarged his kingdome in Aſia, and not content to be incloſed with the ſeas of Euxinum and Helleſpontus, ſet faſt footing in Europe, which ſome attribute to his ſonne Amurath. He was to the Chriſtians alwaies a moſt mortall enemy, and ſo died.

AMVRATHES PRIMVS TERTIVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT Aº 1350 1603

Scævus Amurathes, animo dum maxima verſat: Diſcordes Græcos ſternere Marte parat.
Totus & intentus fines extendere regni: Europam penetrans, obuia quæque rapit, Atoniti trepidant, nimia formidine Thraces:
In medio quorum, ſceptra ſuperba locat.
*Hinc Mæſos premit ille feros, * miſerumque* Dynaſten Coſſoui in campis, obruit atque necat.
Sed non longa fuit ſceleris tam dira voluptas:
A ſeruo cæſus, concidit enſe ferox.

* Lazarum Seruiæ principem.

RIÇH. KNOLLEVS.

Whileſt Amurath in his deepe thoughts, of greatneſſe plots the ground:
The wrangling Greekes by force of armes he ſeekes how to confound.
And wholly bent for to extend his Kingdome with his power, Piercing the confines of Europe, doth what he meets deuoure.
As men diſmaid, the Thracians quake, to ſee their foule diſgrace: Amiddeſt whom, the tyrant ſtout his ſcepter proud doth place.
The fierce Bulgarians he did meet, and in the field ſubdue:
And in Coſſoua's fatal plaines, the woſull Deſpot ſlue.
But long is not the wickeds joy, which they in miſchiefe take:
Stab'd by a ſlaue, the wretch his end in that ſame place did make.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT AVGMENTOR OF THEIR KINGDOME:

Amurath the younger ſonne of Orchanes ſucceeded his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, his elder brother Solyman being dead a little before his father. This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkiſh Kings, aduanced the Mahometan religion, and had therein wonderfull ſucceſſe. In C the beginning of his reigne, he gathered a great army out of all parts of his kingdome, to Pruſa; purpoſing to paſſe ouer Helleſpontus, to inuade the Chriſtians in Thracia. But vnderſtanding, that the other Mahometan Princes in Aſia had combined themſelues againſt him, he was thereby inforced to leaue his former determination for Europe, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which wars he mightily preuailed againſt them, and returned with victory to Pruſa. But hauing ſo ſubdued thoſe confederate Princes, he the next yeare after proſecuted his wars before intended againſt the Chriſtians in Europe. For which purpoſe hauing leuied a ſtrong army in Aſia, he paſſed ouer to Callipolis, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schahin: whoſe graue aduice and counſell he moſt followed in all his weighty affaires, being at that time one of D his chiefe counſellors. From Callipolis he marched to the caſtle of Benutum, which was by compoſition yeelded vnto him. From thence he went to Tzurulus, where the Chriſtians gaue him a ſharpe encounter: but in the end he woon the towne, and carried away the victory. And ſo proceeding farther, tooke diuers other ſmall caſtles and townes in that part of Thracia, which of the antient Romane colonies was then called Romania, and now of the Turks Rumilia, namely, Meſine, Burgos, and others; whereof ſome he vtterly raſed, and into the reſt put ſtrong garriſons. At this time alſo, Chaſi-Ilbeg and Eurenoſes, two of his moſt valiant captains, tooke certaine forts ſtanding vpon the riuer Meritza, in antient time called Hebrus: whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the country thereabouts. Wherewith the captaine of Didymotichum offended, gathered his ſouldiers together, intending to haue intercepted E the great captaine Chaſi-Ilbeg: in which attempt he loſt moſt of his followers, and was himſelfe there taken priſoner. For whoſe ranſome and certaine other conditions, the citizens of Didymotichum yeelded the city vnto the Turks.

Amurath ſucceedeth his father Orchanes in the Turkiſh kingdome.

Didymoticum yeelded vnto the Turks.

Shortly after, Amurath ſent his tutor Lala Schahin to beſiege Hadrianople, now called Andrianople, but in antient time Oreſtias: of whoſe comming the Chriſtians hearing, encountred him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battell, wherein many were on both ſides loſt: but in the end the Chriſtians being put to the worſt, retired againe to the city. Of this victory Schahin ſent newes vnto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians: who therupon ſending Chaſis and Eurenoſes before, he himſelfe with a great army followed after to the ſiege of Hadrianople: of whoſe comming, the gouernor of Hadrianople vnderſtanding, F fled ſecretly out of the city by night to Ænus. The citizens ſeeing themſelues ſo forſaken of their gouernour, yeelded their city vnto Amurath, in the yeare of our Lord, 1362.

Hadrianople yeelded vnto the Turks.

The taking of theſe ſtrong cities in Thracia, eſpecially of Didymotichum and Hadrianople, is (by ſome of the Turks own Hiſtories) otherwiſe reported: which, becauſe it is neither improbable nor diſagreeing from the ſubtill dealings of the Turks, and of themſelues alſo receiued, I haue thought good to ſet downe as their owne Hiſtoriographers report the ſame. G The Turkiſh King Amurath had (as they ſay, and as truth was) in the beginning of his reigne concluded a peace with the Chriſtians of Thracia: during which peace, the gouernor of Didymoticum intending to fortifie his city with new and ſtronger fortifications againſt the aſſaults of the Turks, entertained all the maſons, carpenters, and other workemen he could by any meanes get: which Amurath vnderſtanding, ſecretly cauſed two hundred good and luſty workemen and labourers to come out of Aſia, to offer their ſeruice vnto the gouernour; who gladly entertained them, vſing their help in that his great and haſty work. Which thing ſome of the wiſer ſort of the citiſens diſliking, wiſhed the gouernor to be aware of thoſe Aſian workmen, as by them ſuſpected. But he preſuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and conſidering they were but baſe workmen and no ſoldiers, had the leſſe care of them: neuertheleſſe H (vſing their worke all day) he commanded them to lodge without the wals of the city euery night. Amurath vnderſtanding that theſe workemen were thus by the gouernor entertained, ſent for the valiant captaine Chaſis-Ilbeg, and requeſted him with thirty other good ſouldiers diſguiſed as poore labourers, to go to Didymotichum to ſeeke for worke, and in doing thereof to ſpy if any opportunitie might be found for the ſurpriſing of the city. Chaſis with theſe thirty according to Amurath his direction, comming as poore men lacking worke, found entertainment at Didymotichum, where they carried ſtones, morter, and ſuch like things, euer ſhewing themſelues very diligent in their worke: Chaſis with vigilant eie ſtill awaiting what might beſt ſerue his turne for the ſurpriſing of the city. When night was come, the Turkiſh workemen and labourers after their accuſtomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour I appointed, went out of the city into the ſuburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chaſis ſecretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and ſhewed him how one of the gates of the city might vpon the ſudden be taken, if it would pleaſe him to place a ſufficient number of Turks in ambuſh neere vnto the city, to ioyne with him and the other Turkiſh labourers when occaſion ſhould ſerue. Which being reſolued vpon, Amurath ſent him backe againe to put this his deuice in execution: So Chaſis returning to Didymotichum, brake the matter to ſo many of the Aſian workemen as he thought conuenient, fully inſtructing them what was to be done.

The next day (according to his appointment) the Chriſtians being then at dinner, theſe Turkiſh workemen and labourers fell at words among themſelues, and from words to faigned blowes: in which counterfeit brawle and tumult, they ſuddenly ran to one of the gates of the K city faſt by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands vpon the warders weapons, as if it had been to defend themſelues againſt their fellowes, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner alſo, and ſo preſently ſlew them: which done, they opened the gate of the city, and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not far off: who with great celerity entring the city, preſently tooke the ſame, and there put the chiefeſt of their citizens to the ſword, ſparing the reſt of the meaner ſort.

Rhodeſtum ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The city of Rhodeſtum (of the old writers called Rhœdeſtum) was by Amurath his commandement in this time of peace, by ſudden aſſault giuen in the night by the Lord Eurenoſes, taken alſo.

With this foule dealing and breach of league, yet in force, the Chriſtians hardly charged Amurath; L who turned it ouer to the vnrulines of his captains and men of war, whom he threatned with great ſeuerity to puniſh: and to giue the better color that it was done without his priuity, he had ſaigned himſelf ſick all the while theſe things were in doing: but being requeſted to reſtore thoſe cities ſo wrongfully taken from the Chriſtians, he vtterly refuſed ſo to do, ſaying That it was againſt the law of his great Prophet Mahomet, to deliuer againe to the Chriſtians, any towne or city wherein the Mahometan religion had bin once openly taught. Whereupon wars began again to ariſe on freſh betwixt the Chriſtians and him, wherein ſometime the one preuailed, and ſometime the other: in ſuch ſort, as that thoſe warres at length became vnto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Chriſtians of Hadrianople, Selybria, and Conſtantinople: yet deſiring nothing more in heart, than to take the M city of Hadrianople: which the better to bring to paſſe, he cauſed Chaſis-Ilbeg as a diſcontented captaine to fly to Hadrianople, pretending himſelfe to haue beene hardly vſed by the tyrant his maſter: where hauing in his company other ſuch diſſembling fugitiues as was himſelfe, he oftentimes iſſued out of the city and valiantly skirmiſhed with the Turks; which ſo greatly

A greatly pleaſed the gouernour of Hadrianople, that he thereby grew into his great fauour.

Many other Turks alſo vnder pretence of like diſcontentment, reſorted vnto Chaſis: wherewith finding himſelfe well ſtrengthned, he writ letters ſecretly vnto Amurath, That he would deliuer one of the gates of Hadrianople vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if he would againſt the ſame time be ready to ſend him preſent ſuccors. All things being agreed vpon, Chaſis at the time appointed came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the city, accompanied but with ten of his followers, as if he would haue gone forth to hunt, as he had before accuſtomed. But ſo ſoone as the gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpoſe, furiouſly ſet vpon the warders, whom they ſlew; and being aided by the reſt of the fugitiue Turks (which with all ſpeed by appointment before made, reſorted vnto them)
B they poſſeſſed the gate; vntill a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambuſh neere vnto the city, hauing knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarme, ſpeedily came on, and by that gate entred the city: where was fought a cruell fight all that day, euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turks preuailing, tooke the city, which they haue euer ſince poſſeſſed vnto this day.

These great cities of Thracia thus taken, or otherwiſe as aforeſaid (for that I leaue for the Reader to thinke of as he pleaſeth) Amurath appointed the ſeat of his royall court at Hadrianople, as a place of all others moſt fit for the further inuaſion of the Chriſtians, and inlarging of his kingdome in Europe: from whence ſuch a world of miſchiefes and woe hath ſince that time ouerflowed a great part of Chriſtendome, & drowned ſo many goodly kingdoms in C Europe, as that both they, and moſt part of the reſt that yet remain (daily in dread of like deſtruction) might juſtly accurſe and deteſt the woefull careleſnes and degenerate cowardiſe of the Greekes, were not they themſelues together with the glory of their church and empire, ſwallowed vp in the ſame gulfe of calamity and wo, and ſo become of al others moſt miſerable: but what auail vain complaints, but to increaſe old griefs? wherfore again to that we haue in hand.

Hadrianople the royal ſeat of the Turkiſh kings in Europe.

The proud Sultan Amurath (hauing to his great content thus ſeated himſelfe at Hadrianople, in the middeſt of Thracia) preſently ſent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a great power to inuade the countrey about Philippopolis, with the country of Zagora, which lyeth towards the great mountain Hœmus, where the beſt Turkiſh Scimitars were made; giuing like charge vnto Eurenoſes, for the ſubduing of the territory of Ipſala; who both notably performed what
D he had commanded, and in ſhort time brought al thoſe countries vnder his ſubjection, wherein he ſhortly after placed diuers ſanzacks or gouernours, for the better aſſurance thereof, being ſo lately gained.

About this time (by the ſuggeſtion of Cara Ruſtemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadeleſher or chiefe Iuſtice among the Turks, but afterwards better knowne by the name of Catradin Baſſa, by the commandement of Amurath, took order, that euery fifth captiue of the Chriſtians, being aboue fifteen yeres old, ſhould be taken vp for the King, as by law due vnto him: and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay to the King for euery head 25 aſpers, by way of tribute: appointing officers for collecting both of ſuch captiues and tribute mony, of whom the aforeſaid Cara Ruſtemes himſelfe was chief, as firſt deuiſer of the matter.
E By which means great numbers of Chriſtian youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues, which by the counſell of the ſame Zinderlu Chelil, were diſtributed among the Turkiſh husbandmen in Aſia, there to learn the Turkiſh language, religion, & maners, where after they had bin brought vp in all painfull labour and trauell by the ſpace of two or three yeares, they were called vnto the court, and choice made of the better ſort of them to attend vpon the perſon of the Prince, or to ſerue him in his wars: where they daily practiſing al feats of actiuity, are called by the name of Ianizars (that is to ſay, new ſoldiers.) This was the firſt beginning of the Ianizars vnder this Sultan Amurath the firſt, but had great increaſe vnder Amurath the ſecond, inſomuch as Iouius with ſome other Hiſtoriographers, attribute the beginning of this order to him: which neuertheles (as appeareth by the Turks own Hiſtories) had the beginning F as is aforeſaid; and hath euer ſince bin continued by the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, by the ſame and ſome other greater means; ſo that in proceſſe of time they be grown to that greatnes as that they are oftentimes right dreadful to the great Turke himſelfe: after whoſe death they haue ſomtime preferred to the Empire ſuch of the Emperors ſons as they beſt liked, without reſpect of prerogatiue of age, contrary to the wil of the great Sultan himſelf; & are at this day the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire, and not vnlike in time to be the greateſt cauſe of the ruine thereof: the finger of the Higheſt oftentimes (as we haue before ſaid) turning euen thoſe helps which were by mans wiſedome prouided for the eſtabliſhing of kingdomes, vnto their more ſpeedy deſtruction: and eſpecially theſe continuall garriſons of martiall men, no leſſe to be feared than truſted, as in the courſe of this Hiſtory may appeare.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at Hadrianople, determining now to returne vnto Aſia, he made Schahin his tutor Beb-Lerbeg or viceroy of Romania; and Eurenoſes lord gouernor of the marches; Zinderlu Chelil he made Vezir Azemes or lord preſident of his counſell, and changing his name, called him Cairadin Baſſa, that is to ſay, The Baſſa that had well deſerued, his name witneſſing his good deſert. After this he returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that winter at Pruſa. Theſe two great men Cairadin Baſſa and Cara Ruſtemes before named, ſometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report) the firſt that corrupted the Turkiſh court with couetouſneſſe and bribery, and are therefore of them euen yet much blamed.

Boga taken by Amurath and recouered againe and raſed by the Chriſtians.

Boga new built by the Turks.

Whileſt Amurath thus wintred in Aſia, newes was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of Seruia and Bulgaria had gathered a great army for the beſieging of Hadrianople; which cauſed him to prepare great forces in Aſia, to aid his captaines in Europe. But in returning out of Aſia, he by the way tooke the towne of Boga; where he put to ſword all the Chriſtians that were therein able to beare armes, leading the reſt into captiuity, and with the ſpoile rewarded his ſouldiers. This ſtrong towne was not long after againe recouered by the Chriſtians, who requited the Turkes with like meaſure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raſed it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this preſent to be ſeene: which was done in the yeare of our Lord, 1365.

In the meane time, the Chriſtian army of Seruia and Bulgaria, in number betwixt forty and fifty thouſand, marching towards Hadrianople, and now come very neere the ſame, fell in mutiny among themſelues. Whereof the Turks by their eſpials hauing intelligence, ſuddenly in the night ſet vpon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no leſſe fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to ioyne their forces againſt them, but were ready to turne their weapons one vpon another; and ſo by their owne diſcord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey to the Turkes, by whom they were put to flight, and ſlaine with ſo great a ſlaughter, that the place wherein they fell, not far from Germia, is thereof at this day called Zirf-Zindugi, that is to ſay, the place wherein the Seruians were ouerthrown. The news of this ſo notable a victory, with a fifth part of the ſpoile, and a great number of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) ſent to Amurath into Aſia, being now ready with a great power to haue come ouer to Callipolis: who ioyfull thereof, and glad to ſee ſuch a preſent, the aſſured witneſſe of the victory, returned againe to Pruſa. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare alſo Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumciſed his two ſons, Bajazet, & Iacup. At which time he alſo built a temple, with a monaſtery & a colledge, at Bilezuga: and another faire church at Neapolis: at Pruſa he alſo built a ſtately palace in the caſtle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which city he alſo founded an abbey and a colledge. Germean Ogli, a great Mahometan Prince in Aſia (whoſe territory for the moſt part lay in the greater Phrygia, and the countries thereabout, bordering vpon the Othoman kingdom) hauing alwaies enuied at the riſing of the Othoman kings (as did all the reſt of the Mahometan Princes of the Selzuccian family) & fearing that their greatnes might after his death grow dangerous to his ſon Iacup, being now himſelfe very aged, thought good for the more ſafety of his ſtate to ioyne in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpoſe ſent Iſaac (a learned doctor of the Mahometan law) embaſſador to him, with many rich preſents, & to offer his daughter, the Lady Hatun, in marriage vnto his ſon Bajazet: promiſing with her in dowry diuers great cities and townes, with their territories in Phrygia and Bythinia, adioyning vpon the Othoman kingdom; namely, Cutaie, Simau, Egregios, Tauſanle, & others. Neither was this a ſmall dowry, but well beſeeming ſo great a Prince: the city of Cutaie being at that day the place whereat the Turkiſh emperors great lieutenant or viceroy in Aſia is alwaies reſiant, as in the heart of his Kingdome in the leſſer Aſia. Of which match ſo offered, Amurath liking well, contracted his ſon Bajazet vnto the ſaid lady: and for ſolemniation of the marriage, prepared all things with great magnificence, ſending his Embaſſadors to moſt of the Mahometane

A tan kings and princes both far and neere, to inuite them therunto: commanding alſo moſt of the nobilitie of his kingdom to honor the ſame with their preſence. The time of this marriage drawing neer, Embaſſadors came to Amuraths court from all the Princes before inuited: amongſt whom the Embaſſador from the Egyptian Sultan had the higheſt place. Theſe embaſſadours brought with them many great and rich Gifts, ſuch as well beſeemed the great Princes their maſters, which they with all reuerence preſented vnto Amurath. At length amongſt the reſt of his own nobility came the Lord Eurenoſes, whom he had before left gouernor of the frontiers of his kingdom in Europ: who beſides many other rich gifts not eaſily to be valued, preſented vnto Amurath a hundred goodly boys, with as many beautiful yong maidens, all Chriſtian captiues, ſutably attired in garments richly embroidered with gold & ſiluer, B euery one of them carying a cup of gold in the one hand, and a cup of ſiluer in the other; the cups of gold hauing in them diuers pretious ſtones of great value, and the cups of ſiluer being filled with gold. The richnes of this preſent was ſo great, that all the forrein Embaſſadors wondred therat: all which rich gift Amurath moſt bountifully beſtowed on the ſtrange Embaſſadors; and the preſents which were ſent vnto him from other Princes, hee liberally gaue to Eurenoſes. The learned and religious which came to that mariage hee ſo bountifully rewarded alſo, that none came to the ſame poor, but he went away rich. He had before ſent diuers of his nobility, with an hundred ladies and gentlewomen, and a gard of three thouſand horſmen, to attend the comming of the bride. On the other ſide, the old prince Germean Ogli meeting this honorable company vpon the way, ſaluted euery man of account according to C his degree, and bringing them to one of his cities, in moſt royal maner feaſted them, beſtowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts. All which things with great ſolemnity performed, he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the moſt antient Ladies, whereof one had bin Bajazets nurſe: and ſo taking leaue of his daughter, ſent her away, accompanied with his wife Ienſes, and other of his courtiers; who conueying her to Pruſa, ſhe was there in moſt roial maner maried to Bajazet. The cities and towns promiſed in dowry were accordingly deliuered vnto Amurath, who ſhortly after took poſſeſſion of the ſame, and furniſhing them with his own garriſons.

At this mariage, Chuſun Beg Prince of Amiſum in Galatia, by his Embaſſador ſold his territory of Amiſum vnto Amurath, with many fair cities and towns, doubting (as was thought) D now to be able to keep them, ſeeing Amurath was come ſo neer him, whom he ſaw not to let ſlip any occaſion offered vnto him for the inlarging of his kingdom. When Amurath had in this ſport ſpent great time in Aſia, he gathered a ſtrong army to return into Europ: but before his departure, he committed the gouernment of his kingdom in Aſia (which the Turkes call Anatolia) vnto his ſon Bajazet, joining with him Temurtaſes a valiant man of great experience.
And hauing ſet all things in order in Aſia, paſſed ouer Helleſpontus to Callipolis, from whence he marched toward Hadrianople: and becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he beſieged Magalgara, which he in ſhort time won. Where Lala Schahin and Eurenoſes with all their forces came to him; which two captains he ſent to beſiege the city Pherœ and was by them after a few daies ſiege taken. But he himſelfe to be reuenged vpon Lazarus the Amurath inuadeth Seruia.
E Deſpot, led his army into Seruia, where after he had without reſiſtance forraged the country fourteen daies, vnderſtanding by his captains, That the ſtrong city of Niſſa, being the metropolitical city of Seruia, was as it were the key of that kingdom, he preſently marched thither, and laid ſiege vnto the ſame; and by the aduice of Iaxis Beg the ſonne of Temurtaſes, in ſhort time won it. Which thing ſo daunted Lazarus Deſpot or Lord of Seruia, that he diſpairing Niſſa taken by the Turks. in his own forces, hauing ſo ſoon loſt one of his ſtrongeſt cities, forthwith ſent Embaſſadours to Amurath to intreat a peace; offering to pay him a yearly tribute of fifty thouſand pound, and to aid him with a thouſand men in his wars, whenſoeuer he ſhould require. Vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and ſo departed out of Seruia. In this expedition he alſo with much ado won the great City of Appolonia, neere vnto the mount Athos, and Appollonia won by the Turks.
F gaue leaue vnto moſt of the Chriſtian inhabitants with their wiues and children to depart, with ſuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof ſpoiled by the ſoldiers. This done, he returned back to Hadrianople, leauing Eurenoſes vpon the marches, who ſhortly after took Berrhea, with diuers other Townes. At the which time alſo Lala Schahin won Zichne and Seres, in the confines of Macedonia, with many other ſtrong Townes vpon the Frontiers of Theſſaly and Thrace. In the City Seres Eurenoſes made his abode, as in a chiefe frontier G town: and becauſe the Chriſtians for fear of the Turks were all fled out of the country about Seres, great numbers of people were ſent for out of Aſia, to inhabit that country by the Chriſtians forſaken in the confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadriano-ple, but that he was aduertiſed out of Aſia, that Aladin his ſon in law King of Caramania, did with fire and ſword inuade his dominions in Aſia. With which newes hee was exceedingly troubled; and for that cauſe ſending for his counſellors and nobility to the court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and allyance, with all hoſtilitie inuaded his prouinces in Aſia, whilſt he with great danger of his perſon, and greater terror of his enemies, ſought with honor to increaſ the Mahometan ſincere religion (as hee termed it) in Europ: from which godly War (ſaid he) I am inforced againſt my wil to turne my H ſword, in iuſt defence of my ſelf, againſt men joined with vs both in religion & allyance. And hauing thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Baſſa his lieutenant general in Europ, and alſo made his ſonne Alis Baſſa one of his Counſel, although he were by ſome thought too yong for ſo great a place. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order according to his mind in Europ, took paſſage from Callipolis into Aſia, and ſo to his court at Pruſa, where he ſpent that Winter. In which time Embaſſadors came vnto him from the Sultan of Egypt, for the renu-ing of their former amity and friendſhip. Which Amurath took very thankfully, & ſent them back again loden with kind letters and princely rewards.

Amurath and Aladin prepare themſelves for war.

When the Spring was come, in the year 1387, he leuied a mighty army to make war vpon the Caramanian king his ſon in law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no leſſe I power to meet him, aſſociating vnto him all the leſſe Mahometan princes of Aſia, who were not vnder Amuraths obeiſance, to whom the Othoman Kings were now grown terrible. Which princes brought with them great ſupplies to join with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himſelf now ſtrong enough for Amurath his father in law, ſent an Embaſſador vnto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in power inferior to him, and therfore nothing feared him: yet if it pleaſed him to haue peace, he could for his part be content to hearken vnto the ſame vpon reaſonable conditions: but if he had rather haue war, he ſhould find him ready to dare him battel in the field, whenſoeuer he came. For anſwer of which embaſſage, Amurath willed the Embaſſador to tell the perjured King his maſter, that he had of late, contrary to his faith before giuen, in moſt cruel maner inuaded his do- K minions, whilſt he was buſied in moſt godly wars (as he termed it) againſt the miſ-beleeuing Chriſtians: from proſecuting wherof he was (as he ſaid) by his violence withdrawn, contrary to the law of their great Prophet. For which outrages and wrongs he would ſhortly come and take of him ſharp reuenge: and that therfore hee was to expect nothing at his hands but war, for which he willed him ſo to prouide, as that at his comming he might not find him wanting to himſelf. Aladin by his Embaſſador hauing receiued this anſwer from Amurath, aſſembled all the confederat princes his allyes, with great perſuaſions and greater promiſes encouraging them to this war. And they again kiſſing the ground at his feet, as the maner of that nation is before great Princes, promiſed with ſolemn oaths neuer to forſake him, but to doe all things which Princes deſirous of honor or fame, ought by their oath to do for their Soueraign vnto L whom they owed homage and fealty.

The death of Chairadin Baſſa.

In this great preparation for wars in Aſia, Chairadin Baſſa general gouernor in Europ died: which Amurath vnderſtanding, appointed Alis Baſſa his ſon to go into Europe, there to be Gouernor in his fathers ſtead. But being ſtayd in his journey by vrgent occaſions, Amurath ſent for him back again in poſt.

Aladin forecaſting the great dangers like to enſue of this war, ſent another Embaſſadour to Amurath, with reaſonable conditions of peace. To whom Amurath anſwered, That if Aladin had made that offer one month before, he would perhaps haue accepted of it: but forſomuch as he had don him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinit charge drawn him into the field ſo far from home, hee would not make any other end than ſuch as the chance of Warre M ſhould appoint. And wheras he in diſgrace had called him a heardſman or ſhepheard (ſayd he) if he be not ſuch a one himſelf as he ſaith me to be, let him meet me in the field and there try his valour. Hereunto the Embaſſadour replied, That the King his maſter made this offer of peace not for any fear, but to ſaue the effuſion of innocent bloud: which conſideration ſet apart,

A apart, he ſhould find him not inferior to himſelfe either in number of moſt expert ſoldiers, or other warlike prouiſion: and that therfore if he rejected this offer of peace, he needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, who would bear themſelues ſo valiantly in the field againſt his Turkes, as that hee ſhould haue no great cauſe to rejoice of his comming thither.
Which words of the Embaſſador ſo netled Amurath, that in great rage hee commanded him to depart, and to tell his maſter, if he were a man of ſuch courage and valour as he ſaid, to ſhew himſelf in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where he doubted not but in ſhort time to chaſtiſe him according to his due deſerts. So after the Embaſſador was departed, marching forward three dayes, Alis Beg came vnto him: of whoſe comming he not a little rejoiced, for why, he loued him dearly, and although he was yet of years but yong, B relied much vpon his counſell.

The Embaſſador returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had ſaid, not omitting his hard ſpeeches and proud threats, and how that hee hoped ſhortly to take from him Iconium and Larenda (the principal cities of Caramania) with many things more, leauing nothing vntold. Which Aladin hearing, ſaid vnto the other confederat princes that were with him, Verily Amurath threatneth to take from vs the cities of Iconium and Larenda; but let him take heed that we take not from him his fair city of Pruſa. Then demanding of the Embaſſador, of what ſtrength Amurath might be; it was anſwered by him, that hee deemed him to be about ſeuenty thouſand ſtrong. Wherat Aladin not a little rejoicing, ſaid, Aſſuredly when he ſhall ſee our army, he will not dare to giue vs battell; or [illegible] he do, he ſhall fight vpon great C diſaduantage, his men being both fewer in number than wee, and ſore wearied with long and painfull trauell.

In the mean time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, daily encouraging his ſol-diers with perſwaſions & gifts bountifully beſtowed vpon them, filling their heads with promiſes of greater, the wars once happily ended. At length he came to the great plains in Caramania, called the French plains, becauſe in former times the Chriſtians (whom the Turkes for moſt part call Frankes) in thoſe plaines incamped their great armies as they went to the winning of Ieruſalem, as in the former part of this hiſtorie is declared. Into theſe plaines alſo came Aladin with his army, and was now incamped within one daies march of Amurath, and ſo reſted that night.

D The next morning Amurath put his army in order of battell, appointing the leading of the right wing to his yongeſt ſon Iacup, with whom he joined Cutluzes Beg, Ein Beg Subbaſſa, Egridum Subbaſſa, Seraze and Cuſtendil two Chriſtian Princes, all captains of great experience. The left wing was led by Bajazet his eldeſt ſon, with Ferize and Hozze, both valiant captaines: in which wings were alſo placed the Chriſtian ſoldiers ſent by Lazarus out of Seruia, according to the late conuention of peace: in the main battell he ſtood himſelf: the vantgard was conducted by Temurtaſes; and the rereward by the Subbaſſa of Oxyllithus (called alſo Temurtaſes) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other ſide with no leſſe care and diligence ſet his men likewiſe in order of battell, placing himſelf in the main battel, as did Amurath; and the Princes his allyes, with his other expert captains, ſome in the right wing, and ſome in the left, as he thought E it moſt conuenient: in ſuch ſort that in all mens judgment he was in force nothing inferior to his father in law.

Theſe great enemies thus ranged, with enſignes diſplaid came on couragiouſly, one directly vpon the other; where approching together, the confuſed noiſe of trumpets, drums, fifes, with other inſtruments of war, the neighing of horſes and clattering of armour was ſo great, that whilſt warlike minds therat rejoiced, cowards thought heauen fell. But the ſign of battell on both ſides giuen, Samagazes one of the confederat Princes, with exceeding courage firſt charged Temurtaſes in the vantgard, and broke his ranks: at which time Teberruſes a Tartar prince, and Karſacides another of the confederats, deliuered their arrowes alſo upon the vantgard as if it had bin a ſhour of hail. Which Bajazet ſeeing, and how hardly Temurtaſes was charged; F hauing before obtained leaue of his father, brake in vpon the enemy with ſuch violence as if it had bin the lightning; whereof hee was euer after ſyrnamed Gilderun, which is to ſay, The lightning. Ferize and Hozze, with the other valiant Captaines in that wing, following Baiazet, with inuincible courage entred the battell, where for a great ſpace was made a moſt terrible and dreadfull fight. A man would haue thought two rough ſeas had met together,

The great battel in the Caramanian plains between Amurath and Aladin.

ſwaying one againſt another, doubting which way the current would at length fall. In this G conflict were many thouſands on both ſides ſlain, ſo that the field lay couered with the dead bodies of worthy men and valiant ſoldiers: yet at length theſe confederate Princes, finding themſelues ouermatched by Bajazet and his ſoldiers, reſeruing themſelues to their better fortunes, turned their backs and fled; when Aladin ſeeing a great part of his army thus ouerthrown, and himſelf now ready to be charged with Amuraths whole power, deſpairing of victorie, ſped himſelfe in all haſt to Iconium his ſtrong city. The ſpoil which Amurath got in this battell was great, moſt part wherof he gaue in reward to Temurtaſes and his ſoldiers, who had endured the greateſt fury of the battell. Amurath after this victorie with all ſpeed marched to Iconium, and there beſieged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his ſtrongeſt city, giuing out proclamation in the mean time, That none of his ſoldiers vpon pain of death ſhould vſe any H violence to any of the country people, or take any thing from them; to the intent it might appear vnto the world, that he made that war againſt that Mahometan King, rather to repulſe injury and wrong, than for deſire of ſoueraignty or ſpoil. Which his ſo ſtreit a proclamation the Chriſtians ſent by Lazarus (amongſt others) tranſgreſſed, and therfore by his commandement ſuffered many of them exemplary puniſhment: which was the cauſe of the Servian war which not long after enſued, fatall both vnto Amurath and Lazarus the Deſpot, as hereafter ſhall appear.

Aladin flies to Iconium.

Iconium beſieged by Amurath.

Aladin now on euery ſide beſieged in Iconium, and without all hope of eſcape, ſent to the Queen his wife Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his deſperat eſtate, and requeſting her by all the loue that ſo honorable a minded Lady might bear vnto her miſerable husband, to I aduenture her ſelfe to go to her angry father, and to craue pardon for his great treſpaſſe and offence. The Queen forthwith attyring her ſelf as was fitteſt for her husbands preſent eſtate, came to her father: where falling down at his feet vpon her knees, with words wiſely placed, and tears diſtilling down her fair cheeks from her fairer eies, as if it had bin from two fountains, in moſt ſorrowfull maner craued her husbands pardon, imputing to the heat of youth whatſoeuer he had done; and would not be comforted or taken vp vntill ſhee had obtained grace. Amurath moſt intirely loued this his daughter, and therfore for her ſake not only granted her husbands life (which in ſhort time was like to haue bin in his power to haue ſpilt) but alſo his kingdom, which he as a victorious conqueror might by law of arms haue of right detained. She now aſſured of her fathers promiſe, ſent vnto her husband Aladin, wiſhing him K the next day without fear to come out of the City, and in humble ſort to acknowledge his fault before her father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and proſtrating himſelfe before Amurath, acknowledged his vndutifulnes; of whom (for his wiues ſake) hee obtained pardon, and reſtitution to his kingdom, with many other gifts, contrary to his euil deſert. The Latine hiſtories miſtaking the man, report this Caramanian War to haue beene fought againſt the King of Caramania, Amuraths own grandfather by the mothers ſide; and that he was then by Amurath ſpoiled of a great part of his kingdom. But it agreeth not with the Turkiſh hiſtories, which make Amurath to be the ſon of Orchanes and Lulufer, the daughter of the Gouernour of the Caſtle of Iarchiſar, as is before declared in the life of Othoman; which Lulufer lieth buried by her husband Orchanes in Pruſa. L

This great victory got by Amurath againſt the Caramanian King and the other confederat Princes, was the true beginning of the greatneſſe of the Othoman kingdom in Aſia: wherwith the other Mahometan Princes of the Selzuccian Family were ſo diſcouraged, that they were glad to ſubmit themſelues thus firſt vnto Amurath, and after that, vnto his ſon Baiazet: vntill that Tamerlane the great Tartarian prince, ſome few years after taking Baiazet priſoner in a great battell at mount Stella, abated the Othoman pride, and reſtored the other oppreſſed Mahometan Princes to their old poſſeſſions and kingdoms.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way took the city of Deſpotopolis; and comming to Cutaie brake vp his army, and ſo in triumph returned to his court at Pruſa.

Lazarus Deſpot of Servia (in old time called Myſia) had ſent a thouſand armed men to Amurath M in this the late Caramanian War, according to the conuention of the peace not long before made betwixt them: ſome of which ſouldiers were with great ſeueritie (to the terror of others) executed in Caramania, for tranſgreſſing Amuraths commandement. This great war thus ended, and the army broken vp at Cutaie, they with others were licenſed to depart into

A into their own country. Whoſe General (whom they cal the Vayuod) returning home, reported vnto Laſarus the Deſpot, the ſucces of that war, and withall, in what cruel and tyrannicall maner the men he had ſent were in that ſeruice vſed by the commandment of Amurath: with whom (ſaid this General) you without cauſe haue made a moſt diſhonorable peace; firſt, by giuing your faith to ſuch a miſcreant; and then in ſending your loyal ſubjects, in recompence of their good ſeruice, to be ſo butchered at his pleaſure: beſide the ſhamefull tribute which you yearly pay vnto him. Wheras if it would pleaſe you in the depth of your wiſdome but to know your own ſtrength, you ſhould find your ſelf in warlike force and power nothing inferior to the Tyrant. For we your ſeruants being in number but an handfull, were in theſe his late wars a terror vnto his enemies, and by our valor, and not his own, hee got the victory ouer B them. What cauſe is there then, that you ſhould ſubject your ſelf vnto your inferior? I know he canot of himſelf bring into the field aboue fifty thouſand fighting men: but admit he were able to bring an hundred thouſand; are not you (if you ſo pleaſe) able to levy a far greater power? and for all other warlike prouiſion you are ten times better prouided than he. Beſides that, the mighty Chriſtian Princes wil ſend you ſuch aid againſt this hatefull and Common Enemy, that being vnited with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in compariſon of thoſe which you ſhall then be able to bring into the field againſt him. Which no doubt the Chriſtian princes wil the rather do, as men deſirous to quench this deuouring fire in another mans houſe rather than in their own.

Theſe words of the Vayuod ſo much moued Laſarus, that he determined with himſelfe to C break that ſeruile league which he before had made with Amurath: and for that cauſe ſent his Embaſſador with ſecret inſtructions to the King of Boſna (in time paſt called Illyria) his neighbor; wherof the chief point was, to craue his aid againſt the Turk their common Enemy. By whom the King of Boſna returned this anſwer, That it had bin much better ſuch conſideration had bin thought vpon before the foul contract (full of diſgrace both to himſelf and all other Chriſtian Princes) was vpon a vain fear by him raſhly made with the Turkiſh tyran. Yet forſomuch as things don could not be vndon, letting that paſſe which was remediles, hee promiſed to join with him his whole forces againſt ſo dangerous an Enemy. And therupon appointing a place for an interview, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the Articles of their confederation.

Lazarus the Deſpot craues aid of the king of Boſna.

D There was in the confines of Boſna a caſtle called Alexandria, the captain wherof being a Chriſtian, was yet tributary to the Turk; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good, as men oppreſſed vſe to do to them by whom they are ſo wronged. This captain vnder color of friendſhip went to Amurath, and in great ſecrecie opened to him the whole ſtate of the kingdome of Boſna, and withall, that the King therof intended ſome great mater againſt him: for the preuenting of which he offered his own ſeruice, and ſhewed ſome probable means how that kingdom might be brought into his ſubiection, if hee would but ſend ſome worthy Generall with a conuenient power for the vndertaking therof. This wonderfully pleaſed the ambitious old Tyrant, who therfore commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the Captain (which amongſt the Turks is taken for a ſure token of the Kings great fauor) and forthwith appointed his Tutor E Lala Schahin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdom of Boſna. Who joining himſelfe with this deceitfull Captaine of Alexandria, with an army of twenty thouſand men entred into Boſna, where ouerrunning a ſide of the countrey, he without reſiſtance tooke great booties: and ſeeing no apparant cauſe of fear, to do the more harm, by aduice of the ſaid captain diuided his army, which he ſent into diuers parts of the Countrey, the more to burne and ſpoile the ſame. Of all whoſe proceedings the King of Boſna by ſecret letters from the captain aduertiſed, had in conuenient places laid ſtrong ambuſhes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich booty, hauing then with him but a thouſand men, ſuddenly appeared in his way thirty thouſand Chriſtians well armed: which Schahin ſeeing, thinking it folly to oppoſe ſo few againſt ſo many, would haue preſently F fled; but the reſt of the gallants which were with him, preſuming of their good fortune, and loth to loſe their rich prey, would needs firſt skirmiſh with the Chriſtians: in which deſperat conflict they were almoſt all ſlain, and the whole ſpoile they had taken recouered by the Chriſtians. As for Schahin hee was glad by ſhamefull flight to ſaue himſelfe. The like miſhap befel the other Turks in the other parts of Boſna, who for the moſt part were likewiſe intercepted and ſlain : ſo that of twenty thouſand ſcarſe fiue thouſand returned home. G

Amurath marrieth the emperor of Conſtantinople daughter.

Whilſt theſe things were doing in Europ, Amurath in great triumph at Neapolis maried the Emperor of Conſtantinople his daughter : whoſe two ſiſters were alſo giuen in mariage to his two ſons:at which time he with great ſolemnity circumciſed three of Baiazets ſons. At this time alſo returned Iazigi Ogli, whom he had before ſent Embaſſador to the Sultan of Egypt, in requital of the honorable embaſſage before to him ſent from the ſaid Sultan. Now Amurath vnderſtanding of the loſſe of his men in Boſna, with the reuolt of Laſarus Deſpot of Seruia, was therwith much diſquieted. Wherfore he commanded Alis Baſſa his chief counſellor, with all ſpeed to ſend forth commiſſions into all parts of his kingdom, for the levying of a royal army : which was done in ſuch poſt haſt, that it was thought he would haue taken the field before the beginning of the ſpring. At which time alſo the other Mahometan kings and H Princes of Aſia, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli, and the reſt bound vnto him by homage, with diuers others of ſmaller power, were ſent for to aid him in this war : who partly for feare, and partly moued with the zeal of their Mahometan ſuperſtition, brought their forces with great deuotion. To this war againſt the Chriſtians, came alſo great numbers of the Mahometans from far countries, as voluntary ſoldiers. Baiazet his ſon alſo, then gouernor of Cutaie with a great part of Galatia, gathring all his forces, came to aid his father in this Religious war, as it was by them termed. The Chriſtian tributary princes were not then forgotten, of whom two came, namely Cuſtendil & Seratſil. Other two forſaking Amurath, came not, which was Seſames Prince of Bulgaria, and the Prince of Varna and Dobritza : with whom Amurath was highly offended. I In the time of this ſo great preparation, old Lala Schahin, Amuraths tutor and faithfull Seruitor died, beeing a man of great yeares : and Temurtaſes was appointed Gouernor in his place.

The reuolting of the two Chriſtian Princes, Saſmenos and the Prince of Varna, much grieued Amurath. Wherfore he commanded Alis Baſſa with an army of thirty thouſand to inuade and ſpoil Saſmenos his country, now called Bulgaria, and in antient time the lower Myſia. Alis Baſſa according to that was giuen him in charge, calling vnto him Iaxis Beg the ſon of Temurtaſes, Vlu Beg, Suratze Baſſa, with other Captains and Commanders of the Turks prouinces in Europ, aſſembled an army of thirty thouſand for the inuaſion of Bulgaria. With this Army the Baſſa took many ſtrong towns and caſtles in Bulgaria, as Pirauade, Venuzina, Madra, Suni and others. K

In the mean time, whilſt Alis Baſſa had thus begun the wars againſt the Chriſtians in Bulgaria, Amurath hauing gathered a great Army in Aſia, determined in the beginning of the Spring to paſſe ouer with the ſame into Europ : commending the gouernment of his Countries in Aſia, to Temurtaſes Baſſa, Feriſes Beg, Temurtaſes Subbaſſa, Cutlu Beg, and Haſa Beg; and ſo all things ſet in order in Aſia, he drew down his Aſian forces toward Helleſpontus, where he was a while ſtayd with contrary winds, but was afterwards tranſported to Callipolis, by Ieniſe Beg Sanzack there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his army out of Aſia into Europ. But whilſt he ſtayd at Callipolis, Baiazet his ſon with a great power came to him thither. Alis Baſſa alſo vnderſtanding of Amuraths arriual in Europe, retyred out of Bulgaria, and came to him at Alcide, recounting vnto him the whole ſucces of his expedition into L Bulgaria.

Saſmenos Prince of Bulgaria ſeeing his country ſpoiled, his ſtrong cities and caſtles taken by the Turks, and withall hearing of their great preparations for war, by the aduice of his nobilitie thought it beſt betimes again to ſubmit himſelfe vnto Amurath. Wherfore tying a winding ſheet about his neck, in token that he had deſerued death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at Calcide ; where falling flat vpon the ground at the horſes feet wheron Amurath ſate, he in moſt humble wiſe craued pardon, offering at a certain day to deliuer Siliſtria the chief city of his dominion, into Amurath his poſſeſſion, as a pledge of his fidelitie: who therupon granted him pardon; and to aſſure him of his fauor, commanded a rich M garment to be caſt vpon him, after the maner of the Turks, ſending Alis Baſſa at the time appointed to take poſſeſſion of Siliſtria. But Saſmenos repenting himſelf of what he had ſo largely promiſed, would not deliuer his city, but in ſtrongeſt manner he could preſently fortified the ſame. Wherwith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Baſſa with fire and ſword again to ſpoile and waſt his Countrey. Who according to his commaundement

A entred againe into Bulgaria, and ſtrook ſuch a terrour of his comming into the hearts of the people, that many ſtrong places were voluntarily yeelded into his power; namely Diritze, Coſſova, with the city Ternova the ſeat of the Princes Court, Tzerneui, Nouakeſtri, Ziſtoua, with diuers others: and proceeding further, he laid ſiege to Nicopolis the ſtrongeſt City of Bulgaria, vpon the ſide of the great riuer Danubius, whither Saſmenos was himſelfe for feare fled. Who finding himſelfe vnable to hold out the ſiege, once again (with ſhame enough) tying a winding ſheet about his neck, as he had done before, and taking his ſon with him, went out of the City, and in moſt abject manner falling downe at the Baſſa's feet, craued pardon: which the ſayd Baſſa, mooued with compaſſion to ſee the miſery of ſo great a man, and hauing already taken from him the greateſt part of his dominion, and now out of fear of further B reſiſtance, eaſily granted. And hauing thus ended the Bulgarian war, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right joyfully receiued.

Amurath had now made great preparation for the inuading of Servia; for the which purpoſe hee had drawn ouer into Europe the greateſt forces he could poſſibly out of Aſia: ſending alſo for his yongeſt ſon Iacup, Gouernor of Caraſia, who vnderſtanding his fathers pleaſure, repaired vnto him with all the power hee could make. This Army by Amurath thus aſſembled, was the greateſt that euer was before that brought by the Turks into Europ. Laſarus not ignorant of this great preparation made by Amurath, had drawn into the ſociety of this War, the King of Boſna (as is before ſaid) with Vulcus Prince of Macedonia his ſon in law, who both brought vnto him great aid. He had alſo by his Embaſſadors procured great C ſupplies from other Chriſtian Kings and princes, out of Valachia, Hungaria, Croatia, Sclauonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Italy; beſides great numbers of other voluntary deuout Chriſtians: which all aſſembled and met together, did in number far exceed the great Army of the Turks.

With this army Laſarus the Deſpot incamped vpon the ſide of the riuer Moravia the greater, not far from which ſtood the ſtrong Caſtle of Sarkiue, which Alis Baſſa had of late taken from Saſmenos the Bulgarian Prince; ſtanding as it were betwixt Bulgaria and Servia. This caſtle being now poſſeſſed of the Turks, was thought by Laſarus dangerous to his Countrey; who therfore ſent one Demetrius a right valiant captain, with certain companies of ſelect men to take in the ſame. The name of this captain Demetrius was a general terror vnto the Turks, D for the harm he had done them: ſo that they in the caſtle hearing that he was come, without further reſiſtance yeelded the ſame vnto him. Wherof Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent Eine and Sarutſe Baſſa to recouer the ſame. But Laſarus doubting that the caſtle would hardly bee kept in that dangerous war, ſent Vulcus his ſon in law with 20000 men to bring away all that was therin, and in the city neer vnto it, leſt it ſhould become a prey vnto the greedy Turks: which he accordingly did, and at the ſame time raſed both the caſtle and the City, before the comming of Iaxis Beg, ſent from Amurath to haue done the ſame exploit, which he comming thither found already done to his hand by Vulcus.

The Caſtle of Sarkiue with the city joining to it, taken by the Chriſtians and raſed.

As Amurath was marching towards Servia, Seratſe and Cuſtendyl two Chriſtian Princes his Tributaries, met him with their forces, whom he cauſed to march before him as his guides: E and paſſing thorow Cuſtendyl his countrey, was there refreſhed with plenty of all things neceſſarie; vntill at length paſſing the riuer of Morava the leſſe, hee drew ſo neere to the plaines of Coſſova, where the Chriſtian army lay, that he with his ſon Baiaſet from a little hill took full view of the Chriſtian campe, which was ſo great, that it couered all thoſe large plaines from ſide to ſide, and ſo daunted Amurath, as that returning to his army, hee preſently entred into a great conſultation with his greateſt captains and commanders, what courſe to take againſt ſuch a puiſſant enemy.

Theſe two great armies being now come ſo nigh together, as that they might the one well deſcry the other, Amurath had purpoſed the ſame day to haue giuen the Chriſtians battell; but being diſſuaded by Eurenoſes, both for that it was extream hot, and his ſouldiers wearied F with trauel, he reſted that night. The next morning as ſoon as it was day hee put his army in order of battel; placing his ſon Baiaſet with Eurenoſes and Eine Beg Subbaſſa, in the right wing; his yongeſt ſon Iacup with Sarutſe Baſſa in the left wing; the main battel he led himſelfe. Laſarus in the mean time had alſo ſet his Army in good order; giuing the charge of the right wing to Vulcus his ſon in law; the left wing was led by the King of Boſna, and his ſons; in the main battel ſtood Lazarus himſelfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater Armies than thoſe two had ſeldom before met in Europ: Lazarus (as the Turkiſh hiſtories report, but how truly I know not) hauing in his army fiue hundred thouſand men, and Amurath ſcarſe halfe ſo many.

To begin the battel, Amurath had drawn a thouſand of his beſt archers, vnder the leading of Malcozzeus, out of the right wing of his army, & the like number of archers out of the left, vnder the conduct of Muſtapha: which ſo placed on both ſides of the army as he thought beſt, Eurenoſes a man of great experience told Amurath, That the Chriſtians were for the moſt part well and ſtrongly armed, and ſholdring cloſe together in their charge would be like a rock of iron, vnable to be pierced: but if in joining the battell he would a little retyre, the Chriſtians following vpon good hope, would loſe their cloſe ſtanding (the chief part of their ſtrength) and ſo leaue an entrance for his men. Vpon which reſolution, Amurath commanded the Archers to giue the firſt charge, which they couragiouſly performed. At which time the Turks army gaue ground a little; which the Chriſtians perceiuing, with great force aſſailed the left wing of their army, and with a hard and cruell fight put the ſame to flight. Which Bajaſet ſeeing, with ſuch fury renued the battel, that the Turks who before as men diſcouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turn again vpon their enemies: and the Chriſtians hauing as they thought already got the victory, were to begin a great battell. In which bloudy fight many fel on both ſides: the brightnes of the armor and weapons was as it had bin the lightning: the multitude of the launces and other horſmens ſtaues ſhadowed the light of the Sun: arrowes and darts fel ſo faſt, that a man would haue thought they had poured down from heauen: the noiſe of the inſtruments of war, with the nighing of horſes and outcries of men was ſo terrible and great, that the wild beaſts in the mountains ſtood aſtonied therwith: and the Turkiſh hiſtories to expres the terror of the day, vainely ſay, that the Angels in heauen amaſed with that hideous noiſe, for that time forgot the hauenly hymns wherewith they alwaies glorifie God. About noon time of the day, the fortune of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians began to giue ground, and at length betooke themſelues to plain flight; whom the Turkes with all their force purſued, and ſlew them down right without number or mercy. In which battel Laſarus the Deſpot himſelf was alſo ſlain. Howbeit ſome hiſtories report otherwiſe; as that hee with his ſon were taken priſoners, and by and by afterward, in reuenge of Amuraths death cruelly ſlain. Other ſome alſo reporting that he died in priſon. Amurath after this great victory, with ſome of his chief captaines taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heaps in the fields like mountains; a Chriſtian ſoldier ſore wounded and all bloudy, ſeeing him, in ſtaggering maner roſe, as if it had bin from death, out of an heap of ſlain men, and making towards him, for want of ſtrength fel down diuers times by the way as he came, as if hee had bin a drunken man: at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they who guarded the Kings perſon would haue ſtayd him, he was by Amurath himſelfe commanded to come neerer, ſuppoſing that he would haue craued his life of him. Thus the half dead Chriſtian preſſing neer vnto him, as if he would for honors ſake haue kiſſed his feet, ſuddenly ſtabd him in the bottom of his belly, with a ſhort dagger which he had vnder his ſoldiers coat: of which wound that great King and conqueror preſently died. The name of this man (for his courage worthy of eternal memory) was Mile's Cobelits; who before ſore wounded, was ſhortly after in the preſence of Bajaſet cut into ſmall pieces. The Turks in their Annals ſomewhat otherwiſe report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelits, one of the Deſpots ſeruants, in time of the battel comming to Amurath as a fugitiue, offring him his ſeruice; and admitted to his preſence, in humbling himſelfe to haue kiſſed his feet (as the barbarous maner of the Turks is) ſtabbed him into the belly and ſo ſlew him; being himſelfe ſhortly after therefore (as is aforeſaid) in the preſence of Baiaſet moſt cruelly hewn into ſmal pieces. Wherupon euer ſince that time, the maner of the Turks hath bin, and yet is, that when any Embaſſador or ſtranger is to come to kiſſe the Sultans hand, or otherwiſe to approch his perſon, he is as it were for honors ſake led by the arms vnto his preſence by two of the great courtiers: but indeed by ſo intangling him, to be ſure hee ſhall not offer him the like violence that did this Cobelits formerly to Amurath.

Lazarus ſlain.

Amurath ſlain

The dead body of Amurath was preſently with all ſecrecie conueyed into his Tent by the Baſſa's and Captains preſent at his death: whither Baiaſet was alſo brought with an Enſigne before

A before him,as the ſucceſſor in his fathers kingdom. His yonger brother Iacup,ſyrnamed Zele- bi(or the noble)yet ignorant of that had hapned,was by the great Baſſa's ſent for, as from his father : who caſting no perill,but comming into his fathers tent,was there preſently by them ſtrangled,by the commandement of Bajazet,as moſt hiſtories report : howbeit the Turks annals charge him not therwith. This was the beginning of the moſt vnnaturall and inhumane cuſtom,euer ſince holden as a moſt wholſom and good policie among the Turkiſh kings and Emperors,in the beginning of their reign moſt cruelly to maſſacre their brethren and neereſt kinſmen,ſo at once to rid themſelues of all fear of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his ſuperſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh Kings,a man of great valor,and in all his attempts fortunat. Hee made greater ſlaughter of his Ene-B mies than both his father and grandfather. His kingdom in Aſia hee greatly inlarged by the ſword,mariage and purchaſe; and vſing the diſcord and cowardiſe of the Grecian Princes to his profit,ſubdued a great part of Thracia,called Romania,with the territories therto adjoyning,leauing to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, little or nothing more in Thracia than the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople,with the bare name of an Emperor,almoſt without an empire. He won a great part of Bulgaria,and entred into Servia,Boſna,and Macedonia. He was liberall,and withall ſeuere; of his ſubjects both beloued and feared:a man of very few words and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlain when he was 68 years old,and had thereof reigned 31,Anno Dom.1390. His dead body was by Bajazet conueyed into Aſia , and there royally buried at Pruſa,in a fair chappell at the Weſt end of the city,neer to the Baths there; Amurath buried at Pruſa.
C where vpon his tomb lieth his ſoldiers cloake,with a little Turkiſh Tulipant,much different from thoſe great turbants which the Turks now weare. Neer vnto the ſame tomb are placed three lances,with three horſe nails faſtned at the vpper end of them,which he vſed as guidons in his wars : a thing in antient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a caſtle,with a tomb made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of Coſlova, where hee was ſlaine, and his intrals buried, Which giues occaſion for ſome to report that he was there alſo himſelfe interred.

Proud BajaZet, moſt falſe of faith, and loathing bleſſed peace, His warlike troups like lightning to ſhake he doth not ceaſe.
Of Hadrianople he makes choice for his Imperiall ſeat, That Europes Kingdom he might join vnto his Empire great.
Conſtantinople he diſtreſt twice with ſtreit ſiege and long;
And vainly thought to haue poſſeſt the Grecians wealth by wrong.
But ouercome by Tamerlane, faſt bound in fetters ſure, Trod vnder foot, and clos'd in Cage, great ſhame did there endure.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOVRTH AND MOST VNFORTVNAT KING OF THE TVRKES.

BAjaZet (or as the Turks cal him Bajaſit) of his violent and fierce nature ſyrnamed Gilderun, or lightning, ſucceeded his father Amurath C in the Turkiſh kingdom; his yonger brother Iacup beeing ſtrangled immediatly after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the firſt year of his reign inuaded Seruia, and there beſieged Cratoua, a city of the Deſpots, whereunto the ſiluer mines of Seruia (not the leaſt cauſe of that war) belonged. Which city was yeelded vnto him vpon condition, That the Chriſtian inhabitants might with life and liberty depart. Who were no ſooner gone out of the City, but that by his commandement they were all moſt cruelly ſlain by his men of war, for that purpoſe ſent out after them. At this time he alſo won Vſcupia, with diuers other caſtles in the country neer vnto Cratoua.

Bajazet inuadeth Seruia.

D Sigiſmund at the ſame time King of Hungary (a yong Prince of great hope, and brother to Winceſlaus then Emperor of the Weſt) aduertiſed from the Seruians his allyes and Confederats, of theſe proud proceedings of Bajazet; by his Embaſſadours ſent of purpoſe, requeſted him, that as he was a iuſt Prince, and wiſhed to liue in quiet with his owne, to deſiſt from doing ſuch open wrong, and from inuading of ſuch countries of his friends & confederats, as he had no right in. Which Embaſſadors ſo ſent, Bajazet detained without anſwer, til ſuch time as he had ouerrun a great part of the Deſpots country, and therin don what he thought good. Then calling the ſaid Embaſſadors vnto him into one of the ſtrong towns which hee had in euery corner filled with his own ſouldiers, told them that they might there ſee, that his right both vnto that town and the reſt by him taken was good enough, foraſmuch as the very Walls E acknowledged the ſame. And ſo giuing them leaue to depart, willed them ſo to tel their maſter. Which his proud anſwer by the ſame Embaſſadours reported vnto the young King, no leſſe troubled him than if open war had by them bin denounced vnto him, ſeeing the Tyrant, as it ſhould ſeem, pretended right vnto whatſoeuer he could by force get. Neuertheles, being himſelf as yet not wel ſetled in his kingdom, and in doubt of the contrary faction (that altogether liked not of his election into Hungary for their King) he was glad at that time to put it vp, and ſo to hold himſelf content.

The next yeare Bajazet by Feriſes Beg tooke the City of Vidina, with many other ſtrong Townes and Caſtles in Seruia, and afterwards returned vnto Hadrianople. But whileſt that he thus raged in Europ, the Caramanian King inuaded and ſpoiled the frontiers of his coun- F tries in Aſia. At the ſame time Eurenoſes, Lord Gouernour of the marches of his Dominions in Europe towards Grecia, departing from Serres (where hee then lay) tooke the Citie of Sitros in Theſſalia. And Feriſes Beg, not content to haue taken Vidina (as is before ſaid) paſſed ouer the great Riuer of Danubius, and grieuouſly ſpoyled Valachia: from whence he returned loden with a great prey. This is the firſt time that I read of, that the Turks euer paſſed Seruia the ſecond time inuaded by Bajazet.

ſed ouer the riuer Danubius. At this time alſo Iegides Baſſa entered the kingdome of Boſna, G from whence he carried a great number of Captiues to Hadrianople, where Bajazet ſpent that Winter.

Philadelphia beſieged by Bajazet.

In the beginning of the next Spring Bajazet paſſed ouer Helleſpontus to Pruſa, where hee built a fair Mahometan temple, with a colledge and an alms-houſe: which works finiſhed, he returned again into Europ, and built a monaſtery at Hadrianople, and ſo returned again into Aſia, leauing Temurtaſes Beglerbeg or Viceroy in Hadrianople. After he was come into Aſia, he laid ſiege vnto the ſtrong city of Philadelphia in Lydia, which was at that time the onely city in the leſſer Aſia yet holden by the Chriſtians in the midſt of the Mahometan Princes.
For now was the Greek emperor by the Othoman Kings and the other Turks, quite driuen out of the leſſer Aſia. In the beginning of this ſiege, Bajazet gaue ſtreit commandment to his ſoldiers, H That they ſhould not ſpoil or hurt any thing in the country belonging to the citiſens; hoping by this feigned curteſie to make them the more willing to yeeld themſelues vnto his obedience. But diſappointed of his expectation, and finding them reſolued to hold it out to the laſt, he forthwith gaue out contrary commandment, not to ſpare any thing they could waſt or deſtroy: which was accordingly by his greedy ſoldiers performed. After a long ſiege, the citiſens ſeeing the countrey about them vtterly waſted, and themſelues vnable any longer to endure, and out of all hope of relief, yeelded their city to the pleaſure of Bajazet. Some write, That this famous city was not beſieged without the conſent of the Emperor of Conſtantinople: and that the Greeks themſelues, moued with enuy to ſee that City ſo long hold out, did help the Turks in the winning therof. I

During this ſiege, Aladin Ogli Prince of Caria, a Mahometan, came to Bajazet, & yeelded himſelf into his power as his vaſſal: vnto whom Bajazet reſtored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him; yet vpon ſuch condition, as that he ſhould not from that time coin any money in his own name, either be remembred in their publique praiers as a prince in their Mahometan temples, as he had before bin: but that al ſuch things ſhould be don in the name of Bajazet, as his dread Lord & Soueraign. With which diſgrace the poor prince was glad to content himſelf, and to liue as his vaſſal. From Philadelphia hee led his army into the country of Saruchania, in antient time called Ionia Maritima, which he ſubdued to himſelf vpon like conditions. After that he paſſed further to Menteſia, or Mentz, ſomtime called Myndos, in Caria: the prince wherof for fear fled to Cutrun Bajazet Prince of K Caſtamona and part of Pontus, leauing his country to the pleaſure of the tyrant. And foraſmuch as the yong King of Caramania had inuaded his countries whilſt he was buſied in Europ, Bajazet in reuenge therof entred with his army into Caramania, and took Cæſarea, with diuers other places there: ſo that the yong King diſcouraged with the loſſe of his towns, and fearing Bajazets greatnes, was glad to hold himſelfe content with his loſſe, and to make peace with him as it pleaſed him to grant it. As Bajazet was making this expedition into Caramania, another yong Mahometan Prince the ſon of Prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his chief counſellors, and were both by him ſent priſoners ouer the ſtreit to the caſtle of Ipſala where they lay in durance many years after. Thus Bajazet hauing oppreſſed and wronged L moſt of the Mahometan princes, the ſucceſſors of Sultan Aladin in the leſſer Aſia, at laſt returned again himſelfe in triumph to Pruſa.

The Prince of Menteſia, who for fear of Bajazet was fled out of his Countrey (as is aforeſaid, had now inſenced Cutrun Bajazet prince of Caſtamona, with a great power to inuade that ſide of Bajazet his Kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Bajazet vnderſtanding, gathered together a great Army to go againſt this Mahometan Prince. At which very time the Vayuod of Valachia, hearing of Bajazet his troubles in Aſia, with a ſtrong Army paſſed ouer Danubius, into thoſe parts of Seruia and Bulgaria that were by the Turks as then poſſeſſed; where he ſpoiled the Countrey, and ſlew great numbers of the Turks, making Mahometan Saints and Martyrs by heaps: for ſo the Turks account all them whom the Chriſtians kil in their wars. Which don, he retyred back again into Valachia, carrying with him alſo many M of the Turks priſoners. Bajazet thus at once inuaded both in Aſia and Europe, deferred his Warres purpoſed againſt the Prince of Pontus, vntill a more conuenient time, conuerting his Forces againſt the Valachians. Wherefore paſſing ouer the Streight to Hadrianople, he ſent his Army from thence to Nicopolis, and there paſſing the Riuer of Danubius, entered into

A into Valachia,burning and ſpoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayuod to repreſſe his fury,met him in the field and gaue him battell,but was therin ouerthrown,and many of his people ſlaine; ſo that at laſt he was glad to ſue for peace, which he obtained, by ſubmitting himſelfe to Bajazet,and yeelding to pay him a yeerely tribute.

Theſſalia inuaded by Bajazet

Whileſt Bajazet was thus buſied in Valachia,newes was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of the Weſt with a fleet of gallies did great harm alongſt the coaſts of his dominions in Aſia. In reuenge whereof, he entred with his army into Theſſaly, deſtroying all the countrey vnto Theſſalonica: in which expedition he tooke the city of Neapolis in Greece, and Ioannina in Ætolia,and after that returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great power paſſed the ſtreit of Callipolis B to Hadrianople, intending to haue inuaded Hungary. But as he was vpon the way,it chanced that a Conſtantinopolitan ſpie was by the Turks intercepted, with letters from the Greeke Emperour to the King of Hungary, giuing him warning both of the Turks preparation and comming. By which ſpie Bajazet alſo vnderſtood of another meſſenger before ſent into Hungary for like purpoſe. Whereupon Temurtaſes (then his great lieutenant in Europe) perſuaded him to deſiſt from his intended warres in Hungary,and to beſiege the imperiall city of Conſtantinople, as a thing of more honour,and leſſe danger; the city being already (as he ſaid,and as in truth it was) ſurrounded with the Turkiſh prouinces : bringing in Philadelphia (but a few yeres before woon) for example of the like exploit. Of whoſe counſel Bajazet liking wel, returned with his army,and ſhortly after came and ſate down therewith before Conſtantinople, C laying hard ſiege thereunto, firſt by land,and then by ſea, with his gallies ſent from Callipolis.
Which hard ſiege continued (as moſt hiſtories report) the ſpace of eight yeres: in which long time he draue the Emperour Emanuel Palæologus to that ſtreit, that he was glad to leaue his city,and himſelfe in perſon to craue aid of Wenceſlaus the Germane Emperour,and Charles the ſixth the French King, and other Chriſtian Princes alſo. At which time the citiſens were at length brought to ſuch extremity, that they were euen at the point to haue yeelded vp the city; and haply had ſo done, had not Sigiſmund King of Hungary (aſſiſted with a great army of the French, and other voluntary Chriſtians almoſt out of euery part of Chriſtendome, to the number of an hundred and thirty thouſand, vnder the leading of Iohn County of Niuers, and after Duke of Burgondy) for the reliefe of the beſieged Emperour, paſſed ouer Danubius D into the Turkiſh dominions; and there hauing recouered Vidina, with certaine other ſtrong Holds in Bulgaria, layd ſiege to Nicopolis: out of which city the Turks oftentimes ſallyed, and gaue him many an hot skirmiſh. It is reported, That the yong King Sigiſmund beholding the greatnes of his great army, in his great jollity hearing of the comming of the Turks army, ſhould proudly ſay What need we to feare the Turk, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens, which if they ſhould fall, yet were we able with our ſpears and halberts to hold them vp for falling vpon vs. But Bajazet vnderſtanding what ſpoyle the Hungarian King had made in his late gained countries, and of the ſiege of Nicopolis; commanded the ladders and other great prouiſion now in readineſſe for the ſcaling and aſſaulting of the City of Conſtantinople, to be burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians; and ſo raiſing his ſiege, E marched with a right puiſſant army to Nicopolis, ſending Eurenoſes before, of purpoſe to intercept ſome of the Chriſtians, thereby to learne the ſtate of their camp and army. But they hearing of his comming, ſo wel looked to themſelues, that he with ſhame returned to his Maſter as he came, without any one priſoner taken. Which thing much troubled Bajazet, as fearing he ſhould haue to do with a wary enemy. Sigiſmund vnderſtanding of the approch of Bajazet, leauing a ſufficient power for the continuing of the ſiege, roſe himſelfe, and with the reſt of his army went to meet his proud enemy. Of whoſe comming and approach Bajazet vnderſtanding, diuided his Army into two parts; and being now come within the ſight of the Chriſtian army, made ſhew but of the one halfe, keeping himſelfe cloſe in ſecret ambuſh not farre off with the other. The Chriſtians deeming themſelues (as they were) far more in number F than the Turks which they ſaw, diuided their army alſo into two parts, purpoſing betwixt them to haue incloſed the Turks. Of all the Chriſtians that were there preſent, the French deſired to haue the honour of the firſt charge to be giuen vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope ſet forward (the Hungarians, with a great part of the army, not yet ſet in order) and ſo began the battell: where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruell fight, and Conſtantinople eight yeares beſieged by Bajazet.

in a little time many thouſands ſlain. But this fight had not long endured, when Bajazet with the other halfe of his army ſuddenly ariſing, came on with ſuch violence, as well became his ſyrname of Gilderun or lightning; and ſo hardly charged the French, that they amaſed at the ſuddenneſſe of the danger, and oppreſſed with the fury and multitude of the vnexpected enemy, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmaid; but ſeeing no remedy, encouraging one another, valiantly ſought it out vntill they were almoſt all either ſlain or taken priſoners; ſtil in hope to haue been relieued by the Hungarians and the reſt. In this hard conflict diuers of the French horſmen hauing forſaken their horſes, fought on foot, as their manner was: which horſes running backe without their riders, vpon the Hungarians, cauſed them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrowne; wherewith diſmayed, they without further comming on, all turned their backs and fled, in ſo great haſt, as that it booted not the king or any other great commander to go about to ſtay their flight. The French thus by their too much haſt ouerthrowne, the Turks purſuing the Hungarians and the reſt of the Chriſtians, made of them a great ſlaughter: of whom alſo many were drowned in the great riuer Danubius. At which time alſo the Turks tooke ſo many priſoners, that it was thought euery ſeuerall Turke had his priſoner. King Sigiſmund himſelf, who but a little before had deſpiſed euen the falling of the heauens, had then alſo vndoubtedly fallen into his enemies hands, had he not in a little boat by good hap got ouer Danubius: not vnlike another Xerxes, who hauing couered the ſeas with his ſhippes, and with a world of men paſſed ouer into Grecia, was afterward by the ſtrange change of fortune, himſelfe alone in a ſmall fiſher boat glad to get backe again into Aſia. Sigiſmund being thus got ouer Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the loſſe of the battel, fled by ſea into Thracia to Conſtantinople, from whence he ſailed vnto the Iſland of the Rhodes; and from thence ſailing through the Ægean and Ionian ſea, landed at length at Dalmatia; and ſo hauing wandred from place to place, toſſed with many fortunes, after eighteene moneths long and painefull trauell returned againe into Hungary. Where he found the ſtate of his kingdome in his abſence much troubled, the contrary faction in the mean time hauing made choice of Ladiſlaus King of Naples for their King; who was euen then with a great army going to haue taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome, had not Sigiſmund in good time, by the helpe of certaine of the chiefe of the Hungarian nobility preuented him. In this battel, called the battell of Nicopolis, were of the Chriſtians twenty thouſand ſlain, and of the Turks threeſcore thouſand. The County of Niuers the French Kings neere kinſman was there taken priſoner, with three hundred great commanders more: where after he had indured great contumely and reproach in the preſence of Bajazet, he was commanded to make choice of fiue other of the captaines, ſuch as he liked beſt, all the reſt being cut in pieces before his face, and he with the other fiue left aliue, ſent priſoners to Pruſa, from whence they were afterwards ranſomed for two hundred thouſand Duckats. This bloudy battell of Nicopolis was fought in the yere of our Lord, 1396.

Conſtantinople the ſecond time beſieged by Bajazet.

Bajazet after this great victory, hauing worthily relieued his beſieged city, returned againe to the ſiege of Conſtantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks againſt it on the one ſide towards the land; and paſſing ouer the ſtreit of Boſphorus, built a ſtrong caſtle vpon that ſtreit ouer againſt Conſtantinople, to impeach ſo much as was poſſible all paſſage therunto by ſea. This ſtreit ſiege (as moſt write) continued alſo two yeres, which I ſuppoſe by the circumſtance of the hiſtory, to haue been part of the aforeſaid eight yeres. Emanuel the beſieged Emperor wearied with theſe long wars, ſent an embaſſador to Bajazet to intreat with him a peace: which Bajazet was the more willing to hearken vnto, for that he heard news, that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended ſhortly to warre vpon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition, that the Emperor ſhould grant free liberty for the Turks to dwell together in one ſtreet of Conſtantinople, with free exerciſe of their owne religion and lawes, vnder a judge of their owne nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkiſh King a yerely tribute of ten thouſand duckats. Which diſhonorable conditions the diſtreſſed Emperour was glad to accept of. So was this long ſiege broken vp, and preſently a great ſort of Turks with their families were ſent out of Bithynia, to dwel in Conſtantinople, and a Church there built for them: which not long after was by the Emperor pulled down to the ground, and the Turks againe driuen out of the city, at ſuch time as Bajazet was by the mighty Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken priſoner.

A Bajazet in the beginning of his reign, preſently after the death of Lazarus the Deſpot, ſlain in the battell of Coſſoua, woon part of Seruia (as is aforeſaid) the other part beeing ſtill holden by Lazarus his ſon, called Stephen the Deſpot; who about this time ſent an honorable embaſſador to Bajazet, with louing letters, and royall Preſents: by which embaſſador alſo the old Princeſſe Lazarus his widow, offred her faire daughter Deſpina, Stephens ſiſter, a lady of incomparable beauty, in marriage to him, if it ſhould pleaſe him to vouchſafe his handmaid (as ſhe termed her) ſo high a place. This lady was long before promiſed him, whilſt his father Amurath yet liued. Of this Embaſſador Bajazet was very glad, but eſpecially for the faire Ladies ſake: which being known to the Princes her mother, & the Deſpot her brother, ſhe was forthwith honorably ſent to Bajazet, and ſo to him with great ſolemnity and triumph ſhortly after B maried. Of all his wiues he held her deereſt, and for her ſake reſtored to her brother Stephen the city and caſtle of Semendre (otherwiſe called S. Andrew) and Columbarium in Seruia: ſhe allured him to drink wine, forbidden by the Turks law; and cauſed him to delight in ſumptuous banquets, which his predeceſſors Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath, neuer vſed.

Bajazet marrieth Deſpina the faire daughter of Lazarus the Deſpot.

As the Turkiſh kingdome grew in greatneſſe, ſo corruption, the canker of great ſtates and common-weales, increaſed likewiſe; but ſpecially in the men of law, and judges of his courts. Wherewith Bajazet grieuouſly offended, commanded diuers of the ſame judges to be apprehended, determining (to the terror of others) to haue executed them; whoſe dangerous eſtate was much pitied, and alſo fauoured of Alis Baſſa, and other the Kings great Councellors: yet for ſo much as Bajazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to be ſpoken vnto, C none of them durſt aduenture to intreat him in their behalfe; no not Alis Baſſa, Charydin Baſſa his ſonne, ſometime judge of Pruſa, although he were a man in ſuch ſpeciall fauour with him, that he was therefore of the common people not onely reuerenced, but as the King himſelfe honoured.

There was at that time in the court an Æthyopian jeaſter, who vnder ſome couert pleaſant jeaſt, would many times bolt out that to the king in his greateſt heat, which his graueſt councellors durſt not once ſpeak to him of in ſecret: this jeſter, Alis Baſſa requeſted to deuiſe ſome means to intreat with the angry King in the behalfe of theſe Iudges; promiſing to giue him what he would reaſonably deſire, if he could appeaſe the Kings diſpleaſure. The Æthyopian without feare vndertook the matter, & preſently putting vpon his head a rich hat all wrought D ouer with gold, after the maner of the Turks embaſſadors, and fitting himſelfe with other apparell better beſeeming an embaſſador then a jeaſter; thus attired preſented himſelfe before the King, with a great counterfeit grauity. Whereat Bajazet maruelling, asked him the cauſe why he was ſo gay. I haue a requeſt vnto your Majeſty (ſaid he) and wiſh to find fauor in your ſight. Bajazet more deſirous than before to know the matter, asked what his requeſt was. If it ſtand with your pleaſure (ſaid the jeaſter) I would faine go as your embaſſador to the emperor of Conſtantinople, in hope whereof I haue put my ſelfe in this readineſſe. To what purpoſe wouldſt thou go? (ſaid Bajazet) To craue of the Emperour (ſaid he) ſome forty or fifty of his old graue Monks and Friers to bring with me hither to the court. And what ſhould they doe here? (ſaid Bajazet) I would haue them placed (ſaid the jeaſter) in the rooms of the old doting E judges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (ſaid Bajazet) I can place others of my owne people in their rooms. True (ſaid the Æthyopian) for grauity of look and countenance, and ſo would the old Monks and Friers ſerue as well, but not ſo learned in your laws & cuſtoms of your kingdom, as are thoſe in your diſpleaſure. If they be learned (ſaid Bajazet) why do they then contrary to their learning, peruert juſtice, and take bribes? There is a good reaſon for that too (ſaid the jeaſter.) What reaſon? (ſaid the king.) That can he that there ſtanby tel better than I, (ſaid the jeſter, pointing to Alis Baſſa:) who forthwith commanded by Bajazet to giue the reaſon, with great reuerence before done, ſhewed, That thoſe Iudges ſo in diſpleaſure, were not conueniently prouided for, & were therefore inforced many times for their neceſſary maintenance to take rewards, to the ſtaying of the due courſe of juſtice: Which *Ba*F*jazet* vnderſtanding to be true, commanded Alis Baſſa to appoint them conuenient ſtipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Whereupon the Baſſa ſet down order, That of euery matter in ſuit exceeding one thouſand Aſpers, the Iudge ſhall haue twenty aſpers fee for judgement, and for euery writing and inſtrument out of the court, twelue Aſpers: which fees they yet take in thoſe courts at this day.

Not long after, Bajazet in his fury ſent for certain of his captaines and commanders of his men of war, with whom he was for ſome ſmall occaſion grieuouſly offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death, which was with him no great matter. Theſe captaines being brought before him, the councellors ſeeing him all in choler, ſate looking on the ground, hanging down their heads, as the manner of the Turks is, not daring to looke him in the face, nor to ſpeak a good word for them: when ſuddenly the aforeſaid Æthyopian jeſter ſtept forth, earneſtly requeſting the King, not to ſhew them any fauor, but to execute them preſently, as villaines and traitors; railing vpon them, as if he had known ſome great fault by them. Bajazet thinking he could haue accuſed them of ſome great crime, becauſe of his earneſtneſſe, asked what reaſon he had ſo to exclaime againſt them. Reaſon, (quoth the jeſter) becauſe the knaues be good for nothing; and they ſay that Tamerlane is with a great army comming againſt vs: if you will but take vp an enſigne in your hand, and I go before you with a drum, I will ſtrike vp ſuch a terrible march, & you make ſuch a dreadfull ſhew, that we ſhall need none of theſe bad fellowes or their ſoldiers in the field to get the victory ouer our enemies. This conceit of the jeaſter ſtrucke ſuch a melancholy imagination into Bajazet his head, that he ſtood muſing a great while as it were in a deepe ſtudy: at laſt hauing well conſidered the drift of the jeaſters ſpeech, and his fury now ſomwhat aſſuaged, granted them pardon, which they looked not for.

This Æthyopian jeſter, Bajazet vpon a time ſent vnto the old Queene his mother, to bring her newes of the good ſucceſſe of his wars againſt the Chriſtians, for that ſhe had ſo deſired: who comming vnto her, & by her commanded to ſit down, ſhe began to demand of him, how the King her ſonne did, and of the ſucceſſe of his wars. Whereunto he anſwered, That he did very well, and had woon from the Chriſtians a great countrey, and greatly inriched his ſoldiers. But after a little more talke, the Queene mother deſirous to heare againe the good newes, (or elſe after the manner of ſome, which thinke nothing ſufficiently told, except it be told an hundred times) asked him againe, how the King her ſonne did, and how he ſped in his warres. Whereunto he anſwered euery word as before: but asking him the third time the very ſame queſtion, how her ſon did? Do'ſt thou aske me ſo often (ſaid the Æthyopian) how he doth? Bre Caphre (ô whore, ſaid he) thou haſt brought forth a ſonne like a diuell, who roaming vp and down, doth nothing but burn and deſtroy the world where he commeth. Whereat the Queene crying out, vp ſtart the Æthyopian, and betaking himſelfe to his heeles, was neuer more afterwards ſeene.

In the wars which Bajazet had againſt Sigiſmund, the Vayuod of Valachia had giuen aid to the Hungarian king; wherwith Bajazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged: and therefore intending to make war vpon the Valachian prince, left Temurtaſes his great lieutenant at Ancyra in Aſia, and ſo paſſed ouer Helleſpontus himſelf againſt the Valachian. Vpon whoſe departure, Aladin his ſiſters ſon the yong king of Caramania, with a great power came ſuddenly in the night to Ancyra, and took Temurtaſes priſoner: who then feared nothing leſſe, than in time of peace to be ſo ſurpriſed, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he vnderſtood that Bajazet had ended his wars in Valachia, and was with victory returned to Pruſa, he fearing his heauy indignation for ſo great an outrage, preſently releaſed Temurtaſes out of priſon, apparrelled him richly after the maner of that nation, craued pardon for the wrong he had done him, and ſet him at liberty to go whither he would, and withal ſent one of his noblemen with great gifts and preſents to Bajazet, to make his excuſe in beſt maner he could: vnto which embaſſador Bajazet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or ſuffer him to come in his ſight: but at the ſame time leuied a great army to inuade Caramania. Which Aladin vnderſtanding, and now out of all hope to appeaſe this mighty enemy, leuied all the forces he could in his owne kingdome, and withall entertained all the mercinary ſoldiers he could get, intending to try his fortune in the field, as a man of valour, rather than to be thruſt out of his kingdome like a coward: and ſo in readines, hearing of the comming of Bajazet, met him vpon the way, and at a place called Aczac gaue him battell: but beeing too weak, he was ouercome and put to flight; in which flight his horſe ſtumbling, and he falling to the ground, was there before he could recouer himſelfe, taken by his enemies which had him in chaſe, and ſo brought bound to Bajazet: his two ſons Mahamet Beg & Alis Beg, being taken in that battell alſo, were ſent priſoners to Pruſa. Aladin himſelfe was by Bajazets command deliuered to his enemy Temurtaſes: who in reuenge of the wrong hee had before done him, preſently cauſed him

A him to be hanged:which when Bajazet vnderſtood,he ſeem'd very ſory that he had ſo put him to death,for that he was his own ſiſters ſon. Bajazet following the courſe of his victory,woon Iconium, Larenda, Nigde, with all the reſt of Aladin his kingdome. About this time alſo, Amaſia the great metropoliticall city of Capadocia, was by the prince thereof deliuered to Bajazet, beeing too weake himſelfe to defend the ſame againſt the force of Caſi-Burchanidin, prince of the great and ſtrong city of Sebaſtia, his enemy; now growne to be a man of great power in that part of Aſia,and had ſolicited the Sultan of Ægypt to ayd him againſt Bajazet. Whereupon Bajazet returning from the conqueſt of Caramania, led his army towards Sebaſtia,where the citiſens had a little before depriued Caſi-Burchanidin of his gouernment, for his cruelty,and placed his ſon in his ſtead:but in ſhort time no leſſe weary of the ſon, than before B of the father,they with like inconſtancy ſent word to Bajazet,that if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the city:vpon whoſe approch, Caſis (his ſonne) for feare fled out of the city, to Prince Naſradin his brother in law. After whoſe departure,the citiſens according to their promiſe, deliuered the city vnto Bajazet at his comming, wherein he left Solyman his eldeſt ſonne gouernor. And ſo hauing in this notable expedition conquered the kingdome of Caramania,and taken the great cities of Amaſia and Sebaſtia,with moſt part of Capadocia, and all that part of Aſia, which the Turks call Rumilia Aſiatica, he returned to Pruſa, and there wintred.

Sebaſtia deliuered to Bajazet.

The next Spring, Bajazet hearing that his old enemy Cutrun Bajazet Prince of Caſtamona and Pontus,was dead,came to Caſtamona with a great army: which Iſfendiar (Cutrun Bajazets ſon,and then Prince of that countrey) hearing, fled out of the city of Synope,a little city vpon C the coaſt of the Euxin:from whence he ſent an embaſſador to Bajazet,humbly requeſting him, to ſuffer him to haue that little city, as his ſeruant to liue in, (which he was ſure he would otherwiſe beſtow vpon ſome other of his ſeruants) and not to ſeeke the innocent bloud of the ſon for the fathers offence. Which his requeſt,Bajazet moued with pity,eaſily granted:yet neuertheles took from him Caſtamona,with the greateſt part of his dominion in Pontus,which he gaue to his ſonne Solyman. At the ſame time hee violently oppreſſed the Prince Germean, and tooke from him the cities of Deſpotopolis and Hierapolis,with all the reſt of his dominion.

Bajazet inuadeth Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona.

The Prince of Menteſia long before driuen out of his country by Bajazet,(as is before declared) and hauing all this while made his abode at Caſtamona, doubting now of his owne D ſafety, after the death of his good friend Cutrun Bajazet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Bajazet returning to Pruſa, there built a magnificent Mahometane Temple; during which worke he with great ſuperſtition forbore drinking of wine, repoſing himſelfe with the company of graue and learned men, and the adminiſtration of iuſtice: whereby hee greatly woon the hearts of his ſubiects, and had now ſo inlarged his kingdome, that all Kings and Princes bordering vpon him ſtood in great feare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes King of Bagdat (or new Babylon) and Eiracum, with Ioſephus Niger King of Colchis,inforced with the violent incurſions of Tamerlane & his E Tartars, for ſafegard of their liues were glad to fly into Syria: where they being diſcouered, were both caſt in priſon by the commandement of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commanded ouer Syria:from whence they afterwards hardly eſcaping, fled to Bajazets court. Where after Achmetes had ſtayd two months, he by the aid of Bajazet recouered the poſſeſſion of Eiracum part of his owne inheritance. Ioſephus the other Mahometan King hauing tarried in Bajazets court eight moneths,at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan:in which expedition he mightily preuailed, and hauing ſlaine the Ægyptian Sultans Generall, and diſcomfited his forces,tooke the city of Malatie or Meletine in Armenia,with Diorige,Derende,and Bexene,taken from the Turcomans,and ſpoyled all the country thereabouts. From thence marching with his army towards Erznitzane,the Prince thereof called F Tachretin met him vpon the way,yeelding his city and country into his power; which Bajazet preſently gaue to Ioſephus Niger:who after he had ſix daies enioyed this new gouernment,finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a ſtranger, ſurrendred the ſame againe into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the Citiſens of Erznitzane humbly requeſted of Bajazet, That they might be againe gouerned by their old Prince Tachretin, now his vaſſall.

Which thing he at their earneſt requeſt granted:but taking his wife and children as a pledge of his loyalty, ſent them away to Pruſa, where they were all not long after made away.

The Mahometan Princes of Aſia oppreſſed by Bajazet, diſguiſed fly vnto Tamerlane for ayd.

When Bajazet had now many yeres thus mightily preuailed againſt the Chriſtian Princes in Romania, Bulgaria, Boſna, Theſſalia, Valachia, and other places of Europe, as is before declared, and inflamed with inſatiable ambition, had in worſe manner oppreſſed the Mahometan Kings & Princes of Aſia (of whom ſome were by him ſlain, ſome driuen into exile, ſome impriſoned, and otherſome brought into ſuch ſubiection, that they liued as it were but at his deuotion) and was now growne to that greatnes, that in the pride of his heart he ſtood in feare of no man, but was (as he thought) a terrour vnto the world, hauing vnder his obeyſance great and large dominions in Europe, but far greater in Aſia: it fortuned that diuers of theſe miſerable & diſcontented Mahometan princes, by great fortune, as if it had bin by appointment, to meet together at the court of the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlan, whether they were fled for reliefe and ſuccor. The Prince Germian Ogli, after long impriſonment in the caſtle of Ipſala in Europe, brake priſon, and with Hiſſar-Beg his great counſellor and priſon fellow, conſorted themſelues with a company of loitring companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the countrey people with their apiſh toyes: in which company he paſſed Helleſpontus, as a Beareward, and at length with much adoe came to Tamerlane his court: whither the Prince of Menteſia was come before in the habit of an hermit (as is aforeſaid) with his head and beard ſhauen: Aidin Ogli paſſing through the countrey as a pedlar, with a packe at his backe came thither alſo: the Prince Tachretin as a ſeruing-man, came attending vpon the Prince Iſfendiar, who came alſo, but in ſome better faſhion than the reſt, as an Embaſſadour from ſome other Prince. All theſe poore Princes, with diuers others in like miſery, in ſhort time arriued at Samarcand (great Tamerlane his court;) euery one particularly complaining of his owne priuat griefe, & all together earneſtly requeſting that mighty prince, to take vpon him their defence, and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkiſh tyrant Bajazet. Whoſe pittifull complaints much moued the noble Tartarian; but eſpecially the long & wrongfull impriſonment of Germian Ogli; and the pittifull complaint and mone of Tachretin, who had of late loſt his wife and children by the cruelty of Bajazet. Yet in this matter of ſo great and important conſequence, Tamerlane made no great ſhew of his forwardnes, (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the relieuing of the diſtreſſed, and chaſtiſing of the proud) but coldly anſwered theſe Princes, That he could not tell whether all were ſo as they had reported of Bajazet, or not, but that he well knew him to be a very zealous King in ſetting forth of the Mahometan religion; and that he had therfore made great wars vpon the Chriſtians, in which goodly cauſe (he ſaid) perhaps they had refuſed to aſſiſt him, or els had giuen him ſome other greater occaſion of offence, to him vnknowne: For I can hardly beleeue (ſaid he) that ſo great and religious a Prince as he, would without iuſt and ſufficient cauſe, offer ſuch violence as you may complaine of, eſpecially vnto you his neighbor Princes, and of the ſame religion with himſelfe: neuertheleſſe, whatſoeuer I intend toward your requeſt (ſaid Tamerlane) I will ſend firſt an Embaſſadour vnto him, to vnderſtand more of him and his proceedings, before I reſolue vpon any thing: with which anſwer he willed them vntil then to hold themſelues contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue diſpatched his Embaſſador to Bajazet, he was aduertiſed, that Achmetes late King of new Babylon, and Ioſephus King of Colchis, both by him driuen out of their kingdomes, hauing broken out of priſon from the Sultan of Ægypt, were now come to Bajazet his court, to craue his aid and aſſiſtance: wherefore he deferd to ſend his Embaſſadour, ſuſpecting that Bajazet incited by theſe two exiled Kings, would firſt in their quarrell begin to make war vpon him. But not long after, vnderſtanding that they were both again departed from his court, as is before declared; he then diſpatched his Embaſſadour to Bajazet, with many rich gifts and preſents; courteouſly requeſting him, the rather for his ſake, to deale kindly with theſe Mahometan Princes, his friends, as alſo with the Greeke Emperor Emanuel his allye, for whom he was now become an interceſſor vnto him. Some report alſo, that he beſides this, requeſted to haue the two aforeſaid Mahometan Kings of Bagdat & Colchis deliuered vnto him; and withall ſeemed not a little to diſlike of Bajazet his proceedings againſt the Turcomans his friends. But Bajazet being a Prince of a great and haughty ſpirit, and vnaccuſtomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embaſſage, in great ſcorn reiected the Preſents by Tamerlane ſent to him, and ſpecially certain garments

A garments which Tamerlane after the manner of thoſe Eaſtern nations, had in kindnes amongſt other things ſent him: willing the embaſſador to bid his maſter to meddle with his own matters, and to preſcribe lawes to his owne ſubiects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to do, and to ſend his rags for preſents vnto his inferiours, and not vnto princes of greater power and ſtate than himſelfe. Adding thereunto many other words full deſpight and diſdain, affoording him no better ſtile than the plain name of Tamerlane: calling him the husband of a whore, if he met him not in the field; and wiſhing vnto himſelfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice diuorced wife, after ſhe had bin polluted by another man (as the greateſt diſhonor that might be) if he failed to meet him wherſouer he durſt dare him battel: which proud anſwer of the Turke, by the Embaſſador reported to Tamerlane, and aggrauated by Axalla (a Chriſtian of B the race of the Genowaies, borne at Capha, and then one of his greateſt counſellors about him, and the Greek emperors great friend) was ſo euill taken by him, that all other things ſet apart, he reſolued to go againſt the Turke, and to take in hand that war, as of all other the fitteſt for the increaſe of his honor and glory. Beſides that, he thought it not in reaſon fit for the greatnes of the Tartarian empire, to ſuffer ſuch an vnquiet neighbor to grow great; as ſtill encroaching vpon other the weak Princes confining to him, and adding conqueſts to conqueſts, and yet neuer the more contented, might in the end proue dangerous to his own eſtate and ſoueraignty: a common care to ſuch as be themſelues great, and mounted vp vnto the higheſt degrees of worldly honour, to haue in jealouſie and diſtruſt the ſudden riſing of others neere or farther off, as perillous or diſgracefull to themſelues, or their eſtate: whoſe growing greatnes C they therefore ſeek by all means to hinder; as did now the mighty Tamerlane the proceedings and increaſing of the great Othoman king, Bajazet: and the rather being continually prickt forward ſo to do, by the ſolicitation of the Greeke Emperor Emanuel, the other oppreſſed Mahometan Princes, and by the great captain Axalla (as is aforeſaid) a Chriſtian: of whom for all that Tamerlane himſelfe, a Mahometan, for the great fidelity, valor and vertue he found in him, made no ſmall reckoning, but was contented euen in his greateſt and moſt waighty affairs to be by him aduiſed; diſliking of no man for his religion whatſoeuer, ſo as he did worſhip but one only God, Creator of heauen and earth, and of all that therein is: being himſelfe of opinion, That God in Eſſence one, and in himſelf immutable, without change or diuerſity, yet for the manifeſting of his omnipotency and power, as he had created in the world ſundry kinds D of people, much differing both in nature, manners, and condition, and yet all framed to the image of himſelfe: ſo was he alſo contented to be of them diuerſly ſerued, according to the diuerſity of their natures and manners: ſo that they worſhipt none other ſtrange gods, but him alone, the maker and Creator of all things: which was the cauſe that he ſuffered the vſe of all religions within the countries ſubiect to his obedience, were they not meere Atheiſts, Idolaters, or worſhippers of ſtrange and vaine gods.

Tamerlane his opinion concerning the diuerſity of religions.

Neither was proud Bajazet as one ignorant of the power or purpoſe of Tamerlane, in the meane time idle, but ſtill proſecuted his good fortune for the inlarging of his empire, and increaſing of his ſtrength: wiſely deeming (as the truth was) whatſoeuer meſſages were ſent to him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meere threatnings and forewarnings of his more dan-E gerous purpoſes and deſignes againſt him and his ſtate: which he was ſo farre from fearing, as that to prouoke him the more, he ſpared no intemperate ſpeech, which might mooue him to wrath; wiſhing (as ſhould ſeeme) for nothing more, than to meet him in the field, there to try the fortune of a battell with him. So weake is our foreſight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our vnderſtanding for the apprehenſion or declining of the fatal doom euen preſently hanging ouer our heads, as that we oftentimes through ignorance moſt deſirouſly wiſh for thoſe things which are vnto vs the chiefe occaſions of our vtter ruine and ouerthrow.

But here before we enter into farther diſcourſe of the mortall war betwixt theſe two ſo puiſſant Princes, it ſhal not be much from our purpoſe to ſtep a little out of the way, to ſee what this mighty Tamerlane (of whom ſo many Princes craued aid) was, who liuing, held the Eaſt F in ſuch awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terror of the world, which he then filled with the glory of his name. Moſt Hiſtoriographers report him to haue bin poorly borne, of baſe and obſcure parents: and ſo himſelfe alſo in his youth to haue liued as a poore ſhepheard or heardſman in the mountains, where conſorting himſelfe with other ſturdy companions of like quality and diſpoſition, ſuch as there liued by robbing of Merchants & other paſſengers, he became a maſterfull theefe amongſt them: vnto whom other ſuch lewd mates G dayly ſtill more and more reſorting, he in ſhort time grew (as they ſay) to that greatnes, that he is reported to haue bin of ſuch power, as neuer man but he euer yet came vnto. A matter almoſt incredible: for albeit that the Romane empire, yea and this great empire of the Turks alſo, with ſome others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus, and the other vnder Othoman; yet grew they not as on the ſudden, in their times to any great luſtre (neither was it poſſible for them of ſo ſmall beginnings ſo to do) but by many degrees, and that in long time; euery of the ſucceeding Princes, according to their fortunes, adding ſomthing to their ſtate, before it could be made great: whereas he (by their report) contrary to the courſe of things both naturall & ciuil (which from their ſmall beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatnes, but by degrees, and that in the long reuolution of time) taking H his beginning of nothing, grew vpon the ſudden to be a burthen and terrour vnto the world. Wherein our late Hiſtoriographers ſeem too much to haue followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their kingdome almoſt in one battel ſubuerted, report nothing ſimply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthy praiſes, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage onely, but euen in the courſe of his whole life alſo; making him (as they would haue the world to beleeue) firſt to haue beene a very abiect among men; and then for his inhumane cruelty a very monſter in nature, (or as it was long before, but more truly ſaid of another great one much like himſelfe) a lump of earth tempred with bloud. Which incredible reports concerning ſo great a Monarch, I liſt not to follow, as too full of diſhonor; eſpecially whereas others of no leſſe credit than they, with far I more modeſty & greater probability report of him the greateſt honor that may be. He was (as they & the others alſo ſay) born at Samarcand, the chiefe city of the Zagataian Tartars, pleaſantly ſcituated vpon the riuer Iaxartes: his father was called Zain-Cham, or as ſome others wil Og, Prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the countrey of Sachetay (ſometime part of the famous kingdome of Parthia) third in deſcent from Zingis the great and fortunat leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this hiſtory remembred: which Og, as a Prince of a peaceable nature (accounting it no leſſe honor quietly to keep the countries left him by his father, than with much trouble and no leſſe danger to ſeeke how to inlarge the ſame) long liued in moſt happy reſt with his ſubiects no leſſe happy than himſelfe: not ſo much ſeeking after the hoording vp of gold & ſiluer (things of that nation not regarded) as contenting himſelfe with K the increaſe and profit of his flocks of ſheep, and heards of cattell; then, and yet alſo, the principall reuenues of the Tartar Kings and Princes: which haply gaue occaſion to ſome, ignorant of the manner and cuſtome of thoſe Northern nations and countries, to account them all for ſhepherds & heardſmen; and ſo alſo to haue reported of this mighty Prince, as of a ſhepherds ſon, or herdſman himſelfe: vainly meaſuring his nobility by the homely manner of his people and ſubiects, and not by the honor of his houſe, and heroical vertues, ſuch as were hardly to be found greater in any Prince of that or other former ages. His peaceable father now well ſtricken in yeres, and weary of the world, deliuered vp vnto him (not yet paſt 25 yeres old) the gouernment of his kingdom, ioyning vnto him two of his moſt faithfull counſellors, Odmar and Aly, to aſſiſt him in the gouernment of his ſtate (retiring himſelf vnto a ſolitary life, the more L at quiet to ſerue God, and ſo to end his dayes in peace:) which two his truſty ſeruants & graue councellors he dearely loued whilſt they liued, and much honored the remembrance of them being dead. The firſt proofe of his fortune & valor, was againſt the Muſcouit, for ſpoyling of a city which had put it ſelfe vnder his protection, and for entring of his country, and for proclaiming of war againſt him: whom he in a great battel ouerthrew, hauing ſlain fiue and twenty thouſand of the Muſcouites footmen, and between fifteen and ſixteen thouſand horſemen, with the loſſe of ſcarce eight thouſand horſmen and foure thouſand footmen of his owne. After which battell he beholding ſo many thouſands of men there dead vpon the ground, was ſo far from reioycing thereat, that turning himſelfe to one of his familiars, he lamented the condition of ſuch as commanded ouer great armies, commending his fathers quiet courſe of life, M acounting him happy in ſeeking for reſt, and the other moſt vnhappy, which by the deſtruction of their owne kind, ſought to procure their owne glory; proteſting himſelfe euen from his heart to be grieued to ſee ſuch ſad tokens of his victory. With this ouerthrow the Muſcouit diſcouraged, ſent Embaſſadors to him for peace, which vpon ſuch honourable conditions as Tamerlane honourably deſcended.

The cauſe why ſome haue reported him to haue beene a ſhepheard or heardſman.

A pleaſed him to ſet downe, was by him granted, and ſo the peace concluded. Now the great Cham of Tartaria (his fathers brother) being grown old, and out of hope of any mo children, mooued with the fame of his nephew, after this victory ſent him diuers preſents, and withall offering him his onely daughter in mariage, and with her to proclaime him heire apparant vnto his empire, as in right he was, being his brothers ſonne, and the daughters not at all ſucceeding in thoſe empires. Which ſo great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and ſo the mariage was afterwards with great triumph at the old Emperors court ſolemnized, and he proclaimed heire apparant vnto that great empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being euer after this mariage by the old Emperour his vncle, and now his father in law, ſo long as he liued, notably ſupported, and after his death ſucceeding him alſo in that ſo mighty an empire. Yet B in the mean time wanted not this worthy prince the enuious competitors of theſe his ſo great honors: inſomuch, that whilſt by the aduice and perſuaſion of the old Emperor, he was taking in hand to make warre againſt the great King of China (who had as then gone far beyond his bounds) and ſo was now well onwards on his way, he was by the conſpiracy of Calix (a man of greateſt power & authority in the great Cham his court) almoſt thruſt out of his new empire: Calix with a right puiſſant army hauing already ſeized vpon the great city of Cambalu, and the citizens alſo generally fauouring thoſe his traiterous proceedings, as diſdaining to be gouerned by the Zagatian Tartar. For redreſſe whereof, Tamerlan was enforced with the greateſt part of his army to returne, and meeting with the rebell (who then had in his army fourescore thouſand horſe, and an hundred thouſand foot) in a great and mortall battell (wherein of the C one ſide and of the other were more than fifty thouſand men ſlain) ouerthrew him (though not without the great danger of his own perſon, as being ther himſelf beaten down to the ground) tooke him priſoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which ſo dangerous a rebellion, with the death of the traytor, and the chiefe of the conſpirators repreſſed, and his ſtate in the newneſſe therof by this victory well confirmed, he proceeded in his intended war againſt the great king of China; brake down the ſtrong wall, which the Chinoies had made foure hundred leagues long betwixt the mountaines, for the repreſſing of the incurſions of the Tartars, entred their country, and meeting with the King, leading after him three hundred and fifty thouſand men (whereof there were an hundred and fifty thouſand horſemen, and the reſt on foot) in a great and dreadful battell, with the ſlaughter of ſixty thouſand of his men, ouercame him, and took D him priſoner: whom for all that he (in the courſe of ſo great a victory wiſely moderating his fortune) ſhortly after ſet again at liberty; yet ſo, as that hauing before taken from him the one halfe of his kingdome, and therein left Odmar his truſty lieutenant, with a ſufficient power for the reſtraining of the proud king, if he ſhould again begin to raiſe any new ſtirs; and withall impoſed ſuch other conditions as pleaſed himſelfe, with the yerely tribute of three hundred thouſand crownes, he well prouided for the aſſuring of thoſe his new conqueſts: and ſo in triumph returned with victory vnto the old Emperor his father in law at Cambalu, not a little glad to ſee both him and his daughter, who had in all thoſe wars ſtill accompanied him. But leauing him, now thus by birth great, by his fortune greater, but by his vertue greateſt of all, (as able now to draw after him almoſt the whole power of the Eaſt) let vs again return thither E from whence we haue for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digreſſed.

Tamerlane marries the daughter and heire of the great Cham of Tartary.

The war againſt the Turkiſh Sultan Bajazet (as is aforeſaid) by Tamerlane reſolued vpon, he ſent Axalla the great captain to his countrey of Sachetay (called of ſome Zagaty) to giue beginning to the aſſembling of his forces from all parts; to the end, that with the firſt of the ſpring he might ſet forward for the reliefe of ſo many diſtreſſed Princes, and the abating of the pride of ſo great and mighty a tyrant as was Bajazet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian Emperour, his vncle and father in law, an hundred thouſand footmen, and fourescore thouſand horſmen, hoping to haue as many mo from Sachetay his owne countrey, beſides the lords that for his honors ſake would accompany him in that his ſo honourable an expedition, from whom he made account alſo of 50000 men more which they would bring to F him, and diuers other great ſupplies which he expected from other places alſo, wherewith he doubted not well to performe what he had ſo honorably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Othoman pride: for which and other ſuch like, he was (as he would oftentimes ſay) by God himſelfe appointed: ſo taking his leaue of the old Emperor his father in law, and of the princes his wife (then left behind him for the comfort of her aged father) he departed from Cambalu towards Samarcand, the place of his birth and ſeat of his empire; leauing behind him the forces brought from the great Emperour his vncle, to come after him to Ozara, where he had appointed the generall meeting of his army. At which time among other Princes that thither brought or ſent their ſupplies, the great Muſcouite being requeſted ſo to do, promiſed to ſend him fifteen thouſand horſe, with a certain ſum of mony, and leaue for his army to paſſe through ſo much of his territories as ſhould be neceſſary: all which he afterwards performed vnto Tamerlane, being glad that he did ſet vpon others, rather than on himſelfe, and that ſo great a preparation ſhould fall vpon them, whoſe greatnes was as dreadfull and dangerous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almoſt at that time being aſtoniſhed at the ſudden greatnes of this Othoman King, and the happy ſucceſſe he had in all his wars: not the leaſt cauſe that moued Tamerlane to oppoſe himſelf againſt him, deeming it much better to go and ſet vpon him in his new conqueſts, than to ſtay vntill he therein ſetled, were come neerer to him, and ſo ſhould debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his damage. A good and ſound reſolution: firſt in that it tended to the deſtruction of the enemies country; & then, that if any thing ſhould fall out with him otherwiſe than well, his countrey ſhould not thereby receiue any ſuch aſtoniſhment, as if the daunger were neerer or within the bowels of the ſame. Now in the mean time that Tamerlan lay at Samarcand, Axalla the great captaine & Tamerlan his lieutenant general, had aſſembled all the army at Ozara. Wherof Tamerlan vnderſtanding, ſent for him to Samarcand, to confer with him about the ſetting forward of his army. For although he were ſtil acompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no body in compariſon of Axalla, whoſe ſound counſell had woon him ſuch credit with his Lord & maſter, as by his aduice he did all things, and without him nothing: which his ſo great authority & fauor with his Prince, wanted not the enuy of the court, but that his great vertues, and rare ſound courteſie (in ſo great fortune) together with ſo many worthy ſeruices as he had done, ſupported him againſt the malice of the ſame. He by the commandement of Tamerlane, leauing the charge of the army at Ozara, with the prince of Thanais, another of Tamerlanes great captains, came himſelfe to Samarcand, and there at large diſcourſed with him, about the eſtate and order of his army. And ſhortly after, departing with Axalla and the reſt from Samarcand, for to go to Ozara the place where all his army met, being come thither, entred into a great conſultation with his moſt expert captains, about the taking of his journy, and conducting of his army: as whether it were better to lead the ſame by the coaſts of the Muſcouit directly towards Capha, or els on the other ſide of the Caſpian ſea, by the skirts of Perſia: where after long diſcourſe, and ſundry opinions with their reaſons deliuered, it was reſolued (although the way were the longer) to paſſe by the Muſcouit, ſo to come to the Georgians, & to Trebizonda, and from thence to enter into the Othoman King his countrey. And ſo ſetting forward from Ozara, he came at length to Maranis, where he ſtayed three days looking for the forces which Prince Odmar ſhould ſend him from China, not long before by him conquered: whereof he there receiued newes, and there cauſed his army to be paid, and a generall muſter thereof to be taken. He had alſo there news of the aid the Muſcouit did ſend him: and cauſed an infinite quantity of victuals, & moſt part of his furniture to be conueied by the Caſpian ſea, being a great commodity and eaſe to his army, which marching by land, was of neceſſity to paſſe ſome twenty leagues through places deſtitute both of victuals and water. Tamerlane al the way coaſting along the ſea ſhore, paſſed the time in hunting, his army not comming neer him by 10 leagues, which was ſo great, that it extended it ſelfe full twenty leagues. Comming to the riuer of Edel, he ſtayed at Zarazich whileſt his army paſſed the riuer at Mechet, and two other bridges which he had cauſed to be made for that purpoſe. Now the Circaſſians & Georgians, hearing of the approch of Tamerlane with his huge army, by their embaſſadors offred him all the help and aſſiſtance they could, in his journey as he paſſed that way. Theſe Georgians were and yet are Chriſtians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greek emperors and afterwards ſomtimes tributaries, & ſometimes confederats vnto the Perſians, but alwaies enemies vnto the Turks, by whom of late (and in our remembrance) but eſpecially by Amurath the third, they together with ſome part of the Perſian kingdome, haue bin grieuouſly oppreſſed, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtory may appeare. Of theſe warlike people, glad of Tamerlane his comming for the repreſſing of the Turk, Axalla drew great numbers vnto the ſeruice of his Prince: who not a little eſteemed of them, being all tall men, very beautifull, of great ſtrength

A and courage, and withall moſt expert ſoldiers;as hauing oftentimes reſiſted the power of the Othoman Kings, by reaſon of the aduantage their countrey affordeth them, being very rough and hard to come into. By theſe kind people, Tamerlane was in euery place honorably entertained, and his great army with all neceſſaries plentifully relieued. In paſſing through which country,and the reſt as he marched,he took ſuch order with his ſoldiers,that none of the people whereby he paſſed,were any thing by them iniuried ; inſomuch that if a ſoldier had taken but an apple, or other thing of like value from any man,he died therefore, ſo ſeuere were his commands. It is reported that one of his ſoldiers,hauing taken a little milke from a country woman,and ſhe thereof complaining,he cauſed the ſaid ſoldier to be preſently killed, and his ſtomacke to be ript;where the milke that he had of late drunk being found,he contented the B woman, and ſo ſent her away ; who had otherwiſe vndoubtedly died for her falſe accuſation, had it not ſo appeared. Which his ſo great ſeuerity, and in other like caſes, was of many accounted for extream cruelty : yet was it indeed the wholſom preſeruation of his army,being ſo great,as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to haue found ſufficient victuals for the reliefe thereof : whereof for all that,there was no want, either of any thing elſe neceſſary for the vſe of man,his camp being ſtill as a moſt populous and well gouerned city,ſtored with all maner of things:whereunto both artificers and merchants,from far countries reſorted with their commodities & merchandiſe,as to ſome famous mart;and the country people,without feare, from euery place brought in their country commodities,for which they receiued preſent money, and ſo in ſafety again departed. So marching on,he at length came to Bachichich,where C he ſtaid to refreſh his army eight daies,and there again took a generall muſter therof,wherein were found(as moſt write)foure hundred thouſand horſe,and ſix hundred thouſand foot;or as ſome others that were there preſent affirme, three hundred thouſand horſemen, and fiue hundred thouſand foot of all nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pay,and as his manner was,made vnto them an oration,informing them of ſuch orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obſerue the ſame:with much other military diſcipline,whereof he was very curious with his captaines. At which time alſo,it was lawfull for euery common ſoldier to behold him with more boldnes than on other daies,foraſmuch as he did for that time, and ſuch like,lay aſide his imperiall maieſty,and ſhew himſelfe more familiar vnto them.

The number of Tamerlane his great army.

Now could he hardly be perſuaded, that Bajazet hauing ſubdued the moſt part of Grecia, D diſtreſſed the Greeke Emperour, and ſo great means to recouer whatſoeuer he ſhould loſe in Aſia, would be ſo aduenturous as to come ouer the ſtreits out of Europe,to try the fortune of a battell with him ; but warily rather protract the time, to weary him at length with wants, that in a ſtrange country drew ſuch a world a people after him. Wherein he found himſelfe much deceiued:for hauing paſſed the Georgian country, and being come to Buyſabuich, Axalla (whom he had not ſeene in eight dayes before,becauſe he led the head of the army) came vnto him with ſuch news as he knew would be right welcome vnto him : which was,that Bajazet had raiſed his ſiege of Conſtantinople (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new conqueſts in Aſia:and that he was certainly reſolued,to come to a day of battell,not ſo much truſting vnto the multitude of his army, as to the valour and experience of his ſoldiers,being E all men of long well trained vp in the wars. At which vnexpected newes, Tamerlane greatly reioyced:yet without inſolency or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of ſuch a one as iudged the euents of battell to be (as they are) alwayes doubtfull : ſaying ſometimes, that a ſmall number well conducted,did oftentimes carry away the victory from the confuſed multitude.
Three dayes he ſtayed at Buyſabuich, and cauſed his ſouldiers continually to march forward, which at Garga and Chiuſerig paſſed ouer the riuer Euphrates:which he did the rather to maintaine his army vpon the ſpoyle of the enemy,in attending his comming, than vpon himſelfe,or his allies. All the cities that yeelded vnto him by the way as he marched,he fauourably receiued;the other that refuſed to ſubmit themſelues to his obedience,he vſed with all extremity:ſpecially the great and ſtrong city of Sebaſtia,where certain of the forerunners F of his army were by the Turks there in garriſon cut off and ſlaine, and the gates of the city as it were in contempt of him, ſet wide open : wherewith Tamerlane offended, ſent out certaine of his Tartarian horſemen,commanding them on paine of his diſpleaſure, ſo to beare themſelues againſt their enemies,as that he might at his comming either find the city taken,or the gates thereof ſhut againſt him : for he had his men at ſo great command,that no danger was vnto them more dreadfull than his diſpleaſure, neither did he puniſh any thing ſo ſeuerely as cowardiſe: inſomuch, that if in his diſport of hunting the wilde beaſt, any did for feare giue way to the Lyon or Beare, and ſlew him not, was ſure therefore to die himſelfe: and to turn his backe vpon the enemy, was no leſſe danger than to run vpon his owne death. Now the Turks in garriſon at Sebaſtia, ſeeing theſe Tartarian horſemen marching towards the City, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, iſſued out for to meet them; where they were ſo furiouſly charged by theſe few horſemen, that they were glad to retire, and for haſt to ſhut part of their owne men out of the city, leaſt the enemy following them at their heeles, ſhould haue entred the gates together with them. Which Turkes ſo ſhut out, were by the Tartarians ſlaine at the gates of the city. Shortly after came Tamerlane with all his army, and ſate downe before the city, where he lay ſtill ſeuen dayes, not making ſhew of any violence at all; the defendants becauſe the city was of great ſtrength, all that while thinking that hee had intended by long ſiege to diſtreſſe the ſame, and the more, becauſe of his long lying ſtill. But about the eight day, the walls and towers of the city in many places vndermined, were ſuddenly ouerthrowne, leauing large breaches for the enemy to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the city diſmayed, forthwith yeelded the city to Tamerlane, in hope ſo to haue ſaued their liues: but hee (as the Turks report) being entred the City, commanded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the City, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition, to be throwne into the ſame, and there buried quick. Which done, the City was by his commandement vtterly raſed alſo. After that, calling vnto him Malcozzius, the Gouernour of the City, whom he had for that purpoſe only ſpared, he commanded him to go and tell his Maſter what was happened to his ſtrong City of Sebaſtia, and what he had there himſelfe ſeene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Bajazet, was by him demanded, whether of the two armies he thought bigger or ſtronger: for now Bajazet had aſſembled a mighty army of three hundred thouſand men, or as ſome report of three hundred thouſand horſmen, and two hundred thouſand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius hauing before craued pardon, anſwered, That it could not be, but that Tamerlane might in reaſon haue the greater number, for that he was a Commander of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Bajazet offended, in great choller replyed, Out of doubt, the ſight of the Tartarian hath made this coward ſo afraid, that he thinketh euery enemy to be two.

A ſhepheard more happy than Bajazet.

Moſt of the Latine hiſtories report, that when Tamerlane had taken Sebaſtia, he put all the men to the ſword, and bringing the women and children into the fields without the city, there ouer-ran them with his horſmen, excepting ſome few which were reſerued for priſoners. As alſo that Bajazet there loſt his eldeſt ſon Erthogrul (of ſome called Orthobules) whoſe death with the loſſe of the city, ſo much grieued him (as it is reported) that marching with his great army againſt Tamerlane, and by the way hearing a country ſhepheard merrily repoſing himſelfe with his homely pipe, as he ſate vpon the ſide of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; ſtanding ſtill a great while liſtning vnto him, to the great admiration of many, at laſt fetching a deep ſigh, brake forth into theſe words: O happy ſhepheard, which haddeſt neither Orthobules not Sebaſtia to loſe: bewraying therein his owne diſcontentment; and yet withall ſhewing, That wordly bliſſe conſiſteth not ſo much in poſſeſſing of much, ſubiect vnto danger, as injoying in a little, contentment deuoide of feare. Howbeit the Turkes themſelues reporting the taking of Sebaſtia, ſpeake not of Orthobules at all, but giue him loſt ſix yeares before, in the warres againſt Caſi Burcaniden, and lyeth buried by his father at Pruſa. In this City of Sebaſtia was loſt twelue thouſand Turkes, men, women, and children, as their Hiſtories report. The reſt of the Cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the deſtruction of Sebaſtia, yeelded themſelues for feare of like danger: the citiſens whereof he courteouſly vſed, ſpecially the Chriſtians, whom he ſet at liberty, in reſpect of Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, whom he ſeemed wholly therein to gratifie. But hee had not done farre into the Turks dominion, but that he was certainly aduertiſed, how that Bajazet with a great army was comming againſt him; and now within thirty leagues of him: which cauſed him after that time, to march with his army more cloſely. Axalla leading the Vantgard, ſent forth Chianſon Prince of Ciarchan, with foure thouſand Parthian horſemen, to get knowledge of the Turks army, and where Bajazet lay, as alſo what countrey that was

A was beyond Sennas; and if he could learne any thing thereof, to make relation of it vnto him.
This Prince of Ciarcan was Tamerlanes neere kinſman, a man of great reputation, & next vnto Axalla, in whoſe abſence he had the commanding of the avantgard, his charge; who alſo ſent before him another Parthian captaine with 500 horſemen. So he had not ridden ten leagues, but that he heard news of Bajazets comming, & hauing ſurpriſed Sennas, vnderſtood there the certain eſtate of the Turks army, which was then at Tataia, and ſo marching forward. Whereof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire from that place, vntil he did ſee the arriual of the enemy, and thereof to giue him aduertiſement euery houre; being himſelfe reſolued to paſſe on no further, as come to a faire large plain, and a country of aduantage for the order of his battel: for he knew that his army was far greater than Bajazets, & therefore he made choice B of thoſe great plains. Yet for that his army conſiſted of diuers nations, and withal conſidering that he was not to fight againſt the Chinois, a ſoft effeminat people, (as of late) but againſt the Turks, a moſt warlike nation, & wel acquainted with all maner of fights & martial ſtratagems, he thought it good to be well aduiſed how he proceeded againſt them. Wherfore he preſently ſent for Axalla, with him to view the ſaid place, and to haue his opinion, Whether it would be for his aduantage or not, there to ſtay? who not miſliking of the choice of the place, yet aduiſed him alſo to keepe Sennas ſo long as he poſſibly could: and ſo ſent word vnto them that were therein, vpon the approch of the enemy to ſet fire vpon the ſame, and ſo to withdraw themſelues from thence, to the end that the enemy ſhould not haue any deſire to incampe there, but come ſtil farward neere to thoſe plains where Tamerlane deſired to fight, eſpecially C for that he was ſtronger in horſe than Bajazet. Thus the Turks ſtill marching on, thought to haue ſurpriſed ſome of their enemies in Sennas; who as ſoon as they drew neere, retired all, excepting ſome hundred left of purpoſe to fire the town: who hauing performed the ſame, retired of purpoſe in great diſorder. Now the Prince of Ciarcan had diuided his forces into two parts, & giuen commandment to the firſt, that as ſoon as they perceiued the enemies to purſue the hundred horſe that ſo diſorderly of purpoſe fled, they ſhould receiue them, and ſo retyre all together. He in the mean time with the reſt of his power ſtood cloſe in a valley, neere to a wood ſide, vnſeen at all. Where hauing ſuffered 2000 of the enemies horſe (the vantcurriers of the Turks army) to paſſe by him, he following them in the taile, charg'd them home, the other which before retired, now turning vpon them alſo: ſo that the Turks ſeeing themſelues thus beſet, D and hardly laid vnto both before and behind, as men diſcouraged fled: in which flight moſt of them were ſlain, and the reſt taken priſoners. This was the firſt encounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians: all the priſoners there taken, were by the Prince as a preſent ſent to Tamerlane, & among the reſt the Baſſa of Natolia who led theſe troups: of whom Tamerlane earneſtly demanded, what cauſed Bajazet ſo little to eſteeme of him, as to ſhew ſo great contempt of his army, which he ſhould find ſtrong enough to abate his pride. Wherunto the Baſſa anſwered, That his lord was the Sun vpon earth, which could not endure any equall; and that he rather was aſtonied to ſee, how he from ſo far had enterpriſed ſo dangerous a journy, to hinder the fortune of his lord, in whoſe fauor the heauens (as he ſaid) did bend themſelues to further his greatnes, and vnto whom all the world ſubjected it ſelfe; and that he committed great folly E in going about to reſiſt the ſame. Vnto which ſo proud a ſpeech Tamerlane replied, That he was ſent from heauen to puniſh his raſhneſſe, & to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whoſe promiſe is to plucke downe the mighty and raiſe vp the lowly. As for thy ſelfe (ſaid he) thou haſt already felt (although I pitty thy miſhap) what the valour of my Parthian horſe is againſt thy Turkiſh: and thy maſter I haue already cauſed to raiſe his ſiege of Conſtantinople, and to looke to his own things here in Aſia. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his ſpeech, demanded, If his maſter did come reſolued to bid him battell? Aſſure your ſelfe (ſaid he) there is nothing he more deſireth; and would to God I might acknowledge your greatnes, in giuing me leaue to aſſiſt my lord at that battell. Good leaue haue thou, (ſaid Tamerlane) go thy ways and tell thy lord that thou haſt ſeen me, and that he ſhall in the battell find me on horſebacke, F where he ſhall ſee a green enſigne diſplaid. The Baſſa thanking him, ſwore, that next vnto his lord he vowed vnto him his ſeruice. And ſo returning, declared vnto Bajazet, how that he had ſeene Tamerlane, and truly reported vnto him all that he had willed him to ſay; not forgetting ouer all, to publiſh his courteſie and bounty: who beſides that he had franckely ſet him at liberty, had alſo giuen him a very faire horſe well furniſhed, although he well knew he was to ſerue againſt himſelfe. Whereunto Bajazet anſwered no more, but that he would ſhortly make G triall of him, and that he well hoped before the march were ended, to make him acknowledge his owne folly. The next day the two armies drew neere together, and incamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard ſuch noyſe of horſes, as that it ſeemed the heauens were full of voyces, the aire did ſo reſound, and euery man thought the night long, to come to the triall of his valor, and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians (a people no leſſe greedy than needy) talked of nothing but the ſpoile; the proud Parthians of their honor; and the poore Chriſtians of their deliuerance, all to be gained by the next days victory: euery man during the night time ſpeaking according to his owne humour. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp and down in the camp heard, and much rejoiced to ſee the hope that his ſoldiers had already in generall conceiued of the victory. Who after the H ſecond watch returning vnto his pauilion, & there caſting himſelf vpon a carpet, had thought to haue ſlept a while: but his cares not ſuffring him ſo to do, he then, as his manner was, called for a booke, wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and anceſtors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he vſed ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therwith vainly to deceiue the time but to make vſe thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, & declining of ſuch dangers as they by their raſhnes or ouerſight fell into. And afterwards hauing a little ſlumbred, he commanded Axalla to be ſent for, who forthwith came to him, with diuers other great lords and captains the chiefe commanders of his army: with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the battell, he mounted on horſebacke himſelfe, & ſent euery one of them to their own charges, to put the ſame in readines. At which very inſtant he I receiued news, that the enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battell: whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee, that ſo accordingly he might marſhal his own. And hauing cauſed 3000 horſemen to aduance forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in ſuch places as he had foreſeen to be fitteſt for his aduantage. Now ſeeing the Ianizaries march in a ſquare battell in the midſt, and vpon the two fronts two great ſquadrons of horſemen, which ſeemed to be thirty thouſand horſe; and another which aduanced and couered the battalion of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himſelfe to Axalla, who was neere vnto him, ſaid, I had thought this day to haue fought on foot, but I ſee that it behoueth me now to fight on horſebacke, to giue courage vnto my ſouldiers, K to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnto me as ſoon as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thouſand footmen, fifty thouſand vpon each of my two wings, and in the middeſt of them forty thouſand of my beſt horſemen. My pleaſure is, that after they haue tried the force of theſe men, that they come vnto my auauntgard, of whom I will diſpoſe, & fifty thouſand horſe more in three bodies, whom thou ſhalt command: which I will aſſiſt with 80000 horſe, wherein ſhall be mine own perſon; hauing 100000 footmen behind me, who ſhall march in two ſquadrons: and for my arereward I appoint 40000 horſe, and 50000 footmen, who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of 10000 of my beſt horſe, whom I will ſend into euery place where I ſhall thinke needfull within my army, for to impart my commands. Ouer the firſt forty thouſand L horſe the Prince Ciarcan commanded: ouer the formoſt footmen was the Lord Synopes a Genouois, kinſman to Axalla, and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captain of great eſtimation: the Prince Axalla his owne charge conſiſted of fiue ſquadrons of horſemen. Bajazet his army being alſo both faire and great, came brauely ſtill on forwards towards their enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battell: except certain light horſemen, Scythians, Parthians, and Muſcouits, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an eſpie aduertiſed, that Bajazet hauing before giuen order for the diſpoſing of his army, was on foot in the midſt of thirty thouſand Ianizaries, his principall men of war, and greateſt ſtrength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His battell of horſe was very faire, amounting to M the number of a hundred and forty thouſand, all old ſouldiers. The Sultan of Ægypt hauing alſo ſent vnto his aid thirty thouſand Mamalukes, all very good horſemen, with thirty thouſand foot. So that his army marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe-Moone (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe ſquadrons directly followed one another) ſeemed

The great and mortall battell betwixt Bajazet and Tamerlane.

A ſeemed almoſt as great as his: and ſo with infinite numbers of moſt horrible outcries ſtill aduanced forward; Tamerlane his ſouldiers all the while ſtanding faſt, with great ſilence.

There was not poſſible to be ſeene a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpon the Prince of Ciarcan, who had commandment not to fight before the enemy came vnto him: neither could haue bin choſen a more fairer plaine, and where the skilfull choice of place was of leſſe aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the riuer on the left hand of his army, ſeruing him to ſome ſmall aduantage. Now this young Prince of Ciarcan with his 40000 horſe, was in this firſt encounter almoſt wholly ouerthrown: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entred euen into the middeſt of the Ianizaries, (where the perſon of Bajazet was) putting them in diſorder, was himſelfe there ſlaine. About which time Axlla ſet vpon them B with the auauntgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, & cut it al to pieces, and his footmen comming to ioine with him, as they had bin commanded, he faced the battalion of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themſelues for the ſafety of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue ſeene any ſcattered, but the one ſtill reſolutely fighting againſt the other. You might there haue ſeene the horſemen like mountaines ruſh together, and infinite numbers of men die, cry, lament, and threaten all at one inſtant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to ſee the euent of this ſo mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he ſent ten thouſand of his horſe to ioyne againe with the ten thouſand appointed for the arereward, and commanded them to aſſiſt him at ſuch time as he ſhould haue need of them; and at the very ſame time C charged himſelf, and made them to giue him roome; cauſing the footmen to charge alſo, ouer whom the Prince of Thanais commanded, who gaue a furious onſet vpon the battalion of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the perſon of Bajazet, who had ſuſtained a great burden. Now Bajazet had in his army a great number of mercenary Tartars, called Deſtenſes, with many thouſands of other ſouldiers taken vp in the countries of the poore exiled Mahometane Princes; in whoſe juſt quarrell, and the Greeke Emperours, Tamerlane had chiefly vndertaken that war: theſe Tartarians and other ſoldiers, ſeeing ſome their friends, and other ſome their naturall and louing Princes in the army of Tamerlane; ſtrucken with the terror of diſloyaltie, and abhorring the cruelty of the proud tyrant, in the heat of the battell reuolted from Bajazet to their owne Princes; which their reuolt much weakned Bajazets forces. Who neuertheleſſe, D with his owne men of warre, eſpecially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Chriſtian ſoldiers brought to his aid from Seruia & other places of Europe, with great courage maintained the fight: but the multitude, and not true valor, preuailed; for, as much as might be done by valiant and couragious men, was by the Ianizaries and the reſt performed, both for the preſeruation of the perſon of their Prince, and the gaining of the victory. But in the end the horſemen with whom Tamerlane himſelfe was, giuing a freſh charge, and his auauntgard wholly knit again vnto him, re-inforcing the charge, he with much adoe obtained the victory. Bajazet himſelfe wounded, and now mounted on horſebacke, thinking to haue eſcaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla: vnto whom he yeelded him ſelfe, thinking it had bin Tamerlane: who for a ſpace knew him not, but took him for ſome other great commander of the Turks. Muſa (ſirna E med Zelebi, or, the Noble) one of Bajazet his ſons, with diuers others of Bajazet his great captaines, were there taken alſo: and amongſt the reſt, George the Deſpot of Seruia, who notwithſtanding this misfortune, had that day gained vnto himſelf the reputation of a great and worthy captain, inſomuch that Tamerlane euen in the very heat of the battell maruelled to ſee him and the Seruians, with the other Chriſtians which he had brought to the aid of Bajazet, ſo valiantly to fight, ſaid vnto ſome of the captaines that were neere vnto him, See how couragiouſly yonder Religious fight: ſuppoſing them by their ſtrange attire to haue beene ſome of the Turks ſuperſtitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteouſly welcommed; but yet withall reproued, for that he had fought for Bajazet, againſt him, who was come in fauor of the Chriſtian Emperour, and the other poore F oppreſſed Princes, ſuch as the Deſpot himſelfe was. Who thereunto boldly anſwered, That indeed it was not according to his duty, but according to the proſperity of Bajazet, vnto whom it ſeemed that all the world did bend: and that his own ſafety had cauſed him, though againſt his will, to take part with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excuſed; and ſo without more ado gaue him leaue at his owne pleaſure to depart.

The Prince of Ciarcan ſlaine.

Bajazet and his ſon Muſa taken priſoners.

Bajazet brought before Tamerlane, with his pride.

Bajazet alſo himſelf being afterwards brought vnto Tamerlane as a priſoner, and by him curteouſly entertained, neuer ſhewed any token of ſubmiſſion at all, but according to his proud nature, without reſpect of his preſent ſtate, preſumptuouſly anſwered him vnto whatſoeuer he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane moued, told him, That it was now in his power to make him to loſe his life. Whereunto he anſwered no more, but, Doe it: for that, that loſſe ſhould be his greateſt happines. Tamerlane afterwards demanding of him, What made him ſo proud, as to enterpriſe to bring into his ſubjection ſo noble a Prince as was the Greeke Emperour? he anſwered, Euen the ſame thing that hath moued thee to inuade me, namely the deſire of glory and ſoueraignty. But wherefore then (ſaid Tamerlane) doſt thou vſe ſo great crueltie towards them thou haſt ouercome, without reſpect of age or ſex? That did I (ſaid he) to giue the greater terror vnto my enemies. And what wouldſt thou haue done with me (ſaid Tamerlane) had it bin my fortune to haue fallen into thy hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (ſaid Bajazet) haue incloſed thee in a cage of yron, and ſo in triumph haue carried thee vp & down my kingdome. Euen ſo (ſaid Tamerlane) ſhalt thou be ſerued. And ſo cauſing him to be taken out of his preſence, turning vnto his followers, ſaid, Behold a proud and cruell man, he deſerueth to be chaſtiſed accordingly, and to be made an example to all the proud and cruell of the world, of the juſt wrath of God againſt them. I acknowledge, that God hath this day deliuered into my hands a great enemy; to whom we muſt therefore giue thanks. Which he performed the ſame day: for the battell was won at foure of the clocke, and there was yet fiue houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried; where among the reſt they found the body of the Prince of Ciarcan, dead in the middeſt of the Ianizaries; where he lay incloſed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreuenged: whoſe vntimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented, for he was his kinſman, and like enough one day to haue done great ſeruice. Whoſe dead body Tamerlane cauſed to be imbalmed, and with two thouſand horſe (and diuers of the Turks priſoners chained and tied together) to be conueyed to Samercand, vntill his comming thither. All the other dead bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at Sennas.

This great bloudy battell fought in the yaere of our Lord 1397, not far from the Mount Stella, (where ſometime the great King Mithrydates was by Pompey the great in a great battell ouerthrown) was fought from ſeuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the afternoone: victory all that while as it were with doubtfull wings, houering ouer both armies, as vncertaine where to light; vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane preuailed. Whoſe wiſedome, next vnto God, gaue that daies victory vnto his ſouldiers: for that the politicke tyring of the ſtrong forces of Bajazet, was the ſafegard of his own; whereas if he had gone vnto the battell in one front, aſſuredly the multitude finding ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, had put it ſelfe into confuſion: whereas this ſucceſſiue manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battel ſlaine, is of diuers diuerſly reported: the Turks themſelues reporting, That Bajazet there loſt the noble Muſtapha his ſon, with two hundred thouſand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer: and ſome other ſpeaking of a far leſſe number, as that there ſhould be ſlaine of the Turks about threeſcore thouſand, and of Tamerlane his army not paſt twenty thouſand. But leauing the certainty of the number vnto the credit of the reporters, like enough it is, that the ſlaughter was exceeding great in ſo long a fight, betwixt two ſuch armies as neuer before (as I ſuppoſe) met in field together.

By this one days euent is plainly to be ſeen the vncertainty of worldly things, & what ſmall aſſurance euen the greateſt haue in them. Behold, Bajazet the terrour of the world, and as he thought, ſuperior to fortune, in an inſtant with his ſtate in one battell ouerthrown into the bottom of miſery & deſpaire; and that at ſuch time as he thought leaſt, euen in the middeſt of his greateſt ſtrength. It was three days (as ſome report) before he could be pacified, but as a deſperat man ſtil ſeeking after death, & calling for it: neither did Tamerlane after he had once ſpoken with him, at all afterwards curteouſly vſe him, but as of a proud man cauſed ſmall account to be made of him: And to maniſeſt that he knew how to puniſh the haughty, made him to be ſhackled in fetters and chains of gold, and ſo to be ſhut vp in an yron cage made like a grate, in ſuch ſort as that he might on euery ſide be ſeen; and ſo carried him vp and downe as he paſſed thorow Aſia; to be of his own people ſcorned and derided. And to his further diſgrace, vpon feſtiuall daies vſed him for a footſtoole to tread vpon, when he mounted to horſe: and at other

A times ſcornfully fed him like a dog, with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the vncertainty of worldly honour, that he vnto whoſe ambitious mind Aſia and Europe, two great parts of the world, were too little, ſhould be now carried vp and downe cooped vp in a little yron cage, like ſome perillous wild beaſt. All which Tamerlane did not ſo much for the hatred to the man, as to manifeſt the juſt judgement of God againſt the arrogant folly of the proud. It is reported, That Tamerlane being requeſted by one of the Noblemen that might be bold to ſpeake vnto him, to remit ſome part of his ſeuerity againſt the perſon of ſo great a Prince; anſwered, That he did not vſe that rigor againſt him as a King, but rather did puniſh him as a proud ambitious tyrant, polluted with the bloud of his owne brother.

Now this ſo great an ouerthrow brought ſuch a feare vpon all the Countries poſſeſſed by B Bajazet in Aſia, that Axalla ſent before by Tamerlane with 40000 horſe, and 100000 foot, without carriages, to proſecute the victory, came without reſiſtance to Pruſa, whither all the remainder of Bajazet his army was retired, with the Baſſa Muſtapha: the country as he went ſtill yeelding vnto him. Yea, the great Baſſa with the reſt hearing of his comming, and thinking themſelues not now in any ſafety in Aſia, fled ouer the ſtreit of Helleſpontus to Callipolis, and ſo to Hadrianople; carrying with them out of the battell, Solyman, Bajazet his eldeſt ſonne, whom they ſet vp in his fathers place: Mahomet his younger brother preſently vpon the ouerthrow being fled to Amaſia; of whom, and the reſt of Bajazet his children, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Axalla comming to Pruſa, had the city without reſiſtance yeelded vnto him, which be rifled; and there with other of Bajazet his wiues and concubins, tooke priſoner the C faire Deſpina, Bajazet his beſt beloued wife, to the doubling of his griefe.

Pruſa taken by Axalla.

Emanuel the Greeke Emperor now hearing of Tamerlane his comming to Pruſa, ſent his embaſſadors (the moſt honorable of his court) thither before to Axalla: by whom they were there ſtayd vntill the comming of Tamerlane; who receiued them with all the honor that might be, ſhewing vnto them all his magnificence, and the order of his camp, to their great admiration: For it reſembled a moſt populous and well gouerned city, for the order that was therin, which brought vnto it plenty of all kind of victuals and other merchandiſe, as well for pleaſure as for vſe. By theſe Embaſſadors the Greeke Emperor ſubmitted all his empire, together with his perſon, vnto Tamerlane the great conqueror, as his moſt faithfull ſubject and vaſſall: which he was bound (as he ſaid) to do, for that he was by him deliuered from the moſt cruell tyrant of D the world: as alſo for that the long journy he had paſſed, and the diſcommodities he had indured, with the loſſe of his people and the danger of his perſon, could cot be recompenced but by the offer of his own life and his ſubjects; which he did for euer dedicate vnto his ſeruice, with all the fidelity and loyalty that ſo great a benefit might deſerue: beſides that, his ſo many vertues & rare accompliſhments, which made him famous thorow the world, did bind him ſo to do. And that therfore he would attend him in his chiefe city, to deliuer it into his hands as his own, with all the Empire of Greece. Now the Greeke Embaſſadors looked for no leſſe than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane; thinking that which they offered to be ſo great and delicate a morſell, as that it would not be refuſed, eſpecially of ſuch a conquering Prince as was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindneſſe and friendſhip, was the beſt bargaine E they could make therein. But they receiued anſwer from this worthy Prince, farre beyond their expectation: for he with a mild countenance beholding them, anſwered them, That he was not come from ſo far a country, or vndertaken ſo much paines, for the inlargement of his dominions, already large enough, (too baſe a thing for him to put himſelfe into ſo great danger and trauell for) but rather to win honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all poſterity for euer: And that therefore it ſhould well appeare vnto the world, that he was come to aid him, being requeſted as his friend and allie: and that his vpright meaning therein was the greateſt cauſe, that God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby bruiſed the head of the greateſt and fierceſt enemy of mankind that was vnder heauen: and now to get him an immortall name, would make free ſo great and flouriſhing a City as was Conſtantinople, go- F uerned by ſo noble and antient an Houſe as the Emperors: That vnto his courage he had always faith joyned, ſuch as ſhould neuer ſuffer him to make ſo great a breach in his reputation, as that it ſhould be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend he came to inuade the Dominions of his allies: That he deſired no more, but that the ſeruice he had done for the Greeke Emperor, might for euer be ingrauen in the memory of his poſterity, to the end they might for euer wiſh well vnto him and his ſucceſſors, by remembring the good he had done them; G That long might the noble Emperour liue, happily to gouerne his eſtate: and that before his returne he would ſo well conſider for the eſtabliſhing of the ſame, as that he ſhould not lightly fall againe into the like jeopardy, alwaies aſſuring himſelfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Eaſie it is to judge what joy theſe Greeke Embaſſadors receiued, to heare this ſo kinde an anſwer from the mouth of Tamerlane himſelfe: who rather than he would ſeeme to breake his faith, refuſed an empire offered vnto him, with one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent cities of the word. Few Princes (I ſuppoſe) would performe ſuch a part: but ſo there be likewiſe but few Tamerlanes in the world. Theſe Embaſſadors by the command of Tamerlane, were by Axalla royally feaſted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of them being ſent backe to carry theſe vnexpected news vnto the Greeke Emperor, filled both H him and all the city of Conſtantinople with exceeding joy and gladneſſe, which both he and his ſubjects in general ſpared not with bonfires and all other ſignes of joy and pleaſure to manifeſt.

And the more to ſhew his thankfulneſſe, ſhortly after by the aduice of his graue Councellors, paſſed ouer the ſtreit into Aſia, to ſee Tamerlane at Pruſa, and in perſon himſelfe to giue him thanks: who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, preſently vpon the firſt daies journy ſent the Prince Axalla to meet him, and to certifie him of the joy that he conceiued, to haue the good hap for to ſee him, as alſo to conduct him to Pruſa: where thoſe two great princes, with the greateſt magnificence that might be, met, and ſo ſpent one whole day together.
The Greeke Emperor the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much honor conducted out of the city. Now had Tamerlane himſelfe conceiued a ſecret deſire to ſee this ſo I famous a city as was Conſtantinople, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thither as a conqueror, but as a priuat perſon: which by the meanes of Axalla was accompliſhed, and he thereinto by the Greeke Emperor priuatly receiued, and with all familiarity poſſible, entertained; the Emperor ſhewing vnto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be ſeen and the other Greeke Princes deuiſing all the means they could to do him pleaſure, and them which did accompany him; who were in a manner all apparelled after the Greeke faſhion. At which time the Greeke Emperour himſelfe was curious to ſhew vnto him all the faire gardens alongſt the ſea coaſt, a league or two from Conſtantinople, and ſo priuatly conducting him, ſpent fiue or ſix daies with all the mirth that might be poſſible; Tamerlane by the way oftentimes ſaying, That he had neuer ſeen a fairer city: and that it was indeed K the city (conſidering the faire and rich ſcituation thereof) of right, worthy to command al the world. He wondred at the coſtly buildings of the temples, the faire ingrauen pillars, the high piramides, & the making of the faire gardens; and oftentimes afterwards ſaid, That he nothing repented him of his ſo long and dangerous a voyage, if it had bin only but to haue preſerued from fire & ſword ſo notable a city as that was. In the Greeke Emperor he commended greatly his mild nature and curteſie: who knowing him aboue al things to take pleaſure in faire ſeruiceable horſes, gaue vnto him thirty of the faireſt, ſtrongeſt, and readieſt, that were poſſible to be gotten, all moſt richly furniſhed; and ſent likewiſe faire Preſents vnto all the Princes and great Commanders of the army, and bountifully cauſed to be deliuered vnto them all things which he thought to be neceſſary for the army. So after many great kindeneſſes in ſhort time L paſſed, and a ſtreit bond of friendſhip made, and by ſolemne oath confirmed by theſe two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leaue of the Emperor, and returned againe to his army at Pruſa. Wherewith he now at his pleaſure without reſiſtance waſted and ſpoyled all Bajazet his dominion in Aſia, no man daring to make head againſt him.

Tamerlane goeth to Conſtantinople.

Tamerlane much delighted with the pleaſures of Conſtantinople.

The yere being now well ſpent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane diſperſed his army into diuers of the Prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, expecting ſtill when ſome of Bajazet his ſonnes or other friends ſhould make ſuit or meanes vnto him for his deliuerance, but none came: ſome fearing Tamerlane his heauy indignation, and others no leſſe dreading the fierce nature of Bajazet himſelfe, who if he had beene deliuered, was like enough (as was thought) to haue taken ſharp reuenge vpon all them which forſooke him in the late battell; and therfore neuer made M interceſſion for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day paſſing by him, ſaid vnto him, I maruell that none of thy ſons or friends either come to ſee thee, or to intreat for thee, it muſt needs be that thou haſt euill deſerued of them, as thou haſt of others: yet how thinkeſt thou, if I ſhould ſet thee at liberty, would they againe receiue thee as their Lord and Soueraigne, or not? To whom

A whom Bajazet boldly anſwered; Were I at liberty, thou ſhouldeſt well ſee, how that I want neither courage nor means to reuenge all my wrongs, and to make thoſe diſobedient and forgetfull, to know their duties better. Which his proud anſwere, made Tamerlane keepe a ſtreighter hand ouer hin.

In this great and bloudy war, wherein the Othoman Empire had almoſt taken end, the Sultan of Ægypt had (as is aforeſaid) giuen aid vnto Bajazet: which Tamerlane tooke in ſo euill part, as that he reſolued to be therof reuenged: for as he was vnto his friends of all others moſt kind & curteous, ſo was he to his enemies no leſſe terrible and dreadfull. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the leſſer Aſia, to take ſome good order with theſe his new conqueſts; and finding nothing more honorable to reſolue vpon, he reſtored vnto the poore Ma-B hometan Princes (Tachretin, Isfendiar, Germean, and the reſt before fled vnto him for refuge) all their antient inheritance, with ſomething more; as he did alſo diuers cities and countries of Natolia vnto the Greeke Emperour, for the yearely tribute of foure hundred thouſand duckats of gold, and eight hundred thouſand franks of ſiluer, which the Emperour promiſed to pay vnto him yerely. And ſo hauing inriched his army with the ſpoiles of the Othoman Empire in Aſia, he turned his forces againſt the Ægyptian Sultan, and ſo paſſing thorow Caramania, he entred into Syria, then part of the Sultans kingdome: where neere vnto Aleppo (being before yeelded vnto him) was fought betwixt them a great & mortal battel, the Sultan hauing in his army an hundred thouſand foot, and ſeuenty foure thouſand horſe: whereof there were thirty thouſand Mamalukes, accounted the beſt horſmen of the world. In which battel, Axalla
C the great captaine, with the avauntgard of Tamerlane his army, was hardly diſtreſſed, and Axalla himſelfe taken: but forthwith againe reſcued by Tamerlane: who had he not by his comming on with new forces, ſpeedily reſtored the battell, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like enough to haue made an end of his good fortune. But the victory after a long and cruell fight (wherein were foureſcore thouſand men on both ſides ſlaine) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane purſuing him by the ſpace of three leagues. After which victory, Tamerlane diuiding his army, ſent Axalla with forty thouſand horſe and fifty thouſand foot to purſue the Sultan alongſt the coaſt of Arabia: who oftentimes ſhewed himſelfe with ſome foure thouſand horſe to haue hindred Axalla, who hauing the ſmalleſt forces, followed him the neereſt. Tamerlane himſelfe in the meane time, with threeſcore thouſand horſe, and an D hundred thouſand foot, marching alongſt the ſea coaſt, had all the cities as he went yeelded vnto him; as Magata, Aman, otherwiſe called Apamea, Tortoſa, Barruto, and Nephthalin: onely the ſtrong city of Damaſco refuſed to receiue him, whereinto the Sultan had put the Prince Zamaldzin, with a ſtrong garriſon, who did what he might to haue defended the ſame: But all in vaine, for Tamerlane hauing by battery ouerthrowne a great part of the wall, by aſſault won the city, only the caſtle yet remaining, as being of a wonderfull ſtrength, and almoſt impregnable, whereinto ſuch a multitude had at the taking of the city retyred themſelues, as was not poſſible therein long to liue: who in ſhort time pinched with hunger, and many of them dead, the reſt vpon ſafegard of their liues offered to yeeld: whom for all that, Tamerlane would not receiue to mercy, to make them feele what it was to hold out againſt him: ſo that E moſt of them dying of famine, the reſt yeelded without condition, and were for their obſtinacy almoſt all ſlaine. Which his ſeuerity towards them of Damaſco, cauſed, that thirty leagues off they brought the keyes of their cities vnto him, in token of their ſubmiſſion: whom he no way moleſted, more than in contributing vnto the charge of his army. From Damaſco, he turned directly towards Ieruſalem, at which time they of the city had driuen out the Sultans garriſon, as had almoſt all they of Iudea, ſubmitting themſelues vnto Tamerlane. At Chorazin the Sultan had left ſix thouſand men in garriſon for the defence of the place, who at the firſt ſeemed to ſtand vpon their guard; but afterwards diſmaied to ſee ſo great an army before it, and that Tamerlane hauing aproched the wals, was ſet downe to haue it, they ſubmitted themſelues and found mercy. In which city Tamerlane left certaine of his men in garriſon, for the F better repreſſing of the Mamalukes, who with often incurſions troubled his army. So marching on, he himſelfe with certaine horſemen for his guard, rode to Ieruſalem to viſit the ſepulchre, ſo much reuerenced of all nations, and there to make his oblations: where he was of the inhabitants joyfully receiued, and hauing ſought out all the antiquities of that ancient city, would be conducted vnto all the places thereabouts, where Ieſus Chriſt had preached, euen as the pilgrimes doe: and comming to the ſepulchre, gaue thereunto, and the deuout there, many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to ſee him honour thoſe holy places) but of the Iewes only, who greatly blamed him for ſo doing: of whom of all others, Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accurſed of God. There had he news that the Sultan had gathered all his forces, and being come into Ægypt, was there fortifying of his cities, eſpecially the great cities of Alexandria and Caier. Tamerlane his army in the mean time by his commandment came towards Ægypt to Damiata: which ſtrong city he thought not good to leaue behind him, although he was by ſome perſuaded ſo to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in reſpect of the caſtle, as of the ſtrong garriſon that the Sultan had put thereinto: but he whoſe fortune nothing could hinder, would needs go thither: and ſo hauing commanded Axalla to ſet vpon it, followed himſelfe after with the reſt of his army. Now Axalla hauing ſummoned the city, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were moſt of them Chriſtians) the mildneſſe and courteſie of Tamerlane, as alſo who himſelfe was, and what religion he held: cauſing many of the Greeke captaines to ſpeake vnto them, and to tell them of the miſery they indured vnder the Moores and Mamalukes: ſo farre preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduenture their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the city, with all them that fauoured the Sultan. And ſo in the night taking vp armes, made themſelues maſter of one quarter of the city, and deliuered one of the gates to Axalla: wereby he entering, put all the Mamalukes to the ſword, or tooke them priſoners, and ſo gained the city. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet vpon his march, was in good hope of ſo proſperous a beginning, to find an happy end alſo of his deſignes in Ægypt. For beſides the good fortune thereof, he knew that this hauen of Damiata might ſerue him with victuals out of all the parts of Greece, as the Emperor Emanuel had promiſed him, and wherein he nothing failed him. Into which port Tamerlane hauing made his entry, left there in garriſon two thouſand of the Emperour Emanuel his ſouldiers, with a gouernour, of whom he tooke an oath for their obedience. So hauing ſtaied a ſpace at Damiata, he cauſed his vauntgard to march towards Alexandria; and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer, euen in an inſtant turned directly vnto Caire, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Sultan, who made prouiſion for the defence of Alexandria, as the neereſt vnto danger. But vnderſtanding of theſe news, vſed ſuch diligence, that he entered into the city with forty thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot, euen as Tamerlane his army approached, purpoſing in perſon himſelfe to defend it. By whoſe comming the great city ready before to haue reuolted, was againe in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires: for to remaine long before it, was impoſſible, for want of victuals for ſo great an army in the enemies Country. Yet notwithſtanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbeare to draw neere vnto it, and with all his army to encampe neere vnto the ſame, hauing cauſed a great trench to be made for to couer his horſemen, and thereby to lodge his army more ſafely: during which time he cauſed diuers onſets to be giuen, as well to try what confidence the enemy had in himſelfe, as to ſee how the people of the City, eſpecially the ſlaues (which in that populous city are infinite) were affected towards him: who certainely informed of the ſtate of the City, and the army; as glad to ſee the ſame by him ſhut vp, and the proud Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt. But thus lying ſtill at the ſiege, one day he thought it good to ſhew his army before the City, to try whether the enemy had a deſire to come to a day of battell or not: as alſo to view what forces he had, and ſo indeed to ſeeke occaſion to fight: in hope alſo, that if the Sultan did come forth with all his army into the field, ſome reuolt might happen within the city, as well by the ſlaues (vnto whom liberty was by him promiſed) as by the citizens themſelues (diſcontented with the inſolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the city with the Sultan) vnto whom he had made it knowne by certaine ſlaues (for that purpoſe fled as fugitiues out of his army into the City) how that hee was not come to hurt them, but onely for the deſtruction of the Mamalukes, both his and there enemies. But betimes ſtanding ſo in battell array, no man come forth, neither was there any tumult or ſtirre raiſed in the city, as he had expected. For the Sultan in ſo great a City well prouided of all things, was reſolued to weary him out with lying ſtill, and not to put all to the hazard of a battell. Which Tamerlane perceiuing, and ſet downe not to depart from thence but victorious, reſolued likewiſe to force him euen in his greateſt ſtrength, in the heart of his greateſt City; although it were not to be done, but with great aduen-Caire beſieged by Tamerlane.

Caire beſieged by Tamerlane.

A aduenture: ſuch confidence he had in the ſtrength & multitude of his army. Now his purpoſe was, firſt to take one of the cities (for Caire is diuided into three) & therin incamping himſelf, by little & little to aduance forward as he might, ſtil fighting with the enemy. Vpon which reſolution he commanded an aſſault to be giuen, and hauing brought his footmen to the place where he would haue them to giue the onſet (for the city was not walled, but onely fortified with ditches & trenches) he commanded the Prince of Thanais with fifty thouſand footmen, to begin the aſſault, euen in the face of the enemy; which he moſt valiantly performed, and there began a moſt terrible and cruel fight. Axalla in the mean time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greateſt forces to the place where the Prince of Thanais ſought to enter, as vnto a place of greateſt danger; ſet a compaſſe about, and vpon another quarter of B the city, with ſmall reſiſtance paſſed the trenches; where he preſently left thirty thouſand men to fill vp the ditches, and to make way for the horſemen to enter: aduancing forward himſelfe, againſt twenty thouſand ſent by the Sultan to haue ſtopt his further paſſage: the Prince of Thanais being at that ſame time almoſt beaten backe by the Mamalukes. But the way being made plain, by them that were for that purpoſe left by Axalla, and ten thouſand horſe entred, which charged vpon the backes of the Mamalukes, where the Sultan himſelfe was; and they ſeconded with ten thouſand mo ſent in by Tamerlane, following himſelf after, with al his power: the Sultan retired vnto a ſecond ſtrength, which he had made in the next city. The fight indured full the ſpace of ſeuen houres; wherein where ſlain of the Sultan his men aboue ſixteen thouſand; and of Tamerlanes betwixt ſeuen and eight thouſand. Who contented to haue diſlodged C the enemy, and gained a third part of the city, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, in hope the next day to win all the reſt, as indeed he did. For the Prince of Thanais the next day forcing the enemies trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himſelfe hardly preſſed by the obſtinat enemy, and too weake long to hold out, retired, and ſo forthwith abandoned the city, & encamped himſelfe along the ſide of the riuer Nilus, with purpoſe to paſſe the ſame, and to fly to Alexandria his ſecond ſtrength & refuge. Which Tamerlane ſuſpecting, followed after him with his horſemen (who onely were in order) and ſome few foot, hardly drawne from the city, which their fellowes were in ſpoiling; ſo as hee was glad to promiſe them eſpecially, to regard and reward their good ſeruice. Againſt whom the Sultan vpon a narrow cauſey, had oppoſed twelue or fifteen thouſand men, whom he called D his ſlaues (to fauour his paſſage) but were indeed his beſt ſouldiers, and ſtood faſt, the place ſeruing greatly for their aduantage: who for all that, at length forced by their enemies, ſtill increaſing vpon them, (though not without great loſſe) caſt themſelues into the great riuer, and made a moſt honorable retreat: euery man hauing his weapon in the one hand, and ſwimming with the other to the further bank. The Sultan flying with ſome eighteen thouſand horſe (for the reſt were ſundry waies fled or els drowned) is reported in his flight, to haue comforted his men, by telling them, that they were not men that had vanquiſhed them, but gods, there appeared in them ſo great wiſedome, force, and valor: diuers of the Mamalukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him curteouſly vſed, were of him demanded, if they would be content to ſerue him, now that their maſter was fled and gone? which they all E vtterly refuſed: whom notwithſtanding, for their fidelity, Tamerlane ſet at liberty to go againe to the Sultan: as no leſſe deſirous to be admired of his enemies for his bounty and courteſie, than feared for his force and valor. The wonderfull wealth of this ſo great and famous a city became a prey vnto his ſoldiers; who for the ſpace of foure and twenty houres had the ſpoile thereof, euery man being then by open Proclamation commanded to repaire to his quarter.
The citizens he ſet al at liberty, not ſuffering any of them to be taken priſoners: and ſo leauing ten thouſand good ſoldiers, with a great number of others (wherof he caried a great multitude in his army, planting euery where as he paſſed as it were new colonies) and carrying away with him ſuch of the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things neceſſary for the keeping of ſuch a city, he cauſed his army to paſſe ouer the riuer for to follow F the Sultan to Alexandria, to the end not to leaue his victory vnperfect: Axalla haſting before with the avauntgard, for to hinder the Sultan for joyning his forces againe together; and the reſt of his army conducted by the Prince of Thanais; he himſelfe with an infinite number of boats & ſoldiers to attend vpon him, going by water, taking great pleaſure to behold the faire riuer, and his ſwift courſe ſomtimes, & in an inſtant to become ſo calme as if it ſcarce moued.

The citizens of Alexandria hearing of his comming, and fearing what might betide them, beſought G the Sultan to haue compaſſion on their eſtate, and to withdraw himſelfe into Lybia, whither Tamerlane for the barrenneſſe of the country could not with any great power follow him, reſolued for their parts to giue place vnto fortune, and to do as the time required, and no more to reſiſt ſo great a force, whereof they had already made ſufficient triall: promiſing yet to remain in heart ſtil his, & vpon the firſt occaſion offered, to make the ſame to him appeare.

The Sultan flyeth from Alexandria.

Wherupon the Sultan ſeeing all things deſperat, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring ſome change: as alſo that Tamerlane his populous army would not long remaine there. And ſo departing out of Alexandria with teares ſtanding in his eies, oftentimes ſaid, That God was angry with him and his people, and that he muſt of neceſſity ſuffer the fatal ouerthrow of his eſtate, himſelfe hauing done as much as in him lay, according to his H charge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yet that he hoped at length to returne againe, and deliuer his people from the bondage, whereunto they muſt needs now ſubmit themſelues. Tamerlane comming to Alexandria (before yeelded to Axalla) there ſtaid a great while, ſending Axalla to purſue the Sultan, exceedingly grieued that he could not get him into his hands; and therefore ſtill fearing ſome innouation to be by him raiſed, which cauſed him to deale the more hardly with them whom he ſuſpected to fauour him. Now the bruit of theſe victories hauing with Axalla paſſed beyond Alexandria into Lybia, had brought ſuch a feare, not onely vpon the people adjoyning vnto theſe conqueſts, but alſo vpon all Affrica (they ſuppoſing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twenty of the Moore kings ſent their embaſſadors vnto him, to offer vnto him their obedience: the Sultan as a man forſaken I of fortune, ſtill flying before him. Of the neereſt of which Kings, Tamerlane tooke hoſtages: as for the other farther off, he contented himſelfe with their faith giuen, and with the other outward ſignes of their good wils.

Tamerlane deſirous to returne into his country.

Now after this long trauell and paines taken, was Tamerlane more deſirous than he had before vſed, to ſee the pleaſures of his owne natiue country: the rather thereunto moued by the requeſt of his wife, then longing for his returne; and the newes he heard of the ſicknes of the old Tartarian Emperor his father in law; beſides that, age it ſelfe began to bring vnto him a deſire of reſt: with whom alſo the deſires of his ſouldiers well agreed, as men now weary to haue run ſo many and diuers fortunes. The onely ſtay was, that he expected the comming of Calibes, an old and faithfull ſeruant of his, whom he for his good deſert had of his own accord K appointed gouernor of all his new conqueſts in Ægypt and Syria: a great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had ſo well deſerued. So mindfull was he of the good deſerts of his faithfull ſeruants, as that he needed not by others to be of they put in remembrance, were they neuer ſo far off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his army making way for him along the great riuer Euphrates, for the conqueſt of Meſopotamia, and Perſia: whoſe comming was now with great deuotion looked for of the whole army, deſirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delaied not, but being ſent for, came to Alexandria, whither the whole army was now by the commandement of Tamerlane againe aſſembled.
Vpon whoſe comming, Tamerlane departed from Alexandria, hauing there left the Prince Zamulzan (a man of great reputation) with ſix thouſand horſemen and ten thouſand L foot, as gouernour of that place; and lieutenant generall vnder Calibes: whom Tamerlane (as I haue ſaid) had now appointed to command ouer all Ægypt and Syria, together with the Countries newly conquered in Lybia and Barbary: and now conducting him vnto the great City of Caire, and there taking the beſt order hee could for the preſeruation of his new conqueſts, left him with forty thouſand horſe and fifty thouſand foot. And ſo hauing ſufficiently inſtructed him how hee would haue thoſe Kingdomes gouerned, diſmiſſed him, not like a maſter, but as a companion, ſeeming very ſorry to leaue him deſtitute of his preſence.
So ſetting forward with his Army, conducted by the Prince of Thanais, Tamerlane himſelfe, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aſide vnto Ieruſalem: Where hee remained eleuen daies, dayly viſiting the ſepulchre of Chriſt Ieſus (whom he called the God M of the Chriſtians) and the ruines of Solomon his Temple: much wondering thereat, and at Ieruſalem, the ſeat of Dauids Kingdome, and of that great Solomon: but grieued that he could not ſee them fully in their former beauty. He onely deſpiſed the Iewes, which had committed ſo cruell a murder againſt him that came to ſaue them. And to ſhew his deuotion towards

A wards the holy city commanded it to be free from all ſubſidies and garriſons of men of war; and gaue great gifts vnto the Monaſteries, and honoured them ſo long as he remained there.
Departing from Ieruſalem, he came to Damaſco: which great city, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of IeZides (accounted an arch hereticke among the Mahometans) as alſo euill affected to his proceedings, he cauſed to be raſed, and the bones of IeZides the falſe Prophet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue, before much honored, in deſpight to be filled with dung. So marching on, and blaſting the world before him as he went (for long it were and from our purpoſe, to recount all his victories) he paſſed ouer the riuer Euphrates, and hauing conquered Meſopotamia, with the great city of Babylon, and all the kingdome of Perſia, laded with the ſpoile of the world, and eternized for euer, he returned at length to B Samercand, the famous place of his birth, and glorious ſeat of his Empire.

The miſerable death of Bajazet.

Now had Bajazet (but a little before one of the greateſt Princes on earth, and now the ſcorn of fortune, and a by-word to the world) with great impatiency lien two yeares in moſt miſerable thraldom, for moſt part ſhut vp in an yron cage, as ſome dangerous wild beaſt: and hauing no better means to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines againſt the barres of the yron grate wherin he was incloſed, and ſo died about the yere of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are diuers other reports: ſome ſaying, that he died of an ague, proceeding of ſorrow and griefe: others, that he poyſoned himſelfe: and the Turks affirming, that he was ſet at liberty by Tamerlane, being by him beforehand poyſoned, whereof he died three daies after he was inlarged (a report not like to be true:) but howſoeuer it was, his end appeareth to haue beene C right miſerable. His dead body at the requeſt of his ſon Mahomet, was by Tamerlane ſent to Aſprapolis, from whence it was afterwards conueied to Pruſa, and there lieth buried in a Chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan Temple without the city Eaſtward: where alſo lies his beloued wife Deſpina, with his eldeſt ſonne Erthogrul. And faſt by in a little Chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his reigne murthered,

A compariſon betwixt Bajazet and Tamerlane.

Theſe two great and mighty Princes, Tamerlane and BajaZet, (both of them whilſt they liued, a burthen to the world) as they tooke their beginning from the Scyths or Tartars, ſo were they of like honorable progenitors deſcended: Bajazet being the fourth in deſcent from the warlike Othoman, the raiſer of his family; and Tamerlane in like degree from the great Zingis, the firſt and moſt fortunat leader of the Tartars (his countrymen) vnto the pleaſures of the D Eaſt: both Princes of great power and like ſpirit; wiſe, hardy, painefull, reſolute, and moſt skilfull in martiall affaires; but ambitious aboue meaſure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raiſed, to the aſtoniſhment of the world. Howbeit, the great vertues and other the honourable qualities of BajaZet, were in him by his cholericke and waiward nature much obſcured: which made him to exceed both in cruelty and pride: being alſo much more handfaſt than were his honourable predeceſſors. For which cauſes he was much feared and leſſe beloued of his ſoldiers and men of war in generall, and of them at his moſt need forſaken: He vſed commonly to ſay, That his treaſures were his childrens meat, and not his ſoldiers pay: which by way of reproch was by a common ſouldier caſt in his teeth, when he raged to ſee himſelfe by them forſaken in the great battell againſt Tamerlane; telling him as he fled, that he ranne not E away, but went to ſeeke his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforeſaid vertues in Tamerlane were graced with diuers other of like nature, no man being to his friends more curteous or kinde, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The ſeruice of his ſeruant he neuer forgot, either left the ſame long vnrewarded: being thereof ſo mindfull, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalfe, to be put in remembrance thereof, hauing alwaies by him a catalogue both of their names and good deſerts, which he dayly peruſed. Oftentimes ſaying that day to be loſt, wherein he had not giuen them ſomething: and yet neuer beſtowing his preferments on ſuch as ambitiouſly ſought the ſame (as deeming them in ſo doing vnworthy thereof) but vpon ſuch as whoſe modeſty or deſert he thought worthy thoſe his great fauours; ſo tempering the ſeuerity of his commands with the F greatneſſe of his bounty, as that it is hard to ſay, whether he was of his nobility and men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued: both, the great ſtaies of Princes ſtates; feare keeping the obſtinate in obedience; and loue, the dutifull in deuotion. But with Bajazet it was not ſo, who deeming all done for him but duty, and by nature cholericke and proud (after the manner of Tyrants) deſired aboue all to be of his ſubjects feared, not much regarding how

Bajazet in his poſterity more fortunate than Tamerlane.

how little he was of them beloued; not the leaſt cauſe of his great fall and miſery, and that G therein he was of his own ſo ſmally regarded: wherein for all that he is to be accounted more fortunate than the other great conqueror his enemy, hauing euer ſince in the lineall deſcent of himſelfe, had one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world to ſucceed ſtill in his kingdome and empire: as he hath euen at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great majeſty reigneth in Conſtantinople. Whereas the glory of Tamerlane his Empire, euen in his owne time growne to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatneſſe of it ſelfe, and by him diuided amongſt his ſons, ſhortly after his death decayed, rent in ſunder by ambition and ciuill diſcord; and not long after, together with his poſterity, rooted out by V.ſun Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the worlds wonder, tooke end: nothing of the huge greatneſſe thereof now or ſince then remaining, more than the fame thereof: as doth alſo the miſery of the other ſo brought low. H But leauing this mirrour of miſhap (Bajazet) vnto his reſt, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in Samarcand; let vs now proceed in the courſe of our Hiſtory, yet not forgetting by the way to remember ſuch Chriſtian Princes as then liued together with theſe two great Monarchs.

MAHOMETHES PRIMVS QVINTVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT ANNO 1405 1603

Hiſt.Turc.l.1.

Vindicibus Mahomer patrium ſibi vendicat armis Imperium, & fractas feruidus auget opes.
Quod patri abſtulerat violentia Tamberlani, Imperio reddit Marte fauente ſuo.
Ille ſagittiferoſque Dacas, validoſque Triballos Contudit, & populos Iſter amœne tuos.
Turcica ſic rurſus ſublata potentia, ſtragem Attulit imperio Romule magne tuo.

By force of armes ſtout Mahomet his fathers Kingdome gaines, And doth the broken ſtate thereof repaire with reſtleſſe paines.
What ſo the force of Tamerlane had from his father tane, He by his fortune and his force reſtor'd the ſame againe.
The Dacians he vanquiſhed, and Seruians in field,
And forc'd the people neere to thee faire Iſter, for to yeeld.
So once againe the Turkiſh ſtate (by him rais'd vp on hie) Hath to thine Empire, Romulus, brought great calamitie.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, FIFTH KING OF THE TVRKES, AND RESTORER OF THEIR SORE SHAKEN KINGDOME.

Diuers opinions concerning the ſucceſſors of Bajazet.

HOw wonderfully the Tukiſh kingdome was by the violence of Tamerlane ſhaken, and the majeſtie thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Hiſtories of that time, as well thoſe of the Greeks, as of the C Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the ſucceſſors of Bajazet, their late vnfortunate King. Some writing, that he had two ſons, Orchanes (otherwiſe called Calepinus) and Mahomet: and that Calepinus in the ſecond yeare of his reigne was ſlaine, and his kingdome poſſeſſed by Mahomet his brother. Others reporting, that Bajazet had two ſons, namely, Calepinus and Muſtapha: and that Calepinus ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, when he had reigned ſix yeres, died, leauing behind him two ſonnes, Orchanes and Mahomet: and that Orchanes being young, was ſlaine by his vncle: whom Mahomet in reuenge of his brothers death, afterwards ſlew, and poſſeſſed the Kingdome himſelfe.
Others reckon vp ſeuen ſons of BajaZet, Ioſua, Muſulmanes, Moſes, Calepinus, Ioſua the younger, D Muſtapha and Halis; with an vncertaine ſucceſſion amongſt them alſo. This diuerſitie of opinions, full of no leſſe vncertainty; as I meane not to follow in report of this Hiſtory, ſo will I not ſpend any time in refuting the ſame, (although much might be ſaid in the matter) but leaue theſe reports, together with the hiſtory following, to ſuch credit as they ſhall hap to find with the conſiderat Readers.

The Greeke Hiſtoriographers (beſt like to know the Turkiſh ſucceſſion, as well by reaſon of their neereneſſe, as in that they were by them as their bad neighbors, ſo much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Hiſtoria Muſulmana Turcorum, diligently gathered out of the Turks own hiſtories by Io. Leunclauius (a learned Phy[illegible]an, and himſelf a great traueller amongſt them, and therefore deſeruing the more credit) do not ſo E much as name the ſucceſſion of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captiuity of Bajazet, but rejecteth them both as counterfets. But in my opinion (without prejudice to any, that vpon better reaſon may deeme otherwiſe) the great confuſion of the Turkiſh Kingdome, in ſhort time wrought by the mighty Tamerlane and his Tartars, with the ciuill diſcord and war afterwards riſing among the ſons of Bajazet, ſtriuing all as it were at once, for the reſtleſſe roome of ſoueraintry, which ſuffereth no partners; and euery one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand vpon ſome one part or other thereof, and bearing himſelfe therein for a time as a King, in countries ſo far diſtant, neither leauing, vntill they had like the earth-borne brethren, wrought one anothers deſtruction, might giue juſt occaſion of ſuch diuerſity of reports as is before ſpoken of, concerning the ſucceſſion of that time, in that troubled and rent Kingdome: F ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome, ſuch as neuer were, to haue ſucceeded in the gouernment, and ſo vntruly augmenting the number of the Turkiſh Kings. Wherefore leauing Calepinus & Orchanes vnto them that firſt found them, with that little, which without any good ground and leſſe probability is written of their ſuppoſed reigne; I (following the authority of the Turkiſh hiſtory) reckon this Mahomet one of the yongeſt ſonnes of BajaZet (of whom we are now to intreat) fifth king of the Turks:who after great and dangerous wars as well againſt G his own brethren, as his forreine enemies, was at length ſolely inueſted in the Turkiſh Kingdome, about ten yeares after the captiuity of his father Baiazet, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

The true poſterity of Bajazet.

Bajazet after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, hauing laid vp the hope of his poſterity in the common treaſure-houſe of nature, rather than in the body of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubins ſeuen ſonnes, Ethogrul, otherwiſe called Orthobules, Emer-Solyman, Muſtapha-Zelebi, (that is to ſay, the noble) Iſa-Zelebi, Muſa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Caſan-Zelebi.
Of whom Orthogrul the eldeſt was loſt in the wars againſt Caſi Burchaniden, as is before ſaid in the life of Bajazet. Muſtapha was ſlaine in the great battell againſt Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Cuſan the youngeſt was a child in Baiazet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his ſiſter Fatime deliuered as hoſtages, by their brother Solyman, H vnto Emanuel the Emperor of Conſtantinople, where they both happily became Chriſtians, and ſo ſhortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Baſſa Preſident of Baiazet his Councell, and other great captains, conueyed out of the battell againſt Tamerlane, into Europe, and ſo by them at Hadrianople ſaluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the ſame battell to Amaſia in Capadocia, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Iſa hearing of his fathers captiuity, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tattars, ſeiſed vpon Pruſa a city of Bithynia, the ancient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings, with the country adjoyning, and there reigned as a King. Muſa-Zelebi was taken priſoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards ſet at liberty by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more ſhall be ſaid in this hiſtory following. I

Mahomet gouernour of Amaſia.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeares old when his father Baiaſet in the vnfortunate battell of mount Stella was taken priſoner, and was at the ſame time by his appointment Gouernour of Amaſia, with a great part of Capadocia adjoining: which places became ſo troubleſome after the great victory of Tamerlane, that the Turks in that country were glad day and night for the ſafegard of themſelues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: in ſo much that many of them wearied with thoſe troubles, & deſpairing of better times, went into voluntary exile, becauſe they would not ſee ſo great miſeries: which thing much grieu'd yong Mahomet. Wherfore calling vnto him his moſt faithful counſellors, to conſult what courſe to take in the midſt of ſo many dangers, it was by generall conſent thought beſt (for ſo much as they could not without apparant danger continue neere vnto Tamerlanes forces) to get themſelues K further off into places of more ſtrength, & from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themſelues with ſuch aduantages as occaſion and chance of war might miniſter; cutting them ſhort by policy, whom they were not able to meet in the plain field, and ſo by little and little to weaken or weary their mighty ſtragling enemies.
For albeit that Tamerlane himſelfe was not neere him, as then lying in Caria; yet did the Captains of his great and victorious army, at their pleaſure ſpoile and forrage the countries far and neere all ouer the leſſer Aſia. Vpon this reſolution he with all his forces departed from Amaſia, [illegible] Derby in Paphlagonia: where by the way he incountred with Cara Iahia a nigh kinſman to the Prince Iſfendiar of Caſtamona, his enemy; whom he put to flight with great ſlaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomets good fortune. From thence he went to Keredén, L Mahomet ſendeth Spies into Tamerlane his Campe.

and there ſtaying certaine daies, ſent a ſpy into Tamerlanes campe, to ſee how all things went there: and afterwards entred again into councel with his captains, concerning his further proceedings. In which conſultation ſome were of opinion, That it was beſt for him to withdraw himſelfe into the mountains of the leſſer Aſia, as a place of good ſafety, vntill the departure of Tamerlane, which was ſhortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought, that Tamerlane would with his huge army purſue him in that mountaine country, flying from hil to hil, and as it were from ſtrength to ſtrength. Others better aduiſed, thought thoſe mountains to be no places to truſt vnto, and therefore that it were more honorable, and as free from danger, for him to turn again into Amaſia, and there to liue amongſt his ſubjects, protecting them in ſuch ſort as he might, and not to leaue them for a prey to euery ſtragling company of the rude Tartarians: M which councel he followed, as moſt reaſonable; and being ready to ſet forward, the ſpy before by him ſent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him that he had ſeen his father Baiaſet in good health in the Tartars Campe, but could not by any means ſpeake with him, by reaſon of the ſtreight guard ſet ouer him: and that all that part of Aſia was by Tamerlane poſſeſſed, poſſeſſed, who then with his army wintred in Caria and Lyſia: whereupon Mahomet returned backe againe into Amaſia; where he had not long ſtayed, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian Princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunate blacke King) was with an army of twenty thouſand comming to ſpoyle his country, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled: wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his forces for the ſafegard of his country, he ſent before a ſpy to diſcouer the enemies doings. This diligent ſpy returning in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of Ægiolus in Galatia, in great ſecurity, hauing about him but a ſmall power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his army, to ſeeke after pillage abroad in the country. Mahomet taking hold of this opportunity, marched thither with great celerity, and ſuddenly ſetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himſelfe was ſhot thorow the head with an arrow and ſlaine, and his army vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to Amaſia with victory, refreſhed and rewarded his ſoldiers, yet no leſſe carefull of the ſafety of his kingdome than before.

Cara Dulet ſlaine.

Shortly after he was aduertiſed that Cubad Ogli with a great army laid hard ſiege to the city of Cæſarea in Capadocia, and was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily relieued. By taking of which city, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazarding of the whole country. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his army alwaies in readineſſe, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to Cæſaria, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before he was aware of his comming, and there ſlew moſt of his ſouldiers, and put him with the reſt to flight. After that, he returned into Cubad Ogli his Country in Pontus, and grieuouſly ſpoiled and deſtroied the ſame: at which time he alſo by force won the ſtrong caſtle Peltæ in the confines of Phrygia.

Immediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlanes Captaines (which at their pleaſure without let forraged all the countries of the leſſer Aſia, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks dominions) vpon the ſudden entred into Capadocia with an army of twenty thouſand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and ſpoyling the country before him: ſo that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountains, to hide themſelues from his fury. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly grieued, and wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Mahomet his Letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar Prince.

Whereas without any iuſt or lawfull cauſe, or any war proclaimed, you haue inuaded Our Kingdome, and ceaſe not cruelly to kill Our ſubiects, by God committed to Our protection; and to ſpoile their wealth and labours, to the great diſturbance of the Mahometan commonweale: and make no end of your malice and cruelty: you do therein quite digreſſe from the manners and lawes of the true Mahometans, or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldeſt not only be accounted, but indeed be a true Muſul-man, thou ſhouldeſt forthwith depart out of my kingdome with thine army; thou ſhouldeſt not thus ſhed the innocent blood, or without cauſe thus wrong my people: but foraſmuch as thou knoweſt not what beſeemeth thee, neither wilt liſten vnto good counſell, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpoſe, falſly perſuading thy ſelfe, this my Kingdome to be deſtitute of a lawfull inheritor, and therefore doeſt ſo great wrong and iniury vnto the defenders of the true Mahometan religion; I would thou ſhouldeſt know, that I with my ſo often victorious army will ſhortly by the power of God come againſt thee, and in plaine field according to thy deſerts chaſtiſe thee. Therefore whileſt thou yet maiſt, reclaime thy ſelfe, and proceed not too far in thine obſtinacy: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Thus much We thought good to aduertiſe thee, that thou ſhouldeſt not be ignorant of Our purpoſe, but mighteſt ſo better conſider and diſpoſe both of thy ſelfe and thine affaires. In the yeare after the departure of the great Prophet Mahomet 806.

Vnto which letters Inall Ogli returned this anſwer in writing:

Prince Inall Ogli, to Mahomet.

Inall Ogli his anſwer to Mahomet.

Why doeſt thou Mahomet with ſuch letters prouoke me? why doeſt thou ſo vnciuilly taunt me, being thy ſelfe but a boy, and in truth a very child? It beſeemeth thee not to haue entred into theſe countries, or to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thyſelfe with the title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt complaine, that I ſhould lie in wait or ſeeke after thy life, thy kingdome, or any thing that thine is. I challenge vnto my ſelfe this kingdome, but none of thine: out of which it is reaſon for thee, as a wrongfull intruder of thy ſelfe, to depart; whom otherwiſe I will forthwith thruſt out, and ioyne the ſame vnto the reſt of my territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and ceaſe to oppoſe thyſelfe againſt my deſignes; I denounce vnto thee all the calamities of warre, and wiſh thee with ſpeed to prepare thy ſelfe to battell, for that I meane ſhortly to meet with thee. This yeare of our great Prophet 806.

Ieall Ogli ouerthrowne by Mahomet,

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promiſe meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plain force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victory.

The like good hap he had alſo not long after, againſt Coſter Ogli and Kiupeck Ogli, two other Tartarian captains, at the caſtle of Chara chizar and the Plaine of Artuck-Oua. And hearing that one Meſites a Turke, had fortified himſelfe in the ruins of Sebaſtia, and from thence ſpoiled the country round about, he ſent Bajazet one of his Baſſa's againſt him; who in ſhort time tooke him, and brought him bound vnto him: by whom he was adjudged to die. But ſeeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death at ſuch time as he ſhould haue beene executed, moued therewith, he gaue him his pardon; for which he euer after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great ſeruice.

Mahomet hauing many times thus vanquiſhed the ſtragling Tartarian Princes, which had ſought the ſpoile of his country, became thereby famous amongſt the great commanders of Tamerlane his army; in ſo much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes eare, yet lying in the leſſer Aſia: who as he thought it not worth his greatneſſe and labor, himſelf in perſon to goe againſt ſo weake an enemy; ſo he thought it not good or conuenient, quite to neglect him, but by ſome other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpoſe he began to ſpeake many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valor and forwardneſſe in ſo tender yeres. And calling for Bajazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his ſonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore very deſirous to ſee him: where if he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, hee would beſtow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage, with many other great preferments: and therefore willed Bajazet to write vnto him, Not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himſelfe and his father. Which thing Bajazet at the firſt doubting the worſt, requeſted Tamerlane not to beleeue that of his ſon, being yet very yong, and not worthy of ſo great a fauor. Neuertheleſſe partly perſuaded by Tamerlane his proteſtations, and importuned by him that might now command him; he with an euil will wrote to his ſon Mahomet to ſuch effect as Tamerlane required. With which letters, and others of like purport for himſelf, with many rich Preſents, Tamerlane ſent Hozza Mahomet (one of his ſecret councellors) Embaſſador to Mahomet, of whom he was right honorably receiued, and likewiſe entertained. But hauing read the aforeſaid letters, and thereby vnderſtood the cauſe of his comming, he entred into councell with the great Baſſa's about him, whether he were beſt to go to Tamerlane or not. Where his Councellors were all cleare of one opinion, that it was not good for him to aduenture his perſon to the danger of ſuch a iourney, or the mercy of ſo mighty an enemy, of whoſe faith he had no aſſurance. And if ſo be (ſaid they) he therewith offended, will by force ſeeke to haue you, we at his comming will take the refuge of the woods and mountains, and there ſhroud our ſelues vntill he be departed again: for that he with his huge army cannot here long ſtay in this barren country, for want of neceſſaries. Neuertheleſſe, Mahomet hoping that his iourny might be both for the good of his father, and his own aduancement; contrary to the mind of all his councellors reſolued to go: and ſo hauing prepared all things needfull for the honor and ſafety of his iourny, ſet forward. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of Pontus, Cara Iahia whom he had before ouerthrowne, vnderſtanding of his comming that way, thinking now to be reuenged, and hauing got vnto him ſome of the Prince Iſfendiars forces, ſet vpon him by the way: but with as euill ſucceſſe as before, moſt of his men being there by Mahomet ſlain, & himſelfe glad ſhamefully to fly. So trauelling on further, he vnderſtood that Alis Beg, a great Lord in thoſe countries, went about to intercept him alſo: which cauſed him in ſuch haſt to goe on, that he was vpon Alis before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: ſo that for feare he was glad to betake himſelfe to flight. Mahomet conſidering the danger he had eſcaped in

A that journey, and that the neerer he came to Tamerlane, the more like he was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge: by the aduice of his graue and faithfull counſellors, reſolued to go no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlanes Embaſſador, he thus ſpake vnto him:

You ſee the dangers and injuries I indure in this my journy, and my minde forbodeth greater to enſue: for which cauſes I may not goe any further, but here returne. Commend me therefore I pray you vnto the moſt mighty Tamerlane, with my father; and tell them what dangers haue happened vnto me vpon the way: which conſidered, I hope they will haue me excuſed. For which purpoſe I will alſo ſend in your company an Embaſſadour of mine owne.

Mahomet his ſpeech to Tamerlanes Embaſſador.

Mahomet at that time had with him a graue, wiſe, and learned man, called Sophis Bajazet, B ſometime his ſchoolemaſter: whom he ſent Embaſſador to Tamerlane and his father, to haue him vnto them both excuſed: and ſo departed, he homewards, leauing the way he came (for feare of further danger) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably receiued Mahomets Embaſſador and letters. But taking pleaſure in the man ſent vnto him, gaue him honourable entertainment, but would neuer after ſuffer him to returne againe vnto his maſter.

It was not long after, but that old Bajazet died of impatiencie (as is aforeſaid:) whoſe dead body Tamerlane left at Apropolis with the Prince Germean, to bee deliuered vnto his ſonne Mahomet; with Muſa his elder brother (who all this while had beene kept priſoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet ſhould require him. And ſo the mighty Prince Tamerlane, after he had long time waſted Phrygia, Caria, Lydia, with the moſt part of the leſſer Aſia; and conquered C all Syria, Iudea, Ægypt, and Perſia, with many other great countries and prouinces; returned at laſt into his owne Kingdome, vnto the great city of Samarcand, which he wonderfully inlarged, and beautified with the ſpoiles of a great part of the world, before by him waſted: where he afterwards in great peace and glory raigned, no leſſe honourable than feared of all the Princes of the Eaſt. To the terrour of whom, and for the aſſuring of eſtate, he kept alwaies a ſtanding army of forty thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot ready at all aſſaies: beſide other his great garriſons which he kept in Syria, Ægypt, China, and Cambalu; as alſo againſt the Muſcouite, and Turkes; being commonly in euery place threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, though not ſtill in field, but as occaſion required. Vntill that at length hearing of the riſing againe of the Turkiſh kingdome, vnder the Othoman Princes, the ſons of Bajazet, D with whom the oppreſſed Mamalukes of Ægypt, and the Greeke Emperour (as doubtfull of his eſtate) had now alſo for feare of him combined themſelues; he by the perſuaſion of Axalla (then Generall of his imperiall army) made great preparation for a ſecond expedition to be made for the vtter rooting out of the Othoman family, and the conqueſt of the Greeke Empire. But hauing now all things in readineſſe, and alſo giuing a good beginning vnto theſe his intended conqueſts, (one of the Turks great Baſſaes being by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battell ouerthrowne, and thirty thouſand of the Turks ſlaine) he in the middeſt of theſe his great hopes, as alſo of his greateſt power, died of an ague the 12 day of Ianuary, in the yere of our Lord 1402. A little before whoſe death, appeared a great and terrible blaſing ſtar, portending as it were to the world the death of ſo great a Prince. He was a man of a middle stature, E ſomewhat narrow in the ſhoulders, otherwiſe well limmed, and of a great ſtrength. In his eies ſate ſuch a rare majeſty, as a man could hardly indure to behold them without cloſing of his owne: and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him, became dumbe; which cauſed him oftentimes with a comely modeſty to abſtaine from looking too earneſtly vpon ſuch as ſpake vnto him, or diſcourſed with him. All the reſt of his viſage was amiable and well proportioned: he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who ſhaue their heads, hauing the ſame alwaies couered: whereas he contrariwiſe was for the moſt part bare headed, commanding his ſon alſo to be ſo by his tutors brought vp: his haire was of a darke colour, ſomewhat drawing towards a violet, right beautifull to behold: which his mother comming of the race of Sampſon (as he F gaue it out) willed him to nouriſh, in token of his deſcent: the cauſe that made him to be the more reſpected of his men of war; moſt part of them beleeuing that in thoſe haires was ſome rare vertue, or rather ſome fatall deſtiny: an old practiſe of many great commanders of former ages, to fill the heads of their ſoldiers with ſome ſtrange opinion conceiued of them, to be the more of them honored; as if in them had bin ſome one thing or other more than in other men.

The great power Tamerlane continually kept.

TAMERLANES TARTARORVM IMPER. POTENTISS. IRA DEI ET TERROR ORBIS APPELATVS OBIIT ANº 1402 LAVRANCE JOHNSONN. SCVLP.

Paulus Iouius, Illuſtr. Viror. Elog.li.2.p.97.

Ille novus Xerxes, orientis victor, & ingers Quacunque permearet, horror gentium: Compleuit totos Scythico qui milite campos, Hoc ſe ferebat ore trux Tamerlanes.
Cujus in aduentum tutæ altis mœnibus vrbes, Ipſumque terræ contremiſcebat ſolum; Ipſi adeo montes, ipſa per deuia valles, Vim Barbarorum non ferebant agminum.
Quare ab Caucaſeis Aſiam conuallibus omnem, Advſque Nili flumina armis ſubdidit; Eufratem, & Tigrim, & rapidum tranauit Orontem, Vi, vaſtitate, cade, cuncta proterens.
Vtque olim fœda cum tempeſtate coorta Erumpit atra nube fulmen igneum: Obuia quaque cadens perrumpit, & alta ſonanti Templa atque ſolidas ſtrage turres diſijcit.
Subſidit vaſto tellus labefacta fragori, Humiliſque mentes ſternit humanas pauor:

Haud ſecus ille viam ferro molitus, & igni, Euertit arces, opida æquauit ſolo.
Regem Aſiæ horribili captum impete Bajazetem Caueaque clauſum ferrea circuntulit.
Hæc agitantem illum, & ſpirantem immania juſſa.
Quæ cunctus vndique orbis expaueſceret; Exigua cæcæ domitum molimine febris Fatalis vno ſoluit hora triduo.
Deque tot inſanis opibus, de tot modo regnis, Reliqua vna parvo gleba texit puluere.

In Engliſh thus:

Of Tamerlane a Xerxes new, which did the Eaſt ſubdue,
And in all places where he came, the nations ouerthrew;
That fild the fields with Scythian troupes, brought from thoſe climats cold, This was the feature and the ſhape which thou do'ſt here behold.
At whoſe approach, the ſtrongeſt townes could ſmall reſiſtance make,
The earth it ſelfe vnder his feet ſeeming for feare to quake.
The mountaines high, mating the skie, and vncouth vallies low, Vnable were the force to beare where he did come or goe.
All Aſia from mount Caucaſus, vnto the bankes of Nile, With valiant hand he vanquiſhed and made his force to feele.
Euphrates, Tygris, and the ſwift Orantes gaue him way, With force, waſte, and deſtruction great, on what he liſt to prey.
And as in tempeſts great oft times, when all things go to wracke, The fiery lightning flaſhing forth, out of the clouds ſo blacke, Doth breake downe what it lights vpon, and with a dreadfull fall O'rethrowes the Temples, with their towers, and ſtately buildings all:
So that the earth diſmaid therewith, doth lower downe deſcend, And fearefull wights wrapt vp in woe, are brought to their wits end:
In like ſort he with fire and ſword ſeeking all to confound, The ſtrongeſt caſtles, towers, and townes, laid equall with the ground.
And like a whirlewind taking vp great Baiazet away, Coupt vp in cage, ſo carried him for his diſport and play.
But whileſt he rageth thus about, and plotteth in his head Such hard commands and heauy doomes, as all the world ſhould dread:
A little feuer with three fits, oppreſſed him with woe,
And cloſing vp his vitall ſpirits, did lay his head full low.
So that for all the world of wealth and Kingdomes he poſſeſt, The ſmall remainder of himſelfe in ſimple graue doth reſt.

His great empire by himſelf diuided betwixt his ſons, was by their diſcord, & the ambition of ſome of their diſloyall ſubjects, in ſhort time after brought to great confuſion, and his poſterity vtterly rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes, the Armenian Prince, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory may appear. But to return again to our purpoſe; Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the departure of Tamerlane out of thoſe countries, determined to go to Pruſa in Bythinia, where his brother Iſa as then reigned: but vnderſtanding that Iſa had before taken the ſtraits whereby he ſhould paſſe the mount Horminius, he tooke another way about, and came to Palæo Caſtron, where the valiant captaine Eine-beg Sub-baſſa then remained: who with all honour and gladneſſe receiued him, and there for certaine daies refreſhed both him and his army. Afterwards greater forces ſtill repairing vnto him, he marched thence to Vlabad, called in antient time Lopadium. Of whoſe comming Iſa before vnderſtanding, & hauing aſſembled his army, marched thither alſo, and encamped on the other ſide of the towne towards Pruſa, ready to giue him battell. But Mahomet ſeeing his brother ſo forward, conſulted with his captaines what were beſt to be done: where Eine Sub-baſſa a man of great experience, and of late one of Baiazet his great councellors and captaines, told him, That it was not for their honours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others bloud; but to aſſay if the quarrell might by ſome other good meanes be compoſed, and they made friends. For which purpoſe, Mahomet preſently ſent letters vnto his brother Iſa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in Aſia betwixt them: offering vnto him the prouinces of Aidinia, Saruchania Germeania, Charaſia, Charamania, with other countries to them belonging: ſo that he might haue Pruſa with all the other prouinces about the ſame. Which letters, when Iſa had read, and ſaw that Mahomet offered him but titles for Kingdomes, and ſuch countries as were rather ſometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiaſet, than any part of his kingdome, and now of late by Tamerlane againe reſtored vnto their ancient liberty and gouernors, ſharing out the beſt and ſtrongeſt part thereof vnto himſelfe, he brake forth into choler, and ſaid:

The anſwere of Iſa to Mahomet his offers.

What, doth not my fathers kingdome of right belong vnto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is yet but a youth, and ſcarce crept out of the ſhell: by what right then can he claime my fathers kingdome as his inheritance? If he can by the ſword win it, let him take it, and ſo hold it.

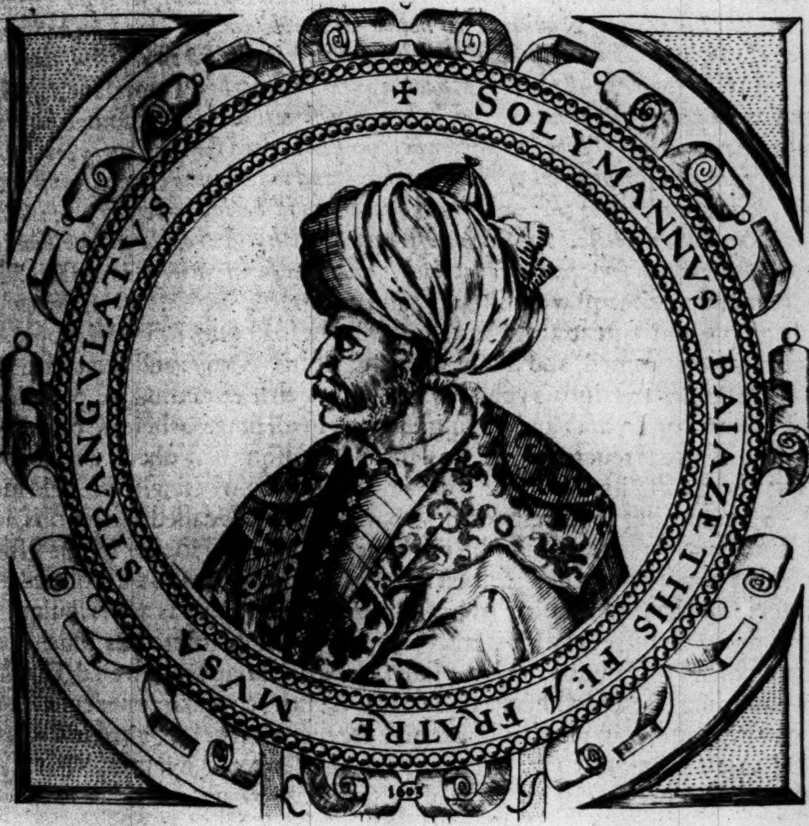
Mahomet hauing receiued his anſwere, prepared himſelfe to the field, where his brother as ready as himſelfe, ſtood, expecting his comming: and hauing ſet his army in order of battell, gaue the firſt charge: which was the beginning of a moſt cruel and bloudy fight, wherein, as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battels, many were on both ſides ſlain. At laſt the fortune of Mahomet preuailing, Iſa his army began to retire: which he ſeeing, left nothing vndone for the encouraging of his fainting ſouldiers, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant ſoldier to do; but preſſing into the thickeſt of his enemies, there with his owne hand ſlew the antient and valiant captaine Eine Sub-baſſa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Baiaſet his wars. But what preuaileth courage againſt euil fortune? Iſa muſt either fly or die. And therefore hauing done what he could in ſo deſperat a caſe, being himſelfe on euery ſide forſaken, in the end was glad himſelfe to fly to the ſea ſide: where finding a ſhip ready bound for Conſtantinople, he paſſed ouer thither in ſafety, and there yeelded himſelfe vnto the protection of the Greeke Emperor Emanuel. In this chaſe Mahomet his ſouldiers tooke the valiant captaine Temurtaſes priſoner, another of Baiaſet his great commanders, and brought him to Mahomet: who in reuenge of the death of Eine, commanded his head preſently to be ſmitten off, and his body to be hanged vpon a tree by the high way ſide. Of this victory, Mahomet certified his brother Solyman at Hadrianople, and in token thereof ſent him Temurtaſes his head. This battell was much ſpoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two brethren; and alſo for the death of the two famous and old captaines Eine and Temurtaſes, who both together as louing friends, had fortunately fought many great battels vnder Baiaſet his enſignes; and now as it were by deſtiny, and againſt their wils, without any priuate grudge, were both drawne into contrary factions and ſlaine: both whileſt they liued wiſhing a good peace betwixt the ambitious brethren. But as the Turks vſe to ſay, What is by God written in a mans forehead before his birth, cannot in his life be auoyded.

After this victory, Mahomet thinking himſelfe now in ſure poſſeſſion of all his fathers dominions in Aſia, led his army to Pruſa, where he was of the citizens joyfully receiued as their Sultan: and for his great bounty, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to Nice, and ſo to Neapolis, and there in both places was likewiſe receiued. Thither reſorted vnto him all the garriſons of Caraſina, Saruchania, and Aidinia, with other the inhabitants of thoſe countries, with all loyalty ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, with ſuch honor and reuerence as belonged to their King.

The body of Baiazet honourably buried at Pruſa.

All things thus ſorting according to his deſire in Aſia, he ſent to the Prince Germean for the body of his father Baiaſet, and for his brother Muſa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This body was by the ſame Prince at the requeſt of Mahomet, with great ſolemnity ſent to Pruſa, and there ſumptuouſly buried, with all the Turkiſh obſequies and ceremonies; the Turkiſh Alcoran or booke of their Law, being read ſeuen daies vpon his tombe. All which time great cheere was kept for all commers, and much giuen to the poore (vpon the Turkiſh deuotion) for Baiaſet his ſoule: but aboue all others, exceeding bounty was extended to the poſterity of their Prophet Mahomet, which are knowne from others amongſt the Mahometans, by the colour of their apparell, which is all greene, and not lawfull to be worne of any

A but of them: ſo that they were by the bounty of Mahomet, at that time greatly enriched. He alſo endowed the abbey which his father had there lately built, with great lands and poſſeſſions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the ſolemnity paſt, he went in progreſſe to all parts of his kingdome, and was in euery place joyfully receiued; and ſo afterward returned to Amaſia, and there in great pleaſure ſpent that ſummer. Where we will for a while leaue him, to ſee what Solyman his eldeſt brother in the meane time doth at Hadrianople: whoſe liuely countenance is by the skilfull workemans hand thus expreſſed:



SOLYMANNVS BAIAZETHIS FI: A FRATRE MVSA STRANGVLATVS 1603

Non malus es niſi te eneruet male ſuada voluptas, Quaque minus bello conuenit ingluvies.
Hoſpitio Mirxi fruitur jam Muſa Valachi: Ille tuum vigilat pronus in exitium.

IAC. BOISARDVS.

Euill art thou not, except leaud luſt do haſten on thy fall:
Or ryot, which beſeemeth not a martiall man at all.
Thy brother Muſa entertain'd by Marke to thine annoy, Doth take no reſt, but waiteth ſtill how he may thee deſtroy.

Solyman the eldeſt ſonne of Bajazet (who kept his court at Hadrianople, there peaceably reigning all this while ouer the countries which his father Bajazet ſometime poſſeſſed in Europe) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently againſt all right he had driuen Iſa out of Pruſa, and made him glad to fly to Conſtantinople: was with this his outragious dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Baſſaes and faithfull counſellers, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet againſt his brother Iſa. Wherein (ſaid he) he doth me alſo great wrong in taking vpon him the ſoueraignty ouer thoſe great dominions and countries in Aſia which of right belong to me his elder brother, and not to him the youngeſt of ſix. In reuenge of which injury and wrong, I intend in mine owue right to paſſe ouer into Aſia with a ſtrong army, and by force of armes to recouer mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwiſe come by it. Vnto which ſpeech one of his graue counſellers replyed, That in his opinion it was not the beſt courſe for himſelfe to goe in perſon into thoſe warres. For although (ſaid he) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatneſſe leſſe accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience aboue his yeares. None hath yet had to doe with him, but they haue had enough of him: yea, it is worth the noting, how politickely he hath borne himſelfe for his owne ſafety, and the ſafegard of the countries which he gouerned all the while that the great and mighty Tamerlane with his innumerable forces couered the face of the countries faſt by him: moſt part hereof, Mahomet hath now ſince his departure, againe recouered. Wherefore it were beſt for you to ſend for your angry brother Iſa, to Conſtantinople, and to make him Generall of the army you intend to ſend into Aſia againſt Mahomet. In which warres, it is not vnlike, but that one of your brethren will be loſt, whereby you ſhall haue one competitor of your kingdome the leſſe. So ſhall you afterwards with leſſe trouble ſubdue him that is left, or at leaſtwiſe pleaſe him with ſome part of that which they haue ſo mightily ſtriuen for. This counſell was of Solyman and all the reſt well liked of, and approued. So was Iſa preſently ſent for vnto Conſtantinople, and a great army leuied. Who being come to Hadrianople, was by Solyman courteouſly welcommed, and made Generall of his Army: and therewith ſhipped ouer the ſtreit of Helleſpontus into Aſia. Where at his firſt comming, he poſſeſſed the whole countrey of Caraſia or Lydia: and paſſing further, in all places where he came, was receiued of the people with great reuerence, they all promiſing him their obedience, if it were his fortune to preuaile againſt his younger brother Mahomet: wherewith he held himſelfe well contented. So comming to the city of Beg-Bazer, otherwiſe called Deſpotolis, he there wintered with his army. In which time, he with many kinde and louing letters ſtill directed to Mahomet as his younger brother, ſeemed to be glad that he was ſo well obeied and liked of by his ſubjects: and that preſuming of his loue and fauour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemy come into Aſia, to intreat with him of ſuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diſſimulation anſwered, That he was right glad of his comming; for which he needed not (as he ſaid) to make any excuſe, for that he was entered into a kingdome, in part his owne, and the reſt open before him: in token whereof he commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the meſſenger as a fauour, ſending alſo diuers rich preſents vnto his brother, with great prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries for his ſouldiers.

Good counſell.

Iſa with a great army ſent by his brother Solyman into Aſia againſt Mahomet.

But Winter paſt and the Spring come, Iſa marched with his army to Pruſa, & there ſhewed vnto the citizens the louing letters he had at ſundry times before receiued from Mahomet: and telling them that he was in good hope that they ſhould in ſhort time right well agree; requeſted to haue the caſtle deliuered vnto him, ſomtime their ſoueraigne: whereinto the better ſort of the citizens had retired themſelues, and made faſt the gates againſt him: but when he ſaw that he could by no faire words or policy gaine the poſſeſſion of the caſtle, enraged with that repulſe, he ſet fire vpon that goodly city, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother Iſa roamed vp and downe his kingdome, vſing all kindnes to ſuch as yeelded vnto him; and exerciſing no leſſe cruelty vpon ſuch as refuſed his obedience: and how that he had raſed the royall city of Pruſa: hauing gathered a ſtrong army, marched in ten daies from Amaſia to Pruſa, and by the way meeting with his brother Iſa, in a great battell ouerthrew him with all his forces. Iſa himſelfe accompanied with no more but ten perſons, fled vnto Caſtamona, Prince Isfendiar his city: who hearing of his arriuall there, entertained him with all the honor he could, in recompence of the great friendſhip he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble ſuter in his father Bajazet his court.

Pruſa burnt by Iſa.

A Mahomet comming to Pruſa, grieued exceedingly to ſee that fair city ſo deſtroyed: yet to comfort the poor citiſens, he gaue exceeding ſums of mony to be beſtowed among them, and took order for the new building of the city, and there continued certain daies himſelfe to ſee the work begun.

Iſa in the mean time hauing incited the prince Iſfendiar in his quarrell to inuade his brother Mahomet, & going thither himſelf in perſon, was by him now the third time ouerthrown and put to flight. Neuertheles he with ſome ſmall forces twice afterwards entered Mahomets dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his euill fortune, was glad at laſt to fly to the Prince of Smyrna, by whom he was both honorably entertained and comforted.

This prince of Smyrna, mooued with Iſa his pittifull complaints in ſo manifeſt a wrong, B did not only promiſe him what help he could of himſelf, but alſo by Embaſſadors ſolicited the princes of Aidinia, Sarucania, and Menteſia, to giue him aid in ſo iuſt a quarrell, for the relief of Iſa againſt his vſurping brother. Theſe princes pittying the eſtate of the diſtreſſed Prince, and mooued with the requeſt of the Prince of Smyrna, and fearing alſo the ambitious ſpirit of Mahomet; amongſt them ſent ſuch aid, that being all aſſembled together, Iſa had now twenty thouſand men in arms. Mahomet vnderſtanding of this great preparation made againſt him, and hauing raiſed a ſtrong army, thought it not beſt to expect his brothers comming into his country (where perhaps many might join themſelues vnto him, being ſo ſtrong in field) but entred into the prince of Smyrna's Country with ſuch ſpeed, that hee was vpon him and the reſt of his enemies before he was looked for; where after a great and bloudy fight he obtained of them a notable victory. C Iſa hauing loſt the battel, and therwith his hope alſo, fled into Caramania, and there in ſuch obſcuritie ended his daies, that no man can tell where or how he died. This was the end of this noble Prince, alwaies of greater courage than fortune. The Prince of Smyrna the chief author of this war, humbling himſelfe to Mahomet, obtained his fauor. The other confederat princes which gaue aid to Iſa, were ſhortly after by Mahomet for moſt part ſpoiled of their dominions. Which done, he returned with victorie to the building of Pruſa, hoping now to liue at more quiet.

Iſa flieth into Caramania, & there dieth in obſcurity.

But whilſt Mahomet after this victory dreading no danger, was in the midſt of his pleaſures at Pruſa, he was certainly aduertiſed, That his brother Solyman had raiſed a great army in Europ, to inuade him in Aſia. Vpon which aduertiſement, he furniſhed the caſtle of Pruſa with D a ſtrong garriſon, and all things needfull for the enduring of a long ſiege, and placed Iacup Beg the ſon of Firoſes, captain therein; and afterwards departed himſelf, becauſe that City (lately before burnt by Iſa) was not as yet to be defended, much leſſe to be accounted of as a place to retyre vnto, if need ſhould ſo require. From Pruſa he came to Ancyra, and from thence directed commiſſions for the taking vp of ſoldiers in all parts of his kingdom. At which time he wrot letters alſo to Doioran a Tartar prince (whom hee had many times greatly pleaſured) for aid: who preſently came vnto him with certain troups of braue horſe, promiſing him his faithfull ſeruice.

Not long after, hearing that his brother Solyman was with a puiſſant army now come ouer Helleſpontus, he conſulted with his beſt leaders, what courſe firſt to take; being himſelfe of E opinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field; deeming it great ſhame, not to offer him preſent battel: but he was by his more expert captains aduiſed to conſider, that hee was to fight againſt his eldeſt brother, of whoſe good or bad fortune he had as yet no experience: and that many ſecretly fauored his quarrel and claim, as the eldeſt ſon and right heir of his father Bajazet. Wherfore it were better for him to retyre further off into the ſtrength of his kingdom, and ſo temporiſing, to await all good opportunities that might chance (as it doth in nothing more than in martial affairs) rather than to commit all to the haſard of one battel, wherin if fortune failed him, all were then vtterly loſt. Vpon which reſolution he retired from Ancyra toward Amaſia. At which time Doioran the falſe Tartar, marching out at the other ſide of the city, fell to robbing and ſpoiling of Mahomets ſubjects as an enemy, burning the F country villages as they went. Which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he with his horſemen purſued him, and ouertaking him before he was looked for, ſlew moſt part of his men, & recouered all the ſpoil which he had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his ſoldiers: Doioran himſelf hardly eſcaping by flight. And ſo Mahomet hauing reuenged himſelfe vpon his diſſembling friend, held on his way towards Amaſia.

The caſtle of Pruſa beſieged by Solyman.

Solyman being come into Aſia, led his army towards Pruſa; where the Citiſens vnderſtanding of his comming, went out of the city to meet him, and hauing don vnto him ſuch honor and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the City. But Iacup Beg ſtood vpon his gard, and would by no means deliuer vnto him the caſtle, which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge: for which cauſe Solyman laid hard ſiege vnto it, and gaue therunto diuers ſharp aſſaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakened, many of them being ſlain, and the reſt for the moſt part wounded. Wherupon Iacup by letters ſent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things ſtood, and that the Caſtle could not long bee holden againſt the furious aſſaults of Solyman, vnleſſe it were ſpeedily relieued: vpon which news he in all haſt made toward Pruſa, returning the ſame meſſenger before him with letters to the captain of the caſtle, if haply he could find means to deliuer the ſame; wherin he highly commended him for his faithfull ſeruice, and promiſed him ſpeedy relief. This meſſenger with his letters chanced by Solymans ſoldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Baſſa, Solymans chief Counſellor, a man of a ſharp conceit, who of nothing could make ſomething; but hauing any thing to work vpon could do wonders: he hauing ſtreitly examined the meſſenger and peruſed the letters, ſuppreſſed the ſame, and preſently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the captain for that he had already done in his ſeruice: but yet foraſmuch as he could not poſſibly in time relieue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the Caſtle, and to prouide for the ſafegard of himſelfe and his Garriſon by ſuch conditions as hee could beſt obtain. Theſe counterfeit letters Alis Baſſa found means to be as cunningly deliuered to the captain, as they were craftily indited: who hauing read the ſame, and now out of all hope of relief, expecting alſo euery hour to be aſſaulted by the enemy, vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded the Caſtle to Solyman. The news whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within one daies march of Pruſa, exceedingly grieued him; but ſeeing no remedy, hee returned back again to Amaſia: whither Solyman (now poſſeſſed of the City and caſtle of Pruſa, and hauing therby got a great name in Aſia) ſhortly after came with his army, and hardly beſieged his brother in Amaſia: but ſeeing no hope to win the city, he retyred backe againe to Pruſa, and there after his wonted maner ſpent his time in ryot and exces, wherunto he was exceedingly giuen. Iacup Beg for yeelding the caſtle was afterward by Mahomet ſtreitly impriſoned, and in danger to haue bin put to death, had not the great Baſſa's become interceſſors for him.

Mahomet lying at Amaſia, was by his ſecret eſpials aduertiſed, that his brother Solyman hauing diſperſed his Army, lay in great ſecuritie, garded but with a ſmall power, paſſing his time in all voluptuous pleaſure, his common exerciſe. Whereupon hee in all haſt marched with his Army thitherwards, to haue ſurpiſed him before he ſhould be able to call together his diſperſed Forces. But when hee was come to the riuer Sangarius, hee was diſcouered by Solyman Sub-Baſſa a great Captain, whom Sultan Solyman had ſent for the taking vp of men in that ſide of the country. Who returning in all haſt, gaue Solyman knowledge of his brothers comming: with which ſudden news he was ſo diſmaied, being now of ſmall ſtrength, that for the auoiding of the imminent danger, he would preſently haue fled into Europ, had not Alis Baſſa otherwiſe perſuaded him; telling him, that if he ſhould ſo cowardly fly away, it would not only blemiſh and defame his honor, but diſcourage his friends alſo in Aſia, and incourage his enemies to purſue him perhaps vnto the gates of Hadrianople: and that therefore it were better with ſuch forces as he had to take the ſtreits of Neapolis, and ſo to ſtay his brothers further paſſage into that country, vntill ſuch time as he might aſſemble the reſt of his army. According to which good counſel, he firſt took the before named ſtreits and paſſages, whereby Mahomet was of neceſſitie to paſſe, and there ſtrongly fortified himſelf. Mahomet comming thither, with great force entred thoſe ſtreights, but was ſtill valiantly by Solyman repulſed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gaue, for that he knew himſelfe to be at that time too hard for his brother. But Solyman hauing the aduantage of the place, with little danger or loſſe fruſtrated thoſe his brothers braue attempts, although he were then a great deale the weaker. Alis Baſſa (whoſe wily head fraught with long experience, could with nothing effect great matters) in the mean time was not idle, but making Solyman before acquainted with his doings, ſent a ſecret meſſenger (one of his owne moſt truſty ſeruants) to Mahomet with Letters; certifying him, That moſt of his Nobility and great Captains had ſecretly conſpired

A conſpired to betray him into the hands of his eldeſt brother Solyman, as the vndoubted heir of his father Bajazet; and ſo with the price of his head to make their own peace and atonement with him: and that for the performance therof they had bound themſelues firſt vnto Solyman and afterwards one to another, by ſolemn oath. Which treaſon he diſcouered vnto him, with great proteſtation of his loue and good wil, as he that had a long time eaten bread and ſalt (as the Turks vſe to ſay) in his fathers court, and therfore could not but wiſh wel vnto him, being one of his Lord and maſters ſons. Theſe letters ſomthing troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit: for all that, hee ceaſed not for ſix or ſeuen daies ſpace, to giue many a hot skirmiſh for the gaining of thoſe ſtreit paſſages, but all in vain. In which time it chanced one of his ſeruants neer about his perſon, to fly vnto the enemy; which cauſed him B the more to ſuſpect all that to be true wherof Alis Baſſa had forewarned him. Which conſide-red, and that by lying there he preuailed nothing, but loſt and wearied his men (for it was all that while exceeding foul weather) and withal doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, to Amaſia. And Solyman glad alſo of his departure, retired to Pruſa, giuing order into all parts of his kingdom, for the aſſembling of a great army: but vnderſtanding that the King of Caramania had made a league with his brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to join their forces againſt him for the driuing of him out of Aſia, he forthwith drew all his forces to Ancyra, as a place of more ſafety.

Whilſt Solyman thus lay at Ancyra, it fortuned that Muſa (who had all this while remained with his brother Mahomet, ſince he was ſet at liberty by Tamerlane, though not altogether wel C pleaſed with his own eſtate) one day by way of talk thus ſpake vnto his brother: You ſee (ſaid he) how our elder brother Solyman ceaſeth not to vex and moleſt vs daily, and is not vnlike in the end to preuail againſt vs to our vtter deſtruction. Now if it might pleaſe you to giue mee leaue, I would goe to Iſendiar Prince of Caſtamona and Pontus, our brothers enemy, and of him procure ſhipping to pas ouer the Buxine ſea, into Europ; where I doubt not to find opportunitie to make ſome great innouation in that kingdom now in my brothers abſence: by reaſon wherof Solyman *ſhall of neceſſitie be driuen to leaue Aſia, to be again by you ſolely poſſeſſed; or els be brought in danger there to loſe his kingdome in Europe.
Which if it ſhall be my good hap to gain out of his hands by your ſupportation, I promiſe you faithfully to hold the ſame of you as of my Lord and Soueraign.*

This greatly pleaſed Mahomet, and therupon not long after they concluded betwixt them-D ſelues, one to ſtand faſt vnto another, and the one to help the other in what they could, during life, confirming the ſame with great ſolemnitie of their Turkiſh faith giuen & taken. Wherupon Mahomet furniſhed his brother Muſa with great ſums of mony and other needful things for the taking in hand of ſo great an enterpriſe.

Muſa thus furniſhed, taking his leaue of his brother, ſet forwards towards the prince Iſfen-diar: who hearing of his comming, met him on the way, & entertained him as a great prince.
But after that Muſa had made him acquainted with his purpoſe for paſſing into Europe, and had obtained grant of his help therein, he tooke his leaue of him for a time, and went to viſit the King of Caramania, who alſo moſt honorably entertained him, and the rather in deſpight of Solyman. But whilſt Muſa was thus paſſing the time in Caramania, it fortuned that Mark (of E ſome called Merxes) prince of Valachia, hauing his country much ſpoiled by Solymans garri-ſons; and hearing that Muſa one of Bajazet his ſonnes was with the Prince Iſfendiar, hee writ vnto him, promiſing to beſtow his daughter and heir in mariage vpon Muſa, if he would come ouer into Europ, and reuenge the wrong done vnto him by Solyman. Whereof Muſa aduerti-ſed by the Prince Iſfendiar, gladly returned out of Caramania, and was by him tranſported ouer the Euxine or black ſea, into Europe. Where the Prince of Valachia glad of his com-ming, receiued him with great honor, and according to his promiſe gaue him his daughter in mariage.

Muſa marieth the Prince of Valachia his daughter.

The fame of Muſa his comming into Europe, and of his marriage, was in ſhort time bru-ted thorow all Solyman his kingdome in Europe, and wrought ſuch effect in the minds of the F mutable vulgar people (always deſirous of nouelty) that they all as it were with one conſent ſubmitted themſelues vnto him as vnto their Lord and Soueraign: inſomuch that comming to the roial city of Hadrianople, in the abſence of his brother Solyman hee was there receiued as their King.

Muſa in Solymans abſence receiued as Hadrianople as King.

Solyman now lying at Ancira in Aſia, vnderſtanding of theſe proceedings of Muſa in Europ, and that hee was poſſeſſed of a great part of his kingdome there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherfore leauing his deputy in Ancyra, he with all his army came to the ſtreit of Boſphorus, and there of Emanuel the Greek Emperour obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore vnto him certain places before taken from him in Aſia. For his brother Muſa had ſo prouided, that he could haue no help of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his commandment all before brought ouer vnto Europ ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his arriuall in Europ, made towards him with a great power: but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now ready to join battell, many of Muſa his captains forſook him, and fled to Solyman his eldeſt brother and their vndoubted King. Which Muſa beholding, was glad to fly, and to take the ſafegard of the Woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victory, Solyman returning to Hadrianople, tooke againe poſſeſſion of his Kingdome, and there without meaſure gaue himſelfe to ryot and exceſſe, according to his wonted manner. G H

After the departure of Solyman out of Aſia, Iacup Beg (but lately before again receiued into Mahomets fauor, and now left as Solymans deputy) deliuered Ancyra, with the caſtle of Pruſa, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in Aſia, to Mahomet, who ſhortly after led his Army thorow the countries of Caraſia, Aidinia, Sarucania, Tekenſis, and Germeania, reducing them once again vnto his obeyſance: and afterwards returned to Pruſa, where hee now the ſecond time took poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdom in Aſia.

Muſa goeth againſt Solyman.

Muſa ſtil aided by the Valachian prince his father in law, gaue many great attempts againſt his brother Solyman, but was ſtill put to the worſe. At length hauing gathered ſome good ſtrength and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solyman lay; who at that time was (as his maner was) banqueting with great pleaſure in his camp, and full of wine. Inſomuch that when news was brought vnto him, that his brother Muſa was at hand with a great power, he in his drunkennes cauſed the meſſenger that brought the news to be beaten; and when he had with greater earneſtnes than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true, he commanded him to be ſlaine for troubling his mirth. But ſhortly after, Muſa was come ſo neer, that the vantcurriors of his army skirmiſhed with ſome of Solymans ſoldiers. When as Chaſis Eurenoſes one of his fathers old captains, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had skirmiſhed with part of his army. Wherof Solyman (now far in wine) had no regard, but ſaid, Good Tutor trauble mee no more: my brother Muſa dares not come ſo nigh me, but if I do but hold vp my cap he is gon. With which anſwere the old Captaine going out diſcontented, ſent in Chaſan Aga of the Ianizaries: who boldly comming to him, told him plainely of the imminent danger, and ſharpely reproued him for his intemperance and ſecuritie. With whoſe free ſpeech Solyman mooued, in great rage commanded his beard to be cut off, then no ſmall diſgrace amongſt the Turks. Chaſan preſently comming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without, This is the honor wherewith Sultan Solyman in his exceſſe rewards his moſt faithfull ſeruants. Wherfore be it known to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerue Muſa, a Prince of greater temperance and diſcretion: whoſo will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Ianizaries, (of whom he was greatly beloued) went ouer to Muſa, as did many other great Captains alſo, with their companies, mooued by his example ſo to doe. But when Solyman vnderſtood that Chaſan with moſt of the Ianizaries, & many other worthy captains, with the greateſt ſtrength of his army, were reuolted to Muſa, then faſt by, and ready to ſet vpon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute folly, and finding no other remedy now to eſcape, hee hid himſelfe vntil it was dark night; then taking horſe, accompanied only with Caratze-Beg and Cara Muchil two of his Noblemen, and one country Turk whom they had retained for their guide, thought to haue fled to Conſtantinople. This malicious Clown hauing of purpoſe led them by vnknown waies all that night, to and fro as it were in a maze, (oftentimes miſ-naming vnto them the places they paſſed by, as if they had bin in the right way) brought them in the morning to a Village not farre from the place from whence they departed the night before: and there riding a little before them of purpoſe, gaue warning vnto a ſturdy Peaſant or two of his acquaintance, That Solyman was comming after, willing them to make ſtay of him. Theſe rude country churles, with ſome others of like breed, running out with bats and ſtaues, and ſuch other homely tooles as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratze-Beg and Cara Muchil, who I K L M Solyman flieth.

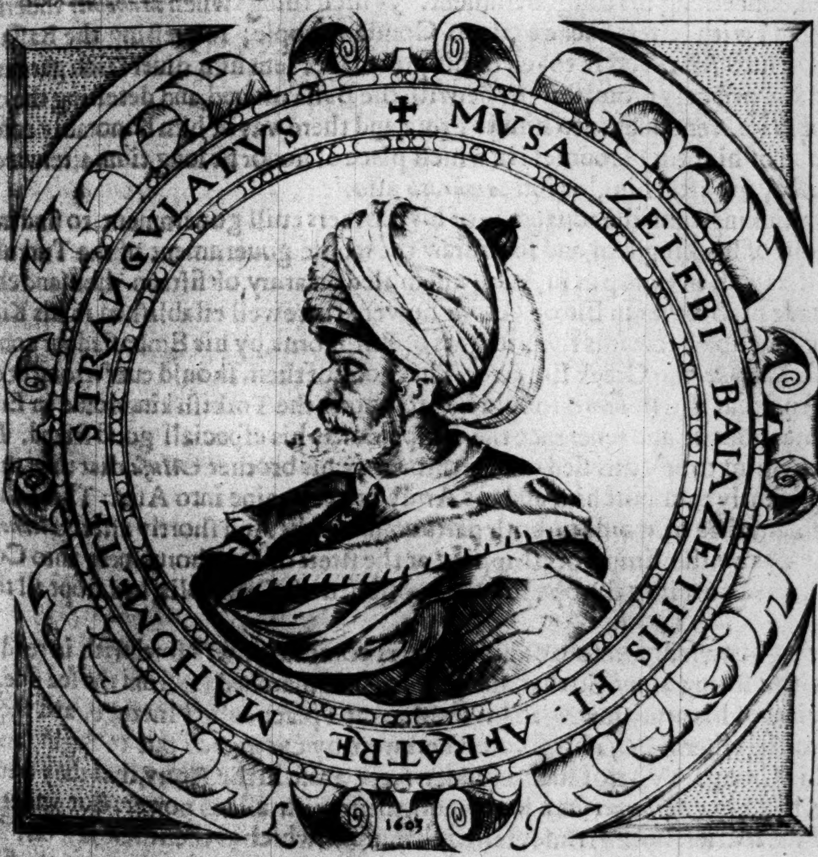
A would not yeeld vnto them, but ſtood vpon their gard, and took Solyman aliue: where, as commonly it falleth out in the vulgar peoples fury, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the wars; ſome likewiſe to burn him; and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſaue him: euery one as his rude affection led him. In the heat of this country vprore came Muſa; who glad to ſee his brother Solyman ſo hard beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when hee had reigned in Hadrianople ſix years and ten moneths.

Solyman ſtrangled by his brother Muſa. This Solyman is he whom ſome call Celebinus, & others Calepinus, and reckon him for the fift king of the Turks.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt ſon which Bajazet left aliue: a man much giuen to exceſſe, otherwiſe endued with many great vertues, being both of great valor, and exceeding bountifull. In his time liued the learned Doctor Achmetes, who wrought the hiſtory of Alexander the Great in Turkiſh verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelfe, for B which he was by him bounteouſly rewarded. The dead body of Solyman himſelfe was by the commandement of Muſa conueyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried faſt by the body of Amurath his grandfather. So now of theſe Cadmeian brethren remained none but Mahomet and Muſa; the one reigning in Aſia, and the other in Europ, diuers parts of the world, & wel bounded with the ſureſt bounds of nature: yet not ſufficient to content or contain their ambitious minds, vntill the yonger had moſt vnnaturally deuoured the elder: whoſe liuely counterfeit, as it is by the ſkilfull workman expreſſed, you may here behold.



MVSA ZELEBI BAIAZETHIS FI: A FRATRE MAHOMETE STRANGVLATVS 1603

Quid properas, inſane tuum, peſſundare fratrem?
Nam ſceleris tanti, præmia digna feres.
Quicquid enim fratri malefeceris, hoc tibi frater Mox referet, nimis hac in tua fata ruis?

Ric. Knollevs.

Why haſteſt thou, mad fool, thy brother to confound?
The guerdon of ſuch villany ſhall to thy ſelf redound.
For look what miſchief thou haſt wrought, ſhall turn to thee again:
Why doſt thou therfore, fooliſh man, ſo haſten on thy pain?

Muſa preſently after the death of his brother Solyman took vpon him the Turkiſh kingdom G in Europ: who in the beginning of his reigne diſplaced moſt of them which had borne great offices before in the time of his brother Solyman, and had now of late reuolted to him, fearing to be by them betrayed or forſaken, as his brother was; and in their rooms placed others his own creatures. And not ſo content, proceeded further, vpon ſmall cauſes moſt vnkindely to impriſon and put to death many of them which had of him wel deſerued. Which cruell dealing ſo alienated the mindes of his Nobility, that many of them kept themſelues out of the way, doubtfully expecting the euent of ſuch his tyrannical gouernment. Chaſis Eurenoſes that old and renowned captain, to eſcape his hands was glad to ſeign himſelfe blinde, ſo to abſent himſelf from court. At this time he alſo by his Embaſſadors demanded of diuers Chriſtian Princes his neighbors, ſuch tribute as they had in times paſt either payd or promiſed to pay H vnto his father Bajazet; and in that quarrell inuaded many of them, namely the Princes of Seruia and Bulgaria. Amongſt other, he ſent Ibrahim Baſſa (a learned man of great experience, and ſomtime one of his fathers graue counſellors) vnto Emanuel Palaologus the emperor of Conſtantinople, to demand the like tribute of him. Who ſo ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, from thence by letters aduertiſed Mahomet of the vndiſcreet gouernment of his brother Muſa in his new gotten kingdom; and what vntimely ſtirs hee began to make before he was therin wel ſetled, loſing the loue both of his ſubjects & neighbor princes: with much other matter concerning his miſgouernment. Which things when Mahomet vnderſtood, hee ſent a meſſenger with letters backe again to Conſtantinople, requeſting the Baſſa to come ouer vnto him into Aſia, and in token of his great fauor ſent him diuers rich garments, with I many great and princely promiſes. Wherwith the Baſſa moued, and deteſting the cruell gouernment of Muſa, went ouer vnto him to Pruſa, and there was of him honorably entertained, and ſworn one of his priuy Counſel: in which place of honor he long time afterwards ſerued him faithfully; and after him, his ſon Amurath alſo.

Mahomet thinking vpon the aduantage of his brothers euill gouernment, to find meanes to thruſt him out of his kingdom, and ſo to draw the whole gouernment of the Turkiſh empire vnto himſelf, as well in Europ as in Aſia; aſſembled an army of fifteen thouſand choice ſoldiers to inuade his brother in Europ, before he were there well eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome.
And ſo ſhocking down towards the ſtreights of Boſphorus, by his Embaſſadour concluded a League with Emanuel the Greek Emperor, That none of them ſhould euer wrong or damnifie K the other: And that if Mahomet ſhould hap to obtain the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, he ſhould alwaies honour and reuerence the Emperour as his eſpeciall good friend. But if it ſhould chance him to be diſtreſſed or ouerthrown by his brother Muſa, that then the Emperor ſhould preſently tranſport him and his Army backe againe into Aſia. This League was with great ſolemnitie of words on both parts confirmed. And ſhortly after, Mahomet with all his Army was by the Emperors ſhipping at the ſtreit of Boſphorus neer vnto Conſtantinople, tranſported ouer into Europ: for Muſa poſſeſſed of Callipolis, had ſtopt all the other paſſages.

The battell betwixt the two brethren Mahomet & Muſa.

Muſa hauing knowledge before of his brothers comming, was forthwith in readineſſe to meet him with a ſtrong army. So that Mahomet had not marched far from the ſea ſide, but that L the vantcurriers of his army met with his brothers at a place called Intzuge, and there began a light skirmiſh; wherin Muſa his fore-runners were by Mahomets put to flight, and chaſed vnto Muſa his Camp. Wherof ſuch a ſudden feare aroſe in the Army, that they were almoſt ready to fly, thinking Mahomet had been vpon them with all his power: But vnderſtanding the truth of the matter, both Armies reſted that night, which as then drew faſt on. The next day theſe two brethren, armed with equall hope, brought their Armies into the field, and gaue the ſignall of battel, wherupon began a mortall and bloudy fight; in the fury whereof Michael Ogli Baſſa of Romania, and certain other of Muſa his chiefe captains, vpon ſecret diſcontentment reuolted to Mahomet: wherwith many of Muſa his ſouldiers diſcouraged, fled.
Which Mahomet his ſouldiers ſeeing, purſued the chaſe with ſuch earneſtneſſe and fury, that M few were left with himſelfe: yet with ſuch as were left, in hope of good hap, hee ſet vpon his brother: who although he was halfe diſcomfited with the flight of the greater part of his Army, whom the enemies had then in chaſe, yet ſtood he faſt himſelfe with 7000 Ianizaries his beſt ſoldiers: ſo taking the vnexpected good hap preſented vnto him by his brothers forwardneſſe, valiantly receiued his charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ſtrength than hee had before ſuppoſed, and himſelfe too weake to withſtand the fury of the Ianizaries, becauſe moſt of his men alſo were follo ving the chaſe, was now for ſafegard of his life glad himſelfe to fly to Conſtantinople, whither he came accompanied ſcarſe with 200 men; and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the Emperour, ſpeedily ſhipped ouer into Aſia. Muſa hauing thus put his brother to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men, preſently took his tents with all that was therin, and there incamped himſelf. They of Mahomets army which had followed the chaſe of ſuch as had fled in the beginning of the battell, not knowing what had hapned to Mahomet, returned to the camp, doubting no perill; and finding it at their return poſſeſſed by their enemies, ſtood as men amaſed and vtterly diſcouraged: at which time Muſa would not ſuffer his ſoldiers to put them to the ſword, as they would faine haue done, but commanded them to be diſpoiled of their armes and ſuch other things as they had, and ſo with life ſuffered them to depart.

After this ouerthrow, whilſt Mahomet lay ſtill at Pruſa, the Prince of Smyrna forcibly entred into Aidinia, purpoſing to paſſe thorow into Saruchania. Which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great army, and entring into the Princes country, made ſuch ſpoil as he went, and ſo diſtreſſed the Prince himſelf, that he was glad to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and from thenceforth to hold his dominion of him as of his Lord and Soueraign, and ſo returned vnto Amaſia.

Mahomet could not wel diſgeſt the loſſe he had ſo lately receiued in Europ, and therfore leuied an army of choice ſoldiers out of all parts of his kingdom, once again to try his fortune againſt his elder brother Muſa. For the better ſucces wherin, hee by his letters craued ayd of the prince Dulgader Ogli; written to this effect:

Sultan MAHOMET, vnto the Prince DVLGADER OGLI, his father in Law.

MY purpoſe is to lead myne army into Romania in Europ, and there again to try my quarrel with my brother Muſa. My hope is, that you will not with your aid be wanting vnto me your ſon in Law, in my ſo great affairs, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpoſe. Fare you well.

In the year of the great Prophet Mahomet 814. From Amaſia.

Mahomets letters vnto the Prince Dulgader Ogli his father in law.

Wherunto the Prince returned this kind anſwer:

Prince DVLGADER OGLI, vnto the great Sultan MAHOMET.

IDoubt not (moſt mighty Monarch) but that whitherſoeuer your deſires ſhall draw you for the vndertaking of any great exploit, He that ruleth aboue in heauen, will be alwaies your aid, proſper your attempts, miniſter vnto you fit occaſions, and bring all your actions vnto moſt happy end, with moſt aſſured victorie. Wherfore ſeeing (God ſo diſpoſing our affairs) I cannot my ſelfe in perſon come vnto you with my power, and giue you my truſty help in this your intended war: yet will I in no caſe fail with all ſpeed to ſend my ſon your ſeruant, to aid you with our Forces in this war. Fare you well.

This ſame year of our Prophet 814.

Prince Dulgaders anſwer to Mahomet.

And ſo ſhortly after, the Prince ſent vnto him his ſon, according to his promiſe, with a company of braue ſoldiers excellently furniſhed: for the welcomming of whom, Mahomet his brother in law made a great and royal feaſt; and there in his mirth gaue vnto the yong Prince the rich apparel he wore himſelf, with the horſe he rode vpon, and all the rich plate of gold & ſilver wherin they were ſerued at that feaſt, a matter of great valu. And to euery one of his Nobles he gaue a rich garment made for that purpoſe, with ſome other gift as a fauor: and afterwards gaue them all to vnderſtand, That he intended forthwith to paſſe ouer into Europ, and there to recouer all his fathers kingdom, or els there to end his days: as for the ſpoil and prey (ſaid he) it ſhal be theirs that can win it; one horſe, one ſword, one horſemans mace ſhall content my ſelf. So hauing furniſhed his army with all things needfull for ſo great an enterpriſe, he ſet forward and came to the ſtreight of Boſphorus, and from thence gaue knowledge of his comming to the Emperor of Conſtantinople: who glad thereof (for the diſpleaſure hee G bare to Muſa) tranſported him and all his army ouer that ſtreit into Europe, and there in one of his country palaces royally feaſted him. At which time Mahomet requeſted the Emperour to join with him in that war againſt their common enemy: but he excuſed himſelf by reaſon of his great age; yet neuertheles aſſiſted him with certain companies of valiant Chriſtians, whoſe ſeruice afterward ſtood the Turk in great ſtead.

So Mahomet taking his leaue of the Emperor, marched with his army to the riuer Wyzen in Thracia, where by the way he receiued letters from the antient captain Chaſis Eurenoſes, ad-uiſing him to be very circumſtant in his marching, and not to make too much haſt to join bat-tel with his brother: counſelling him alſo, if he could by any means, to allure Iegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forſake his brother, and to follow his enſignes; for that in thoſe men H conſiſted Muſa his chiefeſt ſtrength: and promiſed in good time to come vnto him himſelfe alſo, if he were not too haſty. This meſſenger that brought this newes, Mahomet bountifully rewarded, and ſo ſent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching toward Hadrianople, part of the enemies army began to ſhew it ſelfe vnder the leading of Cara Calile, and was preſently charged by Michael Ogli and put to flight. So holding on his way to Hadrianople, he laid ſiege to the city: where the citiſens ſent out to him certain of their graueſt and moſt ſubſtan-tiall Burgeſſes, to certifie him, that by reaſon of the gariſon there left by Muſa, they conld not as then deliuer the city vnto him; but if it ſhould pleaſe him to go and try his fortune in the field againſt his brother, who ſhould be the commander therof, he ſhould find them ready to follow his good fortune, and to yeeld themſelues, the city, and all therin, to his pleaſure, if it I were his good hap to carry away the victory. With which anſwer Mahomet contenting him-ſelfe, raiſed his ſiege, and took the way toward Zagora. In that place Muſa is reported to haue come ſecretly diſguiſed into Mahomets camp, and to haue taken ful view thereof; but perceiuing himſelf too weak to incounter his brother, withdrew his army into the ſafegard of the great woods and ſtrong places; and ſo from thence retyred with his army toward Philippopolis, and ſo marched along the riuer Meritze, called in antient time Hebrus: where Iegides Baſſa, with HamZa Beg and Iſmir Ogli (three of Muſa his great captains) ſet vpon the rereward of Mahomets army, and were by Michael Ogli repulſed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to Sophia; where as he went, Muſa diuers times from the mountains made ſhew of his army, but durſt not come down into the plain to giue him battell. Mahomet hauing refreſhed his army K at Sophia, marched to Sarkiue, where he receiued Letters from Iegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all ſecretly perſuaded by old Eurenoſes to reuolt vnto him: The tenour whereof in brief was this:

Hadrianople beſieged by Mahomet.

IEGIDES BASSA, BARAC BEG, and SINAN BEG, vnto the great Sultan MAHOMET.

WE are three yong men (moſt mighty Monarch) and haue with vs three thouſand choice ſoldiers, men of incomparable valour, ſuch as the world hath ſcarſe the like: draw your forces neere to vs with as much ſpeed as you can, and you ſhall find vs ready to come ouer vnto you. Fare you well. L Wherupon he marched all the next night after, vntill hee came to the riuer Moraua, and there incamped: where the three aforenamed Captaines according to their promiſe joined themſelues vnto him with all their ſoldiers. Thither came alſo old Eurenoſes, of all others the moſt famous captain among the Turks, and now no longer blinde, bringing with him a great company of moſt expert ſoldiers. Mark the Deſpot of Seruia, for the diſpleaſure he bare vnto Muſa, ſent him aid thither alſo. By which ſupplies Mahomets army was greatly increaſed; who after he had curteouſly welcommed all theſe new come Captains, hee began again to march further, vntil he came to Coſſova the vnfortunat plain; where HamZa Beg the Prince of Smirna his ſon, hauing forſaken Muſa, came vnto him with fiue hundred horſe, certifying him that M all the Nobility had forſaken his brother. So as he marcht from place to place, his forces ſtil increaſed by the reuolt of his brothers. Muſa ſeeing his ſoldiers thus daily fall from him, inſomuch that he had almoſt none now left but the ſouldiers of the Court (which were indeed his beſt men of war, and alwaies vnto him faithfull, becauſe hee had bin euer vnto them exceeding

Muſa his chief captains reuolt to Mahomet.

A ding bountifull) thought it beſt to attempt ſomething before hee were left himſelfe alone.
Wherfore hauing yet with him 7000 of thoſe expert ſoldiers, he drew neerer to his brother, ſeeking to haue taken him at ſome aduantage. But Mahomet hauing knowledge of his purpoſe, and contented to be aduiſed by his old expert captains, had euer a vigilant eye vnto him. Yet at laſt, whether it were vpon good hope, or els prickt forward with diſpair, Muſa vpon the ſudden valiantly ſet vpon his brothers army: but his ſouldiers oppreſſed with multitude, rather than ouercome with true valor, after a hard and bloudy fight were put to the worſt. Which he ſeeing, deſperatly brake into the midſt of his enemies, ſeeking there for death among the thickeſt of them. But being known by Bajazet Baſſa, Mahomets lieutenant general, deſirous to take him aliue, he was beſet on euery ſide: where ſeeing himſelf in more danger to be taken than B ſlain, he with great coutage brake from amongſt the midſt of them and fled. In which flight his horſe falling into a deepe muddy ditch (or as ſome others ſay, hoxed by Sarutſes his owne ſeruant, and himſelf wounded) ouerthrew him, and there before he could again recouer himſelfe, was taken by Bajazet Baſſa the great Lieutenant, Michael Ogli, and Barac Beg, which had hardly purſued him out of the battel; and ſo with his hands bound, by them brought thorow the midſt of the army. Which pittifull ſight grieued not a little the hearts of many, to ſee him but euen now ſo great a King, and one of the ſons of great Bajazet, by the ſtrange change of fortune, bound like a captiue ſlaue led forth to execution: yet were moſt part glad therof; hoping this long ciuill wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came vnto him a Nobleman called Balta Ogli, ſent (as they thought) from Mahomet himſelfe; who after hee had in C few words bitterly reproued him, for the cruelty by him before ſhewed vnto his brother Solyman in like caſe, cauſed him preſently to be ſtrangled with a bow ſtring. His dead body was by and by after preſented to his brother Mahomet, who ſeeing it, ſhed a few Crocodiles teares ouer it. He reigned three years and ſeuen months, and was afterward conueyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried by the body of his brother Solyman, in the ſame chappel with his Grandfather Amurath.

Muſa taken.

Muſa ſtrangled

Mahomet after the death of Muſa now free from all competitors, took vpon him the ſole gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdom as well in Europ as Aſia. And here the Turkiſh Hiſtories begin the reign of this Mahomet fift king of the Turks; accounting the troubleſom time from the captiuity of Bajazet, vnto the death of Muſa, as a time of vacancie or anarchy, wherein the D Turkiſh kingdome, was not at any time wholly poſſeſſed by any one of Bajazets ſons: Iſa poſſeſſing one part therof, wherof he was by Mahomet diſpoſſeſſed: who afterward vſurped all that part of the Turkiſh kingdom in Aſia, being the right of his elder brother Solyman: who at that time reigning in Europ, was depoſed and ſtrangled by his brother Muſa; who was in like manner ſerued by his yongeſt brother Mahomet, the only ſonne of Bajazet then left, as is before declared.
Which diuers mutations and intrrupted ſucceſſions, was the cauſe that the hiſtoriographers do ſo greatly diſſent from the ſucceſſor of Bajazet, ſome reckoning one, ſome another; ſome more, ſome fewer; and ſome, ſuch as neuer were. But foraſmuch as Mahomet held all or moſt part of the Turkiſh kingdom in Aſia, during his troubleſome time, and in the end poſſeſſed the other part therof in Europ alſo; I reckon him for the fift King of the Turks, and E ſucceſſor to his father Bajazet: including alſo in this hiſtory of his life, all that inteſtine and ſerpentine-like tragedy, wherin he himſelfe was the principal actor.

Whilſt Mahomet was (as is aforeſaid) thus buſied in his wars in Europe againſt his brother Muſa, the king of Caramania taking aduantage of his troubles there, with a great army inuaded his kingdom joining upon him in Aſia, burning and ſpoiling all before him as hee went: Einaſes Baſſa, Mahomets lieutenant then lying at Pruſa, not able to withſtand him; and fearing his comming thither, becauſe it was the ſeat of the Othoman Kings in Aſia, he cauſed the citiſens to bring the greateſt part of their wealth into the Caſtle; whereinto he alſo receiued as many of the citiſens as he conueniently could, willing the reſt to ſhift for themſelues as they might, in ſuch caſe of extremitie. Shortly after, the King of Caramania (according to his expectation) F came to Pruſa, and without reſiſtance tooke the City, not as yet fully fortified; which he without delay cauſed the ſecond time to be burnt downe to the ground; and afterwards laid ſiege to the caſtle, giuing many great aſſaults therto by the ſpace of 30 dayes, but was alwaies valiantly repulſed by Einaſes the Baſſa, who ceaſed not continually to encourage his ſoldiers, ſtil putting them in comfort, that Mahomet hauing now ouercome his enemies in Europe,

Pruſa burnt by the Caramanian King.

Europ, would in few daies vndoubtedly come to their reliefe. It chanced at the ſame time, G that the dead body of Muſa ſent to Pruſa to be buried, was honourably conueyed vpon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian King hearing of the comming of ſuch a multitude, and fearing it to haue bin Mahomet with his power, raiſed his ſiege and ſpeedily departed. Wherat the Turks long time after ieſted, ſaying, If the Caramanian King run away for fear of the dead body of the Othoman King, what would he do if he had come againſt him aliue? But the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the ſon of Solyman (yet a boy) hauing liued at Conſtantinople euer ſince his fathers death, about this time departed thence, becauſe of the league but lately made betweene the Emperor and his vncle Mahomet, purpoſing to haue gon into Valachia: but by the way as he was trauelling, the Turkiſh voluntary ſouldiers vnderſtanding that he was the ſon of their H late King Solyman, reſorted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to ſpend their liues. Of which inſurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haſt with a great power to ſuppreſſe the ſame: of whoſe comming the ſoldiers with Orchanes vnderſtanding, diſperſed themſelues and fled. As for Orchanes, he was by his vnlawfull tutor Zaganos betrayed vnto his vncle Mahomet; who preſently cauſed his eies to be put out, and ſo ſent him to Pruſa, allowing him great reuenues to liue vpon, and euer after vſed him with great honor. The ſiſter of this Orchanes he gaue in mariage to one of his noblemen with a great dowry. This is that Orchanes whom ſome Hiſtoriographers reckon vp among the Turkiſh Kings, as one of Bajazets Succeſſors, and that he was betrayed to his vncle Moſes: erring, as I ſuppoſe, both in ſucceſſion and the name, miſtaking Moſes for Mahomet. I Mahomet inuades the Caramanian King.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the iniury which the Caramanian King had done to him in his abſence, returning to Pruſa, aſſembled a great army to reuenge himſelfe of that wrong. At which time he ſent to the prince Iſfendiar for aid, who ſent him his ſon Caſſumes. He commanded alſo the Prince Germean Ogli to make prouiſion for the victualling of his camp, as he ſhould paſſe by his country; which was accordingly don. And ſo prouided of all things neceſſary, he with his army entred into the Caramanian country: where he tooke the cities Aſpropolis, Deſpotopolis, Hierapolis, and beſieged Iconium; but by reaſon of the immoderat rain which at that time fel, hee was glad to make peace with the Caramanian King, called alſo Mahomet, and ſo raiſing his ſiege departed towards Pontus: where he had not long ſtayd, but that news was brought him, that the Caramanian King renouncing his league, was K again vp in arms: wherfore returning into Caramania, and ſo to Iconium, he there ouerthrew the King in battell, and took both him and his ſon Muſtapha priſoners: who redeemed themſelues by deliuering many of their ſtrong Cities and Caſtles into his hands: and afterward concluding a peace, they receiued from him an enſigne (as the Turkiſh manner is) in token they were now become his vaſſals.

Valachia tributary to the Turk.

The Caramanian war thus happily ended, he went ouer into Europe, and paſſing ouer Danubius, forraged the country of Valachia Tranſalpina, making there great ſpoil: for redreſſe wherof the Valachian Prince by his Embaſſadors ſent him ſuch tribute as he demanded, and his ſon alſo to ſerue him in his court. About which time hapned a great earthquake in Pruſa L and other places of Aſia, wherby many houſes and towns were ouerthrown; after which enſued great troubles in moſt parts of Aſia: howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his preſence kept all his dominions in peace and quietneſſe.

Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona and part of Pontus, reſeruing vnto himſelf Caſtamona, with a little part more of his dominion, gaue the reſt vnto Mahomet, vpon condition that he ſhould reſtore no part therof again vnto his ſon Caſſumes; who hauing long time ſerued in Mahomet his court and Wars, could not be perſuaded to returne again vnto his father, and therfore was by him thus diſ-inherited. Which great gift Mahomet thankfully accepted of, and in lieu thereof, hee aſſigned vnto Caſſumes other great and large poſſeſſions lying within his own kingdome.

M Mahomet, after the death of his brother Muſa, had ſent Scheiches Bedredin (his brothers Cadeleſcher) to Nice in Aſia, as vnto a place of exile; allowing him neuertheleſſe a great penſion wheron to liue. This Bedredin had in his houſe one Burgluzes Muſtapha his ſteward: theſe two conſulted together, how to raiſe ſome tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable gouernement of Mahomet: for which purpoſe Burgluzes (according to the plot by them laid) took his way

A way into Aidinia (ſomtime called Caria) and there pretending great zeal of reforming Religion, with wonderful grauitie began to broach diuers new and ſtrange opinions, far differing from the Turkiſh antient ſuperſtition, yet very plauſible, and well fitting the humour of the vulgar people. By which meanes hee was in ſhort time reputed for a famous learned deuout man, and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin ſome great innouation. Bedredin glad of his mans ſucces, fled from Nice, into the prince Iſfendiars country, from whence he took ſhipping ouer the Euxine into Valachia, and there withdrawing himſelf into a great foreſt, as if he had bin ſome deuout or religious man, allured vnto him a great number of out-lawes and theeues which there liued. Whom when he had ſufficiently inſtructed and framed to his purpoſe, he ſent them in the habit of religious men into the country of Za-B gora, and other places in the frontiers of Mahomets dominions neer vnto him, as his diſciples; who with great boldnes and confidence publiſhed Bedredins doctrine and authoritie, & how that he was by God appointed to be the King of juſtice, and Commander of all the World, whoſe doctrine and maner of gouernment was (as they ſaid) already receiued in Aſia, beeing ſet forth but by one of his ſchollers, Burgluzes; whoſe fame was now diſperſed throughout all the Turks dominions. And that therfore if any were deſirous of preferment, they ſhould repair to Bedredin, who would in ſhort time ſhew himſelf to the world, and promote his followers according to their deſerts. Many of the country people deluded with this phantaſie and practiſe of theſe ſeditious ſeed-men, reſorted to Bedredin in hope of preferment, & with them ſome of good calling alſo. At laſt, out of the forreſt commeth this great Prophet with ban-C ner diſplaied, attended vpon with a great multitude of the ſeditious vulgar people, which daily reſorted vnto him more and more. Mahomet for the repreſſing of theſe dangerous tumults, ſent his ſon Amurath and Bajazet the great Baſſa, with two thouſand men to apprehend Bur-gluzes in Aidinia. But when they came thither, they found him garded with three thouſand men well appointed, ready to aduenture their liues in defence of their fooliſh Prophet. Ne-uertheles Amurath and Bajazet not diſmaied with the multitude of thoſe vplandiſh people, ſet vpon them; where was fought a right bloudy battell for the number, and many ſlaine on both ſides: yet at laſt the Rebels fled, in which flight Burgluzes himſelfe was ſlain and hewne all to pieces. After which victorie Bajazet from thence haſted to Magneſia, and there executed Torlac Keman another ſeditious Turkiſh Monk, who with two thouſand by him ſeduced, D did much harm in the country therabout. At the ſame time alſo Mahomet ſent another power againſt Bedredin: but moſt of his followers ſeeing in him no ſuch matter as was by his diſciples and himſelf promiſed, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him; ſo that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him: wherby he was eaſily apprehended by them whom Mahomet had ſent againſt him: and ſo being brought to Mahomet, to Serras, was there in the market place before a tauern door fair hanged, without any further harm.

Bedredin hanged.

Mahomet in the ſhort time of his reign finiſhed the great Mahometan temple at Hadriano-ple, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Muſa: Where he alſo built a princely palace, the ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in Europ, vntil the taking of Conſtantinople. He alſo built an E other Temple, with a moſt ſumptuous Abby, and a publique ſchool therto adjoining; indow-ing the ſame with great reuenues, ſuch as had by him and thoſe his brethren of late bin taken from the Chriſtians. He alſo gaue great ſums of mony, yearly to be paid at Medina and Me-cha, for the relief of poor pilgrims trauelling from far, to the ſepulchre of their great prophet Mahomet, at Medina, or his temple at Mecha.

Shortly after, Mahomet fell ſicke at Hadrianople, and perceiuing himſelfe in danger of death, by his laſt Will appointed his eldeſt ſon Amurath to ſucceed him in his kingdom, and ſent Eluan-Beg (a man in great fauor with him) in poſt to Amaſia, to wil him with all ſpeed to repair to the Court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approch, and that he could not poſſibly liue vntill the comming of his ſon, he ſtreightly charged his Baſſa's, with all ſecrecy to F conceal his death vntill his comming, for fear leſt any trouble ſhould ariſe vpon the brute therof, before his comming thither. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, he departed out of this world vnto his prophet Mahomet, about the year of our Sauior Chriſt 1422, when he had reigned ſeuenteen years: accounting in his reign that troubleſome ten yeares next after the captiuity of Bajazet, in which time the Turkes Kingdome was by his ambitious ſons rent in ſun-

Mahomet dieth at Hadrianople ſunder(as is aforeſaid)vntil it was at length again by this Mahomet reſtored to the former in- G tegrity,about 7 years before his death,which the Turks account the whole time of his reign; and the other troubleſom 10 years as a vacancie or anarchy of their kingdom,as is aforeſaid.

The death of Mahomet cunningly concealed from the Janizaries, by the three great Baſſa's.

Mahomet being dead,the three great Baſſa's,Eiuaſes,Bajazet,and Ibrahim, to rid themſelues of the fear they had of the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court,called a Divano or coun-ſel for the wars,as if the King had bin aliue. Wherin it was pretended,that Mahomet had determined to make war vpon the prince of Smyrna, & that for that ſeruice it was his pleaſure, that the Ianizaries ſhould forthwith paſſe ouer into Aſia to the caſtle of Baga. Whereupon preſſe mony was preſently giuen them,and they ſent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of Anatolia,for the aſſembling of an army for Baga.In the mean time the great Baſſas of the court ſat daily in counſel,placing and diſplacing,promoting & diſgracing whom they plea- H ſed,as if the King had ſo commanded. The Kings phyſitians alſo,to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go to and fro with their potions and receits,after their wonted maner,as if they had had the King ſtill in cure : and letters were ſent in poſt to Eluan Beg, for ſpeedy diſpatch of the buſines for which he was ſent into Aſia. Yet for all this cunning diſſimulation,the penſioners and other ſoldiers of the court,wont to be neer the kings perſon, and ſome of them alwaies of the priuy chamber, began to ſuſpect the matter : and comming to the Baſſa's,ſaid,they maruelled the King in ſo long time did neuer ſhew himſelf,as he had alwaies before don.Wherunto the Baſſas anſwered,That he had bin dangerouſly ſick,& was as yet but a little recouered,and that therfore the Phyſitians would not ſuffer him to looke abroad or take the air,for fear of caſting him down againe. Then will wee our ſelues (ſaid the I pentioners)go and ſee his Majeſty;and with that were ready to force in vpon the Baſſa's. Ei-uaſes ſeeing their importunitie, deſired them to hold themſelues contented, and not as then to trouble the King,for that he had that day taken phyſicke ; but to morrow(ſaid he)we will requeſt his Majeſty,if he ſo pleaſe to ſhew himſelfe, that you may ſee him. Wherewith they for that time were ſatisfied. Now among the Kings phyſitians there was one Geordiron a Per-ſian,a man of a quick ſpirit and ſubtil deuice,who found means to deceiue the Pentioners:he deuiſed , that the dead body of the King beeing apparelled in royal large robes , ſhould bee brought betwixt two,as if hee had bin led,into an high open gallery ; and beeing there ſet,to haue a boy ſo neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes, as that hee vnperceiued might moue the Kings hand vp to his head,as if he ſhould ſtroke his face or beard,as his maner was. K
The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Baſſa's in his rich robes, and wrapped with cloaths about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire,or taking cold, and ſo placed in an high open gallery, as was before deuiſed, ſuddenly the phyſitian came running in,fuming and raging as if he had bin halfe mad,ready to teare his cloaths for anger, and in great choler caſting his cap againſt the ground, asked the Baſſa's if they meant to kill the King, by bringing him into the open aire ? Wee (ſaid hee) haue with great paines, in a long time a little recouered him,and will you thus fooliſhly caſt him down again.Pardon vs good doctor(ſaid Eiuaſes) for theſe gentlemen(pointing to the Pentioners)were ſo importunat to ſee his Majeſty,that to ſatisfie their deſires,he was content to be led forth of his chamber;wherof we hope ſhall enſu no harm. The pentioners ſeeing the King many times moue L his hand to his face,and as it were ſtroking his beard,held themſelues wel contented, ſuppo-ſing him to haue bin aliue,although but weak, and therefore not willing to ſpeak vnto them.
The phyſitians taking them vp amongſt them,carried him into his lodging again,which was but faſt by,making as if they had caried an extream ſick man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and forty daies,vntil the comming of Amurath his ſon.

This Mahomet was both wiſe and valiant,and withall exceeding bountifull, but ambitious aboue meaſure;who may of right be accounted the reſtorer of the Turks kingdom;for he re-couered again all thoſe Countries in Aſia,which Tamerlane had taken away and giuen to other Mahometan princes,after the ouerthrow of Bajazet. And when as the kingdome of the Turks was rent in pieces and almoſt brought to nought by ciuil wars,and the ambition of his M brethren and himſelf,he at length got poſſeſſion of the whole, and ſo left it to his ſon Amu-rath an intire kingdom,in the former greatnes,although not ſo much by him augmented.His body lieth buried in a fair tomb made of artificiall ſtone,very beautifull to behold,in a chappel on the Eaſt ſide of Pruſa ; where we leaue him at his reſt.

Lib. 1.

Europam luctu & funeſtis cladibus implens, Sævus Amurathes totus in arma ruit.
Major at Huniades virtute & fortibus auſis, Cogit eum trepida vertere terga fuga.
Conſilia Eugenij bellum furialia ſuadent, Sacrorum antiſtes Martia ad arma ruit: (Arma viri tractent, curet ſua templa ſacerdos) Europæ exitium res tulit iſta grave.

Fierce Amurath doth Europ fill with bloud and wofull cries;
And wholly giuen to martial deeds, doth whole in arms ariſe.
But yet Huniades (than he, of greater force and might) Inforced him right fearfully to turn his back in flight.
Eugenius his infernall ſpels ſtirs vp a fatall jar;
Who hauing charge of ſacred Rites, runs headlong into war.
(Leaue martial deeds to martial men, and let the Prieſt go pray) Such diuelish counſel, worſ-receiv'd, wroght Europs great decay.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLISHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

AFter the death of Mahomet had bin politiquely concealed one and fortie days,by the three great Baſſa's,BajaZet,Eiuaſes,and Ibrahim; Amurath (or C Murat,as the Turks cal him) his eldeſt ſon,at that time comming to Pruſa,was by them placed in his fathers ſeat,and the death of Mahomet at the ſame time publiſhed. Wherupon great troubles began on euery ſide to ariſe.

Murat is the ſame that we call Deſiderius.

The Princes of Smyrna and Menteſia roſe vp in arms:and at Theſſalonica,an obſcure fellow crept as it were out of a chimney corner, took vpon him the name and perſon of Muſtapha the ſon of BajaZet, who was ſlain many years before,in the great battell againſt Tamerlane at mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Bajazet. This counterfeit Muſtapha,animated by the Grecian princes, and going from Theſſalonica to Vardarum,ſet ſo good a countenance vpon the matter, with ſuch a grace and Ma- D jeſty,that not only the countrey people (apt to beleeue any thing) but men of greater place and calling alſo,as Tzunites Beg the prince of Smyrna's ſon,with the ſons of old Eurenoſes Baſſa,perſuaded that he was the very ſon of the great BajaZet,repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraign.From Vardarium he went to Serræ,and from thence to Hadrianople(Amurath being then at Pruſa)where he was receiued as if it had bin that noble prince Muſtapha,whom he feigned himſelf to be. So that in ſhort time he was honored as a King in all parts of the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europ.

Muſtapha, Bajazets ſuppoſed ſon raiſeth rebellion againſt Amurath.

Amurath to repreſſe this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion, ſent Bajazet Baſſa, a man of great authority in his Court, with a ſtrong army into Europ. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer Helleſpontus,found all the country reuolted vnto their new found King Muſtapha: but mar- E ching toward Hadrianople,with purpoſe to haue giuen him battell, hee was firſt forſaken by the Europeian ſoldiers which he brought out of Aſia,and afterwards of all the reſt alſo; and beeing left poſt alone, with his brother HamZe Beg, was for ſafegard of his life glad to yeeld himſelf to Muſtapha,of whom he was gratiouſly entertained,and vpon promiſe of his loialtie ſworn one of his priuy Councel.

Muſtapha thus now poſſeſſed of the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts,the better to maintain his credit,leuied a great army to make war vpon Amurath in Aſia. And as he was vpon his way,at a place which the Turks call Saſlidere,or the place of Willowes,his other counſellors repining at the great honor he gaue to Bajazet Baſſa, aduiſed him to beware he truſted him not too far,of whoſe ſmall faith he had ſufficient trial already, F and was like enough when occaſion ſhould ſerue,to reuolt from him to Amurath, & to draw after him ſome great part of his army,to the great peril both of himſelf & all them his faithfull ſeruants & followers.Vpon which jelous conceit,this great Baſſa BaiaZet was there forthwith as a traitor apprehended,and without further trial executed: at which time his brother Hamze was with much ado ſpared. This done,Muſtapha proceeded on his journey,and paſſed ouer with his army at Callipolis into Aſia. Amurath vnderſtanding of the proceedings of G Muſtapha in Europ,and his preparation made for the inuaſion of Aſia,created three new Baſſa's,Omer,Vruge,and Alis,all the ſons of Temurtaſes; theſe he joined with his old Baſſa's, Ibra- him and Eiuaſes. All theſe fiue he vſed as his Counſellors for the Wars; by whoſe aduice he ſent for Mahomet Beg,ſyrnamed Michael Ogli,who in the time that Muſa reigned was Viceroy in Europe,and therefore a man wel known to moſt principall men in Muſtapha's army,but had bin kept priſoner in the Caſtle of Amaſia, from the time that Muſa was depoſed and put to death by his brother Mahomet,vntil now that he was after 8 years impriſonment,for this ſpe-cial purpoſe inlarged and receiued into fauor.

About the ſame time that Muſtapha ſet footing in Aſia, Amurath hauing gathered his army, ſet forward from Pruſa; yet with ſuch diſtruſt in his forces(which were thought to bee much H inferior to the Europeian ſoldiers that followed Muſtapha) that he was glad vpon a ſuperſtitious opinion,to proſtrat himſelfe at the feet of an Emir, one of the falſe prophet Mahomets po-ſteritie,to receiue at his hypocritical hands a graceles bleſſing for his better ſpeed. By whom he was made to beleeue,that after two repulſes, hee had with much ado at the third time obtained grant of the prophet Mahomet, that he ſhould preuail in that War: and therupon had his ſword girt vnto him with the Emirs holy hands, with many other vaine and ſuperſtitious ceremonies. Yet for all theſe charms,he marched on with his army in fear enough, vntill hee came to the riuer of Vlibad,otherwiſe called Rindacus: where hauing intelligence of the ap-proch of Muſtapha,he for fear cauſed the bridge ouer the riuer there to bee broken downe, and incamped himſelf on that ſide the riuer. Not long after came Muſtapha,and finding the bridg I broken,incamped at the foot therof on the other ſide,ſo that nothing parted the two Armies but the riuer only. Whilſt they lay thus neer incamped together,that the ſoldiers might on both ſides take the full view one of another,and alſo talk together; Mahomet Beg (ſyrnamed Michael Ogli) but lately deliuered out of his long impriſonment(as is aforeſaid) came to the riuer ſide, and with a loud voice called by name vpon the great Captaines and old ſouldiers that were in Muſtapha's Army; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance.
Many of them being there preſent,rejoicing to ſee that honourable man, whom they ſuppo-ſed to haue bin dead in priſon many years before,came gladly to the ſide of the riuer to heare what he could ſay.

Then with a loud voice he began to perſuade them,that the man whom they followed was K not the honourable Muſtapha,but ſome baſe high minded fellow ſet vp by the Grecians, abu-ſing the obſcuritie of his birth,as the vail vnder the couert wherof he went craftily to intrude himſelfe into the honourable diſcent of Bajazet; and ſo masking in the counterfeit titles of ſtoln honor, had miſ-led them from their duty to their naturall King and Soueraign, to follow him a meer Deceiuer. And further aſſured them, That Muſtapha (Bajazet his ſonne) was dead and buried in the bed of fame 22 years before,honorably ending his daies in defence of his country,in the great battell of mount Stella againſt Scanderbeg: wherfore they ſhould do wel to forſake that ſuppoſed Muſtapha, and again to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vndoubted Soueraign Amurath. Theſe words deliuered vnto them by Mahomet (whom they generally both reuerenced and truſted)wrought ſuch effect in their minds, that ſome preſent- L ly aduentured to ſwim ouer the riuer,and joined themſelues vnto him; and many others that ſtaid ſtil,began now to doubt leſt they had worſhipped a wrong Saint. At the ſame time alſo, Eiuaſes Baſſa to terrifie Muſtapha, ſent vnto him letters as in great ſecret, aduertiſing him, That Amurath had the next night purpoſed with his Army to paſſe ouer the riuer aboue the broken bridge; at which time the chief Captains of his army being(as he ſaid)corrupted,had promiſed to deliuer Muſtapha into his hands,and with his head to pay the ranſom of them all.
This he colored with ſuch fair gloſſes,that Muſtapha partly beleeued the ſame. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eiuaſes with certain troups of horſmen paſſed ouer the ri-uer at the very ſame place he had in his letters named; and that with ſuch a noiſe & tumult, as Amurath with his whole army had been comming. Muſtapha ſeeing things begin to worke M thus,according as Eiuaſes Baſſa had before written;and with this,doubting alſo to be preſently betrayed; and carrying about him a guilty conſcience (the mother of fear and diſtruſt) Muſtapha flies. took horſe (ſlenderly accompanied but with ten perſons of his whole army) and fled in haſt, no man purſuing them, vntill he came to the riuer of Boga, and there with a great ſumme of

A of mony obtained paſſage,by corrupting the Captain that dwelt in the Caſtle vpon the paſſage of the riuer: and the third day after,paſſing ouer the ſtreight of Helleſpontus, landed at Callipolis. The flight of Muſtapha once known in his army, they all yeelded themſelues vnto Eiuaſes Baſſa; who taking poſſeſſion of Muſtapha's tent, cauſed the broken bridge to be repaired; wherby Amurath paſſing with his Army, joined himſelf with Eiuaſes. The other Baſſa counſelled Amurath to put to the ſword all thoſe rebels that had followed Muſtapha. But by the mediation of Eiuaſes (to whom they had yeelded themſelues) they were all generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from Vlibad or Lopadium, came to Boga;and there hanged the Captain that had giuen Muſtapha paſſage. From thence he held on his way to Lampſacum,intending B to purſue Muſtapha into Europ:but being come to the ſea ſide he could find no paſſage, for that Muſtapha had cauſed all the ſhipping on that ſide to bee brought ouer into Europe.
Yet at laſt Amurath by good fortune chanced vpon a great Genoa ſhip, which he hired for 4000 ducats to tranſport his army,and ſo with much ado at length landed in Europ. Muſtapha ſeeing that Amurath was now come ouer,fled to Hadrianople, where hee found ſuch cold entertainment,that fearing to be betrayed,he was glad to ſpeed himſelfe thence,thinking all the world too little to hide himſelf in;and ſo came to an obſcure place in the country of the Turks,called Kiſul-Agatze-Genitze: where the ſoldiers ſent to purſue him, ouertooke him, and brought him bound to Amurath,then being at Hadrianople: by whoſe commandement he was ſhamefully hanged from the battlements of one of the higheſt towers of the city,and

Muſtapha hanged.

This Muſtapha of ſome writers is reported to haue been indeed the ſon of the great Sultan Bajazet,and that he was kept in priſon al that long time,& thus at length ſet vp by the Greeks to trouble the ſtate of the Turkiſh kingdom. But the Turkiſh hiſtories report as before, calling him Duſme or counterfeit Muſtapha. And it is very likely, that if he had bin one of the ſons of Bajazet, he would haue found ſome meanes to haue made ſome great ſtir long before that,as all the reſt of the vnquiet brood of Bajazet did,which neuer reſted vntill they had like the earth born brethren one deſtroied another. Beſides that,their bloudy natures conſidered, it is very like that Mahomet his yonger brother,who reigned in Hadrianople almoſt 8 yeares, and was in league all that time with the Emperor of Conſtantinople,would for his more ſafety D haue got him into his own power, if he had been in priſon with the Emperour; or els haue diſpatched him if he had bin in priſon with himſelf. All which I am the rather perſuaded to think, for that Orchanes a child,the ſon of Solyman,could find no ſafe place of abode at Conſtantinople in the reign of Mahomet,but flying,was apprehended, and his eies put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet. Much leſſe is it like, that Muſtapha beeing a warlike Prince,and his elder brother, could haue been ſo long preſerued and kept in priſon from his fury.

It fortuned in theſe late broiles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like caſes) diuers of the rebels Aſapi or common ſouldiers, whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled and armed like Ianizaries, to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull E gard; whoſe liues indeed they ſpared, but vſing them with all the deſpight and indignities poſſible. Among the reſt,one of the Ianizaries being hungry, brought two of theſe Aſapi his priſoners vnto a cooks ſhop,offering to ſel them vnto him for a little victual:which the cook refuſed to giue him,hauing no vſe for ſuch vnneceſſary ſeruants. Wherwith the proud Ianizarie inraged,ſwore many a great oath,preſently to cut off their heads and to giue them him for nought,if he would not for a thing of nought redeem them. And like enough hee was to haue ſo don,had not the Cooke,moued with pitty,offered him for them both a ſheeps head; which the Ianizary tooke,ſwearing that the Cook had giuen for them more than indeed they were worth. Which diſgrace ſo long ſince done vnto theſe Aſapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the maſterfull and inſolent Ianizaries, obiected to the whole F body of the Aſapi,the greateſt part of the Turks huge armies;of whom for all that,the proud Ianizaries make ſmall reckoning,acounting them ſcarſe for men,and in their rage oftentimes telling them,that two of them are not worth a ſodden ſheeps head.

Two Aſapi ſold by a Janizarie for a Sheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raiſed by the counterfeit Muſtapha both in Europe and Aſia, was yet not a little grieued to thinke how

how the ſame had bin firſt plotted by the inſtigation of the Greekes, and afterwards aſſiſted G by the Greek emperor, of whom he thought now to be reuenged. And therfore ſending before him Michael Ogli, his lieutenant general in Europ, with his Europeian ſouldiers to inuade the country about Conſtantinople, followed himſelf after with the Ianizaries and his Aſian forces: and ſo incamping before the city, filled all that neck of land which lieth before it, from ſea to ſea. And ſo incamped, began right furiouſly to batter the wals, in hope ſo to haue made a breach, and by the ſame to haue entred the city. But finding the Walls of greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and the defendants ſtil repairing whatſoeuer the fury of his Artillery had beaten down or ſhaken, he ceaſed his battery, and comming on with all his forces, deſperatly attempted by aſſault to haue gained the city: wherin his fortune was not anſwerable to his deſire; for approching the city, with arrows as ſhours falling vpon the defendants, H and ſcaling ladders in the mean time clapt vp to the wals, and the Ianizaries with other of his beſt ſoldiers valiantly mounting the ſame, they were by the defendants notably repulſed and beaten down, loſing ſome their hands, ſome their arms, ſome their heads, but moſt their liues, no ſhot falling in vain from the wals. Which Amurath beholding, and grieued to ſee (though vnwilling) commanded a retreit to be ſounded, and the aſſault giuen ouer: and ſhortly after ſeeing no hope to preuail, in great rage raiſed his ſiege and departed. Vnto whom for all that, the Greek Emperor not long after ſent his embaſſadors to intreat with him for peace; whereof he would by no means hear, but proudly threatned to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged: which cauſed the Greek Emperor to deuiſe what he might for the troubling of his eſtate, ſo to keep him otherwiſe buſied. As he did ſhortly after with the Caramanian king, by counte- I nancing another Muſtapha (ſyrnamed CutZug, or the little) Amuraths yonger brother, againſt him, to the raiſing of new ſtirs, and Amuraths no ſmall trouble.

Mahomet the late King had fiue ſons and ſeuen daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldeſt, and ſucceeded in his fathers kingdom; Muſtapha the ſecond, ſyrnamed the little; Achmetes the third, who died before his father: the other two, Ioſephus & Machmutes, both died of the plague being but children, after the death of their father. Three of their ſiſters were maried to three ſons of the King of Caramania, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Iſa: other two were beſtowed vpon the ſons of the prince Iſfendiar, Ibrahim and Caſimes: the ſixt was giuen in mariage to CozZa-Beg Viceroy of Anatolia: and the ſeuenth to the ſon of Ibrahim Baſſa, who died at Mecha, whither ſhee went vpon ſuperſtitious deuotion on pilgrimage. K

At ſuch time as Amurath was buſied in his wars in Europe, againſt Muſtapha the ſuppoſed ſon of Bajazet, the yonger ſon of Mahomet (called alſo Muſtapha) beeing but 13 years old, and Amuraths brother indeed, was ſet vp to raiſe new troubles, by the King of Caramania & other Princes, as wel Mahometans, as the Chriſtian princes of Grecia; who thought it good policy by that means to impeach the greatnes of Amurath. This yong prince Muſtapha, ſtrengthned with the forces of his friends, entred into his brothers dominions in Aſia, and beſieged Nice, which was at length yeelded to him. Amurath aduertiſed of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promiſes corrupted Ilias Beg the yong princes tutor, to betray the Prince vnto him. Wherupon Amurath with great celeritie ſet forward with his army from Hadrianople, & in nine daies came to Nice, where he entred the City with ſmall reſiſtance, as was to him before L promiſed, where Muſtapha was by his falſe tutor preſented to him; who becauſe he would not ſpill one drop of the ſacred Othoman bloud (as the Turks call it) commanded the executioner preſently to ſtrangle him with a bow ſtring; which was don accordingly, and his body afterwards buried by his father at Pruſa.

Muſtapha betrayed and ſtrangled.

Amurath hauing repreſſed theſe two rebellions, and now out of all fear of any competitor, thought his fiue counſellors too many by three, and therefore remoued the three Baſſa's, Omure, VrutZi, and Alis (the ſons of Temurtaſes) into honorable places; retaining of his Counſel only the two old Baſſa's, Ibrahim and Eiuaſes. But ſhortly after, Eiuaſes was ſecretly accuſed to Amurath, that he ſought by his fauorits the ſoldiers of the Court, to aſpire vnto the Kingdom it ſelfe, and to depoſe the King; and that intending ſome ſuch matter, he did vſually wear M a priuy coat. This ſuſpitious report troubled the jealous Tyrant. Wherfore on a time as he rode accompanied with Eiuaſes, he caſt his arm about him as if it had bin in kindneſſe: but finding him ſecretly armed, he would needs know the cauſe therof. Whereunto Eiuaſes anſwered, That it was for fear of ſome enemies he had in the Court. But this excuſe could by

A no means ſerue his turn,but that he was forthwith apprehended by Amuraths commandment, and both his eies burnt out with a hot ſteel glaſſe.

Eiuaſa Baſſa's eyes put out.

Whilſt Amurath was thus buſied in ſubduing rebellions at home, Muhametes the Caramanian King beſieged Attalia a great city in Pamphilia,by the ſpace of ſix moneths,which was valiantly defended by Hamza Beg, Amuraths lieutenant there. At which ſiege the vnfortunate King himſelf,as he was taking view of the City,was ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the City.
Whereupon Ibrahim (who ſucceeded him in the kingdome) brake vp the ſiege,and returned home to bury his father. At this time alſo Dracula Prince of Valachia, paſſing ouer Danubius, did the Turks much harm about Siliſtra; but was afterwards inforced to ſubmit himſelfe to Amurath,and become his tributary.

The Caramanian King ſlain.

B About this time alſo Tzunites prince of Smyrna,which had before aided the rebel Muſtapha, did by all means he could vex Iaxis Beg, Amuraths lieutenant in Aidinia; and hauing by chance taken his brother priſoner, put him to death. This prince of Smyrna was deſcended of the antient princes of Aidinia,and therfore pretended an intereſt in that ſeigniory. Which his claim the people of the country ſecretly fauored,ſo far as they durſt for fear of the Turks.
Amurath hearing of the harms which this prince of Smyrna did,commanded Hamze Beg viceroy of Anatolia,with all his power to make war vpon him. The viceroy without delay aſſembled a great army,and inuaded the princes country: and the prince beeing wel prouided for his comming,meeting him vpon the way, gaue him battel; wherin Haſan the Princes ſon leading a great part of his fathers Army,had put one part of the Turkes Army to flight: & purſuing C them with too much fury,left his father at the ſame time ſo hardly beſet by the viceroy, that he was glad to fly to his caſtle of Hipſily hard by. Haſan returning from the chaſe of the enemy,not knowing what had hapned to his father, was by the Turks in his return ouercome and taken priſoner. After which victory the viceroy preſently laid ſiege to the Caſtle wherin the prince was. The ſiege continued a great while:at length the prince brought to extremity was content to yeeld himſelf vnto the Viceroy, vpon condition he ſhould vſe no violence againſt the perſon of himſelf or his ſon, but to ſend them priſoners to Amurath. Which thing the viceroy by ſolemn oath promiſed;wherupon the prince came out of the caſtle,& yeelded himſelf priſoner to the Viceroy. Iaxis Beg,whoſe brother the prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the Viceroy to his tent, where finding Haſan the princes ſon ſitting D vpon the ground,as the maner of the Turks is,took him by the collar with great fury,and drawing him along to the feet of the Prince his father,there moſt cruelly ſtruck off his head: and in the ſame rage laying his hands vpon the aged Prince,ſtrooke off his head alſo; to the great diſhonor of the Viceroy,who had before giuen his faith for their ſafety. The heads of the prince and his ſon were ſet vpon two launces, within the ſight of the caſtle:which the defendants ſeeing,and now deſpairing of all reſcue,yeelded themſelues with the Caſtle. This vnfortunat Tzunites was the laſt prince of Smyrna; after whoſe death all his territory was vnited to the Othoman kingdom. After all theſe troubles, Amurath with great triumph maried the daughter of the Prince Iſfendiar.

Amurath hauing laid vp in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian E Princes had don, in giuing aid to the Rebels aforeſaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong:and for that purpoſe gathered a great army,wherwith he ranged at his pleaſure thorow Macedonia,vntil he came to Theſſalonica; ſurpriſing by the way diuers cities and caſtles belonging to the Conſtantinopolitan empire. This famous city Theſſalonica, now called Salonichi, for beauty & wealth ſomtime not inferior to any of the greateſt and moſt renowned cities of Grecia, is ſcituate vpon the borders of Macedonia, cloſe by a bay of the Archipelago or the ſea Ægeum; which bay was in antient time called Thermaicus-Sinus, and now the bay of Salonichi. To the Chriſtian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrot two Epiſtles,in the later whereof he forewarneth them of a great defection to come before the later day. Before this Chriſtian city,then in the Venetians protection, Amurath incamped F his army of miſ-beleeuing Turks,and laid hard ſiege to it with moſt terrible battery.
At which time he by ſecret means corrupted certain of the wicked citiſens to haue betraied the city by a ſecret mine, and to haue let him in: which treaſon was by the Venetian Gouernors perceiued,and the plotters therof for ſafegard of their liues glad to leape ouer the walls, and to fly into the Turks camp.

Theſſalonica beſieged.

Theſſalonica taken by Amurath.

Amurath hauing greatly battered the walls of the city, the more to incourage his ſoldiers, G promiſed to giue them all the ſpoil therof if they could by force win it. The greedy deſire of this rich prey (wherin euery common ſoldier promiſed vnto himſelf whatſoeuer his fooliſh fancie or vnbridled affection could deſire, ſo inflamed the minds of theſe barbarous ſoldiers, and eſpecially of the Ianizaries, that giuing a moſt terrible aſſault to the City, they by force entred the ſame and won it. The Venetian ſoldiers fled to their gallies lying at anchor in the hauen, and ſo got to ſea: but the infinit miſeries which the poor Chriſtians endured in the fury of that barbarous nation, no tongue is able to expreſſe, or pen deſcribe; death was les pain than the ignominious outrages and vnſpeakable villanies which many good Chriſtians there ſuffered, heartily wiſhing to die and could not; and yet the furious enemies ſword deuoured all the people, without reſpect of age or ſex, except ſuch as for ſtrength of body, or comlines H of perſon, were reſerued for painfull labor or beaſtly luſt: which poore ſoules were afterwards diſperſed into moſt miſerable ſeruitude and ſlauery thorow all parts of the Turkiſh kingdom. The infinit riches of that famous city became a ſpoil to the barbarous ſoldiers, and the goodly houſes were left deſolate void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull city Theſſalonica, ſometime one of the moſt glorious ornaments of Grecia, the late pleaſant dwelling place of many rich Chriſtians, was by the tyrant giuen for an habitation to ſuch baſe Turks as at their pleaſure repaired thither to ſeat themſelues, and ſo is at this day by them poſſeſſed. This calamitie hapned to Theſſalonica in the year of our Lord 1432.

Theſſalonica being thus taken, Amurath returned to Hadrianople himſelf, and at the ſame time ſent Caratze with the greateſt part of his army into Ætolia. Charles Prince of that country, I dying a little before the comming of Amurath to Theſſalonica, and hauing no lawfull iſſue, had diuided the country of Acarnania among his three baſe ſons, Memnon, Turnus, & Hercules; leauing all the reſt of his dominions to his brothers ſon, called alſo Charles. But ſhortly after, ſuch diſcord fell among theſe brethren, that Amurath ſending his Turkes to aid one of them againſt another, as he was by them requeſted, in fine brought all that country of Ætolia into ſubjection to himſelfe, leauing nothing for the fooliſh brethren to ſtriue for, more than the bare titles of imaginatiue honor. The other Grecian Princes, of Athens, Phocis, Boetia, and all the reſt of Grecia vnto the ſtreit of Corinth, terrified by their neighbours harms, were glad to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkiſh tyrant: vnder which ſlauery they haue of long time moſt miſerably liued, if intolerable K ſlauery joined with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians loſt their liberty, which their anceſtors had many times before, to their immortall praiſe, worthily defended againſt the greateſt monarchs of the world, and are now ſo degenerated, by means of the Turkiſh oppreſſion, that in all Grecia is hardly to be found any ſmal remembrance of the antient glory therof: inſomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in compariſon of themſelues, they are now become no leſſe barbarous than thoſe rude Nations whom they before ſcorned. Which miſery with a thouſand more they may iuſtly impute to their own ambition and diſcord.

At this time, among the diſtreſſed princes of Macedonia and Grecia, one Iohn Caſtriot reigned in Epirus; who ſeeing how mightily the Turk preuailed againſt the Princes his Neighbors, L and conſidering that he was not able by any means to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy; to obtain peace, he was glad to deliuer into Amurath his poſſeſſion his four ſons, Staniſius, Repoſius, Conſtantine, and George, for hoſtages: whom Amurath faithfully promiſed, wel and honorably to intreat. But as ſoon as he had got them into his reach, he falſified his oath, and cauſed them to be circumciſed after the Turkiſh maner, and to be inſtructed in the Turkiſh ſuperſtition, to the great grief of their Chriſtian parents: and afterwards when hee vnderſtood of the death of George Caſtriot their father, he poiſoned all the three elder brethren, and by Sebaly (one of his chief captains) ſeiſed vpon Croia his chief city, and all the reſt of his territories, as if they had by good right devolved to him. But George, the yongeſt, whom the Turks named Scanderbeg or lord Alexander, for his excellent feiture and pregnant wit, he alwayes entirely loued, M and as ſome thought, more paſſionatly than he ſhould haue loued a boy. Him he cauſed to be diligently inſtructed in all kind of actiuitie and feats of war, wherin he excelled all other his equals in Amuraths court; and riſing by many degrees of honor, came at laſt (being yet but very yong) to be a great Sanſack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times appointed by Amurath to be General of his armies; in which ſeruice he ſo behaued himſelfe, that he got the loue of all that knew him, and increaſed his credit with Amurath; vntill at laſt he found opportunity, by his great policie and courage, to deliuer both himſelfe and his natiue country from the horrible ſlauery of the Turkiſh tyranny, as ſhal afterward be declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus daunted the princes of Grecia, hee turned his forces into Servia: but the prince of Servia, vnable to withſtand ſo mighty an enemy, to procure his fauor, ſent Embaſſadors, offering to pay him a yearly tribute, and to do further what he ſhould reaſonably demand. Amurath beſides the yearly tribute, required to haue Mary this princes fair daughter in mariage; and that he ſhould not ſuffer the Hungarians to paſſe thorow his country to inuade him; and further, not at any time to deny paſſage vnto the Turkiſh Army, when he ſhould ſend forth the ſame for the inuaſion of the kingdom of Boſna. All which vnreaſonable conditions the prince was glad to agree vnto, and ſent his fair daughter by Saratze, who was afterward maried to Amurath.

About this time, Ioſephus and Machmutes, Amuraths brethren, and Orchanes the ſon of Solyman, who had his eies put out by his vncle Mahomet, with many other men of great account among the Turks, died of the plague at Pruſa.

Plague among the Turks.

Whilſt Amurath was thus buſied in his wars in Europ, the King of Caramania his brother in law inuaded his dominions in Aſia: for ſo it was agreed betwixt the Chriſtian princes of Europ, and the Mahometan princes of Aſia, to whom the greatnes of the Othoman Kingdome was now become dreadful, That whenſoeuer he inuaded the Chriſtians in Europ, the Mahometan princes ſhould inuade his countries in Aſia: and that whenſoeuer he ſhould turne his forces into Aſia, the Chriſtian princes ſhould ſpoil his countries in Europ. Againſt this Caramanian king Amurath tranſported his army into Aſia; and as he went, ſeiſed vpon the countries of Sarucania, Menteſia, and other prouinces, before but tributaries vnto him, driuing out the poor princes before him; and ſo entred into Caramania, and inforced the King ſo far, that he was glad to agree to ſuch conditions of peace as it pleaſed the King to propound to him, and to ſend his ſon to wait at his court. And at the ſame time picking a quarrel with Iſfendiar prince of Caſtamona, cauſed him to become his tributary, & to ſend his ſon to his court alſo. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in Aſia, he returned to Hadrianople: and vnderſtanding that the Hungarians paſſing ouer Danubius, had in his abſence made diuers incurſions into his dominions, he was therewith greatly offended; and in reuenge thereof, firſt ſent Alis Baſſa the ſon of Eurenoſes, with an army to inuade Hungary; which he performed accordingly by the ſpace of a moneth, and returned from thence with rich booty. Not long after, he himſelf in perſon made another road into Hungary, commanding the prince of Servia his father in law to giue his army free paſſage through his country; and charging Dracula the Prince of Valachia to aid him with his forces in that expedition. Which his command both the Chriſtian princes, more for fear than of good will, diligently performed. So Amurath hauing inriched his ſoldiers with the ſpoil taken in Hungary, returned home and wintred at his court at Hadrianople.

Hungary ſpoild by Amurath.

The ſecret confederation between the Hungarians and the Mahometan King of Caramania, was not vnſuſpected of Amurath; which hee was the rather induced to beleeue, for that whenſoeuer he inuaded the one, he was preſently ſet vpon by the other either in Europe or in Aſia: of which plot he doubted not but that George Prince of Servia (his father in law) was the chief author, although in ſhew he was therin the leaſt actor. Wherfore Amurath intending to ſpill the play, ſent for the prince his father in law to come to the court at Hadrianople: but he doubting ſome Turkiſh tragedy, pretended great occaſions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterward fel out, fortified and manned all his ſtrong cities and caſtles by all means he could poſſibly, eſpecially his chief city Semendre (otherwiſe called Spenderovia) and left therin his ſon Gregory (or as ſome call him George) as Gouernor: for his other ſon Stephen was long before in Amurath his Court, with the Queen his ſiſter. The Prince of Servia went himſelfe into Hungary, to procure from thence ſome aid, hauing there alſo himſelfe certain territories, which hee had in exchange of Sigiſmundus (late Emperour and King of Hungary) for the city of Belgrade. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the affinitie and league he had with the Prince his father in law, entered with a great Army into yong Gouernor the Princes ſon, doubting to fall into the enemies hands by ſudden aſſault, yeelded himſelf with the city. Which thing ſo diſcouraged the reſt of the Servians, that in ſhort time Sophia,Novomont,with all the reſt of the cities of Servia were yeelded into the power of Amurath. After which conqueſt he returned to Hadrianople, and hearing that the Prince of Servia with the Hungarians were making head againſt him,and that the two yong Servian Princes,Gregory and Stephen his wiues brethren,had intelligence with their father, he commanded them both to bee caſt in priſon at Didymoticum, and their eies cruelly to bee burnt out with a braſen baſon made red hot,a common vnmerciful practiſe among the Turks

About this time, Albertus duke of Auſtria hauing before maried Elizabeth the only daughter of Sigiſmund the Emperor,and ſucceeding his father in law both in the empire and Kingdom H of Hungary: (vnto which type of higheſt honor nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigiſmund) in the ſecond year of his reign,before he was wel ſetled in his new atchieued honors,died of the flix, as he was making great preparation againſt Amurath the Turkiſh King: who hauing lately driuen George Prince of Servia and Raſcia out of his dominion, had now extended the Turkiſh kingdom euen vnto the borders of Hungary.This Albertus dying,left his wife great with child. The Hungarians (in whoſe minds the remembrance of Sigiſmund was yet freſh) could haue bin contented to haue liued vnder the gouernment of the Queen his daughter,the widow of Albertus, (then great with child) but that the Turkiſh King was now grown ſo great, and come ſo nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by Iohn Huniades and other of the Hungarian nobility, for defence of that kingdom, not wholly I to reſt vpon the deuotion of the people toward the Queene, and the expectation of her iſſue, (wherby they ſhould be nothing ſtrengthned) but to make choice of ſome great prince, by whoſe power they might the better defend themſelues and the kingdome againſt their dangerous enemies. Wherupon with conſent of the Queen it was reſolued vpon,to make choice of Vladiſlaus the yong King of Polonia, then a prince of great power, but of far greater fame and expectation:and by Embaſſadors to offer vnto him the mariage of the Queene, and with her the kingdom alſo. This embaſſage being ſent vnto Vladiſlaus, the matter was to and fro debated in the Polonian court,whether it were to be accepted of or not.Some began to ſpeak of the inequalitie of the match,conſidering that the King was but in the prime of his youth, and the Queen wel ſtept in years; vrging further,that nothing was offered in that match but K wars, and that the Hungarians therin ſought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themſelues againſt the Turks. Others of the contrary opinion ſaid, that the vniting of thoſe two mighty kingdoms would be to the great good of them both, and to the great honor of the King, whoſe very name would therby become terrible vnto the Turks: and that it were greater policy,by the forces of both the kingdomes, to keepe the Turkiſh king from entring into Hungary,than to leaue that kingdom to him for a prey, and afterwards be inforced to fight with the ſame enemy in the heart of Polonia:and as for inequality of years betwixt the King and the Queen, it was not ſo great a matter,that in regard therof,ſo honourable and commodious allyance ſhould bee rejected; foraſmuch as Princes doe more regard the vertues of their choice,with the increaſe of their honour,and wealth of their kingdomes, L than the ſummer fruit of youth and beauty, which of it ſelfe in ſhort time doth rot & periſh, although it were neuer ſo carefully kept and preſerued. And that foraſmuch as there can bee but one King in a kingdome, ſuch choice was to be preferred of Kings, as had not therein the greateſt hope of many children. After long deliberation,Vladiſlaus gaue anſwer to the embaſſadors, That he would accept of the offers by them made. Wherupon ſome of them returned to make relation to the queen,and ſome of them ſtaid behind to haſten the King forward.But whilſt theſe things were a doing,the Queen was in the mean deliuered of a faire ſonne,whom ſhe cauſed to be baptiſed and named Ladiſlaus. After the birth of this child,the queen mooued with a motherly affection, began to repent her ſelfe, that ſhee had giuen her conſent for the calling in of the Polonian King, to the prejudice of her ſonne. And being animated by M ſome of the Hungarian Nobility (who preſuming of the good grace they were in with the Queene, hoped to grow great themſelues, if they might firſt draw the gouernment of that kingdom to the Queen and her yong ſon)determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King: but the greater part of the Nobility better conſidering what was moſt expedient with the queen and her yong ſon, and others ſtanding faſt for Vladiſlaus, the kingdom of Hungary was diuided into two factions, and as it were rent in pieces, and ſo grew to ciuil Wars.

The Queen with ſuch as fauored her claim, the more to gain the minds of the common people (who are many times no leſſe caried away with ſhewes than matter) cauſed her ſon Ladiſlaus (being then but three months old) ſolemnly to be crowned king at Alba Regalis, the vſuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entred into Hungary with a goodly army, and joined his forces with his friends, moſt part of B them which before followed the Queen and her ſon, reuolted vnto Vladiſlaus. So that when ſhe had don what ſhe could, ſhe was glad at laſt to commit the tuition of her ſonne, together with the crown of Hungary, to Frederick the third, then Emperor, neuer ceaſing for all that, to the vtmoſt of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladiſlaus, continually ſtirring vp great wars againſt him both at home and abroad, vntil that at the laſt by her death her quarell took end together with her life.

In the midſt of theſe ciuil wars Amurath thought a faire opportunitie preſented vnto him, to make an entrance vnto the conqueſt of Hungary, which kingdom he had in his ambitious mind already deuoured. And therfore gathering a great Army, hee marched along the riuer Danubius, vntil he came to the ſtrong city of Belgrade, called in antient time Taurunum, and walls with deep and large ditches, and was then accounted the gate or entrance into Hungary.

of his men. Wherfore finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was by him at firſt ſuppoſed, he began to raiſe mounts againſt the City, and high Towers of wood to annoy the defendants, and furiouſly battered the walls. At this time alſo hee cauſed great numbers of gallies and ſmal pinnaces to be brought into both the riuers of Danubius and Saus, to aſſault D the city on thoſe parts where was leaſt feared, and by that means alſo to keep them of the city from all ſuccors to be ſent that way out of Hungary. Yet for all he could do or deuiſe, the city was ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtian ſoldiers, who vnder the leading and conduct of Ioannes Vranus a Florentine, gouernour thereof, with often ſallies and continuall ſhot Amuraths notable ſpeech to incourage his ſoldiers to aſſault Belgrade.

Although I know it is in myne own power to grant or not to grant the peace wherof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleaſure (worthy ſoldiers) to know your mindes alſo: forſomuch as wee haue that war in hand, wherin with worldly felicitie (wherof I hold the chief place amongſt you) is alſo indan-gered our religion and purity of life; the defence and care wherof equally belongeth vnto vs all. For although we differ much one from another in the maner of our vocation and liuing here; yet after death we all hope for one and the ſelfe ſame felicity. And therfore I would haue you to underſtand all that I ſhall ſay, as proceeding not of any regard of myne own priuat, but vpon the conſideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning myne own eſtate, I poſſeſſe ſo large countries in Aſia, ſo great dominions in Europ, that either part therof (in good time be it ſaid) might ſeem a ſufficient kingdom. So that per- I haps it might better ſtand with my eſtate, to take more care for keeping of that I haue, than to trauell for the gaining of more. But you are to conſider with your ſelues, whither you haue euery man ſufficient to ſuffice himſelfe or not, and how long you think your ſelues aſſured of the ſame: and moreouer, that together with theſe worldly things, we ſhall be driuen at length to forſake our religion and profeſsion, if we ſhal now lay down arms. For our enemies requare that we ſhall firſt ceaſe from war; and then afterward they think it meet to talk of peace. I will not ſpeak of the indignity, that men beſieged, and in euill plight, ſhould propound conditions of peace to them that beſiege them, and are well furniſhed with all things: That feeble and cowardly men ſhould promiſe peace vnto couragious and expert ſoldiers. I omit what labor and pains we haue taken, in laying our ſiege, in raiſing of mounts, in making of ſhipping: all which our enemies command vs to forſake, as if they had vs already bound or couped vp in hold, as we haue them. K All Bulgaria and the greater part of Raſcia is by vs now conquered, and moſt part of Servia is at our command: all which places are by vs either to be kept, or els all the reſt of that we poſſeſſe in Europe, is with them to be loſt and forſaken. Whoſoeuer ſhall haue in their power this city which wee beſiege (and that our enemies know right well) ſhall haue not only a fortreſſe and bulwark of defence for his owne, but alſo a caſtle and entrance for the ſubduing of others. The Kingdom of Hungary is now diuided in it ſelf, and full of domeſticall ſedition. Neither is is it ſo much ſtrengthned by the vniting of the Kingdom of Po-lonia, as it is by ciuill diſſention weakned. And in this motion of peace nothing is ſought for, but to gain time for the pacifying of their priuat quarrels, that they may afterwards with their double forces ſet vp-on vs. For if we ſhall break vp the ſiege before we haue won the city, they will eaſily find delayes ſo long to protract the concluſion of peace, vntill Vladiſlaus his good fortune, or els the Hungarians beeing of L themſelues better aduiſed, ſhall make an end of their Ciuill wars. What manner of conditions of peace will they then require of vs, when they are at vnity among themſelues, and in arms againſt vs; ſeeing that now being in danger with mutuall diſcord, and almoſt by vs vanquiſhed; they thinke it reaſonable (as if they had won the field) that we ſhould firſt raiſe our ſiege, and then intreat of peace. Their proud demaunds for the reſtitution of Bulgaria and Raſcia, with other Countries and Cities won by our great trauell and danger, already ſound in our ears. Which if we ſhall refuſe to grant, not onely the Hungarians (beeing then at vnitie amongſt themſelues) but alſo the Polonians joyned vnto them, will bring thoſe Warres home vnto our owne doores, which we now with great aduantage make vpon them, beeing troubled with diſcord and ciuill broiles. And if for deſire of peace we could be content to yeeld vnto ſuch ſhamefull and miſerable conditions, and reſtore vnto them all they ſhould or in reaſon could deſire; do you M think the Prince of Servia would reſt contented with his own, whoſe haughty mind (I am ſure) being inflate with the combining of two ſuch mighty kingdoms, thinketh not only of the recouery of that hee hath loſt, but euen now gapeth at all this is ours in Europ. He will not think himſelfe ſatisfied, before hee (ha-

A uing brought the Hungarian and Polonian forces againſt vs) ſhall ſee the ſame hauocke and ſpoile made in our Kingdome with fire and ſword, which he hath before ſeene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune ſhould anſwere his deſignes (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) beſide all the miſerable and intollerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angry conquerour, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious worke, to vſe all cruell and vnſpeakeable villanies againſt our nation, except we will forſake the faith and religion deliuered vnto vs and our anceſtors, and follow their new incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more eaſily and effectually procure the fauour of God with any other kinde of ſacrifice or ſeruice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our temples, by ſcoffing at our moſt ſacred and ſecret rites and ceremonies, by ſcorning our religion, and prieſts: and that you may know all the fury wherewith they rage againſt vs and our religion, they account all them for holy ſaints B which die in fight againſt vs. There is no cauſe (valiant ſouldiers) that vpon the vaine hope of peace, we ſhould expect whileſt the enemy doth gather and vnite his forces and armes againſt vs, eſpecially ſuch an enemy as propoundeth not ſpoile and worldly honours, but immortality it ſelfe, as a reward of his victory. We haue already taken much more labour than we haue to take, wee haue filled the ditches with reſtleſſe labour, we haue caſt vp bulwarkes equall with the wals, and part of the wals we haue beaten euen with the ground, ſo that you ſee the towne halfe opened: and that towne, by gayning whereof, all that ours is, may be made ſafe and quiet; and that which our enemy poſſeſſeth, ſubiect to our ſpoile and prey. If you will but a little inforce your ſelues as men mindfull of our good fortune and forwardneſſe, you ſhall find our temples, our ſacrifices, our religion, all worldly and heauenly felicity to be then aſſured vnto vs, when as you ſhall to morrow ouerthrow the very foundation of the enemies wall. Then (couragious ſoul- C diours) we may cry victory, not for the preſent, but for euer. If this warre ſhould bring vnto vs nothing elſe but an aſſured ſecurity of our eſtate, it were ſufficient reward: for which we ought cheerefully to aduenture our ſelues to all dangers, and to challenge in combate euen death it ſelfe. But as this victory doth defend all our things as with a deepe trench or ſure wall, ſo doth it lay open and expoſe all our enemies dominions vnto danger and ſpoile. Hitherto we haue ſtriuen with nature her ſelfe in the rough and abrupt mountaines of Bulgaria and Raſcia, where we were to ſtriue with hunger, thirſt, labour, and deſperation: all them we haue ouercome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine vnto the wealth of fruitfull Hungarie, from whence we muſt fetch the guerdon of our victory, and the ground of our glory. We are come to the gates, which being laid open, we are not to paſſe ouer inacceſſible rockes, or vncouth deſarts, but we ſhall goe through moſt pleaſant places, decked both by nature her ſelfe, D and the induſtry of man; where the temperateneſſe of the aire, and liuely ſprings, with the fruitfulneſſe of the ſoile, doth euery where yeeld plenty of all manner of food both for man and beaſt, not onely to ſerue for natures neceſsity, but euen to glut our wanton deſires. What thing ſoeuer curious indeuour hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertility of the ſoyle yeeldeth plentifully of it ſelfe: ſo that it is to be thought, that nature adorned Hungary with a certaine extraordinary care, when as ſhe would ſet forth a patterne of good husbandry, for other countries to imitate. Neither hath ſhe in any place beene more bountifull in beſtowing her rich gifts: for gold, which other men moſt painefully dig vp, and that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their eaſe, as if it were a growing plant. It is in your power (worthy ſouldiers) whether you will to morrow open a way to all theſe good things for your ſelues for euer, or elſe leaue the way open for your enemies vnto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you go vnto the breach, that all the ſtore of happy fortune is laied open to you for a prey, without any other de- E fence, without any other garriſon, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wiues, children, your houſes, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories: ouer whom (except you win the city) the fury and inſolencie of the victorious enemy, will moſt cruelly and ſhamefully inſult. I, according as I ſhall ſee you fight at the breach to morrow, ſhall eaſily perceiue how you are ſet downe to command as conquerours, or elſe as ſlaues to be commanded; and alſo what to anſwere to the moſt inſolent demands of the proud Embaſſadours. In the meane time make much of your ſelues, and together with your armour, haue all things in readineſſe, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may aſſault the breach.

F The Turkiſh captains for that time ioyfully departed, as if they had bin already aſſured of the victory, & of all thoſe good things which Amurath had ſo liuely ſet before their eies. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the aſſault to be giuen vnto a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall battery: the ſoldiers with great courage aſſailed the breach, eſpecially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly-Baſſa valiantly won the

ſame,and were entring the city with aſſured hope of victory. The Chriſtians ſeeing all in danger to be loſt,running to the breach from all parts of the city,ſo forceably charged the proud Ianizaries on euery ſide,that they were glad to retire with more haſt than they before entred: in which retreat many of them were ſlaine, and the reſt flying out at the breach, were either ſlaine or burnt to death in the towne ditch with wild-fire; whereof the defendants had caſt great ſtore vpon the Turks at the breach, which hauing taken hold vpon the faggots, hurdles, and other light matter,wherewith the Turks vpon the ſudden made their way ouer the towne ditch,did ſo terribly burne, that the Ianizaries which had entred the breach,being againe repulſed,were in that fiery lake conſumed,or elſe with ſmoke ſtrangled. In this aſſault Amurath is reported to haue loſt 8000 of his beſt men,beſide 7000 others ouerwhelmed or ſtrangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Chriſtians. The other part of the Turks which at the ſame time aſſaulted the city by water,out of their gallies and ſmall ſhips,had as euill or rather worſe ſucceſſe:many of them were ſunke with great ſhot,and ſome burnt by the fire caſt from the wals,and ſo fired one another;and diuers of them in that ſudden feare,for auoiding of that preſent danger, ran a ground vpon the ſhelfs in the riuer, and ſo ſplit. Amurath wonderfully diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of his men, and ſhamefully beaten from the aſſault, returned to his camp with his Turks,much like men which had lately eſcaped ſome great ſhipwracke. And thus partly by famine,and partly by the defendants force;hauing loſt the greateſt part of his army, he determined now after ſeuen moneths ſiege to returne home. Yet becauſe he would not encourage his enemies, by ſhewing his feare, he ſent for the Embaſſadors into the campe, and with ſterne countenance anſwered them in this ſort.

Amurath his anſwere to the Embaſſadors.

We will (ſaid he) then talke of peace, when Vladiſlaus ſhall deliuer vnto vs all that part of Raſcia which he yet holdeth, and alſo this city of Belgrade, as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raiſe my ſiege, to giue Vladiſlaus time to aduiſe himſelfe: yet I would wiſh him, rather to accept of my friendſhip vpon theſe conditions, than by denying that little which is demanded, to hazard the ſtate of both his Kingdomes. I aske but that which is mine owne by law of armes, before Vladiſlaus was called into Hungarie: and the Hungarians cannot transferre vnto him that right which they had not themſelues. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to ſtriue for that which is other mens, than quietly to poſſeſſe his owne, I will in good time repaire hither againe, with my God the beholder and reuenger of wrong.

With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors,and forthwith riſe with his army, ſore repenting his comming thither:yet becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he left his nephew Iſa-beg with certaine troups of horſemen at Scopia in Seruia, who ſo troubled the King of Boſna,that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promiſe vnto him a yearely tribute of 25000 duckats.

Vladiſlaus newly erected King of Hungary,ſeeing that part of his kingdome which he called Tranſiluania, or Pannodacia, to be much ſubject to the incurſion of the Turks,(who hauing got into their poſſeſſion all the country of Moldauia,and growne inſolent by continuall victories,ceaſed not to inuade and ſpoile the country of Tranſiluania) for remedy of that daily miſchiefe, created Iohn Huniades Vayuod, or his vice-gerent in Tranſiluania. This Huniades,as ſome write, was Earle of Biſtrice, borne in Valachia: other ſay that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Huniades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and prowesse. Whatſoeuer his parents were,he himſelfe was a moſt politicke,valiant,fortunat and famous captain, his victories ſo great,as the like were neuer before by any Chriſtian Prince obtained againſt the Turks: ſo that his name became vnto them ſo dreadfull, that they vſed the ſame to feare their crying children withall. This worthy captaine according to the truſt repoſed in him, began to keepe the Turks ſhort, by cutting them off,whenſoeuer they preſumed to enter into his country; and alſo by ſhutting vp the paſſages whereby they were wont to forrage the country of Tranſiluania;and when he had put his own charge in ſafety, he returned into Moldauia,and neuer reſted till he had quite won it out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, paſſed many times ouer Danubius into the Turks dominion,making hauocke of the Turks, and carying away with him great booty,with many captiues.

A Now were two great and worthy captains met together, in places nigh one to another; Huniades in Tranſyluania and the next part of Hungary, and Iſa in Raſcia and the vpper part of Seruia; the one lying at Temeſwar, and the other at Sinderouia; both men of great ſpirit, and deſirous of honour. Of theſe two, Iſa in great fauour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increaſe his credit with the Sultan his vncle, and to inlarge the bounds of the Turkiſh kingdome committed to his charge, continually forraged the country about Belgrade, to the intent that hauing wearied the inhabitants with the harms he daily did them, & brought the city into great wants, he might ſo at length gaine the ſame, for the moſt part abandoned then of citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine, and ſo to open a way into Hungary.
Thus was the country by him ſpoyled, the villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers B both of men and cattell dayly carried away: yea ſometime not contented to haue ſpoyled the open country, he aſſailed the very ſuburbs of the city, and was thence hardly repulſed: and finding Huniades the only man that hindred his further proceedings, to requite him, and prouoke him the more, brake ſomtimes into his country, laying in euery corner as he went, ſtrong ambuſhes, ſo to haue circumuented that wary captain, if it had bin poſſible. But he grieued to ſee the countrey thus ſpoyled, and purpoſing thereof to be reuenged, ſecretly raiſed a ſtrong power both of horſe and foot, and with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant captain, paſſing ouer Danubius, came and incamped betwixt Belgrade and Sinderouia, being about 20 miles diſtant. Of whoſe comming Iſa-Beg vnderſtanding, forthwith ſet forward with a great army againſt him, leſt he ſhould by longer delay ſeeme to ſtand in doubt of his enemy, C whom he had by many injuries ſo often prouoked. So marching on with his army ranged in order of battell, he found Huniades as ready for battell as himſelfe; who in both wings had placed his light horſemen, and behind them his men at armes, with certaine companies of croſſebowes on horſebacke: in the midſt ſtood his armed men, with his archers, and other ſouldiers more lightly armed, ready at all aſſayes, all ſtrongly garded with men at armes: after whom in the rereward followed alſo a ſtrong ſquadron of valiant footmen. The ſignall of battell being giuen, there began a great and cruel fight, as amongſt men deſirous either to be ouercome, or there honourably to end their daies. At the firſt incounter, the wings of Huniades his battell were by the Turks inforced to retire; but comming to the men at armes, their fury was there ſtaied, and a cruell battell fought, wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks mo, D who truſting to their agility and nimblenes of body, were not able long to endure the ſhocke and ſtrength of the men at armes, but were there by heaps ouerthrowne, and moſt miſerably ſlain. Which Iſa-beg beholding, and perceiuing the Hungarians couragiouſly to fight, as men almoſt in poſſeſſion of an aſſured victory, to ſaue himſelfe, turned his backe and fled to Sinderouia.
The reſt beholding the flight of their Generall, betook themſelues to flight alſo: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed, eſpecially Huniades himſelfe, who by his example to animate the reſt left not the chaſe vntil he was come almoſt to the ſuburbs of Sinderouia: few of the Turks eſcaped, the reſt being either taken or ſlain. Huniades after ſo great a victory, with a rich prey and a multitude of priſoners returned to Belgrade; hauing now ſufficiently reuenged himſelfe of the wrongs he had before receiued. After which time Iſa the Turke was more E quiet, as hauing ſufficient proofe of his valor. The fame of this victory increaſed not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to Buda, filled the city with joy and gladneſſe; but moſt of all King Vladiſlaus, who therupon cauſed publique prayers, with thankſgiuing to be made in euery Church; and by his letters gratulatory, with many rich preſents incouraged Huniades to the proſecution of the religious war, wherein was propounded vnto him 1444. not onely the increaſe of his wealth (a baſe regard in the honourable) but the immortality of his name, and hope of eternall bliſſe.

Not long after this victory, Huniades obtained a far greater in Tranſyluania. For Amurath much grieued with the loſſe he had firſt by himſelfe, and after by his lieutenant Iſa, receiued at Belgrade, and in the country therabout; leſt he ſhould ſeem to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, F repaired his broken forces with new ſupplies, with purpoſe againe to renue his wars in Valachia.
And ſo hauing put all things in readines, ſent one of his Baſſa's called Meſites (his Viceroy in Aſia, a man of great wiſedome, experience, and valor) with a puiſſant army vpon the ſudden by the way of Valachia Tranſalpina, to inuade Tranſyluania. This worthy captain according to his charge departed out of Seruia, and paſſing from Danubius, ſuddenly entred into Tranſiluania inuaded and ſpoiled by Meſites Baſſa.

Huniades flieth

Huniades and the Biſhop of Alba Iula entrapped by the Turks.

Huniades his country,burning and ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in his way,and killing all that he G light vpon,man,woman,and child,without reſpect of age,ſex,or condition,filling all the country as he went with tumult and terror. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the country) vnderſtanding, and hauing then no ſufficient forces to oppoſe againſt the fury of ſo puiſſant an enemy,either means to raiſe any in ſo great a confuſion and feare;was wonderfully grieued thereat,and perplexed in mind,as not well knowing which way to turne himſelfe. At length he tooke his flight into Alba Iula, vnto his old friend George Lepe Biſhop of that city,a man of great vertue and grauity : but whileſt he there ſtaied with his friend, about the raiſing of a tumultuary army,the enemy was now come neere vnto him; who hauing ouerrun the greateſt part of the country, had ſcraped together ſuch a booty, and taken ſuch a multitude of priſo-ners,that ſurcharged as it were with the ſpoyle,he was glad to march ſoftlier; yet ſtill burning H the country before him. Which Huniades and the good Biſhop beholding out of the city,ſo much grieued thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themſelues, with an handfull of men taken vp in haſte hand ouer head,too weake to encounter with their enemies;yet thought it better,with ſuch power as they had to go out, and ſo in defence of their country honorably to die,than longer to behold the moſt miſerable deſtruction of the ſame. But whileſt they vp-on this reſolution(carried forth with too hot a deſire of reuenge) march vnaduiſedly forward, without any ſcouts or eſpials ſent out before them, they fell before they were aware into ſuch ambuſhes both of horſe & foot,as the crafty enemy had in the ſecret woods and vallies whereby they were to paſſe,laid of purpoſe to intercept them:which now with great force and horrible outcries breaking out vpon them on euery ſide,diſmaied them with a great feare. Huni- I ades and the Biſhop ſeeing themſelues ſo intrapped and beſet with the multitude of their enemies,as that they muſt needs periſh if they ſhould longer ſtay,fled incontinently back again; after whom followed all the reſt of their army, and at their heeles the eager Turks, who ſpared none of the flying Chriſtians they could ouertake,but put them al to the ſword:neuerthe-leſſe moſt part of them eſcaped backe again to Alba Iula.The Biſhop thinking to haue ſaued himſelfe by the ſwiftnes of his horſe,comming to a riuer,in taking the ſame was ouerthrown, and there by the enemy ſlain.With whoſe death the Baſſa incouraged,as alſo with the preſent victory,began now more at liberty to range abroad, and at his pleaſure with fire and ſword to waſt that part of the country which yet remained vnſpoiled : leauing in the meane time (as a man out of feare)the rich prey he had taken,together with his baggage & carriages,to be car- K ried all together,as a notable teſtimony of his victory,vnto his great lord & maſter. Huniades in the meane time with wonderfull celerity running about the borders of his country,and out of euery town & village taking ſuch ſoldiers as he could,perſuaded alſo the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi)in defence of their wiues and children to take vp arms:who all in reſpect of the preſent neceſſity,cheerfully did whatſoeuer he commanded. With this tumultuary army he followed the Baſſa(who then in great pride was returning,laded with the ſpoile of the whole country) with purpoſe to ſet vpon him as time or place ſhould giue him occaſi-on.In the meane time Meſites being told,that Huniades with a great power was comming after him,and now euen at hand;is reported to haue made no reckoning thereof,but to haue proudly anſwered vnto him that brought the newes, Let him come, and with the ſpoile of himſelfe inrich L our victory. There was preſent when he thus ſaid, one Iohn one of Huniades his eſpials; who diſcouered vnto him many of the Turks deſignes concerning the ioyning of battell with him; but eſpecially,that the Baſſa had commanded thorow his army, That aboue all things, they ſhould in the beginning of the battell aſſaile the perſon of Huniades himſelfe, for that he being once ſlain,the reſt would eaſily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction:and that for the performance thereof,he had appointed certaine companies of his beſt ſoldiers,giuing them certain tokens wherby they might know both him and his horſe. There was then in the army one Simon Kemene,a right valiant and couragious gentleman, not much vnlike to Hunia- des,with whom he changed both his horſe and armor, appointing vnto him a ſtrong troupe of his choice horſemen to attend vpon him : neither was this counterfeit Huniades vnwilling to M expoſe himſelfe vnto the danger,accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might ſaue the life of his friend, and preſerue ſo worthy a defender of the common-weale. Huniades following faſt after,the Baſſa marching before him,ſought by light skirmiſhes,ſomtimes on the one ſide,ſometimes on the other,and ſometimes in the rereward,to ſtay him, and at ſome aduantage,

A uantage,if any ſuch were giuen,to fight with him before he ſhould get out of the country. At length finding ſuch an opportunity as he thought good to lay hold vpon,he with al his forces, as if it had been a violent tempeſt,came vpon the Turks ſo ſuddenly,as that they had not time to put themſelues in order of battell,but were glad confuſedly to fight as they might,& without order : in which diſordred fight many fell on both ſides, but far more of the Turks. But whileſt both armies with like obſtinacy incounter together,certain troups of the moſt valiant Turks deſcrying Simon the counterfeit Huniades, & by the ſignes before deliuered vnto them, both of his horſe and armor, ſuppoſing him to haue bin Huniades indeed;with all their power made towards him,to haue ſlaine him, according as they had in charge : where meeting with right valiant men, of no leſſe courage than themſelues, there was fought a moſt terrible and B bloudy battell,in ſuch ſort, as if in that very place ſhould haue bin tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turks ſtill bending their forces more and more thither,for the killing of him of whom they ſtood in more dread than of all the reſt ; at length by plaine force made a way vnto him, and hauing ſlaine them that were about him, though not without their owne great loſſe,furiouſly aſſailing him,ſlew him, vainly ſuppoſing it to haue bin the very Generall himſelfe,who had he there periſhed (as like enough it was he ſhould,had he not bin before warned of the Baſſa's purpoſe) no doubt but that the whole country had bin with him,or ſhortly after quite loſt. But Huniades in the mean time riding to and fro in the army, encouraged his ſoldiers not to forſake the victory they were now as it were in poſſeſſion of, nor leaue vnreuenged ſo many ſlaughters and harms ſo lately committed by their enemies,but to remember as they C were fighting,that they carried in their hands their wiues and children, and were in that one battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Somtime he with new ſupplies encouraged ſuch as were ouercharged, and euen now ready to fly ; otherſome he with cheerfull words ſtaied, that had already turned their backs ; performing in euery place all the parts both of a worthy commander & valiant ſoldier, as the neceſſity of the time and place required. In the heat of this battell (fortune yet fauoring neither part,but both fighting with all their powers) the Tranſiluanian priſoners that in great number were kept in the camp, wiſhing rather to die,than to be carried away into captiuity, & thinking it now or neuer,time for them to attempt their deliuerance,with one conſent brake aſunder their bonds, and with ſuch weapons as firſt came to hand,ſet vpon their keepers,of whom they ſlew a great number,and ſo D deſperatly iſſuing out of the battell, incouraged their countrymen, and diſcouraged their enemies. Yet was the battell hardly fought,though not altogether with like courage,or for like cauſe : for why, the Tranſiluanians fought for their country, their wiues, their children, their liues, their liberty, their religion, and altars : but the Turks, for the rich prey they had before taken,and that they were by victory in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the priſoners (who laid about them like deſperat men) out of hope of the victory, began by little and little to retire ; and the other on the contrary part by this vnexpected aid encouraged,and quickly finding the enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Meſites ſeeing his army thus in euery part wauering, was therewith exceedingly troubled : but preſently after, beholding ſome of his men retyring as if they had fled, and otherſome flying out right, E and no means to ſtay them, for ſafegard of his life turned his horſe and fled alſo : after whom the Hungarians followed with moſt terrible execution, as men deſirous of the bloud of them that had done them ſo great harme. In this chaſe Meſites himſelf with his ſon were both ſlain : the report of whoſe death in the purſuit, added ſwiftneſſe vnto the Hungarians, to the increaſing of the ſlaughter of the Turks,whom for the deſire of reuenge they ceaſed not for certaine daies to purſue,vnto the top of the Alps. In this battel were ſlaine of the Turks 20000,and of the Hungarians about 3000. Huniades with this victory recouered all the prey the Turks had taken of the ſpoile of the country, together with their tents and baggage, vnto whom at his returne into the campe, a wonderfull number of poore captiues came, and falling at his feet, and kiſſing them, gaue God thankes for their deliuerance by him; ſome called him the father, F ſome the defender of his country ; the ſoldiers, their inuincible Generall; the captiues, their deliuerer ; the women, their protector ; the yong men and children, their moſt louing father. In all which joyfull acclamations, no honorable addition was heard, which in the judgement of all men, worthily agreed not with his deſerts. He againe with teares ſtanding in his eies, courteouſly embraced them,rejoycing at the publike good ; and himſelfe giuing moſt hearty

A great battell betwixt Meſites and Huniades.

Great rejoicing for the victory.

G thanks vnto God, commanded the like to be done in all churches of that Prouince. Sometime he commended the ſoldiers valor, and in generall the peoples loyalty. The nobility and worthy captaines he extolled by name, according as their deſerts had bin in that notable battell, not detracting any thing from any mans worthy praiſes: part of the ſpoile of the Turks he appointed vnto deuout vſes, and the other part he diuided amongſt his ſoldiers: and willing as it were with the firſt fruits thereof to gratifie King Vladiſlaus and the Deſpot of Seruia, then preſent with him, he ſent a great waggon, with 10 horſes which could ſcarce draw it, laded with the Turks enſignes and the chief of their heads, where the heads of the Baſſa and his ſon ſtood formoſt, and aboue them was placed an old Turke, ſomtime well known vnto the Deſpot: who in this order preſented vnto them, is ſaid to haue thus deliuered his meſſage, as followeth:

H

The ſpeech of an old Turk, in deliuering the Preſent vnto the King.

Huniades your Majeſties moſt humble ſeruant, and the moſt honourable Deſpots ſonne, ſendeth vnto you this part of the ſpoile gained by this late victory, leſt he ſhould ſeeme to defraud you of the honour of the battell, happily fought vnder your good fortune. Theſe heads of the Aſian Nobility he ſendeth you for a Preſent, that you ſhould not want the aſſured teſtimony of ſo notable a victory: theſe are two Princes heads, the one of Meſites Baſſa the Generall, and the other of his ſon; the reſt are the heads of the other great commanders and Sanzacks. All theſe witneſſe the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter, and exhort you to greater atchieuements. What your royall Majeſty for the naturall inſtinct of pitty and religion ingrafted into you, may hope for; and what an occaſion of immortality and glory is offered vnto you, Huniades wiſheth you hereby to conſider: and humbly requeſteth, that generall ſupplications may be commanded, and a great army prouided, foraſmuch as all men ſuppoſe, that the Turke will gage his whole forces, and leaue nothing vnattempted, in reuenge of ſo great a ſlaughter of his people. I

Hauing ended his ſpeech, he ſhewed vnto them the griſely mortified heads: which the nobility and others there preſent, earneſtly beheld, and wondred at, eſpecially the King and the Deſpot; who by letters further vnderſtanding the whole proceeding of the war, and fortune of the battell, highly commended the diſcreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victory, worthy (as they ſaid) of a Roman triumph: for which, Vladiſlaus commanded publike ſupplications to be made in all churches thorow Hungary, and by honorable meſſengers ſent of purpoſe to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deſerts, with many rich Preſents alſo, commending his faithfull and worthy ſeruice: and requeſting him, with like cou- K rage and care, to proſecute the war, ſo happily begun; promiſing him, That he ſhould neither want men nor mony, or any thing elſe needfull thereunto. Vpon this victory, the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted again vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: and the fame of Huniades was in ſhort time diſperſed thorow all Europe, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one moſt like to be one of the greateſt champions of the Chriſtian Commonweale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was.

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Baſſa Meſites, and the loſſe of his Army, being brought to Hadrianople, much troubled the Turkiſh Tyrant; but moſt of all, the reuolt of the two Countries, Moldauia and Valachia. So that full of wrathfull indignation, and deſire of reuenge, he commanded a great army to be raiſed againſt the next Spring, with L intent to haue gone therewith himſelfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his purpoſe, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Baſſa (corruptly called Sciabedin Baſſa) an Eunuch, and yet neuertheleſſe a right valiant and expert captaine, and his Viceroy in Europe; with charge firſt to enter into Valachia, and there hauing done what harme he could with fire and ſword, to doe the like in Moldauia: and after that, with all his power to breake into Tranſyluania, there to reuenge vnto the full, the loſſes before receiued, and with the ſlaughter of the Hungarians to ſacrifice vnto the ghoſts of their dead friends and companions. The Baſſa according to his charge, departing out of Macedonia, and marching thorow Myſia, and ſo paſſing ouer Danubius, with an Army of fourescore thouſand fighting men, whereof foure thouſand were of the beſt Ianizaries, entred into Valachia, filling the country M with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in deſpaire to be able to defend themſelues againſt the fury of the Turks, and ſore repenting them of their reuolt from them, vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheerefull words, willing them betime to retire themſelues vnto the ſafeſt places of the Country, and not to expoſe them-

Valachia grieuouſly ſpoyled by the Turks.

A themſelues with their too weake forces againſt the fury of the Barbarians; promiſing in good time to come himſelf to their reliefe, not doubting by the power of Ieſus Chriſt, to dare them battell in the plaine field, and to haue of them a glorious victory, although they were in number far more than they were reported to be. The Baſſa diuiding his army into two parts, foraged the country far and neere, burning the country townes and villages before them, ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, and killing whoſoeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part retired themſelues, ſome into the mountains, ſome into the ſtrong townes, and ſome into places further off; ſo that few fell into the enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to fly, or not regarding the danger, had negligently ſtaid the enemies comming, and ſo periſhed. Valachia thus B ſpoiled, the Turks paſſing ouer the mountaines, deſcended into Tranſiluania, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to haue done the like or greater harme, if poſſible it had been to haue ſo done: but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen ſoldiers ready to encounter them.
A ſmal power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led: but al men of great experience and reſolution, in valor counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men reſolued rather to die than to fly. Of whoſe approch the Baſſa (vnto whom the name and fortune of the man was dreadfull) by his eſpials vnderſtanding, ſtaied his intended fury, and as one well aware with whom he had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelfe with his army, to ſee what power and courage the enemy had. But certainly informed by his ſcouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as the Turks, but lay ſtrongly C encamped with his waggons and carriages, as in a ſure fort, in ſuch order as that he could not without great danger be aſſailed, and yet might at his pleaſure come forth, and ſo if need were retire againe, as into a ſtrong hold: he wondred at his courage and skilfull manner of encamping; yet preſuming of his owne multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battell. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victory, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betooke themſelues both vnto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a conflict, as well to ſhew the vtmoſt of their policy and skill, as of their courage and valor. The Turke thought it not beſt to joyne battell with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to diuide his army into certaine D battalions, and ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make all his men profitable: or if he could not do ſo, then with his multitude to incloſe the Chriſtians round, and ſo to ouerwhelme them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his ſoldiers, aboue all things to keep their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelues to be diuided by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call Vaſcape, both the armies by the breake of day began to diſlodge, at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great army, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by prouident foreſight and policy to match the multitude of his enemies. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, calling vnto him the chiefe captains and commanders of his army, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

The moſt Chriſtian ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſoldiers againſt the Turks.

E No courage (beleeue me) worthy companions, and fellowes in arms, could haue induced me to encounter ſo great a multitude, did not neceſſity it ſelfe inforce me, your approued valour perſuade me, and the aſſured hope I haue in Chriſt Ieſus aboue all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this his ſacred battell, and by our right hands to reuenge the diſhonor of his holy name. In which his eſpeciall choice we are to conſider how much he hath beloued vs: and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite goodneſſe and mercy.
Three ſuch commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if we will be the ſame men wee haue been in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encourage men of worth, for the ſame to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer ſo deare. Firſt, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues and country, joyned with your whole eſtate: then, for eternall glory and renowne in this world: and laſt of all, for immortality and a crowne that ſhall neuer be taken from you, in F the world to come. How many miſeries and calamities we haue in former times, and of late receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than ſeene the ſame with your eies, and indured them in your ſelues. You had long ſince beene bereft of your beloued wiues and children, whom moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither houſe nor Church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your rare proweſſe beene at hand for preſent reſcue: your

You had long ſince beene bereft of your beloued wiues and children, whom moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither houſe nor Church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your rare proweſſe beene at hand for preſent reſcue: your* country, your goods, your honour, your liberty, you could not haue kept, had not your valour, confirmed by an aſſured confidence in the higheſt, preſerued all theſe things vnto your ſelues: The horrible fury of the Turke had now brought all theſe things into the power of it ſelfe, had they not beene by your armes defended, and he by ſo many bloudy ouerthrows repreſſed. He could not before be ſtayed; the Grecians, the Macedonians (both ſometimes the greateſt commanders) the old Thracians, the ſtrong Bulgarians, the valiant Eperots and Dalmatians, could not abide their force: the Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, authors and maſters of the ancient diſcipline of war, willingly gaue place vnto theſe. Vnto vs, is the praiſe & great glory of the victory by God aſsigned, who oftentimes with a ſmall power, yea, and that ſometime againſt all hope, haue with a notable ſlaughter ouerthrown them, vanquiſhed them, and put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the World whom they more feare and ſtand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they haue by their dayly ſlaughter and loſſes, learned no leſſe to feare, than if you were many. And now to try the vttermoſt of their power, they are come with their innumerable legions: but are not for that of you any whit the more to be feared than before, ſeeing that we all beare armes vnder the conduct of the moſt mighty God, and are by dayly victory, long experience, and approued valour taught, what we are to dare: beſides that, the greateſt part of their army is of common ſouldiers, ſlaues or rude country peaſants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Ianizaries are no good ſouldier among them, the reſt as men enforced, ſerue them for feare, and againſt their wils, and they by their cowardiſe brought into that bondage and ſlauery. What Greekes, Macedonians, or Sclauonians ſoeuer are ſent to their aid, foraſmuch as they are not yet reuolted from the Chriſtian faith, deeme them not to ſtand for them, but for vs: they long for vs the reuengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerors: in this war they haue giuen vnto the Turks their names, but vnto vs their hearts and power, and pray heartily for our victory: wherefore you ought ſo much the more valiantly and couragiouſly to fight, by how much greater you ſee the victory, the honor, the prey before your eies. We are not to fight for other mens houſes and altars, but for our owne; ſo our preſent neceſsity requireth, in ſuch ſort, that if wee our ſelues, deliuer not our ſelues, and beare our ſelues vpon our wonted hope and valour, we ſhall this day be inforced to endure the greateſt miſery that men may poſsibly. Firſt, the loſſe of our goods and ſubſtance, the captiuity of our children, the deflouring of our daughters, the rauiſhing of our wiues, the ſlaughter of our parents, the burning of our houſes and churches; and that which worſe is than all this, the ſcorne of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus, and his Saints; whoſe images you ſhall ſee in deſpight broken, or dragged in the dirt, or moulten and conuerted vnto other prophane vſes; all Religion trodden downe, and God himſelfe (if it were poſsible) with violence and deſpaire driuen out of our hearts, if we ſtand not manfully vnto it as becommeth worthy champions. God is able with his little finger, if he ſo will, forthwith, to deſtroy all the Turks in the world; but ſeeing he hath committed vnto our right hands the defence of his name, he firſt maketh proofe of our courage and valour, that finding the ſame faithfull and ready, he may ſtrengthen and defend it with his owne right hand. He neuer yet forſooke any faithfull or deuout man, neither will our Sauior Chriſt be wanting vnto you, if you be not wanting to your ſelues: in the power of his name which is aboue all names, he ſhall tread downe his rebellious enemies, and exalt the righteous that put their truſt in him. Moreouer, the cauſes that they and we combat for, are diuers, and our hopes much ſtronger: They fight for their Prophet, a moſt prophane man, author of all impiety, for ſpoile and prey, for the deſtruction of nations and countries, for other mens kingdomes, for the inlarging of their dominions, and territories, for worldly praiſe and glory: But we contrariwiſe beare armes for the Sauiour of the world, for our faith and religion, for the Chriſtian common-wealth, for our natiue country, for our wiues and children, for our fortune and ſtate; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honourable. What reward is laid vp for them in heauen which haue worthily protected or deliuered their country, or laid downe their liues in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, hauing often proued, are we ignorant, that God will neuer forſake them that honor, feare, and ſerue him. Whereby (fellow ſouldiers) you may plainely perceiue, how far your hopes are beyond theirs. Beleeue our Sauiour, promiſing vnto you an eternall reward: and ſhew your fidelity and valor vnto God and your country together. Wherefore ſeeing without the power of God we can do nothing, before the ſignall of battell be giuen, I beſeech you collonels, captains, and lieutenants, by your effectuall and Chriſtian exhortations in your regiments and companies, to encourage your ſoldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords battell, and for the preſent, euery man by taking a little earth in his mouth, to prepare himſelfe according to the neceſsity of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the Lords Supper: ſo hauing cleanſed your ſoules, embrace you one another, plight your mutuall faith with your right hand and a kiſſe; and make a perpetuall couenant among your ſelues, none of you to forſake one another in this holy battell, but for your religion and country valiantly to fight it out, euen to

A the laſt man. And a little refreſhing your ſelues with a ſhort repaſt as you ſtand, vpon the ſignall giuen, thrice calling aloud vpon the mighty name of Chriſt Ieſus, fight with the like valour and courage ſo neer as you can, that he in the agony of death fought for your redemption and liberty: which that you will willingly do, I requeſt and charge you thus for our Sauiours ſake, for the loue of our country, and for the faith you owe both to God and man. I alſo pray and beſeech you, ſo to fight, as men reſolued either to gaine a moſt glorious victory, (whereof I doubt not) or elſe if it ſhould otherwiſe chance, this day to purchaſe vnto your ſelues a bleſſed life in the kingdome of heauen: not to ſup in hell with the Turks, but with the bleſſed wights in heauen: for Chriſt Ieſus our Sauiour will be alwaies preſent with vs, who (beleeue me, and ſo hope) will this day not onely deliuer vs out of the hands of the Turks, but to our immortall glory lode vs with the rich ſpoiles of our enemies, and ſo in ſafety bring all home againe with much joy and triumph.

The Baſſa on the other ſide likewiſe encouraged his ſouldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their worthy anceſtors and themſelues, by whoſe great valor the glory and Empire of the Turks had bin ſo mightily increaſed; and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpreter of the gods, had foretold the Empire of the whole world to be by all the gods allotted; and had by diuine inſpiration prophecied, that antient and ſtately nation in time to become the terror of the world, the ſcourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto them, what an increaſe of kingdomes they had got in that ſhort time, ſince which they firſt paſſed ouer into Europe: and filled them with the hope of a great ſpoile; promiſing vnto them that ſhould in C the battell valiantly behaue themſelues, not onely the ſpoile and prey, but whole villages, towns, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they ſhould deſerue. As for the victory, conſidering the weake power of their enemies, and the great number of themſelues, he aſſured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In concluſion, he told them, that hauing ouercome Huniades (whom only, as he confeſſed, he had found to be the moſt valiant and skilfull captaine of the Chriſtians) nothing ſhould afterward be able to ſtand in their way, or to hinder their further conqueſt: and that if this day they ſhould vtterly ouerthrow him, they ſhould gain the moſt honorable victory that was euer yet got in Europe.
Wherefore he willed them aboue all things, in the battell to ſeeke after him, promiſing vnto him that ſhould kill him, a great reward, with moſt honorable preferments. Hauing thus D ſufficiently, as he thought, encouraged his Turks, he ſet forward with his army in order of battell.
His horſemen and footmen he diuided into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a ſquare battell, all men of approued valour: after whom followed the rereward; vnto the wings he had alſo joyned certaine looſe companies of light horſemen to begin the battell, and to fly about the enemies, and ſo as occaſion ſhould ſerue, either to charge or retire.
Huniades likewiſe had placed in both wings two ſquare battalions of men at armes, and with them certaine horſemen with croſſe-bowes: before theſe wings he had alſo placed certaine troups of light horſemen, to encounter the enemies: in the midſt ſtood two ſquare battels of men at armes: and betwixt them a ſtrong ſquadron of armed men, guarded behind with a conuenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings he had compaſſed about with E a multitude of carts and waggons, and they alſo well manned. So marching forward, and both armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the ſignall of battell was on both ſides giuen, and the battell begun. Huniades ſeeing the multitude of his enemies, caſt his firſt battell into the forme of a wedge, the more eaſily to diuide them: and they on the othe ſide in forme of a paire of ſheeres were ready to receiue them: where on both ſides they encountred together with ſuch fury and outcry, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or ſeene. The Turks truſting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horſmen, firſt with their light ſtaues, and afterward with their crooked Scimaters fiercely aſſailed the Chriſtians light horſemen, in which firſt incounter many fell on both ſides. But the wedge battell of the Chriſtians could not of the Turks be broken, as conſiſting all of valiant expert ſouldiers, and they alſo F ſtrongly armed; who, do the Turks what they could, with a great ſlaughter cut their army in ſunder, but not without a great fight, and ſome loſſe alſo vnto themſelues. In the wings alſo the light horſemen for a while fought couragiouſly and with like hope: but the Turks with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Chriſtians, and better appointed for that purpoſe, and exceeding in number alſo, put the Chriſtian light horſemen to the worſt, and enforced ced them to retire to the men at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turks to ſtay, where G both parts deſperatly aſſailing the one the other, was made a moſt terrible fight, wherin moſt part of the Turks light horſemen were ſlaine: for why, thy were not able to abide the force of the men at arms, although in compariſon of them but few; but were with their lances and arming ſwords ouerthrowne and ſlaine, no otherwiſe than if they had bin naked men: ſo that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battell in both the wings yet wauering, and the victory doubtfull, in the maine battell was fought a moſt cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a ſtrong power of men at arms, and certain troups of light horſemen, compaſſed about the men at armes that ſtood (as we ſaid) in the maine battell of the Chriſtians, where the old Ianizaries with their crooked Scimitaries, with great courage cut in ſunder the legs of the horſes of the men at arms; of whom many fell down, and lying along vpon the ground, were made ſhorter by H the head: as likewiſe on the other ſide, the Ianizaries whileſt they ſeek the deſtruction of the men at arms, were themſelues ouerborn & troden vnder foot. Wherupon ſuch a ſlaughter was made, that the bloud run like riuers, whileſt they deſperatly fight with furious rage both on the one ſide & the other. In this cruel fight moſt part of the Ianizaries were ſlain, and many of the Chriſtian men at arms alſo. The Baſſa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the main battell, & yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although he ſaw great ſlaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, and a number of other freſh ſoldiers which he had left for the garding of his baggage, all yet ſound men, in good hope ſo to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Baſſa began it afreſh: neither was this by him done I without reaſon; for why, he was affraid leſt if his men ſhould turne their backes and fly, the whole army ſhould follow after: and therefore to make vſe of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies now ſpent with long fight, would not longer endure a freſh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commanded them to compaſſe in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied enemies; vainly boaſting, That it would be the laſt battell that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide Huniades perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his men to be in part inuironed, and by and by cauſed the waggoners with the armed carts & waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſſe them in, diuided in part from the reſt, & afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the battel with the enemy.

The fight was great, and in euery place right terrible: and albeit that the ſlaughter of the K Turks was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperatly: vntill that they in the right wing ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind with the waggons, & ſo from them charged with ſhot, darts, and other ſuch miſſiue weapons; ſtanding in doubt which way to turn themſelues, & beſet with danger on euery ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhrunke from the fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victory, with great and cheerful outcries, as men inſpired with freſh ſpirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them alſo that aſſailed them behind in the waggons, to approch them neerer: with which double danger the Turks hardly beſet, fought diſorderly, & doubting to be all incloſed The Turks fly. round, firſt retired, & preſently after betook themſelues to plaine flight. But they which were L already ſhut in betwixt the waggons & them that fought before them, periſhed euery mothers ſon. They which fought in the left wing alſo, diſcouraged with the flight of their fellows, fled likewiſe: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelfe ſeeing both the wings of the battel put to flight, & his own battel ſore broken alſo, ſtrucken with deſpaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had ſtil kept about him againſt all euents, for the ſafegard of his perſon: after whom followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could; the reſt deſperatly flying thorow the woods, forreſts, & mountains, either there periſhed with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians were by them ſlain. Of ſo great an army as the Baſſa brought into Tranſiluania, ſcarce the one halfe returned again ouer Danubius. It is reported by ſome that waere in that battel, that if Huniades hauing them in chaſe, had purſued M them to Danubius, ſcarcely one of them had eſcaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with ſo great a victory, & to haue driuen the enemies out of the field, purſued them not far: but entring into their camp, with the ſpoile therof greatly inricht both himſelf & his ſoldiers. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlain, 5000 more were taken priſoners, and 100 of their enſignes.

A furniture, both of men and horſes, beſide the rich pauillions and tents there ſtanding. In briefe, the wealth there found, was ſo great, as that there was no man in Huniades army, which was not thereby for euer enriched. Huniades for this ſo great victory, and for his country, deliuered from ſo great a feare, cauſed generall praier, with thankſgiuing, for the ſpace of three daies, to be made in all churches of thoſe three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatned; and at Vaſcape, where the battell was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turks enſignes, as trophies of the victory there gotten. This was the famous battell of Vaſcape, wherein Huniades got the greateſt victory that euer any Chriſtian Prince before that time obtained againſt the Turkiſh Kings. The fields thereabout lay couered with the dead bodies of the ſlaine Turks, whoſe carrion carkaſſes ſo infected the aire, that many of the better ſort of the inhabitants of B the country were glad for a ſeaſon to leaue their dwellings, and to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to Buda, and there preſented vnto King Vladiſlaus the enemies enſignes, with ſuch a part of the ſpoile, as might both well declare the greatneſſe of the victory, and beſeeme the greatneſſe of ſo great a Prince, which the King thankefully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in ſhort time filled euery corner of Europe.

Amurath a little before this great ouerthrow of his army in Tranſiluania, aſſuring himſelfe of the victory, had ſent a proud embaſſage vnto King Vladiſlaus into Hungary, offering him peace, vpon condition, That he ſhould deliuer vnto him the ſtrong city of Belgrade, or elſe yeeld to pay him a yearely tribute: vnto which, vpon the firſt report of the victory, anſwere C was giuen by the King, anſwerable to the proud demand, That according to the iſſue of matters in Tranſiluania, he would ſhortly in perſon himſelfe come and giue him further anſwere. With which ſhort anſwere the proud Embaſſadors were diſmiſſed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to Buda.

How much this late ouerthrow grieued the great King Amurath, Vladiſlaus was not ignorant; either of his power or deſire of reuenge, as ſufficiently warned thereof by the worthy Huniades: for the withſtanding whereof, he thought it good not to be vnprouided. Wherfore calling together the ſtates of his Kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell, the Popes Legat, at ſuch time as they were all aſſembled, he propounded vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger threatned by the angry Turke, leauing it vnto their graue conſideration to deter-D mine how the ſame were by ſtrong hand and plaine force, or otherwiſe to be auerted. In which moſt honourable aſſembly, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpoſe ſent thither by Pope Vrban to ſtir vp the Hungarians againſt the Turks, being requeſted by the King to deliuer his opinion firſt, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The effectuall ſpeech of Iulian the Popes Legat in the Parliament to perſuade the warr.

Since the time that the Turkiſh peſtilence began to rage in Europe, no newes was euer more welcome vnto the great Biſhop, vnto the Apoſtolicall Senate, and other Princes of Italy (moſt mighty King, and you other moſt worthy Princes) than when it was told them, That Vladiſlaus, King of Polonia, was by you alſo choſen King of Hungary. For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian ſtate, and leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: as he in whom juſtice, religion, wiſedome, valour, E and martiall skill, doth ſo abound, that he ſeemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God ſent from heauen, than here in earth choſen by men. By this happy and fortunat choice, the minds alſo of all the Italians, which before lay heauy and diſcouraged, were lightened and reuiued: and therefore, that this choice might be vnto the Chriſtian common-weale both glorious and fortunate, they made their ſolemne vowes and praiers. At ſuch time as the moſt holy Senate vnderſtood of the ciuile diſcord of this Kingdome, and the danger of the Turks faſt by, it ſent me hither to deale with you for the appeaſing of thoſe troubles, and repreſſing of that miſchiefe (as you haue oftentimes heard me ſay.) The Kingdome is by your force and valor, by my mediation, and the death of the Queene, well pacified: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of ſafety, glory and immortality, beſt fitting Vladiſlaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkiſh tyranny and their proud command (worthy Princes) is to be F repreſſed: yea their ſeruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our neckes, is to be ſhaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to dare to do, the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune, ſaid I, of Huniades? nay the fortune of the Chriſtian common-weale, and preſent mercy of our bleſſed Sauiour, which ſuffereth his people to be vp and downe toſſed, but not quite drowned. If ſo great an army of the enemies was vanquiſhed and put to flight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but ſmall: what is to be hoped of thee (moſt mighty King) if thou ſhalt leade forth thine armies thy ſelfe in perſon, vnder thine own conduct, and the protection of Chriſt Ieſus. The eies of all Chriſtian Princes are caſt vpon thee, vpon the Hungarian and Polonian forces; vpon thee haue they repoſed all their hopes, they all expect that thou ſhouldeſt be the reuenger of the Barbarian cruelty, the defendor of the faith, and protector of Europe: and that it is for which the Pope doth with his letters dayly ſollicite and importune you. And albeit, that the common cauſe and quarrell of the Chriſtian religion require it, yet doth the neceſſity of Hungary and Polonia no leſſe enforce it: of which, the one is moſt miſerably and daily vexed with the Turks forces and fury out of Seruia and Dalmatia; and the other out of Moldauia and Valachia. Now if any there be, whom neither the Zeale of religion, the neceſſity of the cauſe, the hope of immortall fame and glory, can moue, let their owne ſafety, the preſent ſeruitude of their wiues and children, the ſafegard of their wealth and ſubſtance, the lawfull reuenge of the wrongs done them, ſtir them vp to take in hand this ſacred expedition. So fit an opportunity is now giuen vnto you, that at one and the ſelfe ſame time you may ſet your bodies in perpetuall ſafety and happineſſe, your ſoules in quietneſſe and reſt, and vnto both giue eternall glory and happineſſe. You lacke not (worthy captains) mony, the ſinewes of the war, which ſhall be brought vnto you from all parts of the Chriſtian common-wealth, not luſty and couragious ſouldiers, not policy, not fortune, not the propitious heauenly powers, which haue made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion: you want nothing (worthy Princes) but will. It is an expedition neceſſary, religious, profitable, and honourable: wherein are propounded moſt ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (moſt mighty Prince, and you right worthy Princes all) I pray and beſeech you by the faith of Chriſt Ieſu, by the loue of your children, by the health of your kingdome, and deliuerance from your preſent deſtruction, with valiant courage and one conſent to take this ſacred war in hand, and ſo thereby to enroll your names in the eternall booke of fame. And ſith that you are to go, not ſo much to a worldly as a ſpirituall war, againſt the enemies of Chriſt and his truth, take vp your armes with ſuch zeale, courage, and cheerefulneſſe, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valour, the preſent danger, and the mercies of God toward you, ſeeme of right to require.

The pitifull cōplaint of the Deſpot, of the cruelty of the Turks, perſuading the Hungarians to take the war againſt them in hand.

The Legat hauing made an end, forthwith enſued the miſerable ſupplication and tears of the Deſpot, perſuading them, of the neceſſity of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring vnto them the cruelty of the Turks, their torments & ſtrange tortures, his ſons depriued of their ſight, and ſpoiled of their genetoires, many halfe mangled; and moe cut in ſunder with ſawes; ſome ſlain quick, & other buried aliue, with many other ſtrange kinds of death, ſuch as would abhorre any Chriſtian eare to heare. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to looke to themſelues, told them, That they were but by the riuer Sauus, diuided from the Turks; which in ſummer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in winter hard froſen, and ſo to be paſſed: that the country beyond Danubius lay all open vpon them: and that he, ſometime the rich King of Seruia, was now driuen into exile by the power of the Turks, depriued of his kingdome, of his children, ſhamefully diſgraced, ſpoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to fly from place to place, and yet not able to find any ſafe place to reſt in. Firſt he fled (as he ſad) to Raguſium, where by and by he was ſought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into Hungary, which was alſo forthwith by them on euery ſide inueſted; and whereof the Barbarian king now asked tribute, to haue ſome colour for the inuaſion thereof: which dreadfull enemy was not far off from it, but ſtill houered euen ouer it: as well witneſſed Valachia and Tranſiluania, two of the greateſt and richeſt prouinces of the Hungarian kingdome; which had not the valour of Huniades, the fortune of the common-weale, and aboue all, the mercy of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthy nation, the ſtate of Hungary had now bin vtterly forlorne. The euents of war (he ſaid) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not euery day be tempted. Wherfore with many tears abundantly running down his aged face, he beſought King Vladiſlaus and the reſt, not to let ſlip this faire occaſion, neither by cowardiſe or negligence to break off the courſe of their good fortune and victory, but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes than of their own, and to ſatisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he ſaid) a ſufficient example to al men. Beſides that, he offred a great ſum of mony him ſelf towards the defraying of the charge of the war, aſſuring them alſo of great ſupplies both of men & mony from diuers other

A Chriſtian Princes. Which opinion of the Legat and Deſpots being generally liked & approued, a decree was made by a whole court of Parliament there aſſembled, That the king ſhould himſelf in perſon, with all ſpeed poſſible entertain that honorable war. So that though it were now vpon the approch of Winter, yet were men taken vp in euery place, and embaſſadors ſent vnto the Emperor and the other neighbour Princes, to pray of them aid againſt the common enemy. Who for the moſt part excuſed themſelues by their own particular affaires, but ſent no aid at all. Neuertheleſſe many deuout Chriſtians both out of France and Germany, for the zeale they bare vnto Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion, forſaking wife and children, and whatſoeuer they had elſe, came and worthily ſerued vpon their owne charge. The Spring being come, and ſupplication made in all places, for the proſperous ſucceſſe of this religious war, B King Vladiſlaus the firſt of May ſet forward from Buda, where paſſing the riuer Danubius, and marching faire and ſoftly, & comming to the riuer Tibiſcus, he there ſtaied three days for the comming of his army. Departing thence, and marching on alongſt the ſide of Danubius, vntil he came within the ſight of Bulgaria, he there at a place called Cobis, ouer againſt Sinderouia, paſſed ouer Danubius with his army, which was now grown very great: & ſo marched directly to Sophia, ſcituate about ſix daies march from Danubius, in the frontiers of Bulgaria, ſo called of a moſt ſumptuous and magnificent temple there built by Iuſtinian the great emperor. Which city being then old and ruinous, & but badly fortified, was eaſily taken, and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the Kings commandement burnt, as were all the other country towns and villages thereabouts, to the terror of the reſt. Marching thence, he C came vnto the riuer Moraua, and there incamped: where the plain country eaſily riſeth & falleth in manner of the ſea, when it is moued with a little wind. Here 500 horſemen being ſent ouer the riuer, not ſo much to ſeeke after prey, as to view the country, which way the army might moſt ſafely and eaſily paſſe, hapned vpon the Turks ſcouts, of whom they tooke foure: and vnderſtanding by them, that 2000 of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themſelues too weake to encounter them, they retyred backe again with all ſpeed they could, vnto the riuer; where many of them for feare leapt headlong from the high and broken banks, and ſo periſhed in the deepe; the reſt terrified with the misfortune of their fellowes, ſtood ſtill, doubtfully expecting what ſhould become of themſelues. Beyond the riuer was another hill vpon the top whereof the King with a great number of horſemen were hunting: whom the D Turks a far off deſcrying, and doubtful to fall into ſome ambuſh, of purpoſe laid for them betwixt them and the riuer, without comming on further, retyred. Which they that before fearefully ſtayd on the further ſide of the riuer, perceiuing, and now encouraged by the comming of the King downe to the riuer, followed a while after, ſo to increaſe their feare, and ſo hauing well feared one another, retired on both ſides worſe affraid than hurt. The next day the King paſſed ouer the riuer, ſending out his ſcouts to ſee if all were cleare before him: by whom he was aduertiſed, That the Turks were at hand, hauing placed certaine ambuſhes faſt by, expecting but a fit time to ſet vpon him. Whereupon entring into councell with his beſt and moſt expert captains, what were beſt to be done, it was reſolued vpon, That Huniades the next night with 10000 choice horſemen, ſhould vpon the ſudden ſet vpon the enemy, then fearing no- E thing leſſe. Who conducted by the eſpials, was in the firſt watch of the night brought very neere vnto them. The Moone by chance, as fauouring his great attempt, did then ſhine out, ſo that he might very well diſcerne how the enemy lay incamped, and which way to charge them for his beſt aduantage; which was by the ſame way they were moſt like to fly, if they ſhould be put to the worſt: vnto which place he led his men, and there with a moſt hidious outcry entred the campe, as then for the moſt part buried in ſleepe and ſecurity: when as the Turks awaked with the ſudden noyſe, as it were out of a dead ſleepe, and diſmayed with the horror of the cry, began to betake them ſome to their weapons, ſome to their heeles. Of whom ſuch as fled lighting vpon the enemies troups ſtanding in their way, ran as faſt backe againe: the other ſcarce yet well awake, and ouercome with feare, and now ſcarcely themſelues, had F much adoe to make themſelues ready to fight. Huniades in the meane time riding vp and downe amongſt his men, cheered them vp, ſtill crying out and calling vpon them, couragiouſly to aſſaile their ſleepy, naked, and fearefull enemies, and not to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, and ſo notable a victory now already in their hands. At the firſt encounter the Turkes rather made a ſtirre, than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men diſ-

maied with his name, they turned their backes and fled, finding, which way ſoeuer they tooke, G their fellows halfe dead or wounded: yea, ſuch a confuſion was raiſed amongſt them with the greatneſſe of the ſudden feare, that thruſting together, with an inconſiderate deſire of flight, they trod one another vnder foot, and thruſt themſelues one vpon anothers weapons: the greateſt part of them driuen headlong into the thickets and other ſtreits, & not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious enemy, fiercely purſuing of them, ſlain. All that night the fearefull Turks were with great ſlaughter held in chace: but at ſoone as it was day, the reſt that remained of them, ran alſo the ſame fortune with their fellowes. A far greater ſlaughter was their made, than a man would thinke that ſo few men could haue made, when as but with 10000 horſe, 30000 Turks were in one night ſlain, and 4000 taken, with a number of their enſignes. Of Huniades his men were not many loſt, for the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter: moſt re- H port not aboue 500, for few of them found any enemy to reſiſt them. There was taken all the ſpoile of a moſt rich campe, the enemy hauing carried with them nothing out of it. Huniades hauing in ſo ſhort time gained ſo notable a victory, and inriched his army, returned to the king in great triumph: neither was that day more joyfull vnto theſe victorious ſouldiers, than vnto the reſt of the army, who moſt joyfully expected their returne. The King and the Deſpot hearing of the approch of Huniades from the ſlaughter of the Turks, with the great applauſe and joyfull acclamation of the other legions, went to meet him three miles: and at ſuch time as at their firſt meeting Huniades was about to haue lighted to haue done him honour, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do, but taking him by the right hand, joyed with him for the victory, thanking God in the hearing of the whole army, that he of his mercy had giuen him ſuch a I Captaine, as, without enuy, in all mens judgements was worthy to rule the Roman Empire. In briefe, he ſhewed how much his country, his kingdome, yea the Chriſtian commonweale, was bound and indebted vnto him, gaue him his due praiſes, exhorting all others to imitate his glory: the like honour did alſo all the reſt of the nobility vnto him. As for the common ſouldiers, they could not be ſatisfied with beholding of him, but imbracing one another, as if they would haue died one in anothers arms, welcommed their victorious friends. So with joy joyning their forces together, & ſending the rich ſpoile of the enemy, with the priſoners chained together in long ranks before them; the King and Huniades in great triumph returned into the campe, where they cauſed generall praiers, with thankſgiuing vnto almighty God for ſo great a victory, to be made thorowout the army. K

The meeting of Vladiſlaus and Huniades after the victory.

The Legat Iulian, Generall of the voluntary Chriſtians, which for deuotions ſake ſerued of their own charge, after ſo great a victory moſt earneſtly perſuaded the King and the reſt of the great commanders of the army, to proſecute their good fortune, and in God his ſo great fauor not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the reſt of Bulgaria. Now had Huniades by his eſpials learned, that from Sophia it was but three daies journy to Philippopolis, a great city of Thracia; and the like diſtance from thence to Hadrianople, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh tyrant; and as much more to Conſtantinople. The onely difficulty was, how to paſſe the great and rough mountaine Hemus, which running a maruellous way in length, euen vnto the Euxine ſea, and mating almoſt the skie, diuideth the countries of Bulgaria and Seruia, from Macedonia and Thrace: and for the great height and roughneſſe therof, is not to be paſ- L ſed ouer but in two places; the one made by the great Emperor Trajan and the Romans, where as yet is to be ſeene a mighty ſtrong gate built of great ſquare ſtone, whereby the paſſage that way was opened or ſhut at the pleaſure of them that had the keeping thereof: the other neere vnto a little riuer, which the Bulgarians now call Saltiza. By either of theſe waies, if he ſhould find them open, Huniades vnto whom the King had committed both the leading and the conduct of the army, purpoſed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they tooke all ſuch towns of Bulgaria as ſtood in their way; ſome by force, ſome by compoſition: wherein was no ſmall helpe, the conformity of the Chriſtian religion, the horrible cruelty of the Turks, the great affinity of language, the moſt effectuall means to win the loue of ſtrangers: for the Polonians and the Bulgarians both diſcended of the Sclauonians, and vſing the ſame language, the Polo- M nian horſemen came to no town, but it preſently yeelded. But being come vnto the mountain Hemus, to haue entred into Thracia, the Winter weather being now very cold; they learned by their eſpials, that the aforeſaid paſſages were both faſt ſhut vp with great ſtones, timber, and ſuch other light matter, ſo ſtrongly, as that they were very hardly to be forced. Wherfore Hu- niades

A niades leauing the ſtraiter way made by the hand of man(which beſide the former fortification at the great gate,the Turks had in many places, with aboundance of water poured downe the ſteep hil in the night,and hard froſen with the coldnes of the weather,made ſo ſlippery,as that it was not poſſible either for man or beaſt there to ſtand,or to get vp that way)on Chriſtmas euen came to the other,by which the riuer Saltiza runs,the which he found likewiſe ſhut Here they met with many inconueniences:firſt the difficulty of the paſſage(which old Amu-rath had(not without great reaſon)ſhut vp, and there placed ſtrong garriſons, ſo at eaſe, and without danger of battell (ſo often by the Baſſa's vnfortunatly proued) to defend his kingdom in Macedonia and Thracia,from the inuaſion of the Hungarians,who now of al nations he moſt dreaded. Beſides that, in the army was ſuch want of all things,as that the ſouldiers B were ready to forſake their enſignes,and to riſe vp in a generall mutiny : for the country neer the mountain Hemus, riſing high, with broken rocks and inacceſſible places, was altogether barren ; & victuals failing in the camp,they were glad to liue with a little wheat & fleſh boiled together,and that ſo ſparingly,as that the ſoldiers began now generally to grow weak and faint.Beſides that,the winter was exceeding cold,& the froſt ſo great, that many times they could not go out of their tents to ſeek for forrage or water. So the army inforced with hunger and cold,and the difficulty of the paſſage,began to retyre,and had vndoubtedly bin diſſolued,had it not bin for the often and earneſt perſuaſions of Huniades:for he daily told them that the greateſt difficulties were paſt,that that which remained was with their wonted valor and courage to be endured, wherunto nothing was high or difficult : That they ſhould forth-C with come into the borders of Thracia, where they ſhould find plenty of all things:that they were now come ſo far, that if they would go back again, they ſhould in thoſe waſt Countries through which they were to paſſe, find greater difficulties and dangers than in going forward: that theſe ſtreits once opened,remained no more trauel,but cheerfully to fall to the ſpoil of a moſt rich and pleaſant country. They were not(as he ſaid)to ſtay in the midſt of their fortunes,for that it was not alwaies permanent,and for that the contempt of Gods fauors cauſed them oftentimes to be taken from vs. All that was yet don(he ſaid)was nothing,if they proceeded no further, for that whatſoeuer they had already won, was eaſily by the enemy to bee recouered,except that thoſe which yet remained (for the moſt part of them, as he ſaid, were ſlain,with their houſes burnt ouer their heads) were driuen out of Thracia and Macedonia, D and ſo quite out of Europ. So whilſt the ſoldiers heard Huniades ſpeak,euery man was wel incouraged; but when they remembred the miſeries wherwith they were inuironed, they curſed all the raſh attempts of ambitious princes. In the mean time news was brought by the ſcouts that the Turks were comming after them:but then began they to rejoice,as deeming it much more honour, manfully to die in battell,than to ſtarue with hunger and cold. Againſt theſe Turks was Huniades ſent with certain troups of horſmen ; who incountring with them, eaſily inforced them with loſſe to retyre. Eight times he incountred them (as the ſouldiers there preſent reported) and as often put them to flight. In retyring backe from the impregnable mountain,the King with the greateſt part of the army went before, after whom followed Huniades and the Deſpot,a good days march ; When the Turks that kept the paſſage vpon the E mountain,vnderſtanding of their return,followed them down the hil,in good hope to be well reuenged of them before they ſhould get out of Bulgaria. Carambey Baſſa of Romania, and brother to Caly Baſſa(a man of all others in greateſt fauor with Amurath, and his brother in law,as hauing maried his ſiſter)was General of this army,& by him appointed to keep theſe ſtreits,with expres charge,vpon no occaſion whatſoeuer, although it made ſhew of neuer ſo aſſured a victory,to fight with the enemy:for he thought it victory enough,without any loſſe to haue kept his enemies out of Thracia. Which the old Kings command Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory eaſily to anſwer the contempt of that hee was commanded. The Chriſtian army deſcending down the broken mountains,was come to a great mountain which the Bulgarians call Cunobiza,and part of the mountain Hemus. At F whoſe heels followed Carambey with his Turks,ſtil houering ouer their heads to take them at ſome aduantage:whom the Chriſtians beholding, could not by their Captains be ſtayd, but that they would many times by Companies fly forth vpon them , and deſperately fight with them in places of great diſaduantage; ſaying,That they had rather die in fight like men,than ſtarue with hunger and cold. Here Carambey,being himſelf a man of great courage, and deſirous of honor,and by the raſhnes of his enemies allured to fight;and withal,beſide the aduantage G of the ground, perceiuing himſelfe to exceed his enemies both in ſtrength and number of men,could not be ſtaid,but would needs giue battel,with ſuch a deſire as if hee had already bin aſſured of the victory. Huniades & the Deſpot had before perceiued, that the Turks, prouoked with the brauing of their men, would aſſuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the abſence of the King,who(as is before ſaid)was gon a days march before they ſaw they could neither ſhun battel, neither could they haue ſo don, would their deſperat ſoldiers be ſtayd, for the deſire they had to fight. Yet ſeeing Carambey comming down vpon them,they put themſelues(though vnwillingly) in beſt order they could to receiue him; perſuading their ſoldiers not raſhly in fury to run vpon their enemies,as deſperat men prodigall of their liues, but to keep their ranks,and orderly to fight,and ſo like valiant men to carry H away the victory,or to leaue vnto their enemies a bloudy remembrance therof. Now had Carambey ſent his horſmen down the hill, and the battell was begun; where both the armies met together with great fury,and a cruel fight was made both at the foot of the hil,& among the hils and vallies alſo: in which hard incounter many were ſlaine, as well on the one ſide as the other. The Polonian men at arms (whom the King but a litle before had left with Huniades againſt all euents) with the Hungarian light horſmen (of whom the Deſpot had the leading) fought ſo that day,as if they had fought for nothing more than how honorably to die: and the Turks for a ſpace ſtood hard to it,ſo that many were there ſlain: yet at length finding themſelues hardly laid to, as by deſperat men, reſolued to ſell their liues dear, they began to faint and to giue ground:when as Carambey comming in behind them with freſh ſupplies,rated I the cowardly,ſtayd them that were flying, and ſomtimes with rough ſpeeches, ſomtimes with fair perſuaſion, incouraged the wauering, and reſtored the battel, before almoſt quite loſt. Neither did Huniades and the Deſpot leſſe beſtir them: but as ſoone as they perceiued the enemy a little to faint, by and by cried out, Victory; with cheerfull ſpeech encouraging their men,ſtil calling vpon them to keep their ranks ſtrong,& to vrge their preſent good fortune, aſſuring themſelues that they fought againſt thoſe infidels vnder the fauor and protection of the Almighty: who forthwith ſent certain companies of footmen, who climing vp the hil among the buſhes,with their half pikes and boar-ſpears panched the Turks horſes, as they paſſed by them. Theſe looſe companies did the Turks horſmen great harm,and here began their battel to decline; they which were comming downe, for fear of the danger retyring K back again vnto them that were left aboue for the keeping of the ſtreit; and the bolder ſort of them which were come down into the vallies,compaſſed about with the men at arms, hardly recouered the riſing of the hill. Carambey in the mean time crying out behind them,one while called back them that fled,another while relieued them that fainted, and to the vtmoſt of his power reſtoring the battell,performed all the parts both of a valiant ſoldier and worthy Captain, couragiouſly fighting himſelf in the thickeſt of his enemies,and by his own valor ſtayd for a time the loſt battel. At length performing his laſt indeauour,deceiued by the ſnow,hee fel into a bog,where ſticking faſt with his horſe,and not able to help himſelfe,hee was taken priſoner by a common ſoldier. The reſt that eſcaped out of this bloudy battell,retyred themſelues vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountain for the defence of the paſſage. After L whom the Chriſtians followed,through the vntract & rough places,vntil that hindred from their further purſuit by the approch of the night,and the abruptnes of the way,they were glad to ſound a retreit,and ſo retyred vnto the camp. Many other great men were taken beſide Carambey, but many moe ſlain in the battell, and moſt of all in the flight; few eſcaped but ſuch as fled back again vp into the mountains. In the retreit, Huniades ſeeing ſo gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether vnknowne) vnworthily bound and led priſoner by a common ſouldier, asked him if he would ſell his priſoner? Who ſaid hee would; and asked for him ten ducats, a poor price for ſo great a man. Vnto whom Huniades commaunded to be giuen four hundred, and ſo ſent him vnto his Tent, comforting of him vp with cheerfull words,and willing that he ſhould be well vſed. The Deſpot the ſame night comming vnto M Huniades his Tent,to confer with him about the remainder of the war, and ſeeing ſo braue a man ſtanding amongſt the reſt by the fire ſide, began to talk with him in the Turkiſh Language, wherof he had ſome knowledge, by reaſon of the neerneſſe of the Nation, and ſuch matters as he had ſomtimes to do with them. And hauing ſome gueſſe by his talke, what

A he was, and pittying his eſtate, asked Huniades how he would ranſom him? who ſaid, That he coſt him 400 ducats, but that he valued him at forty thouſand: which the Deſpot offred to pay him. Thus by the ſtrange change of fortune, was Carambey, of late ſo great a commander, and ſo neer allyed to the great Turk, valued and priſed twice in one day by his enemies, as a mirror of the vncertaintie of worldly blis and felicity. The Polonians report ſomwhat otherwiſe of this battel; as that Vladiſlaus ſhould himſelf therin be preſent, and the chief that therin commanded. Howbeit the Hungarian Writers, whoſe credit we herin follow, report it as before, not to haue bin fought vnder the good fortune of the King, then abſent, but vnder the leading of Huniades and the Deſpot.

Scanderbeg reuolts from the Turks.

Out of this battel (or as ſome others report, a little before, out of the battel of Morava) fled B the great captain George Caſtriot, otherwiſe of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now ſeeking to deliuer both himſelf and his natiue country of Epirus out of the thraldom of the Turks, as preſently after he did. Whoſe vnwonted flight not a little terrified the reſt of the Turks Army, and much furthered the Chriſtians victory, whoſe proceedings he alwaies ſecretly fauoured, hauing (as it was thought) ſecret intelligence with the great Captain Huniades, who not without inſtructions from him (as ſome ſay) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turks at Morava. But of him and his worthy acts don for the deliuerance and defence of his country, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Vladiſlaus ſeeketh in vain to open the paſſage of the mountain Hemus.

Shortly after this great ouerthrow and diſcomfiture of the Turks, the two great Captains, Huniades and the Deſpot, together with the King, conſulted for the remouing of the Turkes C garriſons left aboue for the keeping of the ſtreit paſſages of the mountaine, and the proſecution of the war. Which Vladiſlaus (conſidering the difficulty of the matter, and his ſouldiers neceſſity) thought it not good further to proſecute, but forthwith to return. But Huniades and the Deſpot, the one thirſting after honor, and the other in no leſſe hope, by the good ſucces of this war to recouer again his loſt kingdom, ſaid, That the Turks were in any caſe to be remoued, the paſſage opened, and the ſparks which yet remained, for feare of raiſing a greater fire, extinguiſhed. Oppoſing againſt the difficultie by the King alledged, the invincible courage of his ſoldiers, wherunto (they ſaid) nothing was impoſſible or difficult. To which opinion the King alſo (leſt he ſhould ſeem to diſtruſt the valor of his captains and ſoldiers) eaſily yeelded, and ſo commanded on Gods name to ſet forward. The firſt that mounted the hil was the D Kings battel, which by the roughnes and abruptnes of the mountain hindred, oft times ſtayd. But Huniades ſtill caried with an earneſt deſire to proſecute the victory, and leauing nothing vnattempted, in ſearching about found a crooked turning way, wherby he and his men more eaſily and readily got vp to the top of the mountain, euen with their enemies, vndeſcried or moleſted, by reaſon of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope eaſily to haue come to their enemies. But being come vp to the place they deſired, they found ſuch a deep and wide gaping of the rocke betwixt them and the enemy, as was neither to bee ſtopt nor filled vp: yet being come very neer, they attempted by croſ-bow ſhot & great ſtones caſt out of ſlings, and other ſuch engins, to haue remoued the Turks from their places. Who were therwith, and with their vnexpected approch, at the firſt ſo greatly both annoyed & diſ- E comfited, that they were almoſt at the point to haue forſaken the paſſage, had not Alis-Beg (but the night before choſen their General in ſtead of Carambey) incouraged them, and taught them how by ſhrouding themſelues vnder the broken rockes, and parapets with tumultuary labor caſt vp, to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of their enemies. In the mean time alſo Huniades, by another more high and ſteep way wherby the enemy was alſo to be approched, had ſent vp other companies of ſoldiers, who fighting at too much diſaduantage, were eaſily by the Turks rejected. So at length, ſeeing the vain attempt giuen by himſelfe vpon the top of the hil, and the deſperat danger of others in climbing the inacceſſible mountain, where one might keep down a hundred, diſpairing to inforce the enemy, he by the Kings command cauſed a retreit to be ſounded, and ſo again retyred down the mountain, to the great rejoicing of F the Turks. The next day, the winter cold raging, and wants in the army daily more and more increaſing, the King with the great commanders entred into conſultation for the haſting of their return out of that rough and barren country, into places of greater plenty, before the army were brought into any greater extremity. Wherunto Huniades (giuing place to neceſſity which always ſuffreth not to be regarded what is ſeemly) now eaſily yeelded: only the deſpot ſpake againſt it, blaming them, that hauing taken the General, and put the enemies to flight, G and victory now as it were in their hands, they would not proſecute the ſmall remainder of the war, but cowardly turn their backs to their vanquiſhed enemies; promiſing that he himſelf would find mony enough for the prouiding of all things needfull for relief of the Army.

So ſaid the Popes Legat alſo. But foraſmuch as the wants of the army were great, and the ſoldiers preſently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer ſo great, be perſuaded to ſtay; openly crying out, that it was not their captains & lieutenants that wanted any thing, but them the poor ſoldiers that ſtarued for hunger. As for the Deſpot, That he in hope of recouering his kingdom perſuaded things impoſſible, and no way to be performed, neither to be any thing moued with the death of their men and cattel. Need (they ſaid) could not be vanquiſhed; but that when winter was paſt, they would willingly return H again vnto the ſacred war. In the mean time, Winter raging, and hunger commanding, let vs giue ouer (ſaid they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refreſh our bodies, ſpent with labor, cold, and hunger. For which reaſons, the King ſending his baggage before, retyred again the ſame way he came. Which the Turks from aboue beholding, and ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, followed after them as after men that had fled, oftentimes aſſailing them in the rereward, & ſetting vpon them ſomtimes on the one ſide, ſomtimes on the other, with often skirmiſhes both did and receiued much harm. Whoſe maner of fight was, to retyre when they were themſelues charged, and preſently by great troups to charge again their enemies, their backs once turned to them; and ſo troubled the army, that it was conſtrained oftentimes to ſtay: beſides that, loded with the rich ſpoil of the enemy, and much baggage, I it could not of it ſelf make any great haſt. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke wood, full of deep bogs and water-courſes hard to be paſſed thorow: where the reſt of the Army going before, in the rereward at the entrance of the wood were left certain ſtrong companies of men at arms, as a wall againſt the purſuing enemy: whom the Turks with their ready light horſmen fiercely charged; where betwixt them, in the wood was fought a great fight, and a great tumult raiſed: vnto the noiſe whereof they which marched before haſtily returning, in skirmiſhing, many of them fel into thoſe deep bogs and queachy places, out of which they could hardly rid themſelues again. Beſides that, there were many crooked and troubleſome turnings and windings, with ſudden deſcents ſo ſteep, as that going down the ſame, their horſes came tumbling heels ouer head, and there lay ouerthrown together with their riders: K in ſuch ſort, as that to auoid theſe difficulties, they were oftentimes inforced to fight on foot. In which troubleſome skirmiſh about fourſcore of the men at arms were loſt; but of the Turks, beſide them that were ſlain, were taken an hundred and ſeuenty, all whom Huniades cauſed preſently to be ſlain. In this wood the Chriſtians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies aſſaults. Wherfore wants daily more and more increaſing in the army, which by reaſon of the multitude of their cariages, abundance of their baggage, and often aſſaults of the Turks, was able to make no way; the King for fear his Army ſhould in ſo long and ſlow a march thorow thoſe troubleſome and barren countries, bee conſumed with hunger and ſuch other wants, cauſed all the carriages and baggage to be brought into the midſt of the army, & of it, all ſuch things as ſerued rather for burthen than vſe, to be there L burnt; and the arms as wel of ſuch ſouldiers as he had there loſt, as of the enemy, to be buried in the ground, and all the weak beaſts that ſerued for burthen, to be killed. So the army well diſcharged of ſuch vnprofitable burdens, marched much more ſpeedily, neither was ſo much ſubiect vnto the aſſaults of the Turks as before. And ſo at length by long journies Vladiſlaus arriued with his army at Belgrade, where he was of his ſubiects honorably receiued. And hauing there ſtaid certain daies, and wel refreſhed his army, departing thence, and paſſing the riuer Sauus, came to the royal city Buda, where he was of al his ſubiects joyfully receiued alſo: the Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Deſpot on the left: after whom followed other colonels, captains and lieutenants with their companies; who at the firſt meeting with the citiſens, more than a mile from the city, in token of their mutuall joy, gaue together M ſuch joyfull acclamations and outcries, as that the heauens ſeemed to reſound, and the earth to ſhake with the noiſe therof. Before the King, at his comming to the city, went a long company of the notable Turks Captiues; and next before him Carambey bound in chaines, vpon whom all mens eies were fixed. With them were alſo caried the enemies enſignes, and ſuch ſpoils

The Hungarians much troubled in paſſing a thick wood.

Vladiſlaus honorably receiued at Buda.

A ſpoils as had bin ſaued. Behind the King came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the midſt betwixt the Legat on the right hand, and the Deſpot on the left, as he that next vnto the King had beſt deſerued the honor of the triumph. Next vnto them followed the deuout Chriſtians, that for the zeal of religion had moſt honorably of their owne charges voluntarily ſerued in thoſe wars: and on both ſides of them the ciuil magiſtrats and beſt of the citiſens. Behind them came the reſt of the legions, and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiſcuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praiſes of the king and Huniades. Before all theſe went the Prelats and Prieſts in ſolemn proceſſion, ſinging hymns and pſalms of thankſgiuing vnto almighty God. Vladiſlaus comming to the gate of the city, acknowledging God to haue bin the author of ſo great a victory, alighting from his horſe, on foot went B firſt to the Cathedral church of our Lady, and there giuing moſt hearty thanks vnto almighty God, hanged vp the enemies enſignes, and part of the ſpoile, in perpetuall remembrance of ſo notable a victory; which he afterwards cauſed to be moſt liuely depainted in a faire table of moſt curious work, and there in a fair church to be hanged vp; as were alſo the Arms of all the notable Chriſtians that ſerued in that moſt famous expedition, which remained there a long time after. Theſe ſolemnities ended, he went to his palace in his caſtle, and there hauing giuen to euery man, but eſpecially to Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leaue to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom the Polonians in moſt part agree, report of this notable expedition of their King Vladiſlaus. Howbeit the Turks (notable diſſemblers of their own loſſes) confeſſing the great ouerthrow, call the Baſſa ſo ouerthrown, not by the name of C Carambey, but of Caſſanes; and the noble priſoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet-Beg, Sanzack of Ancyra, Amuraths ſon in law, and brother to Caly Baſſa, Amuraths great counſellor, of ſome called Carambey, after the name of his father.

Out of this late ſlaughter of the Turks, where Carambey was taken, ſcaped that valiant Prince and famous warrior George Caſtriot (of the Turks called Scanderbeg) as is before declared: whoſe noble mind had long deſired to break out of the golden fetters of the Turkiſh thraldom, and to be reuenged of the intolerable injury by Amurath don to his Countrey, his parents, his brethren and himſelf. Although he had always moſt warily diſſembled the ſame, for fear of the old tyrant: being oftentimes ſolicited and animated therto by ſecret letters and meſſengers from his friends in Epirus, knowing right wel that the leaſt fortune thereof had D bin vnto him preſent death. But finding no fit means for the accompliſhment therof, wiſely diſſembled the ſame, with all the ſhews of loue and loyaltie to Amurath that might be; vntill that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turks army vnder the leading of Carambey, and in ſo great a confuſion, he took occaſion to put in practiſe what he had long before in his deep conceit plotted, for the deliuery both of himſelf and his country from the Turkiſh bondage and ſlauery. At which time Scanderbeg (for ſo we will henceforth cal him) hauing a little before imparted the matter vnto ſome of his truſty friends and countrymen, no leſſe deſirous of liberty than himſelf, but eſpecially to his couſin Ameſa the ſon of his brother Repoſius, a yong man of great courage; in great confuſion of the Turkiſh army, when euery man was glad to ſhift for himſelf, had euer in his flight a vigilant eye vpon the Baſſa's principal ſecretary; whom E accompanied with a few Turkes, hee with Ameſa and other his faithfull friends cloſely followed as he fled from the ſlaughter: but when he had got the Secretary and his followers in place moſt conuenient for his purpoſe, he ſet vpon the Turks and ſlew them euery one, & carrying the ſecretary away with him faſt bound, when he had brought him whither he thought good, with great threats compelled him (ſore againſt his wil) to write counterfeit letters as from the Baſſa his maſter, vnto the gouernor of Croia, commanding him in Amuraths name, forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg the new choſen gouernor, the charge of the city with the garriſon there: cunningly interlacing many other things in the ſaid letters, wherby the matter might ſeem more probable. Which letters ſo extorted, he preſently ſlew the Secretary, with as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpoſe that his doings might the longer F be kept from Amuraths knowledge, who not hearing what was become of him, might eaſily conjecture that he was ſlain by the Hangarians among the reſt of the Turks.

Whilſt the fame of this great ouerthrow is going to Hadrianople, and there filleth the Turks court with ſorrow and heauineſſe; in the mean time Scanderbeg hauing with him three thouſand Epirot ſouldiers which followed him out of the battell, as men deſirous rather to fight for the liberty of themſelues and of their country, than in the quarrell of the Turk, was G with incredible celeritie come into the vpper country of Dibra, in the borders of Epirus, about 70 miles from Croia: where was moſt joyfully receiued, and ſtaying there but a day, he choſe a few of thoſe 300 he brought with him, to wait vpon him when he went to Croia, as if they had bin his domeſticall ſeruants: the reſt, with other 300 ſouldiers which were then come vnto him out of Dibra, he appointed to be led by ſecret by-wayes thorow the Woods and mountains by perfect guids, vntill they came ſo nigh Croia as was poſſible for them to come vnperceiued; and there to ſtay vntill hee might find opportunity to conuey them into the city to oppreſſe the Turks garriſon. So he with a ſmall company of followers, as if they had bin his priuat retinue, took the way towards Croia. But when he began to draw neer to the city, he ſent Ameſa before with two ſeruitors attending vpon him, as if he had bin his Se- H cretary, to certifie the gouernor of his comming. This yong gentleman, as he was of a ſharpe wit and well ſpoken, ſo had he framed his ſpeech and attyre, that hee ſeemed to bee a naturall Turke. Who as ſoon as he was come into the city, went vnto the Gouernor, whom after hee had ſaluted according the Turkiſh manner, he deliuered his meſſage as from Scanderbeg his maſter, with ſo good grace, and words ſo wel placed, that all he ſaid was verily beleeued for truth. But when Scanderbeg himſelf came, and had deliuered the great Commaunders Letters, the Gouernor made no further queſtion of the matter, but preſently deliuered vnto him the gouernment of the City, and the next day departed out of Croia with all his houſhold toward Hadrianople. Scanderbeg hauing by this policie got the gouernment of the chief city of Epirus, the next night following found means in the dead time of the night to conuey in- I to the city the ſoldiers of Dibra, who were by this time come according as he had before appointed. Moſt part of them he placed in moſt conuenient places of the city, and for the ſpeedy ſuppreſſion of the Turks garriſon, he with the reſt firſt ſet vpon the Turks which kept the watch vpon the wall, and ſlew them; and afterwards breaking into their priuat houſes, ſlew many of them in their beds: the Chriſtian citiſens alſo taking vp arms at the ſame time, helped to increaſe the ſlaughter of the Turks, ſo that in the ſpace of a few hours there was none of the Turkiſh garriſon left aliue, except ſome few, which were content to forſake their Mahometan ſuperſtition, and to become Chriſtians. Many of the Turks might ſo haue ſaued their liues and would not, chuſing rather to die, and (as it is reported) alſo to kil themſelues, than to forſake that their damnable ſuperſtition; ſo ſmall is the regard of life to reſolute mindes, K in what quarrel ſoeuer.

The city of Croia being thus happily by Scanderbeg recouered (wherin appeared both the greateſt difficulty, and hope of his good or bad ſucces in ſo great an attempt) hee preſently ſent Ameſa back again into Dibra, and other ſpeedy meſſengers alſo into all the parts of Epirus, to diſperſe the news, and to ſtir vp the people to take vp arms for recouery of their loſt liberty. But flying fame, the ſpeedieſt poſt, had preuented the meſſengers by him ſent, and already filled euery corner of Epirus with report of Scanderbegs comming, and of all that was don at Croia: and the oppreſſed Epirots who had long wiſhed to ſee that happy day, were now vp in arms in euery place, wanting nothing but leaders; whoſe comming although they greatly deſired, they ſtaied not therupon, but running together by heaps (as the maner of the L common people is in all great tumults) they ſet vpon the Turks garriſons which lay abroad in the country, and ſlew moſt part of them: wherby it came to paſſe, that no Turke could ſtir in the country, but that he was ſnatched vp and ſlain; ſo that in few days there was not a Turk to be found in Epirus, but ſuch as lay in garriſon in ſtrong towns. In this common fury, the Gouernor of Croia with all his retinu was by the countrey people by the way as he went ſet vpon and ſlain, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recouered Croia, and ſcoured the Countrey, yet to remoue the garriſons which Amurath had put in euery ſtrong city, was thought to be a matter of greateſt importance, and moſt difficulty. For which purpoſe he commanded thoſe whom he had appointed for Captains, ſpeedily to repair vnto Croia with all the power they could make. At M which time alſo diuers Noblemen his nigh kinſmen reſorted to him with their followers: ſo that within a few daies he had together at Croia 12000 ſoldiers well appointed. With this army he marched from Croia to Petrella, a ſtrong City fiue and twenty miles diſtant from Croia, and incamped before it. This City is ſtrongly ſcituat vpon the top of a ſteepe rocky mountain,

A mountain, as all the reſt of the cities of Epirus be, and was by the Turks wel furniſhed with men, munition, and other things needfull; yet Scanderbeg was in hope that the Turkiſh garriſon there, terrified with the fortune of the garriſon of Croia, and the ſlaughter of the Turks in the country round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reaſonable conditions. Which to make proof of, as ſoon as he was incamped, he ſent one of thoſe ſoldiers which had followed him out of Hungary (a faithfull and wiſe fellow) vnto Petrella, to offer vnto the ſoldiers, that if they would yeeld vp the city, it ſhould be at their choice, either to continue in ſeruice with Scanderbeg (with whom they ſhould find moſt bountifull entertainment) or els to depart with bag and baggage at their pleaſure, with an honorable reward to be diuided among them. The ſubtill meſſenger comming thither, and framing his tale according to the preſent occaſion, B and neceſſitie of the time, firſt declared vnto them, how that Amurath of late ouercome by the Hungarians in a great battel, and looking euery day to be ſet vpon by diuers other Chriſtian Princes, was ſo buſy that he had not leiſure to looke into Epirus, or to ſend them any reliefe. After that, he in the name of Scanderbeg offered them the conditions before rehearſed, ſetting the ſame forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way, to conſider the dreadful miſery that but the other day befel to the gariſon at Croia, and others their fellows abroad in the country, whoſe dead bodies as then lay in euery corner of Epirus, as a prey to the hungry dogs and greedy wolues. Which thing was eaſily beleeued of them of the garriſon, for that diuers of the Turks lately fled out of the country into the City, had themſelues ſeen the ſame to be true. The gouernor hauing a little conſidered of the matter, was content C to giue vp the city, vpon condition, that he with the ſoldiers might in ſafety depart with ſuch things as they had; not couenanting vpon any further reward, becauſe it ſhould not bee ſayd that he had ſold the city. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promiſed to performe, the Turkiſh gouernour comming forth with all his garriſon, yeelded vp the city, and Scanderbeg mindful of his promiſe, gaue vnto them both meat and mony, and ſent them with a ſufficient convoy of horſmen in ſafety out of Epirus.

Petrella yeelded to Scanderbeg.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained Petrella, he placed therin a conuenient garriſon, and ſet all things in order as he thought good: but ſuffered none to enter into the City but the appointed garriſon, although it was then very cold and froſty weather. This don, he preſently raiſed his camp, and following his good fortune marched toward Petra-Alba in ſuch haſt, as D if the city had bin running away from him. Well knowing, that though time be euermore pretious, yet neuer more than in martiall affaires, wherein the leaſt moment is oftentimes of ſuch power, as to effect or fruſtrat mens greateſt deſignes. Petra-Alba is a City in the country of Æmathia, diſtant from Petrella three miles, ſtrongly ſcituat vpon the top of a mountain, neer vnto the riuer Æmathus. Scanderbeg had ſcarſly well incamped himſelfe before this City, but that the Gouernor therof, terrified with the fortune of Croia and Petrella, offered to deliuer vp the city on the ſame conditions that were granted at Petrella. Which beeing agreed vpon, the city was forthwith deliuered, and the conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba yeelded.

Petra-Alba being thus taken, and all things ſet in order, Scanderbeg carried with the courſe E of his victory, without delay came to Stelluſa, which is alſo a ſtrong city in Æmathia, fifty miles diſtant from Croia, pleaſantly (as it were of purpoſe) built vpon the top of an high hil, ſtanding in the midſt of a pleaſant and fruitful vally, with great plains round about it. There Scanderbeg incamped a little before the going down of the Sun, and reſted that night. In the morning he ſent a meſſenger to the city, with like conditions as were accepted at Petrella & Petra-Alba: which moſt part of the garriſon ſoldiers of the Turks would gladly haue accepted, but that Deſdrot the Gouernor of the city, with ſome few others, earneſtly withſtood the reſt: wherupon a great contention aroſe amongſt the garriſon ſouldiers. But the greater part deſirous to yeeld vp the city; when they could by no means perſuade the gouernor and thoſe few which took his part, to yeeld to their deſires, they violently ſet vpon him, and deliuered F him with the reſt, to Scanderbeg faſt bound, and ſo yeelded vp the city. For which fact, fearing to return vnto Amurath, ſome of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterward became Chriſtians. The reſt were either honeſtly prouided for, or els well rewarded, and ſuffered to depart whither they would. All the other weaker places of Epirus, wherin any of the Turkiſh garriſons lay, hearing that the ſtrongeſt Cities were already deliuered to Scanderbeg, in ſhort time yeelded themſelues vpon like conditions: only Sfetigrade (otherwiſe called the Holy G city) remained in the poſſeſſion of the Turks: which city is placed in the vpper Countrey of Dibra, in the frontiers of Epirus, vpon the top of a high ſteep hill, as if it were an Eagles neſt. Vnto this city came Scanderbeg with all his army; and hauing placed his tents, he began firſt to aſſay if he could gain it by compoſition, as he had don the reſt: and the rather to moue them by the examples of others, he cauſed his Embaſſadors to declare vnto them all that had hapned at Croia, Petrella, Petra-Alba, & Stelluſa, ſpecially how he had vſed the gariſon of Stelluſa which yeelded vnto him, with all bounty and curteſie; and how that on the contrary hee had the gouernor in bands, with all his wilful partakers, whom they ſhould preſently ſee executed before their faces, if they forthwith deliuered not the city. This meſſage troubled the minds of all the garriſon, but eſpecially of the gouernour, ſeeing before his eies in the woſull H example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himſelf. Wherefore fearing to deliuer his own opinion, and giue anſwer to the Embaſſadors, for offending the inconſtant multitude and vnknown minds of the people; he firſt entertained the Embaſſadors honourably, and afterwards turning himſelf vnto the citiſens and ſoldiers, ſaid vnto them, Worthy men and moſt faithfull ſoldiers, what is your pleaſure, or what ſhall we anſwer to theſe our enemies demaunds? Then one of the ſouldiers that ſtood by, a rough bold ſpirited fellow, vnwilling for his owne part to giue vp the city, and deeming the gouernor to be of the ſame mind, in that he termed them worthy and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemy, drawing out his ſword, and with his right hand ſhaking it on high, anſwered:

I

A notabl ſpeech of a Common ſouldier to the reſt of his Fellowes, for the holding out of the city againſt Scanderbeg.

Moſt valiant Gouernor, this ſame and the like ſhall make anſwer for vs. Nothing was to leſſe purpoſe, than with premeditated words to ſeek to terrifie valiant minds, firſt with the diuers fortune of Croia, and then of Stelluſa: for as the faces and countenances of men are diuers, ſo alſo are their manners and diſpoſitions. Euery man wiſely directeth his own actions according to his own proper humour, and by the ſame playes the fool or bedlam. We preſcribe no lawes to them of Petrella, nor to them of Stelluſa, neither let them preſcribe any vnto vs. Let neuer ſo baſe examples of cowardly ſlaues euer enter into the thoughts of couragious men. Braue minds diſdain to imitate other men in their honeſt actions, much leſſe in their cowardiſe. And why? for euery man liueth after his own faſhion. Wherfore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kil the gouernor of Stelluſa before our faces, let him ſacrifice our fellow ſoldiers; do you therfore think that we ſhall die in their bodies? ſhall our liuing ſpirits be there extinguiſhed? ſhall our bloud there bee K ſpilt? But ô happy bodies, ô ghoſts of me euer to be reuerenced, which in worthy defence of your liberty and faith haue indifferently contemned gold, ſiluer, death, and torture, and whatſoeuer els miſerable worldlings hold dear or diſmall! Wherfore carry thou back again vnto thy maſter this anſwer from a common ſoldier, If he ſeek to impoſe thoſe conditions vpon vs, let him once more bare that arm of his, which men of courage fear not ſo much as he thinketh. He may peraduenture inforce vs to theſe conditions of his, if God forſake vs; but aſſuredly, perſuade vs vnto them ſhall he neuer. And yet for all that, your Maſter Scanderbeg is not the man we haue long ſince heard him reported to be, of an honourable minde, eaſie to forgiue, and one that will indifferently iudge betwixt the enemy and himſelf: for why then doth he hold in bonds the gouernor of Stelluſa, for that he freely, iuſtly, and honorably ſtood in defence of his King, his faith and liberty? Why doth he threaten him with death, wheras he hath not deſerued the ſame, although L he hath reſolutely offered himſelfe therunto for defence of his liberty.

All they which were preſent liſtned with great attention to the ſouldiers ſpeech, neither was he interrupted by any vntill he had ſaid what he would. Then the ſouldiers thronging about him, and beating their ſwords and targets together, withall gaue a great ſhout, in token that they all approued his ſpeech for anſwer. So the Gouernour incouraged with the cheerfulnes of his ſouldiers, returned the Embaſſadour without other anſwer than that of the common ſouldiers, and preſently appointed euery man to his charge, and with great cheerfulnes ordered all things for the better defence of the City. But when Scanderbeg had heard the anſwer that was ſent him from the City, deliuered by the mouth of a common Souldier, hee M

ſmiled therat, and ſaid, He is vndoubtedly a valiant ſouldier, if his deeds be anſwerable to his words: but if my force fail me not, I will alſo make him happy amongſt the happy ghoſts of them of Stelluſa. And by and by after, he commaunded the Gouernour of Stelluſa with the other Captiues to be brought before him, and there cauſed ſome of them which were content voluntarily to

A forſake their Mahometan ſuperſtition, to be preſently baptiſed, to the great griefe of the other Turks. Deſdrot the gouernor with the reſt, to the terror of the defendants, were in their ſight put to death: whereupon the garriſon ſouldiers with great indignation gaue a great ſhout from the wall, and bitterly railed vpon the Chriſtians.

Deſdrot gouernor of Stelluſa, executed.

Scanderbeg conſidering the ſtrength of the city, with the time of the yeare, vnfit for ſouldiers to keep the field, for Winter was now grown on, left Moſes Golemus, a moſt valiant captain, with a garriſon of three thouſand ſouldiers, to keepe in the Turks garriſon at Sfetigrade, and to defend the borders of Epirus, vntill he might at more conuenient time himſelfe returne againe to the ſiege: and ſo with the reſt of his army repaired to Croia; when he had in the ſpace of little more than one month, to his immortall praiſe, recouered his kingdome, and driuen B the Turks out of euery corner of Epirus; excepting only Sfetigrade: which city alſo not long after was by compoſition deliuered vnto him. During all this time, from his firſt comming into Epirus, he neuer ſlept aboue two houres in a night, but with reſtleſſe labor proſecuted his affairs. He euer fought againſt the Turks with his arme bare, and that with ſuch fierceneſſe, that the bloud did oftentimes burſt out of his lips. It is written, that he with his owne hand ſlew three thouſand Turks, in the time of his warres againſt them. But of his great and worthy victories obtained againſt the two mighty Turkiſh Kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his ſonne, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force and policy wrung his inheritance out of Amuraths hands, and ſcoured the Turks out of euery corner of Epirus; he proceeded further, and C ouerran part of Macedonia, making ſundry incurſions into the heart of that country, being then in the Turks poſſeſſion, whereby he ſo enriched his ſouldiers, that they deſired of him no better pay. Which was ſo vſuall a thing with this reſtleſſe Prince, as that it began to grow into a prouerbe in moſt Princes courts, That the ſpoile of Amurath his dominion, was Scanderbegs reuenues. Complaints hereof came dayly to Amuraths court, which the crafty aged ſire (being then troubled with the Hungarian warres) ſeemed at the firſt to make no great account of, but as of that he could eaſily and at his pleaſure remedy; although he was therewith inwardly grieued at the heart. But when the certaine report of one miſchiefe as it were in the necke of another, continually ſounded in his eares, and that he ſaw no end to be expected of theſe miſeries, he ſent Alis Baſſa, one of his greateſt men of war, with an army of forty thouſand ſelect D ſouldiers, at once to ſubdue the country of Epirus, and to bring it againe vnder his obeiſance.
The ſetting forth of this great army, vnder the conduct of ſo famous a captaine, repleniſhed the minds of the Turks with ſuch an aſſured hope of victory, that a man would haue thought Scanderbeg had bin already taken, and now brought to execution: yea the common ſoldiers before their ſetting forth, were oftentimes at vain contention for the diuiſion of the ſpoile they were neuer like to haue: So ready are men to promiſe wonders to themſelues, whileſt they conferre but with their own deſires. And on the other ſide, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the ſmall country of Epirus, with great terror and feare of Alis Baſſaes comming. The countrymen with their families fled into the ſtrong cities, and the citiſens within their wals fell to fortifying the ſame, and kept continual watch and ward, as if the enemy had euen then lien faſt E by them: the aged men & women commended themſelues and al theirs, firſt to God by praiers and then to the courage of the luſty ſoldiers with tears, as in caſe of extreme peril and danger.
Only Scanderbeg was nothing moued either with the terrible report of the Baſſaes comming, or the vain feare of his ſubjects, but alwaies kept the ſame cheerfulnes both of countenance & ſpeech, as he was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkiſh wars, and hauing (as was ſuppoſed) certain intelligence before from his ſegret friends in the Turks court, of all Amuraths deſignes. So that hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafety of his country, he began to leauy an army at Croia: at which time moſt part of his ſubjects of Epirus, which were able to beare armes, repaired vnto him: the confederat Chriſtian Princes alſo, his neighbors, and for moſt part his kinſmen, ſent to him great ſupplies: beſide other deuout and warlike F minded Chriſtians, which voluntarily reſorted vnto him from far, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he choſe only 8000 horſemen and ſeuen thouſand foot, when as he might haue raiſed a far greater army: and placing ſome few in garriſons in the frontier cities where he thought moſt conuenient, all the reſt he ſent home againe to their dwellings.
At which his confidencie, his friends, yea and his enemies alſo much marueiled, that when he might

Macedonia ſpoiled by Scanderbeg.

Alis Baſſa with an army of forty thouſand ſent againſt Scanderbeg.

The battell betwixt Alis Baſſa & Scanderbeg.

A great ſlaughter of the Turks might haue had ſo many, he would take the field with ſo few: with which ſmall army of fifteen G thouſand, he marched from Croia, foureſcore miles to Dybra: where hearing by his eſpials, of the approch of his enemies, after he had with cheerfull ſpeech encouraged his ſouldiers, he encamped with his army in the lower country of Dibra, neere vnto a wood ſide, right in the way where the Baſſa muſt needs paſſe. In which wood he placed Gnee Muſachee, and Ameſa in ambuſh with three thouſand men: commanding them to ſtand cloſe, vntill they ſaw he had throughly joyned battell with the Baſſa, and then with all their force to breake forth vpon his rereward. The Baſſa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg, a little before the going downe of the Sun, and there reſted that night, making great ſhew of mirth and joy, with great fires in euery corner of the campe, as the Turkiſh manner of encamping is.

Wheras in Scanderbegs campe, all things were ſilent, and no ſhew of any fire at all; for ſo Scanderbeg H had commanded: which made the Turks the more careleſſe, deeming thereby the Chriſtians as good as already diſcouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his army in order of battell, placing Tanuſius in the left wing, with fifteen hundred horſemen, and as many foot; and Moſes in the right with like number: and leading the maine battell himſelfe, the rereward was committed to Vranacontes, a man renowned in thoſe daies, both for his grauity in councel, and for his valour in armes fit to command or to be commanded; but afterwards, amongſt the reſt, moſt famous for the worthy defending of Croia againſt Amurath, being then there himſelfe in perſon. Alis Baſſa contemning the ſmall number of Scanderbegs army, ſeeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order thereof, gaue the firſt charge with a ſmall troup of horſmen: who at the firſt incounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpoſe that the Chriſtians I haſtily purſuing their vntimely hope, might diſorder their battel, & ſo giue occaſion to their owne ouerthrow. But by the commandement of Scanderbeg (who eaſily perceiued the Baſſaes meaning) their dangerous forwardnes was warily waied, and all with ſafety kept in good order.
So both armies comming on, the wings began the battel afreſh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Baſſa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the battels were throughly joyned, Muſachee and Ameſa ſuddenly iſſued out of the wood, and fiercely ſet vpon the rereward of the Turks army, where they made great ſlaughter, and forced many of the Turks for feare to fly. Thus was the Baſſaes great army driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly beſet and laid vnto with a ſmall number. The Baſſa had placed his beſt ſoldiers neereſt vnto himſelfe in the maine battel, as his moſt aſſured ſtrength K and laſt refuge: theſe valiant men ſtood faſt, and renewed the battell, before almoſt loſt. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a ſtand: vntill that the well aduiſed and valiant captaine Vranacontes hauing receiued the wearied ſoldiers into the rereward, and ſetting al things there in ſafety, accompanied with certain troups of freſh ſoldiers which he brought out of the rereward, brake through the Baſſaes army with ſuch ſlaughter of the Turks, that he made way for Scanderbeg & all the reſt of his army. The Turks diſcomforted with the inuincible courage of theſe old ſoldiers, and the ſlaughter of their fellows, which lay by heaps wallowing in their own blood, betooke themſelues to flight; whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued, and ſlew of them two and twenty thouſand: at which time were alſo two thouſand others taken priſoners, with foure and twenty of the Turks enſignes: whereas of the Chriſtians were ſlain not paſt an L hundreth and twenty. The enemies tents with all their carriages, were at the ſame time taken alſo. After this great victory, when Scanderbeg had made all his ſeuen thouſand footmen, horſmen, by giuing vnto them the horſes of the ſlain Turks, he brake into the enemies country, and entred farre into Macedonia, where he filled the deſires of his ſouldiers with the wealth and ſpoile thereof, ſparing nothing that fire and ſword could deuoure: and ſo with victory returned to Croia, where he was of his ſubjects joyfully receiued. Alis Baſſa with the remainder of his diſcomfited army, returned to Hadrianople, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardiſe and want of diſcretion, for that he had loſt ſo puiſſant an army to ſo weak an enemy.
Whereof when he had cleared himſelfe by the modeſt rehearſall of his former victories, and the teſtimony of all the other captains preſent with him in that battell, he was pardoned, and M ſo againe receiued into fauour, and that great ouerthrow imputed to the chance of war.

Amurath in deſpaire.

Amurath hauing receiued two ſo great ouerthrows, firſt from Huniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg, and ſeeing himſelfe elſewhere beſet with ſo many miſchiefs, as that he could not tell which way to turne himſelfe; tormented with deſpaire, and deſire of reuenge,

Amurath by the perſuaſion of Caly Baſſa, ſeeketh for peace of K. Vladiſlaus

The capitulations of the ten yeres peace concluded betwixt Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

A uenge, whereof he ſaw ſmall poſſibility, fell into ſuch a melancholy paſſion, that ouercome with the darke conceits thereof, hee was about to haue become the bloudy executioner of himſelfe, had not Caly Baſſa by his graue aduice comforted vp his dying ſpirits: by whoſe perſuaſion (contrary to his haughty nature) he yeelded by his Embaſſadors ſent for the ſame purpoſe, to deſire peace of Vladiſlaus King of Hungary; vſing the exiled Deſpot of Seruia (his father in law) then preſent with the King, as a meane therein. Who at the firſt gaue ſmall credit vnto the Embaſſadors, or vnto ſuch things as they told him, vntill that at length better perſuaded of the true meaning of the Turke, he ſo wrought the matter both with the King and the reſt of the nobility, and eſpecially with Huniades, that there was an honourable peace concluded.
The capitulations whereof were, firſt, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces and garriſons, B ſhould clearely depart out of Seruia, and reſtore the ſame vnto the poſſeſſion of George the Deſpot, the right lord and owner thereof; deliuering alſo freely vnto him his two ſonnes, Stephen and George, who bereft of their ſight, he had long time kept in ſtreit priſon. Alſo, That from thenceforth he ſhould make no claime vnto the kingdome of Moldauia, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had in the laſt wars loſt. And finally, That he ſhould not inuade or moleſt the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace: and to pay 40000 duckats for the ranſome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkiſh tyrant had full ſore againſt his will condeſcended, a peace for ten yeres was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the ſame by ſolemne oath confirmed: King Vladiſlaus taking his oath vpon the holy Euangeliſts, and Amurath (by his Embaſſadors) vpon their Turkiſh Alcoran.
C This was the moſt honorable peace that euer Chriſtian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkiſh Kings, and moſt profitable alſo, had it beene with like ſincerity kept, as it was with ſolemnity confirmed.

Amurath inuadeth Caramania

Amurath with this peace deliuered of his greateſt feare, conuerted all his forces againſt the Caramanian king, in reuenge of the injuries by him don whileſt he was occupied in the Hungarian wars. This King of Caramania knowing himſelfe vnable to withſtand ſo great an enemy, durſt neither meet him in the field, nor truſt himſelfe to the ſtrength of any his cities or ſtrong caſtles, but fled into the mountaines, there fortifying himſelfe more ſure than in any other his ſtrong holds. Amurath entring into Caramania, made great ſpoyle in the country as he went, and tooke great booties. At laſt comming to Iconium, he laid hard ſiege to the ſame.
D The poore King ſeeing his Kingdome thus ſpoyled, and his chiefe city in danger to be loſt, ſent Embaſſadors, and with them his wife alſo, which was Amuraths ſiſter, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yearely the double tribute which he before payd, and for the performance thereof to giue his ſonne in hoſtage. Vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and ſo returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldeſt ſonne died, to the great griefe of his aged father, being ſlaine with a fall from his horſe as he was hunting.

Old Amurath thorowly wearied with continuall warres and other troubles incident vnto reſtleſſe roomes, reſolued now to retire himſelfe to a more priuat and quiet kind of life: and therefore ſent for his ſon Mahomet, being then but fifteene yeares old, to whom he voluntarily reſigned his kingdome, appointing Caly Baſſa his tutor, with one Choſroë a learned Doctor of E their law, to be his truſty councellors and chiefe directors. And ſo taking with him Hamze-Beg one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greateſt pleaſure, departed to Magneſia, and there as a man weary of the world, gaue himſelfe to a ſolitary and monaſticall kind of life, in the company of certaine religious Turkiſh Monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, glad before of the Hungarian victory, were now no leſſe ſorry to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt King Vladiſlaus and the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, that the proſecution of this war ſo happily begun, would haue bin the vtter ruin & deſtruction of the Turkiſh kingdom. Whereſore they ſought by all poſſible meanes to induce the young King Vladiſlaus to breake the league he had ſo lately and ſo ſolemnly made with the Turke: eſpecially Iohn Palæologus the F Emperor of Conſtantinople, did by letters importune the King to remember the confederation he had made with the other Chriſtian Princes, for the maintenance of the wars againſt the common enemy of Chriſtianity: which Princes were now preſt, and ready (as he ſaid) to aſſiſt him with their promiſed aid: adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had diuers times ſought to joyne with him in amity and friendſhip, he had vtterly rejected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuerſal profit (like to enſue to al Chriſtendome by that religious war) before G his own proper ſecurity and profit, being for his part in readineſſe to joine his forces with the Kings, if he would preſently enter into armes: which he could neuer doe in better time than now, whileſt Amurath terrified with his late ouerthrow, and ſtill beſet with doubtfull war, had drawn his greateſt forces out of Europe into Aſia, in ſuch diſordred haſt, as that it ſhould ſeem he rather fled for feare of his enemies in Europe, than marched to encounter his enemies in Aſia, and now being weary of all, had betaken himſelfe to a priuat kind of life. To conclude, he requeſted the King, not to leaue him and the other Chriſtian Princes of ſmall power, as a prey to the Turke, who would aſſuredly with all hoſtility inuade them, ſo ſoone as he thought himſelfe ſafe from the danger of the Hungarians. At the ſame time alſo, and vpon the departure of the Turks Embaſſadors, for the performance of ſuch things as they had promiſed, letters H came from Francis the Cardinall of Florence, Generall of the Chriſtian fleet, declaring how that Amurath hauing left almoſt none in Europe, was with all the power he could make, gon ouer into Aſia againſt the Caramanian King, leauing a moſt faire occaſion for the Chriſtians, eaſily to recouer whatſoeuer they had before loſt in Europe, and that he was in good time come with his fleet to the ſtreits of Helleſpontus, according to promiſe, and there lay ready to imbarke the Turks paſſage backe againe out of Aſia. Both theſe letters being read in the councell, ſo much moued the King, with all the reſt of the Nobility of Hungary there preſent, as that they were neuer more ſorry or aſhamed for any thing they had done in their liues, than for the league ſo lately with Amurath concluded: for why, they ſaw that all the plot they had laid for their immortall glory, was now by this haſty peace that they had made with I the Turke, without the good liking and knowledge of the confederats, brought to nought; and that they had thereby moſt ſhamefully deceiued the generall expectation that the Chriſtian common-weale had conceiued of them; and that they, of long time called the protectors of the Chriſtian faith, the defenders of true religion, the reuengers of Chriſts name, and deliuerers of the faithfull nations; ſhould now be accounted the breakers of the Chriſtian league, men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greekes, contemners of immortality, and louers of their own profit only. In this doubtfulneſſe of minds whileſt they ſtood yet thus wauering, Iulian the Cardinall and Legat, alwaies an enemy to the peace, and by reaſon of his place, a man in greateſt authority next to the King, took occaſion to diſſuade the ſame as followeth: K

The cunning Speech wherewith Iulian the Cardinall perſuadeth K. Vladiſlaus to break the League he had before made with Amurath.

If any of you, right Worthy (ſaid he) ſhall haply maruell that I ſhould ſpeake of breaking the league, and violating our faith, let him firſt vnderſtand, That I at this preſent am to perſuade you to nothing elſe but the faithfull obſeruing both of the one and the other: led with like repentance with you; repentance, I ſay, not ſorrow, when as I, as from a watch-tower foreſeeing all theſe things which were decreed againſt my will, to ſort alſo contrary to your expectation, am not for the duty of my legation, and the Zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion, inforced with you to doubt: and ſo much the rather, for that at this preſent the queſtion is of the loſſe and hazard of all our honors and credit in common: which except we by common conſent, and wonted valor, endeauour to amend, ô how much is it to be feared, leſt for ſhame neither may you go out of Hungary, or I return to Rome, where all things are with moſt deepe judgement cenſured. Conſider I pray L you, into what miſeries this haſty reſolution hath caſt vs. We haue entred into league with the Turke, an Infidel, to violate our faith with the Chriſtians, and to breake the holy league before made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes our confederats. And that for what, for what profit I ſay? Forſooth, that ſo we might againe recouer Seruia, long before deſtroied. Verily a ſmall and wofull profit, which may againe in ſhort time be cut off, and depriueth vs of others far greater, and of much longer continuance.
For, what can be more fond and inconſiderat, than in our conſultations to haue regard to our priuat profit only, and not to the publcike, without reſpect of religion, honeſty, or conſcience? It is not demanded of you at this preſent, (right Honourable) what you owe vnto the perjured Turke; but you are by me Iulian, the great Biſhops and the confederat Chriſtian Princes Legat, and Agent, before the tribunall ſeat of your owne conſciences, accuſed of breach of faith, breach of league, and breach of promiſe; and thereof euen by M your-owne judgement, rather than by the judgement of God, or other men, I will condemne you. Anſwere me you noble Worthies: After you had happily ſix moneths made wars againſt the Turks in Bulgaria and the borders of Thracia; and after that, triumphantly returning into Hungary, receiued you not honourable embaſſages from almoſt all Italy, and from the great Emperor, with common rejoycing for your ſo glorious

A rious a victory, and exhortations to continue the war? We receiued them. Did not you in my preſence, and I the author thereof, willingly make a moſt holy league with the Italians and Greeks; That the one ſhould with their aid and power meet you out of Thracia; and the other with a great fleet ſhould come into the Helleſpontus? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks? or by what right can you keepe the ſame, being made? Wherefore if the laſt yeare you made a league with the great Biſhop, (God his Vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Chriſtians, this ſecond league is to be broken, leſt you ſhould violate the firſt, and that a moſt Chriſtian league: which except you do, I feare leaſt as Iudas betraied Chriſt, ſo you may ſeeme to betray his Vicar; or that God, whom hitherto you haue alwaies found preſent, propitious, and fauourable, you ſhall hereafter finde him angry, and an enemy to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me, What will you anſwer vnto the Conſtantinopolitan B Emperour; who according to your appointment, hath now with the firſt taken the field, and in ſo great an opportunity expecteth but your comming? What will you anſwer the great Biſhop? What the Venetians and Genowaies, who haue their great fleet ready, as was appointed? What the Burgundians, who for their Zeale vnto the Chriſtian faith and religion, haue long ſince paſſed the Ocean, and ſo by many dangers of the ſea now flote in the Helleſpont? Deuiſe (I pray you) if you can, ſome excuſe and colour, that we may not ſeeme altogether vnlike our ſelues: if out of your hidden skill you can coyne any thing, ſhew it. You promiſed with the firſt of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your ſouldiers both the Spring and Summer, play; ſo great and ſo wholeſome occaſion paſsing away, thorow your wofull ſloth and negligence. O the great blindneſſe of mens minds! O groſſe cowardiſe! O deteſtable League, made to the deſtruction of the Commonweale! Some man happely will blame me, and aske, why I ſuffered it with C the reſt? I was preſent, I muſt confeſſe; but as much as in me was, I intreated it might not be. I diſliked it; and (as many of you here preſent can teſtifie) I vtterly condemned it. I was ouercome by the wiſedom and authority of Huniades, and the compaſsion of the Deſpot, leſt (vnhappy man) he ſhould by my interceſsion ſeeme longer to want his Kingdome: and leſt any man ſhould call me a contemner or impugner of your good; I, full of ſorrow, and vnwillingly, gaue way: not ignorant, the health of the Chriſtian Commonweale to be therein weakened, the hope of your immortall glory extinguiſhed, and vs all (by your leaue may I ſay it) accounted breakers both of diuine and humane Leagues, forſworne men, and traitors vnto all good Chriſtians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiouſneſſe be further bruted, we deliuer our ſelues from this infamy, nothing can be greater, or more miſerable, than our ſhame or villany. If we will ſo do, we may not ſo eaſily, as juſtly and religiouſly do it: Hauing made reſtitution of Seruia and the D captiues, what remaineth elſe for you to do, (Noble Worthies) but to repaire your Army, to prepare what ſo is needfull for war, and to keepe your firſt League with the Chriſtian Princes? And to ſay, That King Vladiſlaus, after his league made with the Greeke and Latine Princes, could not without the conſent of theſe his Confederates and Allyes (vnder whoſe good fortune that common warre was vndertaken) conclude any thing, eſpecially with the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion? And that therefore if any thing were agreed vpon betwixt him and the Turke, it was fruſtrate, and the league to be ſtood vpon. Who is ſo partiall an eſteemer of mens actions, that would not eaſily judge, That in caſe, faith were giuen to both, it were rather to be kept with a Chriſtian, than with a Turke; with a Beleeuer, than with an Infidell? Againſt a perfidious enemy it is lawfull (as they ſay) for a man to vſe all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraud with fraud. By craft the Turke firſt paſſed ouer into Europe, by little and little he E crept into that kingdome, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by ſtrength: and are you become ſo blinde, as to thinke it better to keepe your promiſe with the Turke, deuoid of all faith and humanity, rather than with the faithfull Chriſtians, and eſpecially the moſt holy Biſhop.

All great things are done by aduice and policy: the Romans our anceſtors vprightly and religiouſly alwaies kept the leagues with their confederates, but deluded the deceitfull with their cunning. Cæſar was of opinion, that for ſoueraignty the Law was ſometime to be broken. And Philip (the father and maſter of of him that conquered Aſia) oftentimes vſed cunning and deceit for the deſire of rule: yet were not theſe men called traitors. It is ſometime lawfull for the common-weals ſake, neither to ſtand to our leagues, neither to keepe our faith with them that be themſelues faithleſſe. Lawfull it is to breake vnlawfull oathes, and eſpecially ſuch as are thought to be againſt right, reaſon, and equity. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, F vowing for to ſacrifice vnto the gods whomſoeuer he firſt met at his returne into his country, to kill his ſon by that his vow and oath? Verily it was a great impiety. Wherefore a juſt and lawfull oath is in the judgement of all men to be religiouſly kept; but ſuch an oath as tendeth not onely vnto priuate, but publike deſtruction, that ought not to be vaine and fruſtrate. Wherefore before your faithleſſe dealing be further ſpread abroad, I beſeech you worthy men, and thee eſpecially, moſt glorious King, not in any point to violate your faith, for the good of the Chriſtian common weale, giuen vnto the moſt holy father and the other G Chriſtian Princes. The league you haue made with the Greeks and the Latines, faithfully and religiouſly keepe; the expedition by common conſent taken in hand, by the example of your confederates, proſecute; the foundation of immortall glory by you laid, build vp. Deliuer the Chriſtian Prouinces, oppreſſed with the Turkiſh ſeruitude; ſatisfie the hope conceiued of you, and deceiue not the expectation the world hath now conceiued of you, than which, nothing can be more diſhonourable: make no conſcience of the league you haue made with the Infidell, but thinke it a great impiety and wickedneſſe, to violate the holy league made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes: thinking, that if you ſhould doe otherwiſe, God (which he of his mercy forbid) would become of that your falſified faith a moſt ſeuere and ſharpe reuenger: and that you can do nothing more acceptable vnto our Sauiour Chriſt, or more glorious to your ſelues, than to deliuer the oppreſſed Chriſtian countries from the cruell ſlauery and bondage of the Turke. Suffer H not this ſo fit an occaſion to ſlip away, than which, a fitter can neuer be giuen. Europe is vnfurniſhed of the Turks, buſied in the Caramanian war; their returne is embarred by the Chriſtian fleet, now in the ſea of Helleſpontus; you need but to goe ſee, and as it were to take a view of Thracia, Macedonia, Grecia, and Epirus, there is no enemy there left to oppoſe himſelfe againſt you. Wherefore for God his cauſe, I requeſt you aboue all things to continue the Chriſtian league, and with your happy and victorious forces, to march forward into Macedonia and Thracia, as is before by you with the other Chriſtian Princes your confederates agreed.

In concluſion, hauing much ſpoken of the authority and power of the great Biſhop, he in his name diſannulled the league whatſoeuer, by the King made with the Turke; and abſolued I him, with the reſt whom it might concerne, from the oath they had giuen, and the promiſe they had made. Which ſo well contented both the King and the reſt, that there was now no more queſtion of the oath, or of the lawfulneſſe of the war, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Chriſtian Princes their confederats, and for the proſecution of the wars againſt the Turks, as was with them before agreed: whom, they could now ſay, they were not to forſake, and to leaue them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedy enemy; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their requeſt they had taken vp arms in their quarrell. Vnto which vnfortunat Decree, both the Deſpot and Huniades (the chiefe authors of the late peace betweene the King and Amurath) eaſily conſented: the Deſpot, induced with the great hope he had conceiued of the good ſucceſſe of the war; and Huniades, with the deſire K of the Kingdome of Bulgaria, promiſed vnto him by Vladiſlaus, and by faire Charter alſo (as ſome ſaid) aſſured vnto him.

Of this the Kings reſolution for the breach of the peace with the Turks, notice was with all ſpeed giuen vnto the Conſtantinopolitan Emperour, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of ſeuenty gallies at the ſtreits of Helleſpontus: for feare leaſt they hearing of the former concluded peace, ſhould alter alſo, or elſe quite deſiſt from their former purpoſes. In the mean time, whileſt theſe things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereof, according to his promiſe had withdrawne all his garriſons out of Seruia, and other places before agreed vpon in the late concluded peace, reſtoring the ſame vnto the Deſpot and others the lawfull owners, although it was not done at the very prefixed day at which it ſhould haue L beene done. In which time alſo he ſet at liberty great numbers of captiues, and amongſt the reſt, the two blind ſons of the Prince of Seruia; faithfully performing whatſoeuer he had before vpon his religion promiſed in the league with the Chriſtians before concluded, ſo deſirous he was of peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit Vladiſlaus, by the counſell of Huniades, detained to his own vſe certain of the ſtrong holds in Seruia: for which cauſe, George the Deſpot euer afterwards bore a ſecret grudge againſt Huniades.

Now as King Vladiſlaus (hauing by the perſuaſion of Iulian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him and Amurath) was preparing his forces, the fame of the Epirot Prince Scanderbeg was alſo (by the recouery of his fathers kingdome of Epirus out of the Turks hands, and by the late ouerthrow of Alis Baſſa) growne great, euery one ſpeaking of him honour and M praiſe. Wherwith Vladiſlaus moued, and reaſonably perſuaded what a furtherance it would be vnto his haughty deſignes (aiming at no leſſe than the vtter ouerthrow of the Turks kingdom in Europe) if he might vnto his owne great preparations joyne alſo the ſtrength of that ſo fortunate a Prince, by the conſent of his Nobility, with all ſpeed diſpatched away his Embaſſadors

A dors with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honourable purpoſe for the rooting out of the Turks; and in that common cauſe praying his aid againſt ſuch a dangerous and dreadfull enemy. The purport whereof here followeth:

Vladiſlaus King of Hungary and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg Prince of Epirus, greeting.

The Letters of king Vladiſlaus to Scanderbeg.

It may be that ſome good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation vntill this preſent, to the intent we might at this time, together with you, rejoyce in the double ſucceſſe of your proſperity: firſt, for the happy recouery of your eſtate; and then, for that the ſame hath by your wiſedome and valour, of late B beene ſo notably defended. Wherefore in this we rejoyce, not onely in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Chriſtians, that it hath pleaſed God of his goodneſſe, by your valour to haue giuen ſo great an increaſe and comfort vnto the Chriſtian commonweale: for as much as amongſt others our great euils, the loſſe of the Albanian people hath not beene to be accounted the leaſt, at ſuch time as Iohn Caſtriot, a worthy Prince, your father, oppreſſed by Amurath, and by the vngratefull Deſtinies taken out of this world, had neither the meanes to leaue vnto you his kingdome and ſcepter, (as vnto his ſonne, then liuing in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwiſe to prouide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, moſt happy in ſuch a ſonne, might haue till now liued: whoſe felicity had in that ſurmounted all others, if he might haue ſeene you before his death. For as you ſeeme vnto me aboue all other Princes in the world (without offence be it ſaid) moſt accompliſhed with all the good graces and perfections both of body and C mind; ſo are you indowed alſo with a certaine diuine and wonderfull fortune: vnder the good conduct whereof, not only the whole Kingdome of Epirus may thinke it ſelfe in ſecurity, but all the reſt of the other nations alſo, lately by the deteſtable fraud and violence of the Othoman Kings diſmembred from the realme of Macedon, may alſo recouer the former beauty of their antient lawes and liberties. For (to ſay nothing of thoſe things which euen from your childhood hauing continually made you enuied, haue heretofore purchaſed vnto you an immortall fame and glory euen amongſt the Barbarians themſelues) what can be more glorious than this victory, which (as we haue heard, and beleeue) you, to your ſingular admiration, haue obtained, by the ouerthrow and vtter diſcomfiture of Alis Baſſa, with his ſo great and mighty a power? but now, ô Scanderbeg (God ſo appointing it, who in his deepe and ſecret wiſedome hath reſerued you vnto theſe ſo dangerous times, for the publike good, and comfort of the Chriſtian Common- D weale) there offers it ſelfe vnto you an object of far greater glory, with a faire and fit occaſion for you to reuenge your ſelfe of all the wrongs and injuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan done, not in priuate to the perſon of your ſelfe onely, but vnto the whole ſtate and Kingdome of Epirus alſo; and not the domeſticall and ciuile miſeries of your owne Countrey onely, but the publike calamities alſo, and thoſe opprobrious diſgraces done againſt the Chriſtian Faith and Religion in generall, now oppreſſed (I will not ſay extinguiſhed:) and that is, if you with your victorious Forces, will ſuccour vs in this extremity of our affaires, not yet altogether deſperate. Hereunto do all the Princes of Hungary and Polonia, and all other men of courage inuite you; Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell intreateth you; with all thoſe deuout and couragious Chriſtians, which long ſince here with vs, and ready in armes, wiſh for nothing more than the preſence of your victorious enſignes. Which ſo faire an occaſion (by God himſelfe now of- E fered) if you refuſe not, will in all mens judgement be a ſure meane to vanquiſh and ouerthrow our common enemy the Turke, and to driue him quite out of Europe, wrongfully by him of ſo long time poſſeſſed. I need not therefore (as I ſuppoſe) to vſe any kinde of perſuaſion vnto you in this cauſe and quarrell, the defence whereof both purchaſe vnto vs health, light, and liberty: but being neglected, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may enſue thereof. We Chriſtians haue beene too too ſlacke and backeward in helping one another: the flame hath now well neere conſumed vs all, whileſt no man thought it would haue come neere himſelfe. What do we ſee of the Greeke Empire? What of the Bulgarians and Seruians? yea, mine owne loſſes, and many calamities, already, and yet alſo to be endured, who is able to recount? The braue and moſt valiant Princes, the ſureſt Bulwarkes and defences of the Kingdome of Hungary, from time to time loſt; and the puiſſant Armies with one and the ſame fatall chance of war conſumed and brought to nothing, F who is able to reckon vp? In ſo much that there is no houſe, wife, nor matron, in all Hungary, which is not in ſome meaſure partaker of this heauineſſe. All this do the Chriſtian Princes heare of, and yet the miſerable eſtate and condition of their allies can nothing moue any one of them, but ſuffer vs thus as a ſacrifice for the reſt, to be on all parts expoſed to the rage and fury of the common and mercileſſe enemy.

G Only Eugenius the moſt holy Biſhop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgondy, haue not refuſed to beare a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune: the one hath ſent hither his Legat Iulian the Cardinall, with notable and puiſſant ſuccors; and the other with his fleet at ſea, and come as far as Helleſpontus, ſo much as in him lieth, doth notably hinder the Turks paſſage into Europe. And one other hope there is, not now far from vs, and that is your helpe, whereof we are ſo deſirous: which we require of you, moued thereunto partly by your valour ſo well knowne, and partly in regard of the imminent perill and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how euill you be at leiſure to take ſuch an expedition in hand, for the late troubled eſtate of your affaires, and your new recouered Kingdome, as yet ſcarcely well eſtabliſhed: yet notwithſtanding let it not with-hold you, or keepe you backe; aſſuring you, that as this expedition cannot be but vnto you moſt honourable, euen ſo this your preſent deſert ſhall not be beſtowed vpon vngratefull and thankeleſſe men; but that which you ſhall now firſt begin and vndertake for our preſeruation and dignity, we will from henceforth and euer continue for your glory, and for the increaſe of your greatneſſe. Fare you well. From our regall city of Buda the fourth of Iuly, 1444. H

Of this the Kings motion Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in ſo fit a time, with his own forces joyned vnto the Hungarians his friends, thorowly to buſie Amurath, than in ſhort time after, himſelfe alone to ſuſtaine his whole power; by the generall conſent of the Albanian Princes his confederates and allies, yeelded vnto his requeſt; in liberall termes promiſing him by his letters, in good time to be preſent with him with thirty thouſand good ſoldiers. The copy of which Letters I thought it not amiſſe here to ſet downe alſo.

Scanderbeg Prince of the Epirots, vnto Vladiſlaus King of Hungary and Polonia, greeting.

Scanderbeg his anſwer by Letters vnto King Vladiſlaus.

Your Letters, moſt inuincible King, I haue with like joy and contentment receiued: which I in the generall aſſembly of my Chiefetaines hauing cauſed publiquely to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of one opinion, but that ſo juſt an occaſion of war by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalfe alſo embraced. And ſo euery man doth both publikely and priuately affirme, That nothing could haue hapned vnto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by ſome notable ſeruice teſtifie their gratefull minds, and bind vnto them ſo excellent a Prince; as alſo to giue ſo fit ſuccors vnto the Chriſtian Common-weale. In which forwardneſſe of my people I my ſelfe tooke great contentment K and pleaſure, both in regard of your ſelfe, and in the behalfe of the publike and common cauſe: ſeeing my men of warre, and all other my ſubjects, of what eſtate or degree ſoeuer (without any perſuaſion vſed on my part) to be ſo cheerefully and couragiouſly minded in defence of the faith, and of the Chriſtian Religion; and ſo well affectioned toward your moſt royall Majeſty. And to ſay the truth, Who is he (if he be not hatefull both to God and man) albeit there were no queſtion of Religion, or of the Common danger, that would refuſe ſo juſt and lawfull a warre? for ſuch a King, as vnto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Chriſtians do not onely reigne, but euen liue, breath, and enjoy the liberty of our ſpeech. Who would not willingly take vp armes, and aduenture himſelfe into moſt manifeſt and certaine danger for the people of Hungary; by whom in all ages the Chriſtian Common-wealth hath with their ſo many trauels, and ſo much of their bloud, beene ſo mightily ſupported and defended? Who euen from the very L cradle haue beene continuall enemies vnto our enemies, and haue as it were euen vowed themſelues for the honour of the Chriſtian Religion and name. Would God (moſt mighty and redoubted Vladiſlaus*) it had beene in my power to haue brought vnto you ſuch forces to this honourable warre, as were anſwerable vnto my courage and deſire: then happily Europe ſhould not longer lie in this ignominious eſtate, oppreſſed by* Amurath; neither ſhould the fields of Varna or Baſilia ſo often ſmoake with the bloud of the Hungarians; nor euery corner of Macedonia with the bloud of the Epirots: both nations being as it were become the expiatory ſacrifice of others ſinnes and offences; we all now by turnes periſh, whileſt euery man thinketh himſelfe borne but for himſelfe alone. But why doe I vnto my ſelfe poure forth theſe vaine complaints. Truely, it neither repenteth me of my Forces, neither, as I ſuppoſe (if it ſhall pleaſe God that our Forces may once meet and joyne together in ſo happy a warre) ſhall the Chriſtian Common- M weale haue any cauſe to ſorrow or be agrieued with the iſſue and euent of our fortune. For vnto thoſe fifteene thouſand good ſouldiers which lately diſcomfited Alis Baſſa on the borders of Macedonia, my purpoſe is to joyne as many moe vnto them: with all which ſtrength as ſoone as conueniently they may, I will

A begin to ſet forward, ready to follow your enſignes to all euents whatſoeuer. And ſo fare you well. From Croia the third of Auguſt 1444.

Theſe letters being diſpatched away vnto the king, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leuy his forces. And firſt of all he cauſed with new ſupplies to be made ſtrong, all thoſe companies wherewith hee had ouerthrown Alis Baſſa; not ſuffering any one of them to abſent himſelfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteene thouſand, all men of approued valor, he joyned other fifteene thouſand moe, no leſſe valiant than they: ſuch a power as he neuer either before or after raiſed for the recouery, or defence of his Kingdome. And ſo furniſhed with all things neceſſary for ſo honourable a war, cheerefully ſet forward, accompanied B with the vowes and hope of all his moſt faithfull and louing ſubjects. But being come to the borders of Seruia, he found the ſtreit and difficult paſſages of that rough country ſhut vp by George the Deſpot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwiſe a wicked damned Atheiſt, and a Chriſtian but in name only) who but lately before reſtored vnto his kingdome by the helpe of King Vladiſlaus, hauing changed his mind, did now mightily cleaue vnto the Turke his ſon in law (by whom he had bin before himſelfe exiled) and in fauour of his quarrell, and deſpight of the Hungarians, but ſpecially of Huniades, had ſtopped vp the waies and paſſages whereby Scanderbeg was with his army to paſſe: who by his Embaſſador ſent of purpoſe vnto the Deſpot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in minde of the perjurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithſtanding he had married his daughter: C and of the great pleaſures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proofe: requeſting him if it were but in regard of the common cauſe of Chriſtianity, to giue vnto him (as vnto his friend by whom he was neuer in any thing wronged) paſſage; and not to ſtaine himſelfe with the perpetuall note of infamy, That he being a Chriſtian Prince, and of late ſo mightily oppreſſed by the Turke, ſhould now to the great hinderance of the Chriſtian common-weale take part with him againſt his friends and deliuerers. But what auaileth praiers or requeſts, be they neuer ſo reaſonable, with a man ſet downe to miſchiefe? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, reſolued ſo to do: although it much grieued him to ſpend thoſe forces vpon a Chriſtian Prince, which he had prepared againſt the capitall enemy both of himſelfe and all good Chriſtians, old Amurath the D Turkiſh Sultan.

But whileſt he thus diſcontented, ſpendeth his time with his army vpon the borders of Seruia, beſet with many difficulties; Vladiſlaus prickt forward by the continuall ſolicitation of Iulian the Cardinall, or elſe drawne on by his owne ineuitable deſtity, hauing aſſembled a great army of valiant and couragious ſouldiers out of Hungary and Polonia (yet in number farre inferiour to that he had in the yeare before, for that moſt of the voluntary ſouldiers were returned home) ſet forward from Segedinum; and in the beginning of Nouember (a time vnfit for warres) paſſed ouer Danubius, and entring into Bulgaria, came to Nicopolis, the Metropoliticall City of that Kingdome (but then in poſſeſſion of the Turkes) where he burnt the ſuburbs thereof, and in that fruitfull countrey thereabouts refreſhed his people three or E foure daies, where hee alſo muſtered his Army, and tooke a view thereof: At which time Dracula Vayuod of Valachia, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then preſent, and conſidering the ſmall number of the Kings Army, began to perſuade him to retyre; ſaying, He had ſufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme aright of the power of the Turkiſh Sultan: who (as he ſaid) was wont many times to carry more men with him into the fields for his diſport of hawking and hunting, than was there in the Kings campe: wherefore hee ſhould doe well, not to expoſe thoſe his ſmall forces vnto ſo manifeſt perill, in ſuch vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, but to reſerue them vnto a more fit opportunity, when hee might with greater power encounter his puiſſant enemy. This his counſell moſt men of greateſt experience, and not carried away with other priuate reſpects, thought wholeſome: F but the Cardinall author of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the laſt yeares victory obtained againſt the Turke, with glorious promiſes of great aid, as well by ſea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the Emperour of Conſtantinople and other Chriſtian Princes; augmenting alſo the great troubles in Aſia, and promiſing an eaſie and happy ſucceſſe ſucceſſe vnto theſe warres in Europe: perſuaded the King that Dracula his ſpeech proceeded G either of ignorance, vpon a ſuperficiall judgement which he made of the Kings power there preſent, without regard of further ſtrength from his friends; or elſe of the priuat reſpect of his owne ſecurity, in regard of a commodious league made a little before betwixt him and the Turke. So that the poore Prince ſeeing his counſell mightily impugned by the Cardinall, and not ſo well taken, as it was meant by him, ſtood in a doubt whether to leaue him to his owne fortune, and himſelfe to his quiet peace, or caſting off the Turkiſh league, to joyne with the King in this chance of war: but at length reſolued as a martiall minded man, preferring the vncertaine glory of the field before his owne aſſured reſt, ſaid vnto the King:

Seeing that either your Princely fortune, which hath euer hitherto fauoured your high attempts; or elſe the hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the ſecret deſignement of H your deſtiny, vnable to be auoyded, doth draw your majeſty into a different opinion from me: that your reſolution, which I cannot by reaſonable perſuaſion alter, I will as the ſuddenneſſe of time, and my ſmall ability will permit, moſt gladly further.

Dracula aideth Vladiſlaus with his ſonne and 4000 horſe.

And therewith preſented vnto the king his ſon, with foure thouſand horſemen well appointed, to ſerue him in thoſe wars; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good ſucceſſe as he himſelfe deſired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the King, he preferred vnto him two luſty young men, perfect guides for that country, with two horſes of incredible ſwiftneſſe, and with teares ſtanding in his eies ſaid vnto him:

His laſt farewel vnto the King.

Take this ſmall gift in good part, as a poore refuge to fly vnto, if your fortune hap to faile you, which I tremble to thinke vpon: I pray God they be giuen in vaine, and ſo they ſhall, if my praiers may preuaile. I Yet if neceſſity ſhall inforce you to vſe them, you ſhall find them ſeruiceable at your need.

And ſo taking his laſt farewell of the King, returned into Valachia. Vladiſlaus marching on from Nicopolis toward Thracia, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the Turks for feare yeelded vnto him: at laſt he came to Sumium and Pezechium, where the Turkiſh garriſons truſting as much to the ſtrength of the places, as to their owne valour, ſtood vpon their guard: but the King layed ſiege to both the ſaid places, and took them by aſſault; where he put to ſword fiue thouſand of the Turks.

The Turks Baſſaes terrified with thoſe vnexpected troubles, aduertiſed Amurath thereof, requeſting him to leaue his obſcure life, and to leauy the greateſt power he could in Aſia, for the defence of the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, which otherwiſe was in ſhort time like to be K loſt: blaming alſo his diſcretion, for committing the gouernment of ſo great a kingdom to ſo young a Prince as was Mahomet his ſonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did halfe ſcorne to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath herewith awaked, as it had beene out of a dead ſleepe, left his cloiſter, and with great ſpeed gathered a ſtrong army in Aſia, and came to the ſtreits of Helleſpontus, where he found the paſſage ſtopped by the Venetians and Popes Gallies, and was therefore at his wits end. But marching alongſt the Sea ſide vnto the ſtreits of Boſphorus, he there found meanes to conuey ouer his whole army: vſing therein (as ſome write) the helpe of the Genoway marchants ſhips, paying vnto the Genowayes for the paſſage of euery Turke a ducat, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred thouſand duckats: or as ſome others affirme, corrupting with great bribes them that were left for the defence of L this paſſage. And being now got ouer, joyned his Aſian army with ſuch other forces as his Baſſaes had in readineſſe in Europe: and ſo marching on ſeuen daies, encamped within foure miles of Varna, a City pleaſantly ſtanding vpon the Euxine Sea ſide in Bulgaria, where the Chriſtian army lay: for Vladiſlaus hearing of Amurath his comming with ſo great an army, had retyred thither, hauing but a little before taken the ſame City of Varna from the Turks, with Calachrium, Galata, Macropolis, and others vpon the ſea coaſt.

Vpon the firſt report that Amurath was with ſuch a mighty army come ouer the ſtreit of Boſphorus, Vladiſlaus who before was in good hope that he could not poſſibly haue found any paſſage, entered into counſell with the commanders of his army, what courſe was now beſt to take: where many which before had been moſt forward in that action (preſuming that Amurath M could by no meanes haue tranſported his army) was now ſo diſcouraged with the fame of his comming, that they aduiſed the King in time to retire home, and not to oppoſe ſo ſmall an army againſt ſuch a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captains

A of greater courage, and eſpecially Huniades, ſaid; It was not for the Kings honor firſt to inuade his enemies dominions, and preſently to turn his back vpon the firſt report of their comming; wiſhing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former warres, and that he was to fight againſt the ſame enemy whom he had victoriouſly ouerthrowne the yere before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he ſaid) not to be moued therewith, for that it was the maner of the Turkiſh Kings, more to terrifie their enemies with the ſhew of a huge army, than with the valour of their ſoldiers, which were nothing to be accounof, but as effeminate, in compariſon of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King reſolued to try the fortune of the field.

Vladiſlaus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Amurath the night before incamped within B foure miles, was now putting his army in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captaine Huniades: who with great care and induſtry diſpoſed the ſame, garding the one ſide of the battel with a fen or mariſh, and the other ſide with cariages, and the rereward of his army with a ſteepe hil. Therein politickly prouiding, that the Chriſtian army being far leſſe than the Turks in number, could not be compaſſed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks army approching, began to skirmiſh with the Chriſtians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage maintained, and that with diuers fortune, ſometime one party preuailing, and ſometime the other; but with ſuch ſlaughter on both ſides, that the ground was couered and ſtained with the dead bodies and bloud of the ſlaine. At length the battell being more cloſely joyned, the victory C began to incline to the Chriſtians, for Huniades had moſt valiantly with his Tranſiluanian and Valachian horſmen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkiſh army, and made great ſlaughter whereſoeuer he came. Inſomuch that Amurath diſmaied with the flight of his ſouldiers, was about to haue fled himſelfe out of the maine battell, had he not bin ſtaied by a common ſouldier, who laying hands vpon the raines of his bridle, ſtaied him by force, and ſharpely reproued hiw of cowardiſe. The captaines and prelates about the King (whom it had better beſeemed to haue bin at deuout praiers in their oratories, than in armes at that bloudy battell) encouraged by the proſperous ſucceſſe of Huniades, and deſirous to be partakers of that victory, fooliſhly left their ſafe ſtations, where they were appointed by him to ſtand faſt, and diſorderedly purſued the chaſe, leauing that ſide of the battell where they ſtood, open vnto the D Turks, but they were not gone far, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks army, for ſuch purpoſe placed in a vally faſt by. In which fight Leſco one of the moſt valiant captaines of the Hungarians was ſlaine; and the Biſhop of Veradium, a better churchman than ſouldier, and the firſt man that diſordered the battell, ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight thorow the fenne, was there ſtrangled in the deepe mud, after he had with his horſe therin ſtruggled a great while. The Biſhop of Agria, a man of greateſt authority with the King, was at the ſame time alſo loſt, with many other churchmen more. The Cardinall, with ſome other of the expert captaines retiring toward their former ſtandings, were hardly aſſailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the King and Huniades, were with great ſlaughter forced to retire, and euen ready to fly. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and all brought E into extreme danger, beholding the picture of the crucifix in the diſplaied enſignes of the voluntary Chriſtians, pluckt the writing out of his boſome, wherein the late league was compriſed, and holding it vp in his hand with his eies caſt vp to heauen, ſaid:

The great battell of Varna, fought betweene king Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

Behold thou crucified Chriſt, this is the league thy Chriſtians in thy name made with me: which they haue without any cauſe violated. Now if thou be a God, as they ſay thou art, and as we dreame, reuenge the wrong now done vnto thy name, and me, and ſhew thy power vpon thy perjurious people, who in their deeds deny thee their God.

Amurath praieth vnto Chriſt.

The King with Huniades furiouſly purſued the chaſed Turks, with bloudy execution a great ſpace: when as the King in his heat hardly perſuaded by Huniades to returne againe into his campe, at his comming thither found the Cardinall Iulian, with Franke, one of his chiefe cap-F taines, and others, ouercharged with the Turks, which had againe made head againſt that part of the Chriſtian army: and there yet fought couragiouſly, by reaſon of their multitude, being alſo backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had ſtood faſt with their old King, as his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge, but were now come in. There began a moſt cruell and fierce fight: in the ſucceſſe whereof, the Turks well ſaw the whole ſtate of their kingdom in Europ to conſiſt, many many were there ſlaine of both ſides: the Turks feeling their loſſe leſſe than indeed it was, by G reaſon of their multitude; and the Chriſtians, by reaſon of their courage. A great while the victory ſtood doubtfull, inſomuch, that at length the Turks began to ſhrinke backe, in that part of the battell where the King and Huniades fought. But in the left ſide they preuailed ſo vpon the Chriſtians that they were euen ready to haue fled. Which when Huniades (hauing a vigilant eie vnto euery part of the army) perceiued, he with ſpeed made thither, and there againe with his preſence reſtored the battell, almoſt before loſt. Which done, he returned againe towards the King, who in the meane time had moſt valiantly repulſed a great number of the Turks, and now was come vnto the Ianizaries, Amurath his laſt hope. There was to be ſeene a thouſand manners of death, whilſt both the armies fought more like wild beaſts in their rage and fury, than wary & politick ſoldiers. In this confuſed medly, the yong king Vladiſlaus with H greater courage than care of himſelfe, brake into the battell of the Ianizaries: at which time, Amurath himſelfe was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Roads, firſt wounded with a pike, and after aſſailed with his ſword, and had there ended his daies, but that he was ſpeedily reſcued by his guard, by whom this worthy Knight after great proofe of his valour was there ſlain in the midſt of his enemies. Vladiſlaus being got alſo in among them, valiantly performed all the parts of a worthy ſoldier, till ſuch time as his horſe being ſlain vnder him, he was forthwith oppreſſed by the multitude of his enemies and ſlain: his head being ſtrucke off by Ferizes, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him preſented vnto Amurath, who commanded it preſently to be put vpon the point of a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Chriſtian King: which was afterwards ſo caried thorow the principal cities of Macedonia, and Grecia, as a trophey of the Turks victory. Huniades after he had in vaine giuen diuers I braue attempts to haue reſcued the Kings body retired with a few Valachian horſemen, and ſeeing no hope of better hap (for all the Chriſtians being diſcouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themſelues to flight) gaue place to neceſſity, and reſeruing himſelf to his future fortune, fled ouer the mountains, into the thicke woods, from whence with much difficulty, he got ouer Danubius into Valachia, and was there (as ſome write) by Dracula Prince of that country taken priſoner: In reuenge whereof, after he was inlarged by the Hungarians, he ſo aided Danus againſt Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his ſon were both ſlaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Iulian the Cardinall flying out of the battell, was found by that worthy man Gregory Sanoſe, lying in the deſert forreſt by the way ſide, mortally wounded, and halfe ſtripped, by whom he was in few words ſharpely reproued, as the wicked author of that perfi- K dious war, and there left giuing vp the ghoſt. Many of the Chriſtians which fled out of that battell, fell into the enemies hands, & ſo were ſlain: but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the fens, or that by hunger and cold periſhed in the woods, or elſe after long and miſerable trauel, finding no paſſage ouer Danubius, fel at length into the Turkiſh ſlauery.

Amurath in danger.

King Vladiſlaus ſlaine.

Huniades flieth

This great and mortall battell, as it was with diuers fortune fought, ſo was alſo the preſent report thereof moſt vncertain: for the Turks that were at the firſt put to flight, reported in the towns there by as they fled, that the battell was loſt: & they which had all the day endured the fight, not altogether aſſured of the victory, & not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themſelues, whilſt they ſuſpected ſome deceit in the Kings campe, by reaſon of the great L ſilence therin, ſtaied two daies before they durſt aduenture to take the ſpoile therof. The number of them that were ſlain in this battell, as well on the one ſide as the other was great; as the mounts and little hils, raiſed of the bones & bodies of them that were there buried, do yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certaine number was not knowne, ſome reporting mo, ſome fewer. Yet in this moſt agree, that of the Chriſtian army, being not great, ſcarce the third part eſcaped: and that the Turks bought this victory with a farre greater loſſe, although it was of them leſſe felt, by reaſon of their multitude; made leſſe by that ſlaughter, as they that report leaſt thereof affirme, by thirty thouſand. Which may well ſeeme rather to be ſo, for that Amurath after this victory, neither farther proſecuted the ſame, nor ſhewed any token of joy at all, but became very melancholy and ſad, and being of them about him demanded, Why after ſo M great a victory he was no merrier; anſwered, that he wiſhed not at ſo great price, to gaine many ſuch victories. Yet in memoriall thereof he erected a great pillar, in the ſame place where the King was ſlain, with an inſcription of all that was then done: which, as they ſay, is there yet to be ſeen at this day. This bloudy battell was fought neer vnto Varna (in antient time called Dioniſio-

A Dioniſiopolis (a place fatall vnto many great warriours, and therefore of them euen yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord Chriſt 1444.

Some maliciouſly impute the loſſe of the battel of Varna, and the death of the King, to Huniades, who (as they ſaid) fled out of the battell with ten thouſand horſemen: but this report agreeth not with the noble diſpoſition of that couragious and valiant captaine, but ſeemeth rather to haue beene deuiſed, to excuſe the foule dealing of the clergy; who as moſt hiſtories beare witneſſe, were the chiefe authors both of the war, and of the lamentable calamity enſuing thereof.

From the battell of Varna Amurath returned to Hadrianople, hauing loſt the greateſt part of his beſt ſouldiers, and there with great ſolemnity buried the body of Carazia, viceroy of B Europe, ſlaine in that battell: and then calling together all his nobility, againe reſigned vp his kingdome vnto his ſon Mahomet, retiring himſelfe vnto Magneſia, where he liued a ſolitary and priuate life, hauing before vowed ſo to doe, in the great feare he was in, in the battell againſt Vladiſlaus: but after he had a ſhort time performed theſe his vowes in that obſcure and melancholy life, he weary therof, as ſome ſuppoſe, as not a little reuiued with the late victory, or elſe ſolicited by Cali Baſſa and other great counſellors, returned againe to Hadrianople, reſuming vnto himſelfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great diſcontentment of his ambitious ſonne Mahomet.

Amurath to performe his vow, reſigneth his kingdome to his ſon Mahomet, which he in ſhort time after taketh again vpon him.

Scanderbeg yet ſticking in the borders of Seruia, and hearing what had happened vnto king Vladiſlaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieued: and hauing now loſt the C hope whereupon hee had vndertaken that ſo great an expedition, reſolued to returne home againe into Epirus. Neuertheleſſe, to be in ſome part reuenged of the wicked Deſpot, he with his army forcibly brake into his country, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter at Varna, repaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremity of their fortune) courteouſly relieued: and furniſhed them with ſuch things as they wanted, prouided them ſhipping to Raguſa, from whence they might in ſafety returne into their own countries. Thus by the diſloyalty and trechery of the faithleſſe Deſpot of Seruia, was Scanderbeg ſtaid from being preſent at the bloudy battell of Varna, to the vnſpeakeable loſſe of the Chriſtian common-weale: for it could not be, but that ſo many thouſands of moſt reſolute and expert D ſouldiers, vnder the leading of ſo worthy a chiefetaine, muſt needs haue done much for the gaining of the victory. And what more glorious ſight could a man haue wiſhed for, than to haue ſeene ſo puiſſant an army in the field againſt the ſworne enemy of Chriſtendome, directed by two ſuch valiant and renowned chiefetaines, as neuer, either before or ſince their time, was ſeene the like in one battell againſt the enemy of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding ſtrength and agility of body, wiſe, prudent, and ſubtill; both of long time exerciſed in the Turks warres, the greateſt terror of that nation, and moſt worthy champions of the Chriſtian Religion, being therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better commander, and the more politicke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reaſon of his greater yeares: E which was well counteruailed by Scanderbeg his perpetuall good fortune, ſtill as it were attending vpon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the courſe of his Hiſtory well appeareth.

The compariſon betwixt Huniades and Scanderbeg.

Amurath aduertiſed of theſe proceedings of Scanderbeg, as alſo of the great harmes by him done in Macedonia, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon Epirus, were by his fury vtterly waſted and ſpoiled, and his people there for moſt part ſlaine, and that the reſt had for feare forſaken their dwellings, and left the country deſolate and vnpeopled: was therewith exceedingly moued. Yet for ſo much as he ſtill ſtood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himſelfe clogged with yeares, and therefore more deſirous of reſt; conſidering alſo the young yeares of his eldeſt ſon Mahomet, as yet vnfit for the gouernement of ſo great and F troubleſome a kingdome; with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and malice of Huniades: he thought it not beſt to conuert all his forces vpon him, but to proue if he could cunningly draw him into ſome diſhonourable peace for a time, that ſo he might afterwards at leiſure be the better reuenged of him. For which cauſe he writ vnto him letters, mixt with grieuous threats, and ſome feigned courteſies, as followeth:

Amurath Othoman, King of the Turks, and Emperour of the Eaſt, to the moſt ingratefull Scanderbeg, wiſheth neither health nor welfare.

The ſullen and crafty Letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I neuer wanted honourable preferments to beſtow vpon thee all the while thou diddeſt liue in my court, of all others, moſt vnkinde Scandeger, but now I want words wherewith to ſpeake vnto thee, thou haſt ſo highly offended my minde, and touched mine honour, that I know not in diſcretion what words to vſe vnto thee, but of late one of my domeſticall ſeruants. For neither will hard ſpeech mollifie the naturall fierceneſſe of thy proud diſpoſition, neither art thou worthy of better, which haſt far exceeded all hoſtility. And becauſe thou wouldeſt admit no occaſion to prouoke me, haſt of late proceeded to that point of folly, that thou haſt had thine owne affaires, and the welfare of thine owne ſubjects, in ſmall regard, by confederating thy ſelfe in armes with the Hungarians againſt me. It grieueth me to rehearſe other thy vnkindeneſſe, and as it were to touch thoſe ſores, if my minde would euer ſuffer me to forget the ſame, or that thine ſo manifold and horrible treaſons, and ſtrange examples of a moſt vnthankefull minde, were to be couered with ſilence. Yet I thought good to aduertiſe thee (although perhaps too late) leaſt that thy vnſtaied heat do vntimely ouerthrow thee, with thy vnlucky kingdome: and then thou wouldeſt make humble confeſsion of thy long tranſgreſsion, when thou haſt loſt thy ſelfe, and left no hope of refuge in thy deſperate eſtate. We haue hitherto ſufficiently ſuffered thy manifold injuries: thou haſt ſufficiently prouoked the majeſty of the Othoman Empire, with wrong and contumelious deſpight; and I with patience haue borne all theſe contempts. Thinkeſt thou that my army by thee betraied vnto the Hungarians ſhall be vnreuenged? Thinkeſt thou that ſo many cities and townes in Epirus, by thee rent from the body of my Empire, with my garriſons there ſlaine, ſhall be forgotten? Or thinkeſt thou with thy late committed outrages to eſcape my reuenging hands? Remember the deſtruction of mine army vnder Alis Baſſa; the waſting and burning of my dominions; and lately, the Hungarian warres, by thee ſo farre as in thee was, countenanced; with the territories of George, the Deſpot of Seruia my father in law, by thee ſpoiled. At length amend, thou graceleſſe man, and expect not further, whether my indignation will breake out. Let not theſe trifling allurements of thy good fortune, ſo puffe vp thy fooliſh deſires, and ſharpen thy conceits, that thy miſerable fortune afterwards may moue euen thy greateſt enemies, or my ſelfe to compaſsion. I would thou ſhouldeſt at length remember my courteſies (if any ſparke of humanity remaine in thy ſauage nature) and make me not longer ſorry, that I haue ſo euill beſtowed the ſame. And although it is not the part of an honourable minde, to rehearſe thoſe things which we haue in bounty beſtowed vpon any man; yet is it the token of a moſt vnthankefull nature ſo eaſily to forget all kindeneſſe paſt, as to need to be put in remembrance thereof: wherefore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament thine eſtate: For to let paſſe the health of thy ſoule (which thou a very reprobate, eſteemeſt as nothing) not to ſpeake of the lawes of Mahomet by thee deſpiſed, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the Zeale thou haſt vnto the Chriſtian ſuperſtition: what haſt thou (which now holdeſt thy poore and baſe kingdome in ſuch price) euer wanted at my hands of all thoſe things which moſt delight the deſire of men? Diddeſt thou euer want armour, horſes, a great traine of followers and ſeruants, mony, or other ſuperfluities, the allurements of all ages? or diddeſt thou want matter to exerciſe thy valor, for increaſe of thine honour? Waſt thou euer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all ſorts fit for thine age, both at home & abroad? Was any man in my court dearer vnto me, than thy ſelfe? what growing wit, not of ſtrangers onely, but of them that were neereſt vnto my ſelfe, was better welcome vnto me than thine? With what carefull inſtructions did I cauſe thee to be brought vp? When thou waſt deliuered vnto me almoſt a child, I dayly cheriſhed and increaſed thy hoped towardlineſſe, with learning and nurture: I haue at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praiſes, and honours of the field (which of all worthy things is moſt glorious) ſo that in all feats of armes no ſouldier was to me better knowne, or captaine of me more honoured. For all theſe great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now ſheweſt thy ſelfe ſuch an one, that I may be thought not to haue brought vp ſuch a man as I hoped for, but a very ſerpent in mine owne boſome. But the loue of thy country did moue thee; which if thou hadſt asked of me, would I haue denied the ſame vnto thee? which (if thou doeſt well remember) I ſo oftentimes voluntarily profered vnto thee? But thou haddeſt rather to gaine the ſame by trechery, than to receiue it of my hands of courteſie. So thine be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verily, according to my accuſtomed clemency towards all them whom I haue once well knowne, and beene familiarly acquainted with, A with, I now pardon thee all thou haſt offended me; not for any thy preſent deſerts, which are none, but becauſe in this publique enmitie it pleaſeth me to remember my former kindnes in priuat towards thee, and thy faithfulnes ſomtimes in my affairs: eſpecially for that the time was much longer wherin thou ſeruedſt me, than the time wherin thou haſt offended me. Croia and thy fathers kingdom (although thou haſt gained the ſame by foul trechery) I giue vnto thee, vpon condition thou willingly reſtore vnto mee the other towns of Epirus which by no right belong vnto thee, but are myne by law of Arms, by my ſelf honourably won. Whatſoeuer thou haſt taken from my father in law the Prince of Seruia, thou ſhalt preſently reſtore, and make him an honorable recompence for the other harms thou haſt don vnto him; and for euer herafter thou ſhalt as well forbear to offer violence to any our friends, as to aid any our Enemies. So ſhalt thou for euer auoid the diſpleaſure of the Turks, and ſtand in my good grace and fauor, as thou haſt don before. B Except thou hadſt rather (being taught by thine own harms) then in vain cry for mercy, when thy furious outrage ſhall haue me in perſon an implacable reuenger. Thou knoweſt thy forces, thou knoweſt the ſtrength of myne arms; thou haſt before thyne eies the freſh example of the Hungarian fortune, ſo that thru needeſt no further admonition: yet I would thou ſhouldſt write at large what thou intendeſt to do. Thou mayſt alſo confer with Ayradin our ſeruant, our truſty and faithfull meſſenger, of whom thou ſhalt vnderſtand more than are in theſe letters compriſed. Farewell if thou be wiſe.

From Hadrianople.

To theſe letters Scanderbeg gaue ſmall credit, and leſſe to the meſſenger, but leaſt of all to the old fox himſelfe, whom he well knew to haue written nothing ſimply of good meaning, C but only to gain a ceſſation from wars, vntill hee might at better leiſure ſet vpon him with all his forces. Wherfore calling Ayradin the meſſenger vnto him (whom he rather held for a crafty ſpy, than an honorable Embaſſador) after he had many times both publiquely and priuatly diſcourſed with him, ſo far forth as was poſſible to ſound the depth of his comming, & had alſo further entertained him with all honorable curteſies, he ſhewed him all his campe, with the ſtrength therof; which he did, becauſe the crafty meſſenger ſhould not think that he was any thing afraid of his maſters greatnes. And at laſt greatly complaining of Amuraths cruel and perfidious dealing againſt his father, his brethren, and himſelfe; hee ſent him away with ſuch anſwer in writing as followeth:

D

The Soldier of CHRIST IESVS, George Caſtriot, ſyrnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of Epirus, to Amurath Othoman King of the Turks ſends greeting.

Scanderbegs reſolut anſwer to Amuraths letters.

THou haſt in times paſt (as thou writeſt) exceeded me in many kinds of curteſies; and at this preſent I will exceed thee in modeſt and temperat ſpeech: for I think there is no greater token of a baſe mind, than not to be able to forbear to giue railing and opprobrious words euen vnto our moſt mortall enemies. Wherfore we haue with patience receiued and ſeene both thy letters and meſſenger; and to confeſſe a truth, they haue miniſtred vnto me greater occaſion of ſmile than of choler: whilſt at the firſt thou ſha- E meſt not to accuſe me of much ingratitude and treaſon; and preſently following a milder paſſion, ſeemeſt carefull of my ſouls health, being ignorant of thyne own eſtate, as a ſtudious defender of a moſt damnable error. And at laſt, keeping neither law of arms, nor orderly courſe anſwering to our affaires, doſt moſt inſolently and vnaduiſedly, as a valiant Conqueror to his vanquiſhed enemie, propound many conditions of peace, of ſuch qualitie and condition that myne ears ſcarn to hear the ſame. Truly, Amurath, although thy immoderat railing might moue a man of greateſt patience to intemperat ſpeech; yet I impute the ſame partly to thy great age, and partly to the waiwardnes of thy nature; and the reſt, to thy conceiued griefe, which I know thou canſt hardly moderat: and the rather, for that I haue not ſet down my ſelf to contend with thee in foul and vnſeemly language, but with arms and the juſt fury of war. Yet I pray thee, wherefore doſt thou ſo exclaim againſt me before God and man? as though thou hadſt firſt ſuffered wrong and F injury from me, and that thou hadſt not in truth firſt don the ſame. Doſt thou call my neceſſary departing, a perfidious trechery? my natiue country by my policy and valor recouered, doſt thou obiect to me as a villanie? object the ſame ſtill and ſpare not; charge me with ſuch crimes for euer, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindnes toward me, which thou rehearſeſt, I could willingly remember, if it drew not with it the ſad and wofull remembrance of my greater miſeries. Which if they were equally weighed, and vprightly compared together, the greatnes of thy good deſerts would be quite ouerwhelmed with the mulitude of thy greater tyranies, which I had rather thou ſhouldſt count with thy ſelf, than bluſh whilſt I repeat them. Euery man that knoweth them, may maruel how I had power to endure them, or that thou waſt not weary at laſt of thy cruelty and ſecret hatred. Thou tookſt away my fathers Kingdom by force, thou didſt murther my brethren, and my ſelf thou didſt moſt wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any ſuch cruelty. And doth it now ſeem ſtrange to thee, ô Amurath, that an inuincible mind deſirous of liberty, ſhould ſeek to break out of the bonds of ſo great and inſolent ſlauery. How long didſt thou thinke at length I would endure thy proud bondage? which for all that, I many years endured, and refuſed not thy command: I expoſed my ſelf to publique and priuat dangers, both voluntary, and by thy deſignment: ſpeeches were giuen out daily by thy ſelf, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deep trecherie was riſe in myne ears. Yet for all that, of long time I ſimply beleeued both thy words and deeds to haue bin deuoid of all fraud, vntill thy cankered malice began too too apparantly to ſhew it ſelf. Then began I alſo to gloſe with thee, wholly metamorphoſed into thyne own conceits, vntil I found occaſion to recouer my liberty. Wherſore there is no cauſe thou ſhouldſt now grieue if thou be well beaten with thy own rod. But theſe art but trifles, Amurath, in compariſon of thoſe things which I haue laid vp in hope and reſolution of mind. Therfore herafter ceaſe thyne angry threats, and tell not vs of the Hungarian fortune: euery man hath his own reſolutions, and euery man a particular gouernor of his actions; and ſo will we with patience endure ſuch fortune as it ſhall pleaſe God to appoint vs. In the mean time, for direction of our affairs we will not requeſt counſell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victory by the help of God. Farewell. From our Camp.

When Amurath had read theſe letters, and further conferred with Ayradin, he was filled with wrath and dignation, wondring at the great reſolution of ſo ſmall a Prince, preſently caſting in his mind (as was thought) the difficulty of that war. Yet becauſe he would giue no token of fear, oftentimes ſtroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was thorowly angry; with a diſſembling cheerfulnes of countenance ſaid, Amuraths paſſionat ſpeech in his rage, againſt Scanderbeg.

Thou deſireſt (wicked man) thou deſireſt the title of ſome honorable death: Wee will giue it thee (beleeue vs) we will giue it thee; we our ſelues will be preſent at the buriall of our foſter Childe, and in perſon (though vnbidden) honor the funerall pomp of the great King of Epirus, that thou ſhalt neuer complain among the damned ghoſts, that thou didſt die a baſe or obſcure kind of death.

And becauſe at that time, by reaſon of many great occurrents, hee could not conuert his whole power into Epirus, he ſent Feriſes one of his beſt captains, with 9000 choice horſmen, to keep Scanderbeg in doing, and to ſpoil his country as much as he could. Which was with ſuch ſpeed don, as it was thought Feriſes would haue bin in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his comming. But for all his haſt, he could not ſo preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing therof, and hauing his men alwaies in readines, placed 1500 good footmen in ambuſh vpon the rough mountains leading into the vally of Movea, wherby the Turks muſt needs paſſe into Epirus; placing alſo 2000 horſmen as he thought moſt fit & conuenient for the purpoſe. Feriſes deſcending from the high mountains full of woods and buſhes, by the broken and ſtony waies leading into the Valley, was in that troubleſome and intricate paſſage fiercely ſet vpon by Scanderbegs ready footmen, ſuddenly ariſing out of ambuſh; where the Turks hauing no vſe of their horſes, but rather by them incombred, were ſlain as Deer incloſed in a toil. In this conflict 760 Turks were taken priſoners, and a great number ſlain, and Feriſes himſelf with the reſt inforced to fly, crying ſtill out as he fled, Better ſome ſaued than all loſt. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Feriſes, purſued him into Macedonia, and with the ſpoil there taken rewarded his ſoldiers, as he had alſo many times before done.

Amurath grieued with the ouerthrow of Feriſes, preſently ſent Muſtapha a politique and hardy Captain, with a new ſupply of ſix thouſand ſouldiers to take the charge from Feriſes; commaunding him in no caſe, nor vpon any occaſion to enter far into Epirus, but onely to burn and ſpoil the frontiers therof, ſaying, That he would account it for good ſeruice, if hee might but vnderſtand that the trees and fruits of that country had felt the force of his anger.

Muſtapha

A Muſtapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere to the borders of Epirus, continually ſent out ſcouts before his army, to ſee if the paſſages were clear, and ſo warily entred the vally of Mocrea, where Ferizes not long before was ouerthrown. In this fruitful vally (being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion) Muſtapha intrenched his army vpon the riſing of a hill, and placed eſpials vpon the top of the high mountains round about, by them to diſcouer the comming of the enemy, and to haue notice therof by ſignes into the camp: then reſeruing 4000 horſmen with himſelf to keep his camp, he ſent forth the reſt of the Army, about 9000 horſmen, to forrage and ſpoil the country; giuing charge before, that euery man vpon pain of death ſhould preſently retyre vnto the Campe, vpon ſigne giuen from thence, as vnto a place of ſafety and refuge. The Turkiſh army ranging ouer that rich and pleaſant Valley, B burnt the villages, cut down trees, ſpoiled the vineyards, and made hauock of all things that fire and ſword could deſtroy: in that point executing Amuraths command to the full. At length Scanderbeg drawing neer to this vally with 4000 horſemen and 1000 foot, was aduertiſed of all the enemies doings by an Epirot ſoldier, who grieuouſly wounded, had hardly eſcaped from the Turks; of him he vnderſtood what number of Turks were burning and deſtroying the country, of the Camp alſo kept by Muſtapha, and how eſpials were placed vpon the mountains. Scanderbeg hauing well conſidered Muſtapha's wary proceedings, and ſeeing no policie to be vſed againſt ſo carefull an enemy; reſolued to vanquiſh him by plaine force, by aſſaulting him ſuddenly in his trenches, before his diſperſed ſoldiers could repair to the camp. And hauing to this purpoſe with effectuall perſuaſions incouraged the minds of his valiant C ſoldiers, ready of themſelues to follow him thorow all dangers, when he had ſet all things in order for the aſſaulting of the enemies camp, ſpeedily entred the vally, and was preſently diſcouered by the enemies eſpials from the tops of the high hils, and a ſign giuen to the Camp, from whence alſo the appointed ſign was giuen for the diſperſed ſoldiers to retyre: but moſt of them being ſtrayd from the camp, and buſied in taking the ſpoil of the country, heard not or ſaw not the ſign giuen. Thoſe which were within the hearing therof, retyred to the Camp; after whom followed Scanderbegs ſouldiers, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Chriſtians ſlain in the entrance of the camp, with their booties in their hands, and preſently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbegs ſoldiers couragiouſly aſſaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They hauing won the D trenches, preuailed ſtil vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with fear and ſlaughter. There was no vſe of ſhot in that medly, by reaſon of the ſtreightneſſe of the place, for they were now come to pel mel. Muſtapha ſeeing his ſoldiers put to the worſt, & that the camp was not long to be defended, took horſe and fled by the port which was fartheſt from the enemy. The reſt of the ſoldiers fled alſo, making ſuch poor ſhift for themſelues as they could. In this battail 5000 Turks were ſlaine, and but 300 taken: for the Chriſtians inraged with the ſpoil of the country, reuenged themſelues with the ſlaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg loſt in this conflict but 20 horſmen and 50 footmen. The reſt of the Turks army diſperſed in the country, hearing the tumult in the camp, miſdoubting the fortune of their fellows, fled alſo: yet many of them were in that flight purſued and ſlain.

Scanderbeg his valiant reſolution for aſſaulting of Muſtapha in his camp

E After this misfortune, Muſtapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuſe the misfortune of himſelf and the other captains before ſent, greatly commended the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderfull skil in feats of Armes; perſuading Amurath either to ſend a greater power againſt him, or els none at all: ſaying, that to ſend ſuch ſmall Armies, was but to adminiſter matter to the increaſe of his glory, and the infamy of the Turks; and to vſe policy againſt him the maſter of policie, was but meer folly. It grieued Amurath to hear the praiſes of his enemy, although he knew the ſame to be true, by the continuall fortune he had alwaies againſt his great captains, Alis Baſſa, Ferizes, and Muſtapha: wherfore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to ſuffer him to liue in peace: yet commanded Muſtapha to renew his army for defence of the borders of his kingdome toward Epirus, againſt the F innouation of Scanderbeg; but ſtreitly commanding him, in no caſe to inuade any part of Epirus, neither vpon any occaſion offered, or conceiued hope of victory, to join battell with Scanderbeg, for fear of ſuch euil ſucces as before.

At this time alſo the Grecians of Peloponeſus (now called Morea, hauing before fortified the ſtreit of Corinth from ſea to ſea, with a perpetuall wall which they called Hexamylum, and deep trenches about ſix miles in length, had alſo built fiue ſtrong caſtles in the ſaid wall, of purpoſe to take away all paſſage by land into that rich country; and began now not onely to deny the yearly tribute they were wont to pay vnto the Turkiſh King, but alſo to inuade ſuch Princes of Achaia their neighbors, as were content to remain ſtil the Turks tributaries. Among whom, Niceus Prince of Athens, and Turacan gouernor of Theſſalia for Amurath, ceaſed not by continuall complaints to inſence him againſt them of Peloponeſus. Who hauing his Army in readines, although it was now winter, and he himſelf very aged, ſet forward from Hadrianople, and marching thorow Theſſalia, came into Achaia, where moſt of the Grecians were before fled for fear into Peloponeſus. So paſſing on with his army, he came to the ſtreit commonly called Iſtmus, where the famous city of Corinth ſometimes ſtood; and there incamped his army neer vnto the ſtrong wall and caſtles lately before built: hoping that the Grecians of Peloponeſus, terrified with the multitude of his army, would without reſiſtance ſubmit themſelues. But when he perceiued them to ſtand vpon their gard, & to truſt to their ſtrength, he laid battery to the wal four daies, and hauing made it ſaultable, brake thorow the ſame with his army. The Grecians hauing loſt the wall (their chief ſtrength) fled, ſome vnto one ſtrong hold, and ſome to another, as their fortune led them; the Turkes at their pleaſure ſpoiling and deſtroying that rich and pleaſant country, ſomtime the nurſe of worthy wits and famous captains; where they found wonderfull riches, and took priſoners without number, inſomuch that they were ſold amongſt the Turks at moſt vile price. There Amurath for his pleaſure cruelly ſacrificed ſix hundred Chriſtian captiues to the helliſh ghoſt of his dead father Mahomet. And afterward impoſing a yearely tribute vpon the Peloponeſians and other Grecian princes now again yeelding vnto him, as an induction to their further ſlauery vnder his Turkiſh tyranny, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of Patras and Sicyone. Thus the rich country of Peloponeſus, and all the reſt of Grecia, ſomtime fountain of all learning and chiualry, became tributarie to the barbarous and cruel Turks, in the year of our Lord 1445.

Peloponeſus made tributary to the Turke.

Bajazet born.

Old Amurath now clogged with years and wearied with long wars, was content to take his reſt at Hadrianople: during which time, Bajazet the ſon of Mahomet was born in the year 1446; who afterwards of long time with great glory gouerned the Turkiſh empire at Conſtantinople, as in his place ſhall appear.

The Hungarians after the calamity of Varna (wherein they had together with Vladiſlaus their King, loſt moſt part of their nobility alſo) in a generall aſſembly of the State, made choice of Ladiſlaus the poſthumus ſon of Albertus (and then in keeping of Frederick the emperor) for their king. But foraſmuch as he being then but a child of fiue yeares old, and choſen king more for the remembrance of the emperor Sigiſmund his grandfather, and Albert his father, and the good hope conceiued of him, than for any other thing preſently to be expected from him; it was thought more than neceſſary, to make choice of ſome notable and worthy man, to whom they might during the time of the Kings minority, commit the gouernment and protection of that ſo great and turbulent a kingdom. Many there were in that honourable aſſembly wel thought of both of themſelues and others; but ſuch was the glory and valor of Huniades, and ſo great the remembrance of his noble deſerts, both of the kingdom of Hungary, and of the Chriſtian commonweal, as without his ſeeking procured him the general fauor and ſuffrages of all: yea ſo far, that they which moſt enuied his honor (as ouerſhadowing their own) were glad to hold their peace; for that without him, as it was commonly thought, the ſtate of that ſhaken kingdom could not long ſtand. So by the general conſent of all the States there aſſembled, he was with the great applauſe of the people choſen and proclaimed Gouernor; as of all others moſt fit for ſo great and heauy a charge. Wherin he quietly ſpent ſome few years in deciding of ciuill controuerſies, in compoſing the quarrels of the Nobility: not forgetting in the mean time the indifferent adminiſtration of juſtice to all men, ending many controuerſies far from the place of judgment, and that without any ſuſpition of corruption; vſing therin ſuch expedition and neuer-wearied patience in hearing euery mans cauſe, that ſitting, going, ſtanding, riding, he diſpatched many great and weighty matters: alwayes ſhewing himſelf affable and curteous, as wel vnto them of the poorer ſort, as others of greater calling that had any ſuits vnto him. So that it was of him truely ſaid, That no man was than hee vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more croſſe and contrarie.

Huniades choſen gouernor of all Hungary, in the Kings minority.

A In time of peace he was alwaies prouident for War, heaping vp great treaſure and ſuch other things, as without which the wars could not be maintained. But aboue all things he was carefull for the good agreement of the Nobility, taking great pains in reconciling their diſpleaſures conceiued one againſt another; and that with ſuch dexteritie, as that hee was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

Huniades goeth againſt the Turk.

In the mean time, whilſt he was thus buſied in diſpoſing the ciuil affairs of the Commonweal, and the adminiſtration of juſtice, he was aduertiſed by his eſpials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raiſing great forces both in Aſia and Europe, and that as the common fame went, for the inuaſion of Hungary. For the withſtanding whereof Huniades not vnprouided, as neuer vnmindfull of ſo dangerous an enemy, or of any thing more deſirous than in B ſome ſort to be reuenged of the great loſſe receiued at Varna; in the fourth yeare of his gouernment, and in the year of our Lord 1448, accompanied with moſt part of the Nobility of Hungary, and the Vayuod of Valachia his friend and confederat, ſet forward againſt the Turk with an army of two and twenty thouſand choice ſoldiers. So hauing paſſed the riuer Tibiſcus or Teiſe, and trauelling thorow Valachia, a little beneath where the Riuer Morava running thorow Servia, falleth into Danubius, he with moſt part of his army paſſed that great riuer; the reſt in the mean time taking paſſage ouer at a town called Severin. Huniades with his Army being thus gotten ouer into Servia, by his Embaſſadours requeſted the Deſpot, as hee had oftentimes before, to put himſelfe into that moſt Chriſtian War, and remembring the great benefits he had receiued from the Hungarians, not to ſhew himſelf therfore vngrateful, C than which, nothing could be more diſhonorable. And to encourage him the more, certified him both of his own ſtrength, and of the ayd brought vnto him by the Vayuod; and that for the good ſucces of the War there wanted nothing but his preſence and direction, with ſuch troups of light horſmen as he knew he had alwaies in readines; wherewth he requeſted him with all ſpeed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turk than to Huniades; the more cleanly to withdraw himſelf from this war, pretended many excuſes: firſt, The league hee had with Amurath his ſon in law, which he ſaid hee might not break, for fear that if things chanced not well, he might therby fall again into his old miſery.
Then, The vnſeaſonablenes of the time, Autumn being now paſt: which difficulties in thoſe cold Countries they had to their coſt too much felt in the late Warres. Theſe with many D other ſuch like he alledged in excuſe that he came not: but the truth was, the malice of the man, beeing much grieued to ſee Huniades preferred to the gouernment of the kingdome before him, and diſdaining to ſerue vnder his enſignes, being himſelf Deſpot and King of Servia, deſcended of the royal race, was the cauſe of his backwardnes. So that blinded with envy, he could not there rightly iudge of himſelf, or what was fit for him in this caſe to haue don.
But Huniades angry with his vnkind anſwer, threatned with his own hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to giue away his kingdom to one more worthy therof than he, if hee ſhould with victory return. So paſſing thorow Servia as thorow the enemies country, hee came vnto Bulgaria.
After whoſe departure, the falſe Deſpot by ſpeedy meſſengers aduertiſed Amurath both of the comming of the Hungarians, and of their ſtrength; yea he certified him of euerie E dayes march, and how that Huniades was but with a ſmall company of his own, and ſome weak ſupplies of the Vayuod, come ouer Danubius: whom if he ſhould not preſently meet, but ſuffer him to come on farther, and ſo with his army to get betwixt him and home, he might ſo ſhut him in, as that he ſhould be hardly able to eſcape his hands. All which he did, partly for envy, partly to gratifie the Turk, and the better to keep friendſhip with him. So Amurath not contemning the Deſpots counſel, ſuffred Huniades without reſiſtance to enter a great way into his country, and comming two or three daies march behind him, ſo ſtopped the paſſage, as that he could not poſſibly retyre, but that he muſt needs fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plain in Bulgaria, which the Hungarians call Rigomezu; and the Raſcians, the plain of Coſſova: through the middeſt wherof the Riuer Schichniza riſing out of the mountains F of Illyria, running, at length falleth into Morava, and ſo into Danubius. This Plaine is about twenty miles in length, and in bredth fiue, enuironed on each ſide with pleaſant mountains, in maner of a theatre, the riuer and low vallies at the foot of the mountaines being garniſhed with many country villages and towns. Into this fatall Plain, when as the Hungarians firſt,and after them the Turks,were as into a place of combat deſcended;an old woman dwelling G in one of the villages vpon the riuer ſide faſt by,where both armies of late paſſed, with a loud voice cried out, O how much I now fear the hard fortune of the Hungarians. When as their paſſage ouer by the foord troubled the riuer but one day, and the Turkes three; by the ſmall number of their army diuining their enſuing ouerthrow. In the midſt almoſt of this Plaine ariſeth a ſmall hill,by the foot wherof the riuer Schichniza runneth; not far beyond which toward the head of the Plain,was a certain tower built like a pyramide, in memorial of Amurath the firſt of that name,and third King of the Turks,there ſlain: which tower Amurath fearing leſt Huniades marching before him,ſhould take,and ſo become vnto him ominous(for in ſuch matters the Turks are very ſuperſtitious) he made haſt,of purpoſe to joine battell with him,before he ſhould come to the aforeſaid tower. Huniades being come vnto the hill eaſily H ariſing in the midſt of the plain,there incamped,expecting the comming of Scanderbeg; who was ſaid(according to appointment formerly made betwixt him and Scanderbeg) to be euery hour comming. Wherfore Amurath fearing leſt the Tower faſt by ſhould be taken, and the enemies power ſtrengthned by the comming of the Albanois, prouoked Huniades to battell; who ſtill refuſed the ſame,in hope of his friends comming. Which made the Turke more fierce vpon him,ſeeking by all means he could to draw him to battel, but eſpecially by cutting him off from water & forrage. For why,he much preſumed vpon his multitude,hauing in his army about fourſcore thouſand fighting men. At length Huniades,for want of water and other neceſſaries inforced to fight,vpon Saint Lukes day,being then Thurſday,commanded his ſouldiers to make themſelues ready: and diuiding his Army into two and thirty battalions, I in ſuch order as he meant to giue battell, the more to encourage them, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Huniades his notable ſpeech to incorage his ſoldiers againſt the Turks.

At length(valiant ſoldiers,and fellowes in arms)the day is come,wherin you may reuenge that diſhonor or diſgrace you receiued in the battell of Varna; and recouer your former credit of conſtancie and praiſe,if you will play the men. The Enemie oppoſeth againſt you but theſe reliques of his armies, by you ſo often broken and diſcomfited; who although they bee in number more than you, yet are they in hope, quarrell,and ſtrength far inferior. For what can they hope for,which fight not for their owne,but for an other mans kingdom, and in conquering, procure vnto themſelues nothing but bondage in this life, and torment in the life to come, and in both, perpetuall and endles miſery? Wheras you on the other ſide, howſoeuer K the matter fall out, fighting for your own kingdom, your children, your country, your houſes, your altars,may aſſuredly hope for in both,eternall and vndoubted bliſſe. You haue alſo farre greater cauſe to fight, as they which if they do not valiantly ouercome their enemies, are in danger, with themſelues, to loſe all that theirs is. The ſtrength of both is ſufficiently tried. Once we vnfortunatly joined battell at Varna, where if we might make exchange of our fortunes there found, haply the Turk would make choice of our flight,rather than of the great ſlaughter of his own men; who being not able to beat vs, was there notably beaten,with the loſſe of a great part of his Army: whoſe great loſſe there receiued, might counteruail our diſhonor; although he ſuffered the loſſe perforce, but we our flight by choice. But of that our ouerthrow,the angry powers from aboue(willing to reuenge our breach of faith) were,as I verily beleeue, the cauſe,rather than our cowardiſe: for euen there all the authors of that perfidious dealing,euen there, L I ſay,euery one rceiued the iuſt guerdon of their treachery. Wheras we,againſt our wills drawn into that wofull war,by the mercy of God yet liue with you, preſerued for the defence of the Chriſtian commonweal, and eſpecially of Hungary,that it ſhould not be ouer-run with the Turkiſh power and rage. The number of your enemies is not of you to be feared, when as you with few haue oftentimes learned to fight with their multitudes,and carried away from them the victory. Hitherto we haue rather fought by the power of God than man, and in the name of Chriſt Ieſus our Sauiour haue eaſily ouerthrowne their prophane battels.
Which way ſoeuer we haue turned our ſelues in his moſt mighty name,we haue with our victorious armes opened our way, for that we fought vnder the leading and conduct of the Higheſt, whoſe help wee haue alwaies felt at hand: neither ſhall we therof this day fail,if we be mindfull of his forepaſſed loue towards vs,and of our wonted valour. God is alwaies preſent with them that in his iuſt quarrell fight couragiouſly. M Herunto is ioyned the ſafe maner of our fight,by reaſon of our men at arms,and barbed horſes,who like a ſtrong caſtle cannot eaſily be ouerthrown. Our battalions are ſuch as may eaſily be commanded, and yet ſtrong enough againſt our enemies; wheras their great multitude breeds but confuſion. We haue many notable and forcible engins of war, which they haue not. Beſides that, euery hour we look for the worthy Scanderbeg his comming. The danger is not ſo great as that we ſhould feare it, or ſo little as that wee ſhould contemn it. Back again without victory we may not go, for that our army is hardly by the ſtreits of theſe mountains to be led: and if the way were neuer ſo eaſie, yet without doing that we came for, and glory with victory, we may not retyre. Vnto the Valiant all difficulties are propounded: wherfore ſith this your laſt labor is at hand, wherin the whole ſtrength of the Turks may for euer be cut off; I pray and beſeech you (fellow ſoldiers) by that God vnder whoſe power and protection we ſerue, and by the loue you bear vnto your country, your wiues, your children, and wealth, vpon the ſignall of battell giuen, ſo to ſhew your valor, as men reſolued to be fully reuenged of the iniuries by that filthy and wicked nation done both to God and man, and eſpecially of the loſſe receiued at Varna. We loſt there a deuout King, who for our ſafety, and for the breach of his faith, ſacrificed himſelf; by which royall ſacrifice that diuine anger is appeaſed: vnto whoſe ghoſt I beſeech you in this battell to make an honorable ſacrifice. Not forgetting withall, to reuenge the death of other worthy men in that battell ſlain. This fear of the Turks is at once and euen at this day to be cut off; and ſo, as that it ſhould neuer grow again: and the kingdom of Hungary ſo to bee deliuered from the danger of moſt cruell ſlauery, as that it may by this daies work gain perpetuall reſt and glory, vnto the injoying of the pleaſures both of this life, and of the life to come. Wherfore (worthy ſoldiers) we muſt fight with all our force, for that our honor ſo requireth, our profit ſo perſuadeth, and neceſſity inforceth. As for our ſelues, howſoeuer the matter fall out, it ſhall be well with vs: if victory, perpetuall bliſſe and happines ſhall therby be procured vnto our country, and immortall fame vnto our ſelues: but if we be ouercome, here we ſhall be moſt honorably buried in the bed of fame, to liue in heauen with God and his Saints for euer. Wherfore I beſeech you ſo to fight, as men reſolutely ſet downe to ouercome, or if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as men reſolued honorably to die.

With this the Generals ſpeech all the mindes of the hearers were greatly inflamed, and they all by his words, and their own hot deſires, ſufficiently encouraged. Neither did old Amurath on the other ſide with leſſe care or diligence marſhal his Army, and encourage his Turks, ſparing neither cheerfull ſpeech, glorious promiſes, or ſeuere command. Whoſe Army being brought into the plain, and ranged in order of battel, filled the ſame from the one ſide to the other, euen vnto the very mountains, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Chriſtians: and ſo about nine a clock in the morning ſet forward. Huniades had from the hil where he lay ſent downe both the wings of his Army, and had afront on both ſides before them ſtretched out certain long troups of light horſmen to begin the skirmiſh. In the midſt betwixt both he had placed Zechel his ſiſters ſon, with a ſtrong ſquare battell of men at arms: and ſuch as he had kept aloft vpon the hill for reſcues, hee had compaſſed about with his Waggons as with Trenches. The ſignall of the battell being giuen, the fierce and couragious ſoldiers on both ſides, with cheerfull minds began at firſt to skirmiſh afar off: but afterwards fortune as it were fawning vpon both ſides, and their courage therupon encreaſing, they began with greater force to fight foot to foot, and hand to hand. Which hot fight continued about three hours: at length the Turks battell was put to the worſt by Benedict Loſonicus, who had the leading of the right wing. And ſo likewiſe in the left wing by Stephen Bamffi, who with much ſlaughter had foiled the great Baſſa of Europe, ſtill preſſing hard and deſperately vpon him. Which diſcomfiture of his men in both wings Amurath perceiuing, preſently ſent in ſtrong ſupplies, and in both places renewed the battell: wherby the Hungarian and Valachian light horſmen, before wearied, were inforced to retyre to the men at Arms; who ſerred together, and ſtanding as a ſtrong wall, eaſily repulſed the Turks greateſt aſſaults. In which maner of fight many were on both ſides ſlain, but far more of the Turkes, by reaſon they were neither ſo well horſed nor armed as were the Chriſtians. Huniades in the mean time with the artillerie from the hil did the Turks great harm: which Amurath perceiuing, drew as cloſe vnto the hil as he could, by that mean ſauing his people ſo much as was poſſible, out of the danger of the Artillery, mounted on high aboue them in ſuch ſort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them. Which Huniades from the hil beholding, came down to the relief of his men, ſending new ſupplies to both wings, ſomtimes encouraging them with cheerfull ſpeech, and ſomtime with his own moſt valiant hand: vnto the weary he ſent relief, the fearful he encouraged, them that were flying he ſtaid, & where he ſaw the enemies faſteſt comming on, there was he himſelf preſent to meet them; omitting nothing that was of a good General or worthy ſouldier to be done. The valiant he commended, the coward he reproued, and as a careful General, was G himſelfe in euery place preſent. Wherby the battel became ſo fierce and terrible, that in eueuery place a man might haue ſeen all fouly foiled with bloud and the quarry of the dead. Amurath in like maner ſtill ſent in new ſupplies, nothing diſcouraged with the loſſe of his men, preſuming vpon his multitude, as fully reſolued orderly to fight, and to make vſe of his forces, in hope at length, by continuall ſending in of freſh ſupplies, to weary his enemies, whom he ſaw he could not by force ouercome. Wherin he was not deceiued; for one battalion of the Hungarians was oftentimes inforced to weary four or fiue of the Turks before they could be relieued, they came on ſo faſt. That day they dined & ſupt in the battell, refreſhing themſelues with ſuch ſhort repaſt as they could eat ſtanding, going, or riding. The Turks Army was that day in euery place put to the worſt, and oftentimes with great ſlaughter inforced by H the Hungarians to retyre almoſt to their trenches: yet was the battel ſtill again renued, and ſo fought on both ſides, as well appeared they were reſolued either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruel fight, maintained al the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retyring into their own trenches, but with purpoſe the next day to renew the battel, and not to giue ouer or turn their backs, vntill the victory were by dint of ſword determined.

So with little reſt was that night ſpent, both armies keeping moſt diligent Watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as by battel, therin to try whither they ſhould liue or die. It was yet ſcarſe fair day, when both the armies in good order ranged began again the battaile; which at the firſt was not by the Hungarians fought with ſuch force and courage as before: for there was none of them which had not the day before ſpent their whole ſtrength; wheras I there was yet 40000 of the Turkes which either had not fought at all, or but lightly ſkirmiſhed.
Yet Huniades exhorted his ſouldiers, not by faint-hearted cowardiſe to break off the courſe of the victory by them the day before ſo wel begun, but couragiouſly to proſecute the ſame; beſeeching them not to be wanting vnto themſelues and their country, but to remember how they had fought the day before, how many thouſands of their enemies they had ſlain, and not now at laſt to giue ouer, and ſo ſhamefully to fruſtrat all the pains and dangers by them endured: for that they (as he ſaid) were to be thought worthy of honour, not which began, but which ended honorable actions. He wiſhed them to ſet before their eies the calamities like to enſue, if they ſhould as cowards be ouercome: firſt, the diuers kindes of death and torture; then the ſlauery of their wiues and children, the rauiſhment of their virgins and K matrons; and laſt of all, the vtter deſtruction of their kingdome, with the horrible confuſion of all things, as wel ſacred as prophane: all which were by that one daies labor (ſaid hee) to be auoided. And therfore he beſought them for the loue both of God and man, with their wonted valor, that day to ſet at liberty for euer, themſelues, their country, their wiues & children, and whatſoeuer els they held dear. In like maner alſo did Amurath incourage his ſouldiers with great promiſes and threats, perſuading them rather to endure any thing, than by that daies ouerthrow to be quite driuen out of Europ. He carefully viewed his army, ordered his battels, and with many great reaſons perſuaded them to play the men. But after ſome light ſkirmiſhes being paſt, both the armies were fully joined, the battel was fought with no leſſe force and fury than the day before. Of the Chriſtians many then wounded came now againe L into the battell, there either by ſpeedy death or ſpeedy victory to cure their wounds before receiued, and there did right good ſeruice. Great was the ſlaughter in euery place, neither could the valour of the Hungarians bee withſtood; whoſe furious impreſſion when the Turks could not by plain force endure, began with their freſh horſmen cunningly to delude their deſperat fiercenes: at ſuch time as the Hungarians began moſt hardly to charge them, they by and by turned their backs, ſuffring them to follow after them, far ſcattred and diſperſed: who allured as it were with the hope of preſent victory, eagerly purſued them, and in the purſuit ſlew diuers of them: and they again vpon a ſignal giuen, cloſing together, and turning back vpon the diſperſed troups, wel reuenged the death of their fellowes; and with their often charges and retreits wonderfully wearied the Hungarians, notably deluding their furious M attempts with that vncertain kinde of fight, all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were ſlain, and the Turks had that day the better. And ſo both Armies beeing wearied, night and wearineſſe ended the fight, both retyring into their trenches, there keeping moſt carefull watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day the battel was again begun. Huniades his brother,

The battell begun againe the ſecond day.

Huniades encourageth his ſoldiers.

A brother, Generall of the Valachians, with his light horſmen ſetting firſt forward; after whom in ſeemly order followed the reſt of the nobility with their Companies. Where for certaine hours the battel was hardly fought with like hope on both ſides, and a great ſlaughter made; but ſpecially of the Hungarians, who wearied with the long fight, & moſt part of them wounded, were now all to endure this third daies labor. Zechel (Huniades his ſiſters ſonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battell, was the firſt of the Leaders there ſlaine in the thickeſt of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus, and Stephen Bamffi, both great Commaunders, incloſed by the Turks, there died alſo. Amurath ſeeing the formoſt enſignes of the Chriſtians, which ſtood in Zechels regiment, taken, and his ſouldiers, diſcomforted with the death of their Colonell, turning their backs; preſently commanded all the Companies (which were many) yet left in the B trenches for new ſupplies, to iſſue forth, and at once to ouerwhelm the Chriſtians, being (as he ſaid) but few, and ouerwearied with three daies continual fight. Vpon which commaund they fiercely breaking out, preſently ouerthrew both the wings of the Chriſtians, before wauering; and in a great battel (wherin moſt of the chief commanders were ſlain, and their Enſignes taken) diſcomfited the reſt, and with a great ſlaughter put them to flight. Huniades ſeeing his brother now ſlain, the enſignes taken, & the battel quite loſt, betook himſelf to flight alſo, leauing behind him his tents and baggage, all which ſhortly after became a prey to the Turks; who from noon vntil night fiercely followed the chaſe with moſt cruel execution: but at length ſtayd by the comming on of the darknes, they returned again to their trenches. The reſt of the Turks army that followed not the chaſe, compaſſing in the Hungarian campe, were C there by the wounded ſoldiers, the wagoners, and other drudges of the army, kept out ſo long as they had any ſhot left; but yet were in the end euery mothers ſon ſlain, though not altogether vnreuenged, two or three of the Turkes in many places lying dead by the body of one Hungarian. Amurath to couer the greatnes of his loſſe there receiued, commanded the bodies of his captains there ſlain, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common ſouldiers to be for the moſt part caſt into the riuer Schichniza: for which cauſe the inhabitants of the country there by, of long time after abſtained from eating of any fiſh taken in that riuer. The plain by this great battel made once again famous, lay neuertheles many years after couered with dead mens bones, as if it had bin with ſtones: neither could be plowed by the country people, but that long time after armor and weapons were there ſtill in many places turned vp D and found. Thus albeit that this bloudy victory fel to the Turks, yet was their loſſe far greater than the Hungarians, hauing loſt (as was reported by them that ſay leaſt) 34000 of themſelues, for 8000 of their enemies. Howbeit they themſelues report the loſſe to haue been on both ſides far greater; as that of the Chriſtians were ſlain 17000, and of themſelues 40000: which in ſo long and mortal a battel is not vnlike to haue bin true. In this vnfortunate battell fel moſt part of the Hungarian Nobility, all men worthy eternall fame and memory, whoſe names we wil for breuities ſake paſſe ouer. Many in the chaſe taken, & the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandement of the angry tyrant ſlaine. Such as eſcaped out of the ſlaughter by the way of Illyria, returned in ſafety; but ſuch as thought to ſaue themſelues by returning back again through Servia the Deſpots country, found the ſame ſo troubleſom E as that few of them eſcaped, but that they were by the way either ſlain, or quite ſtripped out of all they had.

The battell begun againe the third day.

Huniades flies.

The number of the Turks and Chriſtians ſlain in the battel of Coſſova.

Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the reſt; who hauing on horſeback all alone by vncoth and vntract waies trauelled three days without meat or drink, and the fourth day tyred his horſe and caſt him off; being himſelf on foot and diſarmed, fell into the hands of two notable Theeues, who in diſpoiling him of his apparell, finding a fair crucifix of gold about his necke, fell in ſtrife amongſt themſelues for the ſame: wherby he took occaſion to lay hand vpon one of their ſwords, and with the ſame preſently thruſt him through; & then ſuddenly aſſailing the other, put him to flight alſo. So deliuered of this danger, trauelling on, and almoſt ſpent with thirſt and hunger, the next day hee light F vpon a ſhepheard a ſturdy rough knaue, who hearing of the Hungarians ouerthrow, was in hope of prey roaming abroad in that deſolat country: who at the firſt meeting, ſtrucken with the majeſty of the man, ſtood at gaze vpon him; as alſo did Huniades, fearing in his ſo great weaknes to haue to do with him. Thus a while hauing one well regarded the other, they began to enter talk; the ſhepheard bluntly asking him of his fortune; and he for Gods ſake crauing uing of him ſomthing to eat. When as the ſhepheard hearing of his hard hap,mooued with G his eſtate,and hope of promiſed reward,brought him vnto a poor cottage not far off, cauſing to be ſet before him bread and water, with a few onions. Who in the pleaſant remembrance of that forepaſſed miſery, would oftentimes after in his greateſt banquets ſay, That he neuer in his life fared better or more daintily,than when he ſupped with this ſhepheard. So wel can hunger ſeaſon homely cates. Thus refreſhed,he was by the ſhepheard conducted to Sinderovia: wherof the Deſpot hauing intelligence (whoſe Countrey was all laid for the ſtaying of him)cauſed him by the captain of the caſtle to be apprehended and impriſoned. But after certain daies ſpent in talk about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, That all ſuch ſtrong towns in Raſcia and Servia, as had by the Hungarians bin detained from the Deſpot, at ſuch time as his kingdom was by Vladiſlaus reſtored vnto him, ſhould be again to him deliuered; H and that Matthias,Huniades his yongeſt ſon,ſhould for the confirmation of further friendſhip marry the Deſpots daughter: with ſome other ſuch conditions as it pleaſed the vngratefull Prince for his own behoof to ſet down. For performance wherof, he required to haue Ladiſlaus,Huniades his eldeſt ſon,in hoſtage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto, for fear the falſe Deſpot ſhould haue deliuered him into the hands of Amurath his mortall enemy. So the hoſtage being giuen,Huniades was again deliuered. Who vpon Chriſtmas day comming to Segedinum,was there by all the nobility of Hungary, and great concourſe of the people,honorably receiued. This ingratitude of the Deſpots no leſſe grieued this worthy man,than the diſhonor receiued from the Turk. Wherfore vpon the ſudden raiſing a great army,he inuaded the territory,long before giuen to the Deſpot by the Emperour Sigiſmund in I Hungary,in exchange of the ſtrong town of Belgrade,deſtroying the country before him,and burning the villages,neuer reſting vntil he had got into his power whatſoeuer the deſpot had in Hungary:and not ſo contented,preſently entred Raſcia,where the Deſpots Embaſſadours met him,bringing with them Ladiſlaus the hoſtage honorably rewarded,and humbly crauing peace at his hand,which he at the requeſt of the nobility eaſily granted,with forgiuenes of all former wrongs or injuries: and ſo hauing with him concluded a peace, returned back againe into Hungary. But fortune neuer long ſuffereth the valiant man to reſt,but ſtil keeps him buſied,leſt he ſhould at too much eaſe attain vnto honors glory.

Huniades taken priſoner by the deſpot.

The Deſpot inuaded by Amurath, craueth aid of Huniades.

The year following, Amurath certainly informed, That George the Deſpot hauing of late Huniades in his power, had againe ſet him at liberty; was therewith exceeding wroth: blaming K him of great ingratitude, That for a kingdome which he had at his hands receiued, hee had not deliuered to him his enemy, in ful recompence therof; whom of al others he moſt feared,& therfore likewiſe wiſht to haue had him periſh. In reuenge of which injury,as he took it,the melancholy tyrant ſent Fritze-beg and Ioſe-beg,two of his moſt expert captaines,with a ſtrong power to inuade Raſcia the deſpots country: who accordingly entring therinto,ſtrongly fortified Chryſonicum a town before ruinated,vpon the ſide of the riuer Morava,and from thence with fire and ſword deſtroied the country both far and neer. The Deſpot diſmaid with this ſudden and vnexpected invaſion,wiſt not wel which way to turn himſelf: the angry Turk he wel knew was not to be appeaſed without yeelding to ſome great inconuenience; and to pray aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withſtand the Turks, he thought but L vain,for the wrong he had before don him. So that what to do he wiſt not; yet had he rather to endure any thing,than again to ſuffer the heauy bondage of the Turk. In this extremity he thought beſt to make proof of Huniades, of whom he humbly, and not without great ſhame, craued aid. Which the curteous gouernor,according to his honourable nature,forgetting all former injuries,eaſily granted; and the rather,for that he deſired nothing more,than to be of the Turks in ſome part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late receiued in the plaines of Coſſova: as alſo for that he wiſely foreſaw, that the Deſpots country being loſt,he ſhould haue the Turks ſtil brauing him euen as it were in the gates of Hungary. Wherfore hauing with great ſpeed raiſed a conuenient power, he forthwith in perſon himſelf ſet forward, and at Synderovia paſſing ouer the riuer of Danubius,into Raſcia,there joined his forces with the M Deſpots,which he found there ready. And ſo marching forward with ſuch expedition that he preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather alſo at the ſame time as it were fauoring his purpoſe. (and couering the Countrey with a thicke miſt) hee was the fourth day vpon the Turks before they were aware of him. Who beeing wonderfully diſmayed with

A the ſudden comming of the Chriſtians, and vpon the breaking vp of the miſt diſcouering alſo Huniades his enſignes (alwaies vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of reſiſtance, or of the ordering of their battel, but as men diſcouraged, betook themſelues to ſpeedy flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Servian light horſemen with moſt bloudy execution, hauing them in chaſe all that day; Huniades with his men at arms following ſtil after in good order, for feare the Turks ſhould again make head vpon the light horſemen that had them in chaſe. And had not the comming on of the night ended the ſlaughter, few of the Turkes had there eſcaped: but by the approch thereof, many of them got into the Woods, and ſo ſaued themſelues. Fritze Beg the Generall, with moſt of the Turks beſt commanders were in that flight taken. Huniades after this victory entring into Bulgaria, came to Budina the metropolitical B City of that Country; which (as the cauſe oftentimes of great wars) he burnt downe to the ground. And ſo hauing well reuenged himſelf, and cleared the Country of the Turks, he returned back again into Servia, and there gaue to the Deſpot for a preſent all the priſoners he had taken; and contenting himſelf with the honor of the victory, returned with triumph to Buda, there to find no leſſe trouble with the Bohemians and ſome of the diſcontented Nobilitie of Hungary, than he had with the Turks, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian Commonweal.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, MuMuſtapha lying ſtil vpon the borders of Macedonia, as Amurath had commanded, it chanced that a great quarrel grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech C Zachary a nobleman of Epirus, then ſhamefully murthred by his vnnaturall kinſman Lech Duchagne; part of whoſe inheritance lying in the frontiers of Epirus, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their ſeigniory: and hauing got poſſeſſion of the city of Dayna, part thereof by force held the ſame againſt Scanderbeg. Vpon which quarrell great wars aroſe betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before bin very good friends; inſomuch that in the end they joined battel at the riuer of Drine, where the Venetians were by him in a great battel ouerthrowne.
Of which troubles Muſtapha daily vnderſtood, and how that Scanderbeg ſo buſied, had left but a ſmall garriſon vpon the borders of Epirus. Wherfore being deſirous to redeem his former diſgrace with ſome better hap, he would fain haue taken the opportunitie now preſented, but that his great maſters command lay ſo heauy vpon him, as that he durſt not without his leaue D attempt the ſame: knowing that the danger of his euill fortune, if it ſhould ſo fal out, would far exceed the vncertain glory of his better ſucceſs. Yet ceaſed hee not from time to time, to giue Amurath intelligence of theſe troubles and wars in Epirus, erneſtly requeſting him not to let ſlip ſo fair an opportunitie, but to giue him leaue to enter into the country, in maner aſſuring him before hand of the victory: yet the ſuſpitious old King was long in reſoluing what to do, ſtil fearing the fortune of his enemy. At length diſcharged of the fear of the Hungarians, and commending Muſtapha's forwardnes, he ſent vnto him a meſſenger with letters of this purport, anſwerable to his deſire.

The wars thou ſo greatly deſireſt, behold Muſtapha wee grant vnto thee: the glory therof (if thoſe E things be true which we hear of the Venetian war) thine own valor and worthy right hand ſhal giue thee.
Yet thou muſt warily deal with that enemy, and not raſhly take vp Arms, which thou maiſt be inforced ſhamefully to caſt away, when thou thinkeſt leaſt. Peraduenture the counterfeit ſhew of war and falling out among the Chriſtians do too much allure thee; for the common ſaying is, There is no quarrell ſooner ended than betwixt the father and the ſonne. We in perſon abſent, can neither aduiſe thee as preſent, nor commend a fooliſh forwardnes in arms. Thou muſt before thou put on arms, diſpoſe of all things, and conſider of euery particular which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou haſt a great army of freſh and luſty ſoldiers; thine enemies are with continual war wearied and ſpent: in that remains do as thou thinkeſt good, for I forbid thee nothing which thou thinkeſt may be for aduancement of our honor.

Amurath's letters of aduertiſement vnto Muſtapha, concerning his going againe into Epirus.

F Muſtapha hauing thus obtained leaue, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into Epirus, hoping in one battell to end that War. Which hee (preſuming vpon the ſtrength of his army) many times offered in the plain field. News herof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the ſiege of Dayna againſt the Venetians) from his gariſons lying vpon the frontiers of Epirus; to whom he addreſſed a ſpeedy meſſenger, commaunding them in no wiſe to encounter with the Enemy, but to keep themſelues within the ſafegard of their ſtrong Holds, and to protract the time vntill his comming. Afterwards ſelecting out of his army 500 horſmen, and 1500 choſen footmen, all old beaten ſoldiers, he with that ſmal number marched to the place where he knew his garriſons lay intrenched, in the vpper country of Dibra; leauing Ameſa his nephew at the ſiege of Dayna. Muſtapha hauing many times in vain ſought to draw the garriſon ſouldiers out of their trenches, by offering them many opportunities of aduantage, and now out of hope that way to circumvent them, began to ſpoil and burn the country round about: but when he vnderſtood by his ſcouts of Scanderbegs comming, he ſpeedily called together his army, and incamped within two miles of Scanderbegs camp, at a place called Oronoche, in the vpper country of Dibra. Scanderbeg had there in his Camp, of the garriſon ſoldiers and thoſe he brought with him, 4000 horſmen and 2000 foot, all old expert ſouldiers, where after he had made his trenches ſtrong, he left therein 300 of them, and brought the reſt into the field in order of battell. Muſtapha likewiſe on the other ſide likewiſe brought on in good order his army alſo. But whilſt both armies thus ſtood ranged one within view of an other, expecting nothing but the ſignall of battell, ſuddenly a man at arms in gallant & rich furniture, iſſued out of the Turks army, into the midſt of the plain betwixt both armies, and from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Chriſtian army: this Turk was called Caraguſa. At the firſt Scanderbegs ſouldiers vpon this challenge ſtood ſtill, one looking vpon another; for as they were all aſhamed to refuſe ſo braue an offer, ſo the danger ſo ſuddenly offered ſtaid euery mans forwardnes for a while: vntil that one Paul Maneſsi, accounted the beſt man at arms in Scanderbegs army (vpon whom euery mans eye was now caſt, as if hee had beene by name called out by the proud Challenger) not able longer to endure the Turks pride, with great courage and cheerful countenance came to Scanderbeg, requeſting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on Gods name to ſet forward, firſt to win honor to himſelf, and then to giue example of his valor for all the reſt of the army to follow. Paul ſtaying a while, vntill he had for that purpoſe moſt brauely armed himſelf, preſently mounted to horſe, and riding forth into the plain, called aloud vnto the Turk, that he ſhould make himſelfe ready to fight. Whom Caraguſa required to ſtay a while, that he might ſpeak vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

Caraguſa the Turks ſpeech to Maneſsi.

The victory (ſaid he) our force and fortune ſhall determin; but the conditions of the victory we are now to appoint our ſelues. If the Deſtinies haue aſsigned vnto thee the honor of this day, I refuſe not but that thou maiſt by law of arms, when I am ouercome, carry away with thee my rich ſpoiles, and at thy pleaſure diſpoſe of my dead body. But if thou ſhalt fal vnder my hand, I require that I may haue the ſame right and power ouer thy captiue body; and that the Generals will grant, that no man ſhall moue out of either army, to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combat, or after.

Maneſsi his ſtout anſwer to Caraguſa.

Wherunto Maneſsi anſwered; That he agreed to thoſe conditions of the combat, which hee vpon a needleſſe fear had ſo required to be kept: ſaying, That where the fierce ſoul had yeelded, there of good right all the reſt ought to be the Conquerors. And that therfore he ſhould fight without fear of any more Enemies than himſelf, whom ſo ſoon as he had depriued of life, he ſhould haue free power to doe with his dead body what he would. Which if thou wouldſt giue (ſaid he) to the tears of my fellow ſouldiers, yet would not worthy Scanderbeg ſuffer the carkaſſe of a vanquiſhed coward to be brought backe againe into his Campe.

Caraguſa maruelled to heare his ſo braue reſolution, and as it was thought repented him of his challenge. But after both the Generals had vpon their honors confirmed the lawes of the combat before rehearſed, both the champions were left alone in the middeſt of the plain betwixt both armies, with all mens eies fixed vpon them. Now both the Armies betwixt fear and hope, ſtood in great expectation of the euent of the combat, preſaging their own fortune in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both hauing withdrawn themſelues one from another a conuenient diſtance, for the making of their courſe, and after with great violence running together, Caraguſa was by Maneſſa at the firſt incounter ſtruck through the head and ſlain. Maneſsi alighting, diſarmed the dead body & ſtruck off his head, and ſo loded with the armor and head of the proud challenger, returned Victor to the Army, where he was

A joyfully receiued and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there preſently honorably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg ſeeing his men by this good fortune of Maneſſi, greatly encouraged, and the Turks as men diſmaied with the death of their Champion, hanging their heads, like an inuincible Captaine, himſelfe ſet firſt forward toward the enemy, as it were in contempt of their multitude: and had charged them as they ſtood, before they had ſet one foot forward, had not Muſtapha to incourage his ſoldiers, with certain diſordred troups oppoſed himſelfe againſt him; which the whole army ſeeing, faintly followed: but as they ſet forward with ſmall courage, ſo were they at the firſt incounter eaſily driuen to retire. Which when Muſtapha ſay, he called earneſtly vpon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his own example, put ſpurs to his horſe, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbegs B army, as one reſolued either to gaine the victory, or there to die: after whom followed moſt of the principall captains of his army, which would not for ſhame forſake their Generall: thus by his valor the battell was for a while renewed. But Moſes preuailing with great ſlaughter in one part of the Army, the Turks began to fly: in which flight Muſtapha the Generall, with twelue others of the chiefe men in that army, were taken priſoners, but of the common ſouldiers few were ſaued. There was ſlaine of the Turks army ten thouſand, and fifteene enſignes taken; whereas of the Chriſtians were ſlaine but three hundred. The Turks tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof, became a prey to Scanderbegs ſoldiers: wherewith although he had ſatisfied the deſires of them all, yet to keep his old cuſtom, he entred into the confines of Macedonia, and there burnt and ſpoiled all that he could. And afterward leauing a garriſon of C two thouſand horſemen and a thouſand foot for defence of his frontiers, returned againe with the reſt of his army to the ſiege of Dayna.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Muſtapha.

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg; and Amurath deſirous to redeeme his Captaines, about the ſame time ſent great preſents vnto Scanderbeg, with fiue and twenty thouſand duckats for the ranſome of Muſtapha and the other chieftaines; whom Scanderbeg ſo honorably vſed, as if there had neuer been any hoſtility betwixt him and them: and ſo with a ſafe conuoy ſent them out of his country. The ranſome of Muſtapha and the other Turks he diuided amongſt his ſoldiers. When Scanderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his army againe into Macedonia, with the ſpoile of that country to make his ſoldiers better pay, as his vſuall manner was. And to do the greater harme, he D diuided his army into three parts, wherewith he ouer-running the country, waſted and deſtroied all before him, putting to the ſword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Chriſtians that there liued among them, he ſpared, but left them nothing more than their liues: the buildings of the Countrey he vtterly conſumed with fire, ſo that in all that part of Macedonia which bordereth vpon Epirus, nothing was to be ſeene more than the bare ground, and the ſhews of the ſpoile by him there made. Which vnmercifull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turks ſhould finde no reliefe in thoſe quarters, whenſoeuer they ſhould come either to lie in garriſon in that country, or to inuade Epirus. The ſpoile he made was ſo great, that it was thought he left not all that country, ſo much as might relieue the Turks army for one day.

Muſtapha ranſomed.

E Of all theſe great harms by Scanderbeg done in Macedonia, Amurath was with all ſpeed aduertiſed, and therewith exceedingly vexed: howbeit he reſolued with his great counſellors, no more to ſend any of his Baſſa's or captains, but to go himſelfe in perſon, with ſuch a royall army as ſhould be ſufficient not to conquer Epirus, but if need were, to fill euery corner thereof. Wherefore he commanded Commiſſions to be ſpeedily directed into all parts of his Kingdomes & prouinces, for the leuying of a great army for Hadrianople: yet whither he intended to imploy the ſame, was not knowne to any in the Turks court, more than the Baſſa's of the councell. Which cauſed all the bordering Chriſtian Princes to make the beſt preparation they could for their own aſſurance, euery one fearing leſt that growing tempeſt ſhould break out againſt himſelf. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkiſh policy, eaſily F perceiued all that great preparation to be made againſt him: which he was the rather induced to think, by reaſon of the vnaccuſtomed quietnes of Amurath, who all that while had neither ſent any army to reuenge Muſtapha's ouerthrow, nor ſo much as a garriſon for defence of the borders of his kindome, but had let all things negligently paſſe, as if he had bin in a dead ſleepe. Beſides that, it was alſo thought that he had ſecret intelligence from ſome of his old friends and acquaintance in Amuraths court,who probably ſuſpected the matter. Wherfore Scanderbeg G ſetting all other things apart,gaue himſelf wholly to the preparing of things neceſſary for the defence of his ſmall kingdome againſt ſo mighty an enemy. Firſt,he by letters and meſſengers aduertiſed all the Chriſtian Princes his neighbors and friends,of the greatnes of the danger of that war: wherein Amurath (as he ſaid) ſought not only his deſtruction, but the vtter ruine of them all:exhorting them therefore to conſider, how far the danger of ſo great an army might extend,and therefore to ſtand faſt vpon their guard. Then he ſent Moſes and other his expert captains into all parts of Epirus,to take vp ſoldiers,and all the prouiſion of corne and victuals that was poſſible to be had. Wherin he himſelf alſo buſily trauelled day and night,nor reſting vntill he had left nothing in the country,whereupon the enemy might ſhew his cruelty. Moſt part of the common people,with their ſubſtance, were receiued into the ſtrong cities;the reſt H tooke the refuge of the Venetian and other Chriſtian Princes towns and countries farther off, vntill this fury were ouerpaſt: all ſuch as were able to beare armes, were commanded to repaire to Croia; where when they were all aſſembled, they were ynow to haue made a right puiſſant army. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice only of 10000 old expert ſoldiers,whom he purpoſed to lead himſelfe,to incounter with the Turks great army, as he ſhould ſee occaſion, and placed 1300 in garriſon in Croia. The citizens alſo themſelues were thorowly furniſhed with all manner of weapons & other prouiſion meet for the defence of their city. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men vnfit for wars, with the women and children, ſhould depart the city, and none to be therein left, but the garriſon ſoldiers, and ſuch citiſens as were willing to tarry, and able to beare armes. This city of Croia I was the chiefe city of Epirus, and of the fortune thereof ſeemed to depend the ſtate of all the other ſtrong townes and cities, and ſo conſequenly of the whole kingdome: for which cauſe, Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miſerable ſight, to ſee the lamentable departure of this weake company out of Croia;all was full of weeping and wailing; no houſe, no ſtreet, no part of the city was without mourning: but eſpecially in the churches was to be ſeene the very face of common ſorrow and heauineſſe; where all ſorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout praiers, with fountaines of teares, ringing their hands;yea, and ſome in the impatiency of their griefe forgetting themſelues,ſeemed to expoſtulate their griefe with God. But when their ſorrow was with tears aſſuaged, and their hearts ſomewhat eaſed, the aged mothers kiſſing their ſons, gaue them many a fearefull K commandment, ſometime rehearſing, how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and other ſometimes ſhewing vnto them their feeble lims and hoary haires, willing them to be mindfull of them. The wiues preſented their children vnto their husbands, bewailing to leaue them as childleſſe widowers,and their houſes deſolate. The old men mute with ſorrow, and carefull of their children,durſt neither incourage them, for feare of making them too forward; neither diſſuade them from aduenturing themſelues,leſt they ſhould ſeem to loue them more than their natiue country. In the middeſt of theſe paſſions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they muſt now depart, that the ſouldiers might take their places and charge.

Then began their ſorrows afreſh, with pitteous ſcriching and tears:a man would haue thought the city had euen then bin preſently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawne from L the imbracing of their friends,all now deſiring to remain ſtill with them in the city, partakers of their common danger. But when they ſaw the officers begin to be earneſt vpon them,and to haſten their departure,then with heauy hearts they took as it were their laſt farewell,and departed out of the city,ſetting their feet many times they wiſt not where, for deſire they had to looke backe againe vpon the city. This great multitude was conueied alſo into the Venetian cities and other places free from danger:whither all the country people which were not before receiued into the ſtrong cities,reſorted alſo,with all their ſubjects and cattell; leauing nothing in all the country of Epirus,but the bare ground for the Turks to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed,and all well quieted,and none left in the city but men fit for ſeruice,Scanderbeg thorowly ſtored it with all things needfull for the defence thereof, and for the induring of M a long ſiege: beſides that,he gaue to euery ſoldier conuenient armor,with ſome ſmall reward.
Then he placed Vranacontes (a valiant and famous captaine, honorably diſcended) Gouernour of the city. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafegard thereof, after he had in few words exhorted them couragiouſly to endure the ſiege, and not to liſten to Amuraths flatte-

The lamentable departing of the weake citizens out of Croia.

A ring and deceitful charms, he departed out of the city vnto his army, then lying within view, and began preſently to march toward Dybra. But he was not farre gone, before he met with Moſes with a gallant troup of horſemen comming from Sfetigrade, a ſtrong city of Dybra, ſci-tuate in the confines of Epirus, bordering vpon Macedonia: which city was Scanderbeg his ſecond care, for that it was like to be the firſt that ſhould indure the angry tyrants fury, ſtanding firſt in his way, as it were the fortreſſe of that country. Moſes had there ſet all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in Croia, and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a graue and politique man) Gouernour, with a ſtrong garriſon of ſoldiers choſen out of all the country of Dybra, which were alwaies accounted the beſt men of war in all Epirus, and was for ſo doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who deliuering vnto him all the forces he had prepared for the B defence of the other caſtles and cities of Epirus, ſent him with diuers others of his Nobility and Captaines, to take order for the ſafety of thoſe places, appointing vnto euery man his charge. As for himſelfe, he with a ſmall troupe of horſmen went to Sfetigrade, carefull of that city aboue meaſure, as it were before diuining the enſuing danger. Being come thither, and all the ſoldiers aſſembled by his commandment into the market place, he there in open audience ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Scanderbeg commeth to Sfetigrade.

Almighty God could not this day offer vnto you (worthy ſoldiers of Sfetigrade) better matter, neither could a fairer occaſion be preſented vnto braue minds and ſoldiers deſirous of honour, than that which now hath cauſed you to take vp moſt juſt armes. Wherein you may for euer, by worthy example, make knowne C your conſtant faith and worthy valour, both towards me in priuate, and the people of Epirus in generall.
Hitherto we haue borne armes for the honour of our kingdome, but now we muſt fight for our liues, our liberty, and the wals of our country. You muſt now force your ſelues, that you do not by reproch and cowar-diſe ſtaine the worthy praiſes you haue already deſerued by the great victories by you obtained vnder my conduct. The greateſt part of the fortune of this war dependeth vpon you: For, the firſt paſſage of Amu-rath into Epirus (that I my ſelfe may be vnto you the firſt meſſenger of that danger) will be this way; the firſt fury of the Turks will aſſaile you, that hauing here as it were broken downe the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe of Epirus, he may afterwards breake into the country, more ſubject to danger. The firſt fruits of this war is yours, you (if you beare the hearts of couragious men, mindfull of your liberty) may beat downe the proud ſtrength of the haughty enemy, and diſcouer his high conceits. The Othoman King ſhall haue his begin- D ning both of his hope and feare: if he ſhall ſee you ſo minded, as I now ſee you gallantly moued, and with joy heare your violent indignation; he will in euery place feare a great force of danger, and therby learne to abſtaine from the other cities of Epirus. Neither will he lie here long at a vaine ſiege, except the wayward old man will fooliſhly hereupon gage all his whole forces: for ſuch is the ſcituation and ſtrength of this city, that it may eaſily ſet at nought an angry enemy. Wherefore reſolue with your ſelues (worthy ſol-diers and citizens) onely by conſtancy and faithfulneſſe, without bloudſhed, to gaine vnto your ſelues an honourable victory. Of your valour (which I willingly ſpeake of) dependeth for the moſt part the faith-fulneſſe of all the reſt; they will locke vpon you, whom they may praiſe or accuſe, and whoſe example they may follow in the fortune of theſe warres. But to what purpoſe ſhould men of worth in their actions pretend the neceſſity of faith, or chance of fortune? whereas by Reaſon, things are both beſt begun and accom-E pliſhed. It ſeldome chanceth, that fortune faileth the ſecond aduice, or is not obedient to vertue: and you haue all things which moſt politique care could prouide for your ſafety. You want not armour, you want not plentifull prouiſion of victuals, you want not valiant men: the ſuperfluous multitude of vnneceſſary people, the pittifull lamentation of women, and troubleſome crying of children ſhall not withdraw you from your publique charge, from your ſeruice and defence of your oountry; I haue left you alone to your ſelues, for defence of your city, your Religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged only with the prouocations of honour and liberty, with the emulation of aduenture and danger, and the very ſight one of another; and I my ſelfe will not be far off with my couragious ſoldiers, a ſilent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not auert from you all the force of the cruell enemy by raſh aduenture, nor try the whole fortune of this war in plaine field; yet will I turne a great part of your danger vpon my ſelfe, F and trouble the enemies deſignes with many an hot skirmiſh. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor ſafer kind of war for vs, amongſt ſuch a multitude of men, & ſo many thouſands of ſoldiers, than neuer to offer battell vnto the enemy in plaine field, neither to aduenture all vpon the fortune of one conflict, although a man did ſee apparant ſignes of victory. He will of purpoſe at the firſt giue vs the opportunity of good hap; he will feed our hardineſſe with the bloud of his baſe ſoldiers, the eaſilier to intrap or oppreſſe our raſhneſſe, allured with the ſweet baits of good fortune: but the crafty deuices of the Othoman Kings are by great policy and conſideration to be fruſtrated: this mighty enemy is by little and little to be cut off, as time and place ſhall giue occaſion. For truly that victory ſhall be vnto me lamentable, which I ſhould buy with the bloud of my ſoldiers: and beleeue me, it would be vnto me a more ſorrowfull than pleaſant ſight, to ſee eight or ten thouſand of my enemies ſlaine, with the loſſe of a few of you. I praiſe and honor my ſubjects of Epirus for valiant conquerors, if they ſhall not ſuffer themſelues to be conquered of the Turkiſh King. The reſt I had rather you couragious ſoldiers of Dybra ſhould conſider with your ſelues, than that I ſhould ſeeme to diſtruſt of your aſſured faith, by giuing you a carefull and tedious admonition.

When Scanderbeg had with cheerefull perſuaſion thus encouraged the minds of them of Sfetigrade, he departed thence, and viſited diuers others cities of Epirus; where finding all things politiquely ordered by Moſes and the other captaines, whom he had put in truſt, he returned to his army, then lying neere vnto Croia.

Whileſt Scanderbeg was with great cheerfulneſſe yet thus prouiding for the ſafegard of his Kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his army was aſſembled at Hadrianople, to the number of an hundred and fifty thouſand men, whereof many were pioners, and men appointed for other baſe ſeruices neceſſary at the ſiege of townes. Of this great army Amurath ſent forty thouſand light horſemen before him to Sfetigrade; who according to his command came and incamped before the city. The newes of their comming, with a great deale more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his ſmall Army neere Croia: whereupon he with foure thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, tooke the way toward Sfetigrade, and ſtrongly incamped his Army within ſeuen miles of the city. Where hauing ſet all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moſes and Tanuſius went by certaine blinde wayes thorow the mountaines and woods, vntill he came ſo neere vnto the city, that from the place where he ſtood, he might eaſily diſcouer in what ſort the enemy lay incamped: and ſo returning backe againe to his campe, roſe with his army in the night following, and drawing as neere vnto the Turks army as he could, vndiſcouered, placed all his army in the couert of the woods and ſecret vallies, vnperceiued of his enemies. After that, he ſent forth Moſes and Muſachi his nephew, with thirty of his beſt horſemen, apparelled as if they had beene but common ſouldiers, but paſſing well mounted, driuing before them certaine horſes laden with corne, by a by-way, as if they had ſecretly purpoſed to haue got into the city. The day then breaking, they were diſcouered by the Turks ſcouts, and ſet vpon: where at the firſt Moſes and the reſt began of purpoſe to fly; but when hee ſaw that they were purſued but with like number to themſelues, he turned backe vpon the Turks, and ſlew fiue of them, and chaſed the reſt vnto the campe. The Generall ſeeing what had hapned, ſent forth foure thouſand horſemen to purſue theſe ſuppoſed victuallers: whom they quickely recouered ſight of, for that Moſes of purpoſe had made ſmall haſte to fly: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moſes left the horſes laden with corne, and fled; yet ſo, that he ſtill drew on the Turks with hope to ouertake him, vntill he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his army lay in wait: by whom they were ſuddenly aſſailed on euery ſide, and with great ſlaughter put to flight. In this conflict two thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, and a thouſand of their horſes taken: of the Chriſtians were loſt but two and twenty. This was the firſt welcome of the Turks army to Sfetigrade.

A notable ſtratagem of Scanderbeg for the intrapping of his enemies.

About eight daies after, came Amurath with all his army, in the beginning of May, Anno Dom. 1449, and hauing made the greateſt ſhew he could with his huge army to terrifie the defendants; he incamped the baſer ſort of his footmen at the foot of the hill whereon the city ſtood, and lay himſelf with his Ianizaries, & other his moſt valiant ſoldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off: where after he had lien ſtill one day, and well conſidered the ſtrength of the place, toward euening he ſent a meſſenger to the city, who requeſted to ſpeake with the Gouernour Perlat. Whereof he hearing, came to the wall: of whom the meſſenger requeſted, That he would command the ſouldiers ſtanding by, to goe further off, for as much as he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay vnto him from his maſter. Vnto whom Perlat merrily anſwered; It is like indeed to be ſome great ſecret, that you would haue kept not onely from the hearing

A ring of my ſouldiers, but from the very light of the day, and therfore haue choſen the night: but I haue not learned of myne elders, to hear any meſſage from myne enemies by night, neither at any time els out of the hearing of the garriſon ſoldiers, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of the City, and I the ſafegard of my perſon. You muſt therfore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your maſter ſo pleaſe, I wil hear you at large. And therwith commanded him to depart from the wall. So he returned at that time without audience as he came. It grieued Amurath not a little to ſee his meſſenger ſo lightly regarded; yet foraſmuch as he had more hope to gain the City by large offers, or ſome reaſonable compoſition, than by all his great force; he diſſembled his wrath, and the next day ſent the meſſenger again with one of his Baſſa's, a graue and wel ſpoken man, himſelf born in Epirus. This Baſſa, with three B ſoldiers and two ſeruitors was by the Gouernors command, by one of the ports receiued into the city, and brought into S. Maries Church, where after he had with great eloquence ſought to inſinuat himſelf into the minds of the Gouernor and hearers; and afterwards augmented the terror of Amuraths power beyond all meaſure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained againſt the Hungarians and the other Chriſtian Princes; in fine hee exhorted them to yeeld the City vnto him. In whoſe name he promiſed firſt, that the citiſens ſhould in all reſpects vnder his gouernment liue as they had before don vnder Scanderbeg. Then, That the Gouernour ſhould receiue at Amurath his hands moſt honourable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts. And, That it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſouldiers to depart in ſafety whither they pleaſed; and to haue three hundred thouſand Aſpers diuided a-C mongſt them in reward. But when the Baſſa had ended his ſpeech, the Gouernour in this ſort replied.

The reſolute anſwer of Perlat the gouernor to the Baſſa

If you had not deliuered this ſpeech vnto reſolute men, deuoted vnto the defence of their liberty, perhaps it might haue wrought ſome effect; and we (ſaid he) might peraduenture liſten vnto your offers, if wee were either afraid of the Othoman King, and the vain threats of our enemies, or els were weary of the gouernment of the noble Scanderbeg. But foraſmuch as no euill deſert of his, nor good deſert of your Maſters, hath yet paſſed, for which we ſhould prefer a ſtranger before our naturall Soueraign, an enemie before a friend, a Turk before a Chriſtian; let your maſter proceed firſt in his action begun, let him prooue his fortune, let him by force terrifie vs, beat down our walls, make hauock of our men, and by ſtrong hand D driue us to humble our ſelues at his feet, and to ſue for peace. But it were a great diſhonor, yea a thing almoſt to be laughed at, if we ſhould cowardly accept of theſe conditions by him offered, before any aſſault giuen, before one drop of bloud ſpilt, before any ſoldier did ſo much as once groan for any wound receiued, before one ſtone were ſhaken in the wall, or any ſmall breach made. But your maſter ſhould do better to raiſe his ſiege, and get him back again to Hadrianople, therto ſpend the ſmall remainder of his old yeares in quiet; and not to prouoke vs his fatall enemies, whoſe courage in defence of our liberties, and fidelitie towards our Prince he hath ſo oftentimes proued to his great diſhonour, and loſſe of his armies. The faith I haue once giuen to my Soueraign for the defence of this city, I will neuer forget, vntill the effuſion of the laſt drop of my bloud. It ſhall be vnto me reward and honor enough, if I either liuing defend this city, or with loſſe of my life ſhall leaue my guiltleſſe ſoul at liberty, and my carkas among the dead bodies of wor- E thy ſoldiers, when I ſhall find a way into a far better place.

The General hauing giuen this reſolute anſwer vnto the Baſſa, bountifully feaſted him that day at dinner, and afterwards led him thorow the midſt of the city; where he ſaw great ſtore of victuals, by the gouernor commanded of purpoſe to be ſet in ſhew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the city by long ſiege. And ſo ſent the Baſſa out by the ſame port whereby he came in, much diſcontented with the anſwer he was to returne to his Maſter.

Sfetigrade aſſaulted.

When Amurath vnderſtood by the Baſſa, of the gouernors reſolution, he was therewith exceeding wrath, and thereupon with his great Ordnance battered the city three daies without intermiſſion. And hauing by the fury of his artillery made a ſmall breach, he forthwith gaue F thereunto a moſt terrible aſſault, laboring firſt to win the ſame by force and multitude of his common ſoldiers, which the Turks call Aſapi, whom he forced by great numbers to that ſeruice. Of theſe ſouldiers the Turke in his wars maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the ſwords of his enemies, or to abate their firſt fury, thereby to giue the eaſier victory to his Ianizaries and other his better ſoldiers: which the Othoman Kings hold for good policy. Whilſt theſe forlorn ſoldiers without reſpect of danger preſſing forward, were ſlain by heapes at the G breach, the Ianizaries at the ſame time in another place attempted to haue ſcaled the wals of the city: but whilſt they with much labor and difficulty firſt crawl vp the ſteep rock whereon the city was built, and afterward deſperatly mount vp their ſcaling ladders, they were by the defendants, with huge ſtones & weighty pieces of timber caſt vpon them, beaten down, wherwith they were driuen headlong to the bottom of the rock, and ſo miſerably ſlaine. Many of them together with their ſcaling ladders, were by the Chriſtians thruſt from the wall, and tumbling from the rock, violently caried with them others comming vp behind them. Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the walls, loſt ſome their fingers, ſome their hands, but moſt their liues, being beaten down as the other were.

Many of them which ſtood farther off, were then wounded alſo, and with ſhot from the Wals H ſlain. With this miſerable ſlaughter, and no hope to preuail, the Turks diſcouraged, began to withdraw themſelues from the aſſault: but the Baſſa's and Captains ſtanding behind them, forced them again forward, exhorting ſome, threatening others, and beating the reſt forward with their truncheons. By which means the aſſault was again renued, but not with like courage as before, though with no leſſe ſlaughter: which the defendants ſeeing, gaue from the Walls, great tokens of joy and triumph. Amurath ſeeing his diſcouraged ſouldiers ready of themſelues to forſake the aſſault, preſently ſent Feri Baſſa (one of his moſt valiant Captains) with a new ſupply of 3000 choſen ſoldiers to renew the fight. The Chriſtians well aware of their comming, ceaſed not with continuall ſhot to beat them from the wals: but ſuch was the forwardnes of that fierce captain, that without regard of danger he brought his men vnto the I wals, where the defendants from aboue ouerwhelmed them with ſtones, timber, wild-fire, and ſuch other things as are vſually prepared for the defence of towns beſieged. For all that, Feri-Baſſa gaue ſo great an aſſault, that he ſlew diuers of the defendants vpon the wals, & had there forcibly entred, had not the gouernor, perceiuing the danger, with a company of freſh ſouldiers come with ſpeed to the defence of that place; wherby the enemy was preſently repulſed and driuen again from the wals. Amurath ſeeing the great loſſe of his men, and no hope of ſucces, cauſed a retreit to be ſounded, & ſo leauing the aſſault, retyred again into his camp. The great loſſe and diſhonor at this aſſault receiued, much troubled his waiward minde, who for all that yet ceaſed not to giue the like vain attempts. At length the captain of the Ianizaries perceiuing that part of the city which was fartheſt from the camp, to be commonly but ſlenderly K manned, by reaſon that it ſeemed a place impregnable, both for the height and ſteepnes of the rock; told Amurath that he would aſſay (if it ſo pleaſed him) ſecretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the city; whereas they thought nothing was more to be feared than the hight therof, which they, ſupported with the wings of deſire, doubted not to mount vnto. This his deuice exceedingly pleaſed the King, and was the next night with great ſilence put in execution. But ſuch was the carefulnes of the gouernor ouer euery part of his charge, that nothing could bee done againſt the ſame, but that it was forthwith by him diſcouered.
The gouernor aduertiſed by the watch, of the Turks attempt, with great ſilence preſently repaired to the place with a great company of the gariſon ſoldiers, and ſtanding cloſe, from the top of the wal beheld the Turks, as it had bin a ſwarm of Emmets, climing vp the high rocks, L and one helping vp another, by ſuch a deſperat way, as was in reaſon to be thought no man would haue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rock, and now euen ready to enter, they were from aboue ſuddenly ouerwhelmed as it had bin with a ſhour of ſhot, and ſo violently forced down that ſteep rocke, that moſt of them which had got vp to any height, were miſerably cruſhed to death, either with the weight of themſelues, or with others falling vpon them, and many of the reſt ſlain with ſhot from the top of the rock. Wherof Amurath preſently vnderſtanding, was therwith exceedingly grieued.

The Turks repulſed, retyre.

The Janizaries deſperatly attempt to ſurpriſe the city.

The Janiſaries repulſed.

During the time of this ſiege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long ſtil in one place, but remoued continually from place to place as beſt ſerued his purpoſe, breaking ſomtime into one quarter of the Turks camp, and ſomtime into another, & ſtraitway ſo ſuddenly gon again, and as it were M vaniſhed out of ſight, that Amurath many times wondred what was become of him. At this time, being the later end of Iune, he was come with his army within eight miles of Amuraths camp: and from thence ſent Moſes his greateſt Captain, in the attyre of a common ſouldier, with two other, to take view how the enemy lay incamped. By which truſty Eſpials he was informed,

A informed, That the Turks lay in great ſecuritie as men without feare, keeping but negligent watch. Of which oppertunitie Scanderbeg rejoicing, the night following ſuddenly aſſaulted one quarter of the Turks camp: whoſe comming, although it was a little before by the Turks ſcouts diſcouered, yet his furious aſſault was ſo ſudden and forcible, that he ſlew 2000 of the Turks, and filled euery corner of that great camp with fear and tumult, before they could wel arm themſelues or make reſiſtance. After which ſlaughter he ſafely retyred, carrying away with him two hundred and thirty horſe, with ſeuen of the Turks enſignes, hauing in this skirmiſh loſt of his men but 42: whoſe dead bodies the Turks the next morning, in reuenge of their ſlain friends hewed into ſmall pieces.

Vpon theſe great diſgraces one following in the neck of another, Amurath hauing no other B object but the city to ſhew his fury vpon, fiercely aſſaulted the ſame thrice one after another, and was alwaies with loſſe both of his men and honor repulſed. But the more he loſt, the more he burnt with deſire of reuenge, perſuading his ſoldiers, that as the ſtrongeſt cities & fortreſſes were built by mens hands, ſo were they to bee ouerthrowne and laid euen with the ground by reſolute and valiant men: incouraging them to a freſh aſſault, with greater promiſes of reward than euer he had done before in all his wars, from the firſt beginning of his reign. And becauſe he would with more ſafety giue this his laſt and greateſt aſſault, he commanded Feri Baſſa with 12000 horſmen and 6000 foot to attend vpon Scanderbeg, if hee ſhould hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the aſſault by aſſailing of his camp. Feri-Baſſa glad of this charge, wel hoping now to redeem his former ouerthrow with ſome great victory, and C leading forth his army a little from the camp, as he was commanded, ſo lay; wiſhing for nothing more than the comming of Scanderbeg; vainly boaſting, That he would ſeek him in the field, and there try his force and fortune with him hand to hand: which he did ſhortly after to his coſt. When Amurath had thus ſet in order all things requiſit, as wel for the ſiege as for the ſafegard of his Camp, the next morning he compaſſed the City round about with his army, and couered the ground with his men of war, purpoſing at that time to gage his whole forces vpon the taking therof. The wals he had before in ſome places battered, ſo much as was poſſible; and yet but ſo, as that they were not without ſcaling ladders to be aſſaulted; partly for the naturall defence of the place, and partly for that the defendants had with great diligence continually repaired and filled vp with earth what the fury of the cannon had thrown downe.
D This aſſault Amurath began firſt with his archers and ſmall ſhot, who deliuered their arrows and bullets vpon the top of the wall, and into the city, as if it had bin a ſhour of hail, thereby to trouble the tumultuary ſoldiers. In this heat ladders were clapt to the wals in euery place where any could poſſibly be reared, and the Turks began deſperatly to ſcale the wals. But the Chriſtians nothing diſmaid therat, with great courage reſiſted them, & with ſhot from their ſafe ſtandings wounded & ſlew many of them: yet others ſtil preſſed vp in the places of them that were ſlain, ſo that the aſſault began moſt terrible in many places at once, but eſpecially neer the great gate of the City, where the Turks had vpon the ſudden, with ladders, timber, and planks clapt together, raiſed cloſe vnto that tower, as it had bin a wooden tower, equall in hight to the wall: from whence the Turks greatly diſtreſſed the Chriſtians in that place, fighting E with them as if it had bin vpon euen ground, ſtil ſending vp freſh ſoldiers in ſtead of them that were ſlain: and therby preuailed ſo far, that they had ſet vp certain of Amuraths Enſignes vpon the wal, to the great comfort of the Turks, and aſtoniſhment of the beſieged Chriſtians.
The Gouernor ſeeing the imminent danger, haſted to the place with a company of freſh and valiant ſoldiers, by whoſe force the Turks were quickly repulſed from the wal, their enſignes taken and ſent into the market place; and the tower of wood, with many ladders and much timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly conſumed with Wild-fire caſt vpon the ſame from the wals. Perlat hauing deliuered the City of this fear, preſently placed freſh ſoldiers in ſtead of them that were ſlain or hurt, and ſo worthily defended the city.

Whilſt Amurath was giuing this great aſſault to Sfetigrade, Scanderbeg to withdraw him F from the ſame, came with nine thouſand ſouldiers to aſſail the Turks Camp, as Amurath had before ſuſpected, and was now come very neer the ſame. Feri Baſſa glad of his comming, oppoſed his army againſt him: which Scanderbeg ſeeing, retyred a little, of purpoſe to draw the Baſſa farther from the camp, and then forthwith began to join battell with him. The Baſſa conſidering the ſmall number of his enemies, and his own great power, withdrew four thouſand horſmen out of his army to fetch a compaſſe about, and to ſet vpon the rereward of Scanderbegs army: Hoping ſo to incloſe him that he ſhould neuer eſcape thence, but there either to G be ſlain or taken aliue, and his army vtterly defeated. But the expert Captain perceiuing his purpoſe, to meet therwith, left Moſes to lead the main battel, and he himſelf with 2000 horſmen ſo valiantly charged thoſe 4000 of his enemies before they were wel departed from the reſt of the Baſſa's army, that they had now more cauſe to looke to their own ſafety, than how to circumuent others. In this conflict Feri Baſſa hand to hand, as he had oft times before deſired, encountring with Scanderbeg, was by him there ſlain. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri Baſſa in the right wing of the army, and Muſachy in the left, Moſes ſtood faſt, receiuing the aſſault of the enemy without mouing any thing forward, expecting the ſucces of the wings. But Scanderbeg hauing diſcomfited the right wing, and ſlain the Generall, com- H ming now in, he ſet forward with ſuch force and courage, that the Turks not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled, of whom many were ſlain in this chaſe, although Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemy ſo nigh at hand, durſt not follow them too far, but ſounding a retreit, put his Army again in good order, for fear of ſome ſudden attempt from the camp, and after appointed ſome of the meaneſt of the ſouldiers to take the ſpoile of the ſlain Turks. When Amurath vnderſtood what had hapned to Feri Baſſa, hee was ſo ouercome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not ſpeak one word. But after the beat was a little paſt, he commanded certaine ſmall pieces of ordnance which hee had before vſed againſt the city, to be remoued into the camp, and there placed vpon that ſide which was moſt in danger to the enemy. He alſo preſently ſent thither 4000 ſouldiers to join with the I remainder of Feri Baſſa's Army; for defence of the Camp, with ſtreit charge that they ſhould not iſſue out of the trenches. Neuertheles he himſelf continued the aſſault of the city all that day: but when night drew on, and no hope appearing for him to preuail, he cauſed a retreit to be ſounded, and leauing the aſſault, he returned again into his camp. At this aſſault Amurath loſt 7000 men, beſide many that died afterwards of their wounds: but of the gariſon ſoldiers were ſlain but ſeuenty, and ninety more hurt.

The terror of the Turkiſh army began now to grow in contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after ſo many ouerthrows and ſhamefull repulſes, would at length raiſe his ſiege and be gon: yet hee ſent ſpies continually to diſcouer what was don in the Turks camp, and he himſelf with two thouſand ſoldiers would oft times ſhew K himſelf vpon the ſides of the mountains, neer to Amuraths camp, of purpoſe to draw the Turks out, that he might take them at ſome aduantage. But the old King had giuen commandment vpon pain of death, that no man ſhould go out of the trenches without leaue, or once to ſpeak of giuing battell or aſſault. So that he lay certain daies in his camp, not like a King beſieging a city, but more like a man beſieged himſelf: the which his ſtil lying Scanderbeg had the more in diſtruſt, fearing greatly that he was hatching ſome miſchiefe, which ſo ſoon as it was ripe, would violently break out.

Amurath by great promiſes ſeeks to corrupt the garriſon of Sfetigrade, & a traitor thereupon conſpires to betray the city.

Amurath conſidering with what euil ſucces he had many times aſſaulted the city, & holding it as a great diſhonor to raiſe his ſiege & depart, hauing don nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once again to proue if it were poſſible to ouercome the mindes of the L garriſon ſoldiers with gifts, whom he was not able to ſubdue by force. For which purpoſe he ſent an embaſſador vnto the city, offering vnto the beſieged and garriſon ſoldiers eaſie conditions of peace, with ſuch large gifts and rewards as had not bin heard offered to any garriſon in former time. Al which his magnifical promiſes were lightly rejected by the common conſent of the whole gariſon, preferring their faithfull loyaltie before all his golden mountains. For all that, Amurath was in hope, that among ſo many ſome would be found, into whoſe minds his large offers might make ſome impreſſion. Wherein he was not deceiued; for one baſe minded fellow among the reſt, corrupted with the Turks great promiſes, preferring his own priuat wealth before the welfare of his country, waiting his time, had ſecret conference with the Turks eſpials, promiſing vpon aſſurance of ſuch reward as was before by Amurath M profered, to find means that in few days the City ſhould be deliuered into his power. This corrupted traitor had layd many miſchieuous plots for the effecting of this horrible treaſon: but the firſt deuice he put in practiſe, which of all others a man would haue thought to haue bin of leaſt moment, ſerued his wicked purpoſe in ſtead of all the reſt. All the garriſon ſouldiers

A diers of Sſetigrade were of the vpper country of Dybra, put into that city, by Moſes, for their approued valor aboue all the other ſoldiers of Epirus. But as they were men of great courage, ſo were they exceeding ſuperſtitious both in their religion and maner of liuing, putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawfull meat and other: accounting ſome clean,ſome vnclean; abhorring from that,which they fondly deemed vncleane,with more than a Iewiſh ſuperſtition, chuſing rather to die than to eat or drinke thereof: ſuch is the ſtrong deluſion of blind error, where it hath throughly poſſeſſed the minds of men. The city of Sſetigrade (as is aforeſaid) is ſcituate vpon the top of a great high rocke, as moſt of the cities of Epirus now be,and was then watred but with one great well in the midſt of the city, which ſunke deepe into the rock,plentifully ſerued both the publike and priuat vſe of the inhabitants. Into this common B well the malicious traitor in the night time caſt the foule ſtinking carrion carkaſſe of a dead dog,knowing,that the conceited garriſon ſouldiers of Dybra, would rather indure the paines of death and ſtarue,or els yeeld vp the city,vpon any condition,than to drink of that polluted water. In the morning when that ſtinking carrion was eſpied, and drawne out of the well,the report therof was quickly bruted in euery corner of the city,& that the well was poiſoned: ſo that al the people were in maner in an vprore about the finding out of the traitor. The citizens were exceeding ſorry for that had hapned, but the garriſon ſoldiers deteſted that loathſom and vnclean water(as they accounted it)more than the Turkiſh ſeruitude,proteſting,that they would rather periſh with thirſt than drink therof. Wherupon ſome of them deſired to ſet fire vpon the city,and whileſt they had yet ſtrength, to breake thorow the enemies camp or there C manfully to die. And they which thought beſt of the matter,requeſted that the city might be yeelded vp; for now, they diſcouraged with a ſuperſtitious vanity, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea, they were ready enough of themſelues to ſue to Amurath for peace,though it had been vpon harder tearmes. The Gouernour troubled with that had hapned, and aſtonied to ſee ſo great alteration in the minds of his ſouldiers vpon ſo ſmal occaſion:could not tell whether he might thinke it to proceed of a ſuperſtitious conceit, or of ſome ſecret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter,he came into the market place,and there in the hearing of al the garriſon, with many effectual reaſons, exhorted them to continue faithfull vnto their Prince and country in that honorable ſeruice; and in a matter of ſo great conſequence to make ſmall reckoning to vſe that water, which D would eaſily in ſhort time be brought again to the wonted purity and cleanneſſe: and to perſuade them the rather,he went preſently to the well himſelf,and in the ſight of them all drunk a great draught of the water,whoſe example the citizens following,drank likewiſe. But when it was offered to the captains and ſoldiers of the garriſon,they all refuſed to taſte thereof,as if it had bin a moſt loathſome thing,or rather ſome deadly poiſon,and with great inſtance cried vnto the Gouernour, to giue vp the city: for which cauſe many thought they were corrupted by Amuraths great promiſes. Howbeit none of the garriſon (except that one traitor) did euer afterwards reuolt to the Turkiſh king,or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby ſuch ſuſpition might be confirmed. When the Gouernor ſaw that the obſtinate minds of the garriſon were not to be moued with any perſuaſion or reward (whereof he ſpared E not to make large promiſe) nor by any other means which he could deuiſe,he called vnto him his chief captains,with the beſt ſort of the citizens,& reſolued with them ful ſore againſt his wil,to yeeld vp the city to Amurath, on ſuch conditions as they themſelues there agreed vpon: which were,That it ſhould be lawfull for all the captains and ſoldiers to depart in ſafety with their armor and all other things;and that ſo many of the citizens as would ſtay,might there ſtil dwel in the city,in ſuch ſort, as they had done before, vnder the gouernment of Scanderbeg; the reſt that liſted not to remain there ſtil,might at their pleaſure with bag & baggage depart whither they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him, and granted them all that was deſired,ſauing that he would not conſent that the citizens ſhould continue in the city, yet was he content that they ſhould liue vnder him as they had done before, F quietly enjoying all their poſſeſſions, but to build their houſes without the wall of the city: which condition ſome accepted,and ſome forſaking all,went to Scanderbeg. When all was thorowly agreed vpon, the keys of the gates were deliuered to Amurath, & the gouernor with the captains,& all the garriſon ſoldiers ſuffered quietly to paſſe thorow the Turkiſh camp,as the King had promiſed. Howbeit, Mahomet the ſon of Amurath, a Prince of a cruell diſpoſition, earneſtly earneſtly perſuaded his father,to haue broken his faith,and to haue put them all to the ſword: G ſaying,it was one of their Prophet Mahomets chiefe commandements,to vſe all cruelty for the deſtruction of the Chriſtians. But the old King would not therein hearken vnto his ſon,ſaying, That he which was deſirous to be great among men,muſt either be indeed faithfull of his word and promiſe,or at leaſtwiſe ſeeme ſo to be,thereby to gain the minds of the people, who naturally abhor the gouernment of a faithleſſe and cruell Prince.The traitor which corrupted the water,remained ſtill in the city,and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich ſuits of apparell, and fifty thouſand aſpers, and had giuen vnto him beſides a yearely penſion of two thouſand duckats.But ſhort was the joy the traitor had of this euill gotten goods:for after he had a few daies vainely triumphed in the midſt of Amurath his fauors, he was ſuddenly gone, and neuer afterwards ſeene or heard tell of;being ſecretly made away(as was ſuppoſed)by the H commandement of Amurath;whoſe noble heart could not but deteſt the traitor, although the treaſon ſerued well his purpoſe. Amurath entring into Sfetigrade,cauſed the wals to be forthwith repaired,and placed one thouſand two hundred Ianizaries in garriſon there. And raiſing his campe the firſt of September, departed out of Epirus, hauing loſt thirty thouſand of his Turks at the ſiege of Sfetigrade;much grieued in mind for al that,that he could not vanquiſh the enemy,whom he came of purpoſe to ſubdue. In his returne,the viceroy of Aſia marched before him with the Aſian ſouldiers ; in the rereward followed the viceroy of Europe with his Europeian ſouldiers:in the middeſt was Amurath himſelfe, compaſſed about with his Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of Amurath his departure, followed ſpeedily with eight thouſand horſemen,and three thouſand foot, and taking the aduantage I of the thicke woods and mountaine ſtreits (to him well knowne) whereby that great army was to paſſe,oftentimes skirmiſhed with the Turks, charging them ſometime in the vaward, and ſometime in the rereward,ſomtime on the one ſide,and ſometime on the other,and ſlew many of them : whereby he ſo troubled Amurath his paſſage, that he was glad to leaue the viceroy of Romania, with 30000 to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he himſelfe might in the meane time with more ſafety march away with the reſt of his army.Scanderbeg perceiuing the ſtay of the viceroy, ceaſed to follow Amurath further, fearing to be encloſed betweene thoſe two great armies. The viceroy ſeeing that Scanderbeg was retyred, after he had ſtaied a few daies,followed his maſter to Hadrianople,and ſo Scanderbeg returned to Croia.

A traitor worthily rewarded according to his treaſon.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of Epirus,Scanderbeg left two thouſand ſoldiers K vpon the borders for defence of the country againſt the Turks. Theſe ſouldiers ſo ſtreightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garriſon at Sfetigrade that they could not looke out of the city, but that they were intercepted and ſlaine.And within a few daies after came himſelfe with an army of 18000, and laid ſiege to Sfetigrade the ſpace of a moneth, which was from the middle of September vntill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great aſſaults to haue recouered the city, but was both times repulſed, with the loſſe of fiue hundred men.
Amurath vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg lay at the ſiege of Sfetigrade, ſent with all ſpeed to recall his army but lately before diſperſed. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing intelligence, conſidering alſo the difficulty of the enterpriſe, with the approch of Winter, raiſed his ſiege,and returned to Croia : where he ſet all things in the ſame order he had done before the comming L of Amurath to the ſiege of Sfetigrade,and put two thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers there in garriſon, vnder the charge of the famous captaine Vranacontes, and ſtored his city with ſufficient victuall for a yeares ſiege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Chriſtian Princes, for that there was then great ſcarcity of all things in Epirus, by reaſon of the late wars. The like care he had alſo of all the reſt of his cities, being continually aduertiſed from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, of the great preparation intended againſt him by the Turkiſh King,againſt the beginning of the next Spring.

1450 Amurath aſſembleth againe his army at Hadrianople.

Amurath vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg was departed from Sfetigrade,changed his former determination for the calling backe againe of his army, and appointed it to meet againe at Hadrianople,in the beginning of March following:whither the Baſſaes, and other great commanders, M at the time appointed, aſſembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commanded. So that by the latter end of March,he had there in readineſſe an army of an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong.Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkiſh wars,ſent forty thouſand horſemen, vnder the leading of Sebalyas a politick captaine,

A captaine,as his vauntcourriers into Epirus,in the beginning of Aprill,in the yeare 1430.The valiant captaine with great ſpeed and no reſiſtance entred into Epirus, as was giuen him in charge,and without let came to Croia: where,after he had aduiſedly conſidered of the ſcituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he ſtrongly encamped himſelfe neere thereunto in the pleaſant plaine called Tyranna: and there with his trenches kept his ſouldiers cloſe, attending nothing more,but that no new ſupply of men,munition,or victuals,ſhould be conueied into the city,more than was therein before his comming. For he was not able with his horſmen to do any thing againſt the city:and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the country ſubiect to his fury. Beſides that, he was expreſly by Amurath forbidden, to attempt any thing againſt Scanderbeg himſelfe.

B After Sebalyas had twenty daies thus lien encamped before Croia, neither doing nor taking harme; Amurath by reaſon of his great age, hauing marched oftentimes but fiue miles a day,came thither alſo with his whole army,wherewith he filled all the country round about: the very ſight whereof had bin enough to haue diſcouraged the ſmall garriſon in Croia, had they not been men both of great experience and reſolution. Where after he had ſpent foure daies in ſettling of his campe, he ſent two meſſengers vnto the Gouernour (as the manner of the Turks is)offering him if he would yeeld vp the city,that it ſhould be lawfull for him with all his ſouldiers in ſafety with bag and baggage to depart;and the Gouernour himſelfe to receiue in reward two hundred thouſand aſpers, with an honourable place amongſt the great Baſſaes of his court, if it would pleaſe him to accept thereof: and further, that the Citiſens C ſhould enjoy all their antient liberties as in former time,without any alteration,with promiſe alſo of greater. Theſe meſſengers comming to the gates of the city, could not be ſuffered to enter,but ſtanding without, were commanded there to deliuer their meſſage:which when the Gouernor had heard, he ſcornefully reiected their offers, and returned the meſſengers ſhamefully derided by the ſouldiers which ſtood vpon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refuſall of his offers; and ſeeing no other means to gaine the city,conuerted all his deuiſes vnto the ſiege thereof. Wherefore he firſt commanded ten great pieces of artillery to be forthwith caſt, for he had brought with him none ready made, becauſe of the difficult paſſage ouer the high mountaines of Epirus; whereby it ſeemed to be a matter of infinit trouble to haue brought his great ordnance:and therefore carried with him great ſtore D of mettall in maſſe,whereof at his pleaſure to make his great artillery as he ſaw cauſe. In fifteen daies this worke was brought to perfection,and ten pieces of huge greatneſſe were ready mounted vpon carriages. Six of them he placed againſt the Eaſt ſide of the city,towards the plaine of Tyranna,and the other foure againſt the gate: in which two places only, Croia was ſubiect to battery,being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rockes,vpon the tops whereof were built faire battlements, more for beauty than needfull defence. Theſe two places Amurath battered foure daies continually, and with the fury of his artillery had Croia battered.
in both places beaten downe halfe the wall, and ſore ſhaken the reſt. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, & with great cheerfulnes made all things ready to aſſault theſe breaches,whenſoeuer Amurath ſhould command,ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhould ſhew E himſelfe moſt forward in that dangerous enterpriſe. And Mahomet the yong Prince,the more to encourage the ſoldiers, beſides the great rewards by his father propoſed, promiſed of himſelfe to giue an hundred thouſand aſpers vnto him that ſhould firſt ſet vp an enſigne vpon the wals of the city. The garriſon ſoldiers on the other ſide,conſidering that the whole ſtate and welfare of Epirus was repoſed in their valour;and that the eies of moſt part of Chriſtendome were as it were fixed vpon them, were nothing diſmaied with the breaches made,but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might poſſibly chance: but eſpecially the worthy Gouernour Vranacontes,who going through the middeſt of his ſouldiers,and ſhaking ſome of them by the hands,withall ſaid:

F Theſe, theſe are the fortreſſes of our City, theſe are the inuincible bulwarkes, theſe are the irremouable ſtones and ſureſt ſement. What honour? what praiſe? what triumph ſhould we hope for? if theſe wals ſtanding whole and ſtrong, we ſhould lie ſhrouded vnder the defence of them, and not they defended by vs? So can cowards defend cities, and ſheepe feare not the wolues rage, when they are ſafely ſhut vp within the wals of their ſheepecoats: But that is the praiſe of the wals, and not of the men.

The cheerefull ſpeech of Vranacontes the Gouernour to encourage his ſouldiers.

Worthy Caſtriot our Prince hath commended this his city to be defended by vs, and not vs by it. Honour G is attended vpon with danger, and foſtered vp amongſt perils : euery baſe mariner may be a maſter in faire weather : and firme things ſtand of themſelues, and need not our vpholding. Wherefore, men of worth ſhun ſuch things, which being kept or loſt, yeeld like praiſe. Things ready to fall, need ſhoaring, and thither haſteth honour, and there (worthy ſouldiers) appeareth courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend theſe broken breaches, and in ſtead of theſe dead wals, couragiouſly oppoſe our luſty and liuely armed bodies againſt the force of our enemies. If theſe wals ſtand ſtill firme, and vnbattered, you ſhould then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are ſomething ſhaken, you ſhall as men ſtand vpon ſomewhat more euen ground, and encounter your enemies hand to hand, the better to ſatisfie your furious deſire. Where I alſo in the thickeſt, ſhall eaſily view and judge of euery mans priuate courage in particular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if we well conſider H of the matter, the place it ſelfe doth yet notably make for vs; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by theſe ſmall breaches diminiſhed: for, this riſing of the hill (not poſſible to be taken from vs) although it be not ſo high as it is in other places, yet, doth it not ſerue vs ſufficiently at great aduantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their aſſault? The ſteepneſſe whereof, as it will be troubleſome vnto them, ſo will it keepe vs moſt freſh in ſtrength, and make our ſhot more forcible. Wherefore this had beene a thing of vs to haue beene wiſhed for, if we deſire the ſlaughter of our enemies at this ſiege, or if we wiſh for perpetuall honour and glory by this warre. For this breach of the wals will encourage theſe barbarians, and allure their armed men to clime vp in greater multitude than if the wals were whole; whereof ſo many ſhall on euery ſide be eaſily ſlaine, as we ſhall but aime at : except you had rather ſit ſtill, holding your hands together in your boſome as cowards. Their dead bodies ſhall fill vp the breaches againe, if I you be men mindfull of your liberty. What is there (worthy captains and ſouldiers) that letteth our victory? or memorable ſlaughter of our enemies? by whom only theſe two places of the city can be aſſaulted: all the reſt is out of danger and feares no enemies force. Here only is the pains to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here ſhall you all be: the courage, force, and ſtrength of you all ſhall in this place appeare. How will you ſo many worthy captains, and valiant ſouldiers, in ſo little roome beſtow your ſelues? we are too many defendants for ſo ſmall breaches. Yet let vs play the men, and do our endeuour: let vs in one conflict weaken the tyrants ſtrength, and burſt his proud heart; he will forſake this city, and raiſe his ſiege vnfortunatly begun, ſo ſoone as he ſhall ſee his firſt aſſault to coſt him the liues of ſo many thouſands of his men. K

Croia aſſaulted.

When Vranacontes had with this comfortable ſpeech thus encouraged his ſoldiers, againſt the aſſault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence ſet al things in order for the ſame, & repaired the breaches as wel as was poſſible in that caſe, he gaue them leaue for that night to take their reſt. In the morning Amurath commanded the aſſault to be giuen to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks cheerefully begun, and euery man buſie to perform the ſeruice he was appointed vnto. But by that time that the aſſault was well begun, a ſudden alarum was raiſed throughout all the Turks campe : for Scanderbeg with fiue thouſand valiant ſoldiers, had ſuddenly broken in vpon one ſide of the Turks great camp, and at the firſt encounter had ſlain ſix hundred of the Turks, & was now ſpoiling their tents. The rumor whereof troubled the whole campe, and made the Turks with leſſe courage to aſ- L ſault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amurath although he had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the ſafeguard of his tents, yet for more ſurety ſent Stremet one of his greateſt captains, with foure thouſand ſouldiers backe into the campe, for more ſurety; ſaying, that nothing could be too ſure, againſt that wild beaſt: meaning the fury of Scanderbeg. Mahomet alſo the yong prince, haſted thither in great choler with his guard, much againſt his fathers will. But Moſes, Scanderbegs lieutenant, knowing himſelf too weake to withſtand the multitude that was ſwarming thither (contenting himſelf with that which was already done) had before Mahomets comming, ſpeedily retired with all his army into the ſafegard of the mountains, from whence he came : hauing done great harme in the Turks campe, with the loſſe but of ten men.

Scanderbeg in danger.

Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmiſh, forgetting himſelf had ſo M far ingaged himſelf among the Turks, that he was by them on euery ſide incloſed, & in great danger to haue bin ſlaine or taken : yet valiantly breaking through them, he eſcaped the danger, and recouered the mountains, and with much ado came at length to his camp, to the great joy and comfort of them all; being before in great feare he had bin loſt. This was accounted

A the greateſt ouerſight of Scanderbeg in all his wars; for ſo much as the office of a good General conſiſteth not in aduenturing of his perſon to manifeſt danger, but in the politick gouernment of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus aſſailed the Turks camp, Amurath but faintly aſſaulted the breaches, expecting the ſucceſſe in the camp: but when he vnderſtood that Scanderbeg was retyred, and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the wals: and firſt with the multitude of his archers and ſmall ſhot labored to driue the defendants from the wals, ouerwheming them with arrows falling as thick as haile. And likewiſe at the ſame time other common ſoldiers of baſer account, brought ſcaling ladders and other things needfull for the ſcaling of the walls. After whom alſo followed the Ianizaries and other choſen ſoldiers, ready to mount the ladders ſo ſoone as they ſhould be ſet to the wals. But whilſt they climb vp the B high hils in this order, the garriſon ſoldiers made ſuch ſlaughter of them with ſhot from the wals and out of the city, that they would haue preſently retyred, had they not bin forced forward by their captains, who ſpared neither ſtripes nor wounds, when words would not ſerue: by this tyrannicall means, the ſcaling ladders were with great ſlaughter of the common ſoldiers ſet vp againſt the wals, and the Turks climing vp, came to handy blowes with the defendants at the breaches: nothing was to be heard but the crying of the people, the clattering of armor, and the inſtruments of warre, which was terribly redoubled with the eccho's from the mountains round about. The Turks doing what they might to win the breaches, were by the Chriſtians worthily repulſed, and with their ladders tumbled headlong down the mountain, with ſuch horrible ſlaughter and diſcomfiture, ſpecially of the common ſoldiers, that none of them C would ſet one foot forward again toward the wals, although they had ſmal hope to ſaue themſelues by retiring backe: for the fierce young Prince Mahomet euen then making ſhew of his cruell diſpoſition, cauſed them that returned, to be ſlain, by the terror thereof to driue others forward. Theſe common ſoldiers, whom the Turks make ſmall reckoning of, are for the moſt part miſerable Chriſtians, which liued in ſuch countries as had ſometimes receiued the faith of Chriſt, but are now vnder the Turkiſh ſlauery; of which ſort of wretched people the Turkiſh tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their warres, moſt commonly vnarmed, becauſe they dare not well truſt them in wars againſt the Chriſtians: theſe carry all the baggage of the camp, theſe ſerue to fetch wood and water for other ſouldiers of better account, theſe ſerue in ſtead of pioners to caſt trenches and raiſe bulwarks; and when battell is to be giuen, if D it be in plaine field, theſe haue their weapons put in theirr hands, and thruſt into the fore front of the battel, to blunt the enemies ſwords: but if a city be to be beſieged, theſe ſerue as fit matter to fil vp the breaches with their dead bodies, or to make bridges for other ſoldiers to paſſe ouer vpon: and if they ſhrinke to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly vſed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath ſaw his ſouldiers ſo diſcouraged, he ſtood in doubt whether it were better for that time to ſound a retrait, or to ſend a new ſupply: but being inraged with the loſſe of his men, and deſirous to be in ſome part reuenged, he ſent diuers companies of his better ſoldiers, for the incouragement of them which were before diſcouraged, and ſo gaue a freſh aſſault: but with as euill or worſe ſucceſſe than before; for Vranacontes had withdrawne from the breaches all thoſe ſouldiers which had endured E the former aſſault, and placed other freſh & luſty men in their ſtead; who encouraged with the former victory, and loth to be accounted inferior to their fellows, repulſed the Turks with double ſlaughter: vntill that the aged King, not able longer to behold the endleſſe loſſe of his men, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded; which all his ſouldiers were glad to heare, and ſo returned into his camp, hauing loſt in thoſe two aſſaults eight thouſand men, without any notable harm done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance.

Mahomet thinking to deceiue Scanderbeg, is himſelf by him deceiued.

This ſhamefull repulſe much grieued all the captains and commanders of Amuraths army, but eſpecially Mahomet the young Prince, whoſe violent nature vnacquainted with miſhap, burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched on the mountaine of Tumeniſt, not far from his fathers army, he drew moſt of the beſt and readieſt F ſoldiers of all the whole camp, into that quarter which was neereſt vnto Scanderbeg: of purpoſe that if he ſhould againe aſſaile the camp in that place (as it was moſt like he would) he ſhould be encountred with ſo many braue and valiant men there in readines, as that it ſhould be hard for him either to do any great harme, or for himſelfe to eſcape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as alſo in what order the camp lay: wherupon he left Moſes with fiue hundred ſoldiers in the place where he lay; taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certain appointed houre in the night following, ſhould aſſaile the Turks camp in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay; and hauing there raiſed ſome tumult, ſpeedily to retyre again vnto his aſſured ſtrength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg himſelf with the whole ſtrength of his army, in number about 8000, in the mean time tooke a compas, and by certain ſecret by-waies through the woods and mountains, came to the farther ſide of the Turks camp, to a place called Mountecle. The night following, Moſes at the appointed hour, with his 500 ſoldiers aſſailed that part of the Turks camp next to him, with ſuch noiſe and tumult as if it had bin ſome great army: by occaſion whereof, all the Turks camp was in alarm, and drew in haſt to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the ſame inſtant Scanderbeg with al his army brake into the other ſide of the Turks army, where he was leaſt feared or looked for, & from whence the beſt ſoldiers were before drawn by Mahomet; and there made ſuch ſlaughter and hauocke of the reſt (not knowing which way to turn themſelues) that the loſſe a little before receiued vnder the walls of Croia was now forgot, as a ſmall thing in compariſon of this. Moſes hauing raiſed a great fear, and don little harm, returned in ſafety to his wel known ſtrength; and Scanderbeg hauing made great ſpoil in the Camp, fearing to be oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, if hee ſhould there longer ſtay, returned in good time, hauing ſcarce loſt one man.

Amurath after this great loſſe and trouble of his Camp, withdrew the greateſt part of his ſmall Ordnance which he had before bent againſt the City, into his Trenches, placing them as commodiouſly as he might, for the defence therof againſt the ſudden attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot ſeaſon of the year ſo cloſely incamp his Army, but that ſome part therof would ſtill be in the like danger as before; he therfore appointed Sebalias with ſixteen thouſand ſoldiers to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he ſhould no more trouble the Camp. After which order taken, he battered the Walls of Croia afreſh, and with his great Ordnance ouerthrew whatſoeuer the Citiſens had with great labour repaired, making the breaches greater and more ſaultable than before, intending once againe by a new aſſault to proue his fortune and the force of his ſoldiers: which he appointed to be the next day. But when he ſaw no ſign of courage or good hope in the heauy countenances of them diſcouraged; and that they yeelded vnto him their conſents rather for fear and ſhame, than for hope of victory: he called them Cowards, diſcouraged with the leaſt frown of fortune; and ſaid,

Euery weak caſtle is able to hold out one aſſault; but if you wil draw theſe wild beaſts out of their dens, you muſt arm your ſelues like reſolute men of inuincible courage, to endure what thing ſoeuer ſhal happen. Great Captains with their puiſſant armies haue grown old vnder the walls of their enemies, vpon light and ſmall diſpleaſures: and will you, hauing receiued ſo many diſgraces of theſe periured Epirots, leaue them all vnreuenged? What great victory was euer yet by any man gained without bloudſhed? Remember the moſt glorious victory of Varna. It is hard without bloudy hands to put the yoke vpon the fierce enemies neck. All honorable things are brought to paſſe with aduenture and labor; and the end of this War dependeth vpon the taking of Croia: if it were once won, all this war were at an end; which if Scanderbeg loſe (being the ſtrength of his kingdom) he will not tarry one day longer in Epirus. Wherfore bee of good cheer, and couragiouſly ſet vpon it: there is not more vncertaintie in any thing than in matters of war. Fortune is to be proued, and oftentimes prouoked of him that will wed her. And yet I wil not deny, but that we muſt go more warily to work againſt this enemy, and haſard our ſelues with better aduiſement, and not without reaſon like wild beaſts to run headlong vpon our own death. At length we ſhal wear them out, if we kill but ten of them at an aſſault; yet are they daily to be aſſailed, that they may haue no leiſure to refreſh themſelues, and to make vp their breaches; and peraduenture if force may not preuail, fortune may find ſome mean that we look not for, as it fell out at the ſiege of Sfetigrade, beyond all our expectation. Treaſon is ingenious, and mens deſires great where rewards are propounded.

With theſe and the like ſpeeches old Amurath incouraged his captains & ſoldiers, and the next morning early began the aſſault; which the Turks valiantly attempted, and without any regard of danger, came vnto the gates of the City, aſſaying, but with vain and deſperat labour, A bour to haue broken them open. In this aſſault wilde-fire was caſt into many places of the city, and the great Artillery oftentimes diſcharged into the breaches, whereby many of the Turks themſelues were ſlain with their own great ſhot, together with the Chriſtians: for Amurath deſperatly ſet, was content to buy the life of one Chriſtian with the loſſe of twenty of his Turks. But the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly repulſed their enemies, ſo that of them that came to the gates, none eſcaped aliue; and of them that aſſaulted the great breach, the forwardeſt were firſt ſlain, and they which ſtood farther off were ſore wounded with great ſhot. Yet for all that, Amurath ſtill maintained the aſſault by ſending in of new ſupplies, delighted to ſee them go forward, but grieued at the heart to ſee them ſo ſlain; vntil at laſt, weary with beholding the ſlaughter of his men, he cauſed a retreit to be ſounded, and ſo ended the aſſault, B perſuaded by his Baſſa's, not wilfully to caſt away his valiant ſouldiers where there was no hope to preuail, but to preſerue them for his better ſeruice.

The Turks retyre.

Amurath ſeeks to vndermine Croia.

Amurath now out of hope to win the city by aſſault, thought good to prooue what might be don by vndermining the ſame: during which work he cauſed ſmall alarms daily to be giuen to the city, to the intent that the defendants buſied therwith, ſhould not perceiue the ſecret work of the mine. About which time his prouiſion of corn began to fail in his camp: for which cauſe he ſent his purueyors for Corn to Lyſia, a City of the Venetians, with whom he was then in league, and bought of them great ſtore of corn. But as his officers were conueying it to the camp, Scanderbeg hauing intelligence therof, ſlew the Conuoy, and carried away with him all that prouiſion, diuiding it among his own ſoldiers. Howbeit not long after, Amurath C receiued great abundance of corn and other prouiſion out of Macedonia. Beſide that, the Venetian merchants afterwards furniſhed him with plenty of corn, oil, honey, and other neceſſaries: which Scanderbeg might wel haue hindred, but that he would not in ſo doing offend the Venetians, who were alſo his ſecret friends; conſidering that Amurath might haue had all the ſame prouiſion out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, Myſia, and ſuch other places, if he had not otherwiſe had it from the Venetians.

Whilſt Amurath thus lay expecting the ſucces of his mine, 400 of the gariſon ſoldiers of Croia ſallying out of the city, chaſed diuers of the Turks that were come forth, back again to the Camp. Wherof Amurath was glad, hoping that they, incouraged with that good hap, would to their further loſſe giue the like attempt afterward. But the ſtaid diſcretion of the D gouernor deceiued that his expectation: who conſidering the danger, would not ſuffer his ſoldiers any more to ſally out of the city. Scanderbeg alſo at this time hauing increaſed his army with a new ſupply of 2000 ſoldiers, diuided the ſame into three parts, deliuering one part to Moſes, another to Tanuſie, and reſeruing the third vnto himſelf. With this Army of 9000 thus diuided, he determined by night at one inſtant to aſſail the Turkes great Camp in three diuers places, appointing in which quarter euery one ſhould charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed was comming toward the Turks camp, he was diſcouered by their Scouts; wherupon a ſudden alarm was raiſed in the camp, and all mens minds turned that way, & ſoldiers appointed with all diligence to gard that ſide of the camp. But whilſt the Turkes were all at gaze this way for fear of Scanderbeg, Moſes & Tanuſie in the dead of the night at one time E aſſailed the Turks Camp in two diuers quarters, as they were appointed, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoil. At which time Scanderbeg did alſo what he might, but by reaſon he was before diſcouered, did not much harm. Vpon the approch of the day Scanderbeg retyred again to the hils, and by that time it was fair day light ſate down vpon the ſide of a great mountain about 20 furlongs off, in the open ſight of all the Turks camp: which he did of purpoſe, that Moſes and Tanuſie, which were by night retyred into the mountaines, might ſee which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turks thinking that he ſtood there to braue their whole camp, and as it were to out-face them, to the great incouragement of the beſieged; diuers of them earneſtly craued leaue of Amurath that they might go vp to him, and at leaſtwiſe beat him out of ſight: which he granting, 12000 of his beſt ſoldiers, of F which 7000 were horſmen, and the reſt foot, preſently ſet forward to incounter them. Scanderbeg ſeeing them all the way they came, vpon their approch ſoftly retyred a little farther vp into the mountains, ſtil expecting the comming of Moſes & Tanuſie. The Turks vnacquainted with ſuch difficult waies, marched vp the ſteep hils after Scanderbeg with much labor and pains,

paint, wel wearied of themſelues: but when they were come a great way into the mountaines, G they perceiued by the riſing of the duſt, that ſome greater force was at hand, and ſoon after they might plainly ſee the formoſt of their enemies. Wherfore fearing to bee incloſed, they began to retyre: in which retreit Scanderbeg hardly purſued them, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, ſlew many of them, but eſpecially with his archers. Moſes alſo comming afreſh on another ſide, cauſed them to fly down the hil amain, & beſide the ſlaughter that he made, took diuers priſoners. After which victory by Scanderbeg obtained in the ſight of Amurath and his whole army, he retyred again into the mountains.

The late ſpoil of the Turks camp, with this ouerthrow of the ſoldiers but now ſent againſt Scanderbeg, much grieued the old tyrant: but the work of the mine, wherin he had of long laid vp his greateſt hope, ſorting now to no great purpoſe, beeing deemed as wel an endleſſe piece H of work, for the natural hardnes of the rock, as alſo of ſmall importance, for that it was by the defendants diſcouered, draue him to his wits end. His forces he had to his great loſſe ſufficiently proued, and ſtil found them too weake; and policie preuailed not. Nothing remained now, but to proue if by great gifts and glorious promiſes hee could firſt corrupt the faith of the Gouernor, and afterwards the garriſon, wherin he determined to ſpare no coſt. Wherupon he ſent one of his Baſſa's (a man of great authoritie and dexteritie of wit) vnto Vranacontes, with ſuch rich gifts and preſents as might haue mooued a right conſtant mind: commanding the Baſſa, if it were poſſible, firſt to faſten the ſame vpon the Gouernor, as preſents ſent from Amurath of meer bounty, in the honor of his valiant mind; and afterwards to deliuer his meſſage, not ſparing to promiſe any thing for the deliuering vp of the city, yea more than ſhould I be deſired. The Baſſa attended on but with two ſeruants, came with this rich preſent neer to the gates of the City, and there ſtayd vntill the Gouernors pleaſure were known. By whoſe commandement he was receiued into the city, and brought to his preſence. Then the Baſſa with much reuerence and many magnifical words, preſented vnto Vranacontes the rich gifts ſent from Amurath; and would forthwith haue deliuered them vnto him as the reward of his valor. But Vranacontes willed him firſt to declare his meſſage from Amurath, vpon the hearing wherof he would (he ſaid) as he ſaw cauſe, either receiue or refuſe them: before which time he would not be beholden to his enemy, by receiuing from him the leaſt curteſie. With which anſwer the ſubtil Baſſa nothing diſmaied, with great conſtancie thus began to deliuer his meſſage: K

The Baſſa ſent from Amurath craftily ſeeks to corrupt the gouernor, and to perſuade the ſoldiers to yeeld vp the city.

Howſoeuer we agree (ſaid he) vpon other matters we come for, we brought not theſe gifts of purpoſe to deceiue any: for ſo men vſe to deal with their children and ſeruants, and not with men of courage and valour. And albeit that enemies gifts are euer to be ſuſpected, (as you haue right wiſely ſaid, and wee our ſelues know) yet we durſt not for ſhame come vnto ſo worthy a Gouernor (as the common ſaying is) empty handed. Neither ought you, if you be the man you ſeem to be, and whom men report you are, to refuſe our curteſie. Take this preſent in good part, which ſhall no way inforce or hinder you to determin or diſpoſe of your affairs otherwiſe than ſhall ſeem vnto you good: neither ſhall wee once obiect vnto you theſe gifts, which we ſo frank and freely offer in the great Sultans name, whether you reiect or admit his demands and meſſage: wherin there is (perhaps) no leſſe regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no L greater token of a baſe mind, than to giue, in hope to receiue again. We come vnto you frankely, (worthy Gouernor) I ſpeak it from my heart, wee goe not about with filed ſpeech and rich rewards to circumuent thee, whoſe inuincible minde we haue ſo often in vain proued with our forces and power. That is it for which Amurath loueth thee. He doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his enemies; and if it were poſsible, deſireth to haue them with himſelf. There verily with ſo mighty a Monarch might thy inuincible mind and pregnant courage find a better way vnto the higheſt type of Fortunes bliſſe. Not that I condemn Scanderbeg (whom we his enemies do highly commend) for his Countrey ſo wel recouered, and ſo oftentimes worthily defended, yet chiefly by your help; but you are worthy of another manner of Soueraign, and of another maner of calling, and not to ſpend all the daies of your life, and ſuch heroical vertues in obſcuritie, and (without offence be it ſaid) in contemptible baſenes. Beſides that, Scanderbegs eſtate is M but momentary, the Deſtinies haue aſsigned vnto him too too mighty an enemy; his deſtruction may wel be deferred, but not by any means auoided. Amurath hath conceiued againſt him an implacable diſpleaſure, and prepared his forces accordingly: he hath ſworn to ſpare no coſt, no labor, no danger: and that he

A neuer whilſt he liueth depart out of Epirus, before he haue impoſed a deadly yoke vpon his neck. And behold, the firſt of his miſery beginneth at this city, and vpon your ſelues. We daily hear his pauilions ſound with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, That he will neuer depart out of this place before he haue taken this city, and ſatisfied his angry mind with the torture of your bodies; no, not if he ſhould therfore loſe Hadrianople, yea and that more is, his whole kingdom. And verily he will do it, which I fear to diuine or think vpon: For although I with others bear againſt you the mind of an enemy, yet am I a man, and mooued with human compaſſion. Beleeue me, ye men of Croia, beleeue mee, my eies would ſcarſely endure to behold the horrible ſpectacle of your miſerable fortune. I tell you again, he will do it, except you change your purpoſe, and now receiue health, life, liberty and peace, whilſt it is ſo freely offered. For albeit that this notable ſtrong place, theſe impregnable walls, and eſpecially your own valour, do yet defend you; how long will it B hold out? Verily no longer than you haue victuals, no longer than you haue meat to ſuſtain your bodies: Do you think that Amurath wil raiſe his ſiege in the middle of the heat of this war, and be gon? No, no; if force will not preuail, if all his attempts fail, yet ſhall you ſee and feel theſe enemies continually to your hurt; you ſhall alwaies haue theſe tents in your eies, and at your gates, vntill long famine, which maſtreth all things, tame your courage alſo. I pray you, what hope haue you left? from whence ariſeth in your reſolute minds ſuch deſperat contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victuall you being ſo ſtreitly beſieged? who hideth himſelf (poor man) in the woods all day, and flieth ouer the tops of the mountains, loden with trauell and care, ſcarſe able to relieue his own miſery. Or will the Venetians relieue you, who daily bring vnto vs, and ſtore vs with too too great plenty of all things for this war againſt you. Wherfore repent your too much hardines, and gather your wits together: behold, I your enemy aduiſe you; you haue long enough C continued in your obſtinacy; your country and liberty is not ſo far to be defended, as that you ſhould therfore fight againſt God. But wherfore do I call this, liberty? you muſt giue place vnto your fortune, and learn to obey them that be too ſtrong for you. You ſhall find aſſured liberty, rich rewards, perpetuall reſt with Amurath. Prouide for your ſelues, if you be wiſe, whilſt all things are yet whole for you to determin of; whilſt we your enemies exhort and requeſt you, and had rather haue you our voluntary companions, than our inforced ſeruants and ſlaues.

This the Baſſa ſpake with great grauitie, and no leſſe vehemencie, expecting ſome great motions to haue riſen in the minds of the ſoldiers. But when he perceiued that his ſpeech had rather filled them with indignation, than with fear; and that it was but a vain thing to go a- D bout to terrifie them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons; he requeſted to talk alone with the gouernor in ſecret; which was alſo granted. For all men had no leſſe good opinion of the worthy gouernors fidelitie, than of his wiſdom and valor. The crafty Baſſa hauing him by himſelf, began with great cunning to deliuer his more ſecret meſſage. When Vranacontes perceiuing by a little, what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his ſpeech, and without more ado commanded him to depart, ſtreitly charging him, that neither he nor any other ſhould after that time preſume to come from his maſter to the city, to ſpeak with him about any ſuch diſhonorable matter; for if he did, he would in deteſtation therof cauſe their hands, noſe, and ears to be cut off, and ſo return them diſmembred in ſtead of anſwer. And ſo the Baſſa was with his preſents turned out of the city, E and no man ſuffered to receiue any thing of him in reward; although the ſoldiers could haue bin wel content to haue eaſed him and his ſeruants of that cariage, if the gouernor would but haue winked therat.

Vranacontes reiecteth Amuraths preſents, and threatens the Baſſa.

Great was the expectation in the Turks camp, of the Baſſa's return; but when they ſaw the preſents were not receiued, they eaſily gheſſed that all went not as they wiſhed. But when Amurath himſelf vnderſtood the gouernours reſolute anſwer, he in great rage commanded all things to be made ready for a freſh aſſault: which he did rather to ſatisfie his anger, than vpon any hope he had to preuail therin. The next day he cauſed a furious aſſault to bee giuen to the city, but with greater loſſe to himſelf than before; the Chriſtians ſtil valiantly defending the city againſt the Turkiſh fury. In this aſſault many of the Turks were ſlaine at the F breach with their own great ſhot: for whileſt Amurath ſought therwith to driue the Chriſtians from the defence of the breach, he ſlew a great number more of the forwardeſt of his own men, than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endles ſlaughter of his men, he gaue ouer the aſſault, and returned into his camp, as if he had bin a man halfe frantick

tick or diſtract of his wits; and there ſate down in his Tent all that day full of melancholy paſſions, ſomtimes violently pulling his hoary beard & white locks, complaining of his hard and diſaſter fortune, that he had liued ſo long to ſee thoſe daies of diſgrace, wherin all his former glory and triumphant victories were obſcured, by one baſe town of Epirus. His Baſſa's and graue counſellors laboring in the meane time with long diſcourſes to comfort him vp: ſomtimes recounting vnto him his many and glorious victories, and otherwhiles producing antient examples of like euent. But dark and heauy conceits had ſo ouerwhelmed the melancholy old Tyrant, that nothing could content his waiward mind, or reuiue his dying ſpirits: ſo that the little remainder of naturall heat that was now left in his aged body, now oppreſſed and almoſt extinguiſhed with melancholy conceits, and his aged body dried vp with ſorrow, he became ſick of griefe. Wherupon by the counſell of ſome of his Baſſa's he ſent an Embaſſador to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, if he would yeeld to pay him a yearly tribute of ten thouſand Duckats: thinking by that means his honour to be well ſaued, if before his departure out of Epirus, hee could but make Scanderbeg his Tributary. This Embaſſadour was by Scanderbeg honourably entertained in his Campe; but the offered peace at the ſame time vtterly refuſed. The Embaſſadour returning vnto Amurath, declared vnto him the euil ſucceſſe of his Embaſſage, which greatly encreaſed his melancholy ſickneſſe. And Scanderbeg to grieue him the more, vnderſtanding that he was dangerouſly ſicke, and that the great Baſſa's were more carefull of the Kings health, than of the ſucceſſe of the wars; diuers times aſſailed the Turks Camp. Which thing though the Baſſa's kept from his knowledge with all carefulneſſe; yet he oftentimes ſuſpected the matter, by the often alarums and tumults in the Camp, and with the grief therof languiſhed. So feeling his ſickneſſe daily to increaſe, and that he could not much longer liue, lying vpon a pallet in his pauilion, grieuouſly complained vnto his Baſſa's, That the Deſtinies had ſo blemiſhed all the former courſe of his life with ſuch an obſcure death, That hee which had ſo often repreſſed the fury of the Hungarians, and almoſt brought to nought the pride of the Greecians, together with their name, ſhould now be inforced to giue vp the ghoſt vnder the walls of an obſcure Caſtle (as hee termed it) and that in the ſight of his contemptible enemy. After that, turning himſelfe to his ſon Mahomet, he erneſtly commended him to the faithfulnes of his Baſſas, and gaue him many graue aduertiſements, ſomtimes in ſecret betwixt themſelues, and ſomtimes in the hearing of others: want of ſtrength, and abundance of tears running down his aged face (vpon the ſight of his ſon) oftentimes interrupting his ſpeech. Yet ſick vnto death as hee was, and drawing faſt vnto his end, he forced himſelfe, to warn his ſon of ſuch things as now at his death grieued him moſt.

The laſt ſpeech & admonition of Amurath to his ſon Mahomet vpon his death bed.

Let myne example (quoth he) be a warning vnto thee, my ſon, neuer to contemn thine enemy, be hee neuer ſo weak: of which one thing aboue all others I haue repented my ſelf too long, and ſhall do after my death, if any feeling of human things remain in the dead. And that I was ſo fooliſh and inconſiderate to foſter vp as it were in my boſom this my domeſticall and neglected enemy, wherby I haue purchaſed vnto my ſelf this calamity, and for euer blemiſhed the honor of the Othoman kings; whilſt I ſo baſely ending my daies vnder the walls of Croia, ſhall become a by-word vnto the world and all poſterity for euer. This Traitor ſhould euen then haue bin oppreſſed, when he by treachery firſt recouered his wicked kingdom: in that newneſſe of his eſtate, and before the minds of the people were aſſured vnto him, then it had been an eaſie matter, without bloud-ſhed vtterly to haue extinguiſhed the wretch, together with his name. Alis Baſſa, whoſe euill fortune was the firſt beginning of his good; nor the other Generals, who by him ſlaine or taken priſoners, increaſed his ſtrength & credit vnto his ſubiects, ſhould not haue bin ſent againſt him: a thing which I haue oftentimes thought vpon, but would ſcarſe haue beleeued, that euer I ſhould haue therby receiued ſuch diſgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdom, if I had not beene taught the ſame by myne own experience, to my great loſſe and hearts grief. We entred into Epirus, and here incamped an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong: now if leiſure ſerue you, take view of them, examin the matter, you ſhall find a great want of them. The fields could not contain our regiments and the multitude of our men: but now, how many tents ſtand empty? how many horſes want riders? You ſhall go to Hadrianople with our forces much impaired. As for me, the Deſtinies haue vowed my ſpirits to this country of Epirus, as vnto me fatal. But wherfore do I impute vnto my ſelf theſe impediments and chances of fortune? for then firſt began this ſeed of miſchief in Epirus, when the Hungarians and other the Chriſtian princes roſe vp in arms againſt vs; at which time we fought not with them for ſoueraignty, but for the whole ſtate of our kingdom, as the bloudy battels of Varna and Coſſova ſtill witnes to the world. So whilſt I had neither leiſure nor ſufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once, in the mean time this enemy grew as you ſee. But how or in what order you are herafter to wage war againſt him, you may not look for any direction from me, which haue in all theſe matters ſo euil directed my ſelf. Fortune neuer deceiued my indeauors more than in this: but haply thou Mahomet my ſon mayſt proue a more fortunat warrior againſt him: and for ſo many honors already giuen vnto me, the deſtinies haue reſerued the triumph of Epirus for thee. Wherefore, my ſon, thou ſhalt receiue from me this Scepter, and theſe royall enſignes: but aboue all things, I leaue vnto thee this enemie, charging thee not to leaue my death vnreuenged. It is all I charge thee with, for ſo great and ſtately a patrimony as thou art to receiue from me: it is the only ſacrifice that my old departing ghoſt deſireth of thee.

Shortly after he became ſpeechles, and ſtriuing with the pangs of death half a day, he then breathed out his gaſtly ghoſt, to the great ioy and contentment of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians. He died about the middle of Autumn, Anno Dom. 1450. when he had liued 85 years, as moſt write, and therof reigned 28, or as ſome others report 30; about fiue months after the beſieging of Croia.

Amurath his death.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erſt not inferior vnto the greateſt monarchs of that age, dead almoſt in diſpair: a worthy mirror of honors frailty, yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end neither comfort nor relief. Who had fought greater battels? who had gained greater victories, or obtained more glorious triumphs than did Amurath? who by the ſpoil of ſo many mighty Kings and Princes, and by the conqueſt of ſo many proud and warlike nations, again reſtored and eſtabliſhed the Turks kingdom, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner clean defaced. He it was that burſt the heart of the proud Grecians, eſtabliſhing his Empire at Conſtantinople, euen in the centre of their bowels; from whence haue proceeded ſo many miſeries & calamities into the greateſt part of Chriſtendom, as no tongue is able to expres. He it was that firſt brake down the Hexamile or wall of ſeparation on the ſtreit of Corinth, and conquered the greateſt part of Peloponeſus. He it was that ſubdued vnto the Turkes ſo many great countries and prouinces in Aſia; that in plain field and ſet battell ouerthrew diuers puiſſant kings and princes, and brought them vnder his ſubiection; who hauing ſlaine Vladiſlaus king of Hungary and Polonia, and more than once chaſed out of the field Huniades that famous and redoubted warrior, had in his proud and ambitious heart promiſed to himſelf the conqueſt of a great part of Chriſtendom. But ô how far was he now changed from the man he then was! how far did theſe his laſt ſpeeches differ from the courſe of his forepaſſed life! full of ſuch baſe paſſionat complaints and lamentations as beſeemed not a man of his place & ſpirit; but ſome vile wretch ouertaken with diſpair, & afraid to dy. Where were now thoſe hauty thoughts, thoſe lofty looks, thoſe thundring and commanding ſpeeches, at which ſo many great Captains, ſo many troups and legions, ſo many thouſands of armed ſoldiers were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that head, before adorned with ſo many trophies and triumphs? Where is that victorious hand that ſwaied ſo many ſcepters? where is the majeſtie of his power and ſtrength, that commanded ouer ſo many nations & kingdoms? O how is the caſe now altred! he lieth now dead, a ghaſtly filthy ſtinking carkaſſe, a clod of clay vnregarded, his hands cloſed, his eies ſhut, and his feet ſtretched out, which erſt proudly traced the countries by him ſubdued and conquered. And now of ſuch infinit riches, ſuch vnmeaſurable wealth, ſuch huge treaſures, ſuch ſtately honors and vain-glorious praiſes as he in his life time enioyed; his frail body enjoyed nothing, but left all behind it. O the weake condition of mans nature! ô the vain-glory of mortal Creatures! ô the blinde and peruerſe thoughts of fooliſh men! Why do we ſo magnifie our ſelues? why are wee ſo puft vp with pride? why do we ſo much ſet our minds vpon riches, authority, and other vanities of this life? wherof neuer man had yet one daies aſſurance, and at our moſt need, and when we leaſt think, quite forſake vs; leauing euen them that moſt ſought after them, and moſt abounded in them, ſhrouded oft times in the ſheet of diſhonor and fame.

Amurath an example of the vanity of worldly honor.

That his death is otherwiſe by ſome reported, I am not ignorant; the Turks ſaying that he died miraculouſly forewarned of his death at Hadrianople. And ſome others, That hee died in Aſia, ſtrucken with an apoplexy proceeding of a ſurfet taken of the immoderate drinking of wine. But Marinus Barleſius, who liued in his time in Scodra faſt by Epirus, whoſe authoritie in the report of the wars betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, ſets it down in ſuch maner as is before ſaid.

Preſently after his death, Mahomet his ſon, for fear of ſome innouation to be made at home, raiſed the ſiege and returned to Hadrianople: and afterward with great ſolemnitie buried his dead body at the Weſt ſide of Pruſa, in the ſuburbs of the city; where he now lieth in a chapel without any roofe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turkes: which they ſay he commanded to be don in his laſt will, that the mercy and bleſſing of God (as he termed it) might come vnto him, by the ſhining of the Sun and Moone, and falling of the rain and due of heauen vpon his graue.

He whilſt he liued mightily inlarged the Turkiſh kingdom, and with greater wiſdom and policie than his predeceſſors eſtabliſhed the ſame. Inſomuch that ſome attribute to him the firſt inſtitution of the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the firſt, his great grandfather, (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, and the policy of that ſtate, wherein it euer ſince in his poſteritie flouriſhed, euen by himſelfe plotted. For the better eſtabliſhing wherof in his own houſe, & to cut off al occaſion of fear, as alſo to leaue all ſuch as he thought might riſe againſt him, naked & bare of forces to reſiſt (but eſpecially the other antient and noble families of the Turks, ſtil ſecretly repining at the great honor of the Othoman kings) he as a man of great wiſdom and iudgment, to keep them vnder in the beginning of his reign, by manifold fauors began to bind to himſelf men of ſtrange and forrein countries, his ſeruants; and by ordering his moſt weighty affaires by their authoritie, purpoſed ſo by little and little to caſt off the ſeruice of his natural Turks: they in the meen time little or nothing at all looking into this his practiſe. And wheras the Othoman Kings his predeceſſors had for the moſt part, or rather altogether raiſed their Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the Court, of ſuch children of the Chriſtians as were taken in the Wars; hee, ſeeing by experience how ſeruiceable thoſe new kind of ſoldiers were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himſelf an army altogether of ſuch able perſons, his own creatures, and ſo to bring in a new kind of Warfare, wholly depending of himſelf. And to that end, by his officers appointed for that purpoſe, took from the Chriſtians throughout his dominions, euery fiſt child; the faireſt and apteſt of whom he placed in his own Seraglio at Hadrianople, and the reſt in other-like places by him built for ſuch purpoſe: where they were by ſufficient teachers, firſt inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion, and then in all maner of actiuity and feats of arms. Of theſe being grown to mans ſtate, he made horſemen, gaue them great penſions, and ſorting them into diuers orders, appointed them alſo to gard his perſon, honoring the better ſort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to ſay, his ſons the Knights: and of theſe hee began to make his Baſſa's, his Generals of his armies, and the gouernors of his prouinces and cities, with all the great offices of ſtate. The reſt, & far the greateſt part of theſe tribute children, taken from their Chriſtian parents, and not brought vp in the Seraglio's, hee cauſed to be diſperſed into euery city and country of his dominion in Aſia, there for certain years to be brought vp in all hardnes and painful labor, neuer taſting of eaſe or pleaſure: out of which hard brood ſo inured to pains, he made choice of the moſt luſty and able bodies, fitteſt for ſeruice, as hee thought good; who kept in continuall exerciſe, and by skilfull men taught to handle all maner of weapons, but eſpecially the bow, the piece, and the ſcimitar, were by him as occaſion ſerued, added to the other Ianizaries, and appointed for the garding of his perſon; commonly calling them by the names of his Sons. The remainder of theſe Tribute children, as vnfit for the Wars, he put vnto other baſe occupations and miniſteries. But vnto thoſe martiall men of all ſorts ſo by him ordained, he appointed a continuall pay according to their degrees and places: and by great liberties and benefits beſtowed vpon them, bound them ſo faſt vnto him, as that he might now account himſelf to haue of them ſo many ſons, as he had ſoldiers. For they, together with the Chriſtian religion, hauing forgotten their parents and Countrey, and knowing no other lord and maſter but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace only, remained euer bound and faithfull vnto him, and ſo kept others alſo, as wel the naturall Turks themſelues, as the other oppreſſed Chriſtians, with-

A in the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great policie proceeding from a deep iudgment, firſt to weaken the Chriſtians, by taking from them their beſt children, and of greateſt hope; and then by them depending wholly of himſelf, to keep in awe and dutifull obedience his natural ſubiects alſo: hauing them alwaies as a ſcourge ready to chaſtiſe the rebellious or diſloyal.
Now the other Othoman Kings and Princes (the ſucceſſors of Amurath) keeping this cuſtom, and alſo increaſing it one after another, haue therby not onely kept the empire ſtill in their houſe and family, where it was firſt gotten; but alſo ſo maintained the majeſty of their ſtate, as that they are of their ſubiects feared, obeyed, and honored not as Kings, but as Gods.
For the naturall Turks their ſubiects loſing courage continually, and daily growing more baſe and daſtardly, by reaſon they are not ſuffered to practiſe the knowledge of arms; and the B ſoldiers in whoſe power all things are, knowing nothing of their own, but holding & acknowledging all that they haue to come of their Lord, account them as Lords and Kings of all: ruling much after the maner of the Pharaohs the antient Kings of Egypt; who were abſolute Lords and maſters both of the publique and priuat wealth of their ſubiects, whom they kept vnder as ſlaues and villains. And herof comes it to paſſe, that the better part of them whom we cal Turks (but are indeed the children of Chriſtians, & ſeduced by their falſe Inſtructers) deſire to be called Muſulmans, that is to ſay, right beleeuers; holding it a reprochfull & diſhonorable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people. For that they knowing right wel, that there is not one natural Turk among all thoſe that bear authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honor and reputation than the reſt (ſuch as are the men of C war and the courtiers) but he is born a Chriſtian either of father, or at the leaſt of his grandfather; auouch them only to be Turks who liue in Natolia, all of them either merchants, or of baſe and mechanical trades, or poor laborers with the ſpade and pick-ax, and ſuch like people vnfit for the wars; the reſt (as I ſay) holding it for a title of honor, to be deſcended of Chriſtian parents. Yea the grand Seignior himſelf, although by the fathers ſide hee be come of progenitors ſuch as were naturall Turks born; yet many of them had Chriſtian mothers, which they accounted in the greateſt part of their nobility and honor. Thus by Amuraths wiſdom was the Order of the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the Court greatly aduanced, though not by him begun; and the politick ſtate of the kingdom (to ſay the truth) quite altered: the natural Turks (more than the Sultan himſelf) now bearing therin no ſway; but only theſe new D ſouldiers, all of them deſcended from Chriſtian parents, and by adoption as it were become the ſons of the Turkiſh Sultans, and vnder them commanding all. By whom they haue euer ſince mannaged their eſtate, and by their good ſeruice wonderfully, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, increaſed and extended their empire. But of them more ſhall be ſaid herafter.

A great policie.

This great King was of his ſubiects while he liued, wonderfully beloued, and no leſſe of them after his death lamented. He was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkiſh Kings either before or after him: by nature melancholy and ſad, and accounted rather politick than valiant, yet was indeed both: a great diſſembler and painful in trauell, but waiward and teſty aboue meaſure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had iſſue ſix ſons, Achmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Haſan (otherwiſe called Chaſan) Vrchan, & Achmetes the yonger, of ſome E called Calepinus. Three of whom died before; but the two yongeſt were by their vnnaturall brother Mahomet, who ſucceeded in the Turkiſh kingdom, euen in their infancie, in the beginning of his reign cruelly murthered.

And haue alone diſmaid the world,

Am now by death (which all deuours)

Yet doth the glory of my name

The great King Alexanders fame

Nor worthy Hanibal, whoſe force

I vanquiſht the victorious Greeks, and tam'd with mighty hand The warlike people of Epire,

My force in field Hungaria felt, my greatnes is there known;
Which of late time through Italy,

Th'Aſſyrians felt my heauy hand;
ſo did th'Arabians wild:
The Perſian King with all his force I droue out of the field.
I purpoſed to win the Rhodes,

If that the fatall Deſtinies

But wo is me, for griſly Death hath brought all this to nought, And in the twinkling of an eye

So periſheth the pride of man,

His gold, and whatſoeuer els, it fadeth as a flower.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING, AND FIRST EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SYRNAMED THE GREAT.

THE report of the death of old Amurath the late King, was in ſhort time blowne thorow moſt parts of Chriſtendome, to the great joy of many; but eſpecially of the Greekes and other poore Chriſtians which bordered vpon the tyrants Kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkiſh King, to make exchange alſo of their bad eſtate and fortune: and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, after the death of his father, would haue imbraced the Chriſtian Religion, being in his childhood inſtructed therein (as was ſuppoſed) by his mother the daughter of the Prince of Seruia, a Chriſtian. But vaine was this hope, and the joy thereof but ſhort, as afterward by proofe it appeared: For Mahomet being about the age of one and twenty yeares, ſucceeding his father in the Kingdome in the yeare of our Lord 1450, embraced in ſhew the Mahometan Religion, abhorring the Chriſtian; but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other, but as a meere Atheiſt, deuoyd of all Religion, and worſhipping no other god but good Fortune, derided the ſimplicity of all ſuch as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which graceleſſe reſolution ſo wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his luſt, and making conſcience of nothing, kept no league, promiſe, or oath, longer than ſtood with his profit or pleaſure.

Mahomet of no Religion.

Now in the Court men ſtood diuerſly affected towards the preſent ſtate: the mighty Baſſaes, and others of great authority, vnto whom the old Kings gouernment was neuer grieuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting leſt the fierce nature of the yong King ſhould turn to the hurt of ſome of them in particular, and the ſhortning of their authority in generall, as indeed it ſhortly after fell out. But the luſty gallants of the Court weary of the old King, who in hope of preferment had long wiſhed for the gouernment of the yong Prince, were glad to ſee him ſet vpon his fathers ſeat. And the vulgar people (neuer conſtant but in vnconſtancy, and alwaies fawning vpon the preſent) exceedingly rejoyced in their yong King. The Ianizaries alſo at the ſame time (according to their accuſtomed manner) took the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iews that dwelt amongſt them, and eaſily obtained pardon for the ſame: whereupon he was by the ſame Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the Court, with great triumph ſaluted King. Which approbation of theſe men of war, is vnto the Turkiſh Kings a greater aſſurance for the poſſeſſion of their Kingdome, than to be borne the eldeſt ſon of the King, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory ſhall appeare: ſo great is the power of theſe maſterfull ſlaues, in promoting to the kingdome whichſoeuer of the Kings ſons they moſt fauour, without much regard whether they be eldeſt or not.

This yong tyrant was no ſooner poſſeſſed of his fathers kingdome, but that he forgetting the lawes of nature, was preſently in perſon himſelfe about to haue murthered with his owne

hands, his youngeſt brother, then but eighteene moneths old, begotten on the daughter of Sponderbeius. Which vnnaturall part, Moſes one of his Baſſaes, and a man greatly in his fauour, perceiuing, requeſted him, not to embrue his own hands in the bloud of his brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to ſome other: which thing Mahomet commanded him the author of that counſell forthwith to do. So Moſes taking the child from the nurſe, ſtrangled it, with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young lady vnderſtanding of the death of her child (as a woman whom fury had made paſt feare) came, and in her rage reuiled the tirant to his face, ſhamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane cruelty. When Mahomet to appeaſe her fury, requeſted her to be content, for that it ſtood with the policy of his ſtate: and willed her for her better contentment, to aske whatſoeuer ſhe pleaſed, and ſhe ſhould forthwith haue it. But ſhe deſiring nothing more than in ſome ſort to be reuenged, deſired to haue Moſes (the executioner of her ſonne) deliuered vnto her, bound: which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe preſently ſtruck him into the breaſt with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankfull maſter for helpe:) and proceeding in her cruell execution, cut an hole in his right ſide, and by piecemeale cut out his liuer, and caſt it to the dogs to eat. At the ſame time alſo he cauſed another of his brethren, committed by his father to the keeping of Caly-Baſſa, and now by him betraid into his hands, to be likewiſe murthered.

A cruell reuenge of an angry woman.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkiſh commonweale.

Thus beginning his tyrannous raign with the bloudy execution of them that were in bloud neereſt vnto him, and whom of all others he ought to haue defended, he preſently after began to frame a new forme of a common-weale, by abrogating and altering the old laws & cuſtoms, and publiſhing of new, better fitting his own humour, and more commodious for himſelfe: impoſing alſo new taxes and ſubſidies vpon his ſubjects, neuer before heard of: thereby to increaſe his treaſures, and ſatisfie his auaritious deſire: which amongſt many other his vices, ſo much reigned in him, as that he was thought ouer-ſparing vnto himſelfe, as well in his apparel as in his diet. And proceeding further, he called vnto ſtreit account all the great officers of his kingdome: of whom ſome he put to death, and confiſcated their goods: others he put to great fines, or quite remoued them from their offices. In like maner he dealt alſo with his great Baſſaes, admitting many falſe and ſurmiſed accuſations againſt them: whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercy was to be looked for. By which meanes he became no leſſe terrible vnto his ſubjects, than he was afterwards vnto his enemies: and ſo was of them exceedingly feared, but more hated. Among other things, he much miſliked in his court the exceſſiue number of faulconers and huntſmen, which was growne ſo great by the immoderate delight which his predeceſſors tooke in the pleaſures of the field, that there were continually maintained of the Kings charge ſeuen thouſand faulconers, and not many fewer huntſmen; ſaying, that he would not be ſo much a foole, as to maintain ſuch a multitude of men to attend vpon ſo meere a vanity. And therefore tooke order, that from thenceforth there ſhould be allowance made for 500 faulconers only, and 100 huntſmen: the reſt he appointed to ſerue as ſoldiers in his wars. At the ſame time alſo he entred into league with Conſtantinus Palaeologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, and the other Princes of Grecia: as alſo with the Deſpot of Seruia, his grandfather by the mothers ſide, as ſome will haue it; howbeit, ſome others write, that the Deſpot his daughter, Amurath his wife, was but his mother in law, whom he, vnder the colour of friendſhip ſent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, ſtill allowing her a princely dowry. But if ſhe were not his mother (as like enough it is that ſhe was not) much more happy was ſhe that ſhe neuer groned for ſo graceleſſe a ſon.

Mahomet goeth againſt the king of Caramania.

Whileſt Mahomet was thus occupied about his ciuill affaires, Ibrahim King of Caramania, who long before had maried Amuraths ſiſter, and yet for all that, had (as his anceſtors had before him) alwaies enuied the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Othoman Kings, tooke occaſion in the firſt yeare of Mahomet his reigne, with fire and ſword to inuade his dominions in Aſia. Which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he diſplaced Iſa his lieutenant in Aſia, as a man not ſufficient to mannage ſo great warres, and appointed Iſaac-Baſſa in his roome, a moſt valiant man of war, vpon whom not long before he had vpon ſpeciall fauour beſtowed in marriage the faire daughter of Sponderbeius, one of his fathers wiues, of whom we haue ſpoken before. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer into Aſia, raiſed a great army. After whom followed Mahomet in perſon himſelfe with a greater, out of Europe: and hauing all his forces together, entered with great hoſtility into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiuing himſelfe vnable to withſtand ſo

A ſo puiſſant an enemy, fled into the ſtrength of the great mountains, and by his Embaſſadours offered vnto Mahomet ſuch reaſonable conditions of peace, as that he was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by ſolemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his army to Pruſa: but when he was come thither, the Ianizaries preſuming that they might be bold with the young King, putting themſelues in order of battell, came and with great inſolency demanded of him a donatiue or largious, as a reward of their good ſeruice done. With which ſo great preſumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed: but for ſo much as they were his beſt ſouldiers, and already in armes, he wiſely diſſembled his anger for the preſent, hauing a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Baſſa, and Turechan beg, two of his great captains, who had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter: wherefore to content them, he cau-ſed ten great bags of aſpers to be ſcattered among them; and ſo pacified the matter. But with-B in few daies after, he cauſed Daganes (the Aga or chief captain of the Ianizaries) to be brought before him, and to be ſhamefully whipt: and ſo preſently diſcharging him of his office, placed one Muſtapha in the ſame. The like ſeuerity he vſed againſt the reſt of the vnder captains, cau-ſing them to be cruelly ſcourged and beaten like ſlaues: which in that tyrannical gouernment is an vſuall puniſhment, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the King to be inflicted vpon any man, without reſpect of degree or calling, if he be not a naturall Turke born. Preſently after he ſent Iſaac his lieutenant againſt Elias Prince of Menteſia or Caria, by whom the poore Prince was driuen out of his countrey: euer ſince which time it hath remained in ſubjection to the Turkiſh Kings, as part of their Kingdome and Empire.

Menteſia ſubdued by the Turks.

1452

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian war, and was determined with his army to C returne to Hadrianople, he was aduertiſed, That the ſtreits of Helleſpontus were ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the Chriſtian fleet, that he could not there poſſibly paſſe ouer but with moſt ma-nifeſt danger: wherefore he tooke his way through that part of Bythinia which lyeth aboue Conſtantinople, and came to the caſtle which the Turks call Acce-Chiſar, and the Grecians, ἀσπρόκαστρον, or white caſtle, ſtanding vpon the narrow ſtreit of Boſphorus on Aſia ſide, and there paſſed ouer into Europe at the ſame place where his father Amurath had not many yeares before in like manner found paſſage. Where when he was ſafely got ouer with his army, he by the aduice of his Baſſaes encamped faſt by the ſea ſide, and there preſently began to build a great ſtrong caſtle cloſe vnto the ſtreits of Boſphorus, neere vnto Propontis, on Europe ſide, D directly ouer againſt the other caſtle in Aſia. For the ſpeedy accompliſhment of which work, he aſſembled thither al the workmen he could poſſibly get out of Europe and Aſia, apportioning vnto his captaines and ſoldiers of his army part of the worke alſo: by whoſe induſtry and labor, that great building was in ſhorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the firſt expected. This caſtle which for the greatneſſe thereof, is of moſt writers reputed for a city, was by the Turks named Genichiſar, and of the Grecians Neocaſtron, or New caſtle, and alſo Lemocaſtron, or caſtle vpon the ſtreits; and was there by the Turks built, as well for the ſafety of their owne paſſage to and fro, as for to hinder the paſſage of the Chriſtians through thoſe narrow ſtreits, they now poſſeſſing the ſtrong forts on both ſides: and thereby alſo to diſtreſſe the city of Conſtantinople, from whence this caſtle was not aboue fiue miles E diſtant. When Mahomet in the ſecond yere of his reign had finiſht this great caſtle, with ſome other ſmall forts about the ſame, and alſo repaired the other caſtle in Aſia ouer againſt it, he placed therein ſtrong garriſons, and furniſhed the ſame with artillery; in ſuch ſort, that no ſhip could paſſe through the ſtreit of Boſphorus into the great Euxine, or blacke ſea, but ſhee was in danger to be ſunke: whereby the rich trade which the merchants of Venice, Genua, and Conſtantinople, had to Caffa, and other places lying vpon the Euxine, were almoſt quite cut off, to the great hinderance of thoſe eſtates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall deſirous to do ſome ſuch thing as the glory whereof might farre paſſe the fame of his predeceſſors, thought nothing more anſwerable to his high conceits, than to attempt the winning of Conſtantinople, and the vtter ſubuerſion of the Greeke Empire: Wherupon his father Amu- F rath, and his great grandfather Bajazet, had before in vaine ſpent their forces. Beſides that, it grieued him to ſee that goodly city, the antient ſeat of the Chriſtian Empire, to be ſo commodiouſly ſcituated, as it were in the middeſt of his Kingdome, and not to be at his command. Hereunto the ſmall power of the Greeke Emperour himſelfe, and the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſame time at mortall diſcord amongſt themſelues, miniſtred vnto his greedy

deſire no ſmall hope of ſucceſſe, and ſerued as ſpurs to prick him forward vnto ſo great an enterpriſe. Wherefore all the Winter he cauſed great preparation to be made of ſhipping and other warlike prouiſion both by ſea and land: and gaue out commiſſions for the leuying of a mighty army, to be in readineſſe againſt the next Spring. But whither he would imploy the ſame, no man could certainly tell: ſome gheſſing one thing, and ſome another, as the manner of men is, when ſuch extraordinary preparation is at hand. Conſtantinus the eight of that name, then Emperor of Conſtantinople, a Prince of a mild and ſoft ſpirit, fitter for the Church than for the field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkiſh King, and fearing leſt that tempeſt then growing, ſhould vpon the ſudden break forth vpon himſelf, firſt made ſuch preparation as his owne ſmall ability would extend vnto. And then ſent his Embaſſadors vnto other Chriſtian Princes, earneſtly crauing their aid & aſſiſtance in that his dangerous eſtate. But that labour was loſt, and all his ſuit vaine: for they being at variance one with another, and hauing more care of priuate reuenge, than how to repulſe the common enemy of Chriſtianity, could not, or would not afford him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fifth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, with Alphonſus King of Naples, and the State of Venice, promiſed to haue ſent him thirty gallies, but none for all that came.

There were by chance at Conſtantinople certain ſhips and gallies of Venice, Genua, Creet and Chios, of whom the Emperour made ſtay: at which time alſo it chanced, that Ioannes Iuſtinianus, an aduenturer of Genua, who had beene ſcouring thoſe ſeas, came to Conſtantinople with two tall ſhips, and foure hundred ſouldiers: where he was entertained by the Emperour. And foraſmuch as he was a man honourably deſcended, and ſuppoſed to be both of great courage and direction, was by the Emperour appointed Generall of all his forces next vnto himſelfe. He alſo entertained ſix thouſand Greekes: which, with three thouſand Venetians, Genowaies and others, whom he had made ſtay of, joyned vnto the citizens, was all the weake ſtrength he had to rely vpon, for the defence of his State and Empire.

Againſt the beginning of the Spring, the Turkiſh king had in readines a great and puiſſant army of three hundred thouſand men, of whom, the greateſt part were taken out of Bulgaria, Seruia, Raſcia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, and Grecia, which as yet were called the Chriſtian countries, and were themſelues either indeed Chriſtians, or elſe ſuch renegates as had not long before forſaken the Chriſtian faith: vnto theſe alſo were joyned diuers other Chriſtians which came out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, to ſerue the Turke in his wars. This hath been none of the leaſt means, wherby the Turkiſh Kings haue growne ſo great, and their kingdome ſo mightily inlarged, by inforcing and alluring Chriſtians to fight againſt Chriſtians, to the vtter confuſion of themſelues. Among the great multitude of the Europeian Chriſtians, were mingled his effeminate ſouldiers of Aſia, and his naturall Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number feweſt, and yet cammanded all the reſt.

Mahomet encampeth before Conſtantinople:

With this great army, well appointed with all warlike prouiſion, came Mahomet the Turkiſh King from Hadrianople: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1453, encamped before Conſtantinople, and with the multitude of his army filled all the maine land before the city, from the ſea ſide of Boſphorus, vnto the place where the ſame ſea compaſſing in the city on two parts, and running far into the land betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, maketh there a goodly hauen betwixt them.

The ſcituation of Conſtantinople.

This city of Conſtantinople (called in antient time Bizantium) is in forme of a Triangle, ſcituated in Europe in the pleaſant country of Thracia, vpon a point of the maine land ſhooting out towards Aſia, called of Pliny and Solinus, the promontory Chryſoceras, where the ſea of Propontis joyneth vnto that ſtreit of ſea, which diuideth Aſia from Europe, called in antient time Boſphorus Thracius; ſometime the ſtreit of Pontus; and the mouth of Pontus; and of the modern writers, the ſtreit of Conſtantinople; and about two hundred yeares paſt, or more, S. George his arme. This point of the maine, whereon the city ſtandeth, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the ancient city of Calcedon, on the other ſide of the ſtreit in Aſia: more than thirty miles diſtant from the Euxine or blacke Sea, lying from it Northward: And two hundred miles from the ſtreit of Helleſpontus or Calipolis, from thence South. Which noble City (of all others moſt fitly ſeated for the Empire of the World, and with great majeſty ouerlooking both Europe and Aſia) is by the Coſmographers accounted to ſtand in the height of 43 degrees, vpon ſeuen little hils, of Conſtantinople built by Pauſanias, deſtroied by Seuerus, reedefied by Conſtantine the Great, and now taken by Mahomet the Turk.

A no great and eaſie aſcent : and was there firſt built by Pauſanias the Lacedemonian King, and called Bizantium, and ſo many yeares flouriſhed as a populous and rich city, vntill the ciuill wars betwixt Seuerus the Emperor, and Niger : what time it indured the ſiege of the Romans vnder Seuerus, three yeres, with ſuch obſtinacy, that it yeelded not vntill it was brought to ſuch extremity, that the citiſens did eat one another; and then yeelded, had the wals ouerthrowne by Seuerus, and the city it ſelfe deſtroied, and brought to the low eſtate of a poore countrey village, and ſo by him giuen to the Perinthyans. In which baſe eſtate it continued vntill the time of Conſtantine the Great, the ſon of Helena (whom ſome will needs haue to haue beene an Engliſh woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings ſo ſtately & ſumptuous, that vnto the ſtrange beholders it ſeemed a dwelling place for heauenly wights, rather B than for earthly men. And to grace it the more, tranſlated his imperiall ſeat thither, and called it Noua Roma, or New Rome; and all that pleaſant part of Thracia alongſt the ſea coaſt of Helleſpontus, Propontis, and Boſphorus, by the name of Romania, of the faire Romane colonies there by him planted; which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks called Rumilia, and Rum-Ili, that is to ſay, the Romane country. But as for the city it ſelfe, the glorious name of the founder ſo preuailed, that the city was & yet is (of him) called Conſtantinople, or Conſtantine his city : and now of the barbarous Turks commonly, but corruptly, Stam-boli. It is (as we ſaid) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longeſt ſide, which runneth from Northeaſt to Southweſt, is on the South ſide waſhed with the Propontis; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the ſeuen towers, is ſomewhat indented; being com-C monly reputed to be eight miles long. The other ſide lieth Eaſt and Weſt fiue miles in length, being waſhed with the hauen, which is ſomewhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the freſh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad : on the further ſide whereof ſtandeth the city of Pera, commonly called Galata, ſometimes a colony of the Genowaies.
This hauen is very deepe, and by that reaſon as commodious as deep, bearing ſhips ful fraught cloſe to the ſhoare, ſo that they may diſcharge their burthens with the leaſt trouble that may be; and is of Strabo called Cornu Bizantij, or the Horne of Bizantium. The third ſide of this city towards the Continent, lieth almoſt North and South, fiue miles alſo in length: thoſe two ſides that lie vpon the ſea, and the hauen, are inuironed and girt in with a ſingle wal, built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which ſtrongly defend and flanke the ſame. With-D out which wals (eſpecially towards the hauen) there lieth a ſtreet between them and the ſhore.
But the other ſide which is the third, and regardeth the maine land (beſide the ditch, which is alſo fenced) is defended with three wals: the firſt wall ſtanding vpon the ditch being but low; and the ſecond not far diſtant from the firſt, raiſed ſomwhat higher; but the third ouerlooketh and commandeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortreſſe both the other wals and all the ditch without may eaſily be defended. But the two vtter wals, with the whole ſpace betwixt them, are now by the Turks but ſlenderly maintained, lying full of earth and other rubbiſh, euen as they were in the time of the Grecians: ſom cauſe why they with leſſe heart & courage defended the ſame againſt their barbarous enemy. In the Eaſt part of the city, on that point which in the reign of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, diſtant from Aſia E not much more than halfe a mile, ſtands the Seraglio or palace of the great Turk, containing in it ſelfe a great part of an hill, encloſed round with a wall, as if it were it ſelfe a city, in circuit more than two miles : wherein amongſt other ſtately buildings, neere vnto the ſea ſtandeth a very faire and ſumptuous gallery, built for pleaſure, with a priuy gate well fortified and planted with great ordnance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times paſſeth, when he is diſpoſed in his gally to take his pleaſure vpon the ſea, or to paſſe ouer the ſtreit vnto his houſes or gardens of delight, on the other ſide in Aſia. In this great city are alſo many other moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkiſh Sultans, ſince they became Lords thereof, as before by the Greeke Emperors : amongſt all which the Temple of S. Sophia ſtanding on the Eaſt ſide of the city, not far from the Seraglio (now redu-F ced vnto the form of a Mahometan Moſchy, and whither the great Turke goeth oftentimes to heare ſeruice, being indeed but the ſanctuary or chancel only of the great, ſtately, and wonderful church (built by Iuſtinian the Emperor) is moſt beautifull and admirable. That which ſtan-deth of it now, is both round and very high, built after the faſhion of the Pantheon in Rome, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top as is that: the wals thereof being of the fineſt marble,and the floore all paued with faire marble alſo. In the middeſt there is a very great and G large circle,compaſſed in with high and huge pillars of moſt excellent marble of diuers ſorts; and theſe ſupport a mighty vault that beareth vp as many mo pillars aboue, ſtanding after the very ſame order, and in a downe-right line, almoſt of the like greatneſſe and goodneſſe of the marble with the other below : vpon which, aboue the ſecond vault in manner of a loouer, reſteth the great round roofe which couereth all that ſpace of the Church which is compaſſed with the aforeſaid pillars:being all enameled and fillited,with the pictures of Saints,after the antient manner of ſome great Churches in Chriſtendome : but that the Turks, who like not to haue any pictures in their churches,haue put out their eies only, as loth to ſpoile ſuch a rare piece of worke and vtterly to deface it. In like maner the wals of the vpper vault are wrought, painted,or portraied after the ſame order,though in ſome part decaied,by reaſon of their long H continuance and ſtanding. About this church are eighteene or twenty doores of braſſe,right faire and coſtly,well declaring the magnificence and greatneſſe thereof in more antient times; when as it had(as is reported)more than two hundred doores of like making and greatneſſe: and beſide the hugeneſſe of the frame and building it ſelfe, had alſo diuers faire monaſteries and houſes of religion joyned vnto it : whereunto belonged ſix thouſand Prieſts,whoſe houſes and lodgings extended almoſt all ouer the place where now the Turks palace ſtandeth, and the other places adjoyning to this great church, which is now their chiefe Moſchy,and called by them by the proper name of S.Sophia, becauſe they hold euen as we doe, the wiſedome of God to be incomprehenſible and infinit. The next in magnificence vnto this,is the Moſchy of Solyman,wherin he lieth buried,and his welbeloued wife the faire Roxolana : a worke well beſeeming I the majeſty of ſo mighty a Monarch. There are beſide theſe alſo many other faire Moſchies, Seraglioes for the Turke his wiues and concubins, Bezaſtanes or Burſes for merchants, Obeliskes,Bathes,and other publike edifices and buildings of great majeſty and ſtate,all well worth the beholding : wherin conſiſteth all the beauty of this ſo antient and renowned a city; far vnlike to that it was in the time of the firſt Greeke Emperors, and before it was ſpoiled by the Latins. For the Turks priuat houſes in this ſo great and imperiall a city,ſo much renowned thorow the world,are for the moſt part low and baſe,after the Turkiſh faſhion,built ſome of wood,ſome of ſtone,and ſome of vnburnt bricke, laid with clay and dirt,which quickly decaieth again: they after their homely manner(by long cuſtome receiued) neuer building any thing ſumptuouſly for their own priuat vſe,but contenting themſelues with their ſimple cottages, K how mean ſoeuer,commonly ſaying them to be good enough for the ſhort time of their pilgrimage:and yet not ſparing for any coſt vpon the publike buildings and ornaments of the common weale,which they build with great majeſty and pomp;but ſpecially their Moſchies, wherein they excell. Neuertheleſſe, there yet are in Conſtantinople ſome other houſes alſo built high and comely enough;but theſe be few,and very old, all inhabited by the Chriſtians and Iewes,and not by the Turks ; but of this enough. And ſo againe to our purpoſe.

The frugality of the Turks in their priuate buildings.

The Turks fleet.

Mahomet with his puiſſant army thus encamped before the city, placing his Aſian ſoldiers on the right hand towards the Boſphorus;his Europeian ſoldiers on the left hand, toward the hauen ; lay himſelfe with 15000 Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court, in the middle betwixt both,againſt the heart of the city. On the further ſide of the hauen alſo by Pera,he placed L Zoganus,one of his chiefe councellors,with another part of his army. At which time alſo Pantoleges his admirall came to the ſiege,with a fleet of 30 gallies,and 200 other ſmall ſhips; and a number of other leſſer veſſels, which were rowed with three, or fiue oares apiece,full of Turkiſh archers,fitter for ſhew than ſeruice. But for defence of the hauen,and ſo of the city on that ſide, the Emperour had cauſed the hauen to be ſtrongly chaind ouerthwart from the city to Pera:and within the chaine had orderly placed his ſtrong fleet;the greateſt ſtrength whereof was ſeuen great ſhips of Genoa, with three gallies, and two galliots of Venice, three of Creet,and a few other of the Iſland of Chios ; all which were there, rather by chance, vpon marchants affaires, than that they were prouided for any ſuch ſeruice : yet by this means the Turks fleet was ſhut out of the hauen,and ſo the city put in good ſafety on that ſide. M

When Mahomet had thus conueniently encamped his army, and ſurrounded the city both by ſea and land:he firſt caſt vp great trenches as neere as he poſſibly could vnto the wals of the city,and raiſed mounts in diuers places as high as the wals themſelues,from whence the Turks with their ſhot greatly annoied the defendants. After that,he placed his battery againſt one of

A the gates of the city called Calegaria, and terribly battered the ſame, ſpecially with one piece of ordnance of a wonderfull greatneſſe, which with much difficulty was brought from Hadrianople with an hundred and fifty yoke of oxen, and carried a bullet of an hundred pound weight, made (as his other ſhot was) of a kind of hard blacke ſtone brought from the Euxine ſea: for as yet (as it ſeemeth) ſo ſoone after the inuention of that fatall engine, the vſe of bullets of mettall was vnknowne. There with continuall battery, he terribly ſhooke the wals, which although they were very ſtrong, yet were they not able to withſtand the fury of ſo great a battery. The Chriſtians alſo out of the city diſcharged their great artillery vpon the Turks, but ſo ſparingly, as if they had bin afraid to ſhake their owne wals, or loth for good huſbandry, to ſpend ſhot and poulder, which was to the canoniers very ſparingly allowed: yet that B which was ſpent, was ſo well beſtowed, that the Turks were therewith grieuouſly annoyed. The breach alſo which they had made at the aforeſaid gate, was by the defendants with great and dangerous labour again repaired with faggots and earth, and ſuch like matter beſt ſeruing for that purpoſe, and ſo made ſtronger than before. In which moſt dangerous worke, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iuſtinianus the Genoway, the Emperors lieutenant Generall for defence of the city.

Yet for all this diligence of the Chriſtians, Mahomet continued his battery with no leſſe fury than before: but repoſing greater hope to finde a way into the city, by the ſpade and mattocke, than by battery; he emploied his pioners, whereof he had great ſtore, to digge a mine: being altogether directed by Chriſtians, ſkilfull in that kind of worke, whom he had C for that purpoſe entertained. By whoſe cunning direction, with the induſtrous labour of the poore pioners, the mine was brought to ſuch perfection, that part of the wall, with one of the ſtrong towers in the ſame, was quite vndermined, and ſtood ſupported, but with ſuch vntruſty ſtaies as the pioners had left for the bearing vp thereof till ſuch time as it ſhould be by the tyrants appointment blowne vp. This dangerous work was neither perceiued, neither yet feared by the Conſtantinopolitans, as a thing not poſſible to haue bin done: foraſmuch as Bajazet & Amurath had both with great labour before in vaine attempted the ſame, at ſuch time as they hardly beſieged the city. But that which thoſe great kings had with much vaine labor by vnskilfull men made proofe of, Mahomet had now by men of greater deuice, brought to paſſe, although it took not ſuch effect as he wiſhed: for one Io. Grandis, a German captaine, and a man D of great experience, ſuſpecting the matter, had cauſed a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time diſcouered, and they with fire and ſword driuen out of the mine, and the ſame ſtrongly filled vp againe, and ſo the city for that time deliuered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiuing that it auailed him not to continue his battery againſt that place, which was againe ſo ſtrongly repaired, remoued the ſame, and planted it againſt a tower called Bactatina, neere vnto the gate called Porta Romana, or, Romane Gate. Which tower ſhaken with continuall battery, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vtter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was alſo ſpeedily and with great courage made vp again by the defendants, although the Turks did what they could, with continuall ſhot to haue driuen them from the ſame. At which time they alſo erected certaine E high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the ſame from fire, out of which they with their ſhot ſlew many of the Chriſtians vpon the wals, and in making good the aforeſaid breach: but Mahomet ſeeing this valiantneſſe of the defendents, openly ſaid, That it was neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the city: for the Turks commonly call all the Chriſtians of the Weſt by the name of Frankes or Frenchmen.

Conſtantinople vndermined by the Turks.

The cheerfulneſſe and induſtry of the Chriſtians in defending and repairing the aforeſaid breach, was ſo great, that the Turkiſh King began almoſt to deſpaire of winning the city; which he could no way aſſault but on one ſide. When as a bad Chriſtian in his camp, put him againe in good hope, by ſhewing vnto him a deuice how to bring a great part of his fleet ouer land into the hauen, & therby to aſſault that part of the city by water, which the citiſens leaſt F feared; by which ingenious deuice, and by the great ſtrength of men, Zaganus Baſſa (to whom that charge was committed) brought ſeuenty of the leſſer ſhips & gallions, with all their ſailes abroad (to the great admiration of thoſe that ſaw them) vp a great hil, & ſo by dry land, out of the Boſphorus behind Pera, the ſpace of eight miles, into the hauen of Conſtantinople, which running in betweene the city and Pera, runneth into the maine Land (as we haue ſaid) about eight miles. The Chriſtian that diſcouered this deuiſe vnto the king, is ſuppoſed to haue learned G it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of Bennacus. Glad was Mahomet to ſee ſo many of his ſhips and gallies in the hauen, and the Chriſtians with the ſight thereof no leſſe diſcouraged. Neuertheleſſe, they attempted to haue burnt thoſe veſſels as they were in launching, but the Turks had ſo commodiouſly placed certain pieces of great Ordnance for their defence, that the formoſt of the gallies of the Chriſtians, approching the Turks fleet was preſently ſunke; wherewith the reſt diſmaied, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Chriſtians of the loſt gally, whom the Turks tooke vp ſwimming in the hauen, were the next day cruelly ſlaine in the ſight of the Chriſtians: in reuenge whereof, certaine Turks before taken priſoners into Conſtantinople, were forthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the ſight of the campe with like cruelty put to death. H

A wonderfull bridge made by the Turks ouer the hauen of Conſtantinople.

Mahomet thus poſſeſſed of the hauen, ſhortly after cauſed a wonderfull bridge to be made quite ouer the hauen, from Zoganus his campe which lay by Pera, vnto the wals of Conſtantinople: which bridge was built with timber and plankes, borne vp with ſmall boats and empty caske, after a moſt ſtrange manner, and was in length more than halfe a mile: by which bridge his army came ouer the hauen, to aſſault the city on that ſide alſo.

A notable fight betweene foure of the Chriſtians ſhips, and the Turks fleet.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway ſhips laded with men and munition from the Iſland of Chios, with one of the Emperours laded with corne from Sicilia, came with a faire winde for Conſtantinople. The Turks great fleet then lying not far off, within the ſight of the camp, ſet vpon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turks were ſlaine with ſhot, the gallies boorded the ſhips: but being much lower, were ſo far from doing any I good, as that the Turks could not well looke out, but they were from aboue ſlaine or wounded. Mahomet from the ſhore beholding the vnequall fight, and ſlaughter of his men, cried out aloud, ſwearing and blaſpheming God, and in great rage rid into the ſea ſo far as he durſt, and comming backe again rent his clothes, faring with himſelfe like a mad man. The whole army of the Turks beholding the ſame fight at ſea, was filled with like indignation alſo, but could nothing remedy the matter. The great fleet aſhamed in the ſight of their King to be ouercome of ſo few ſhips, did what they might deſperatly to enter: but all in vaine, being continually ouerwhelmed with ſhot and ſtones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Chriſtian ſouldiers. At length weary of their loſſe, they were glad with diſhonour to fall off again, and to get them further off. The report of the loſſe the Turks ſuſtained in this fight is almoſt K incredible: ſome of the Turks fugitiues reported, almoſt ten thouſand Turks to haue there periſhed: but certaine it is, that ſuch was the loſſe, as filled the whole army with indignation and ſorrow, many hauing there loſt their kinſemen or friends. Three of theſe ſhips that had made this fight, arriued in ſafety at Conſtantinople, the other was loſt. Mahomet vpon this ouerthrow conceiued ſuch diſpleaſure againſt Pantogles his Admirall, who in that fight had loſt one of his eies, that he neuertheles thruſt him out of his office, confiſcated his goods, and was hardly by the great Baſſaes entreated to ſpare his life.

Whileſt Mahomet thus lay at the ſiege of Conſtantinople, and had thereunto giuen many great attempts, with more loſſe vnto himſelfe than to the defendants, a rumor was raiſed in his camp, of great aid that was comming out of Italy by ſea, and out of Hungary by land, for the L reliefe of the beſieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due conſideration of the danger of the ſiege, filled the Turks camp with feare: ſo that the ſoldiers commonly murmured amongſt themſelues, ſaying, That to ſatisfie the ambitious humor of their young king, they were led to fight againſt impregnable wals and fortreſſes, yea, againſt the bars of nature it ſelfe, without all reaſon: Whereupon Mahomet entred into conſultation with the three great Baſſa's his counſellors, Whether it were beſt for him to continue the ſiege or not. When Caly Baſſa, ſometime his tutor, a man of greateſt authority among the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall ſecretly fauouring the diſtreſſed Emperour, after he had with long & graue diſcourſe declared the difficulty or rather impoſſibility of the wiſhed ſucceſſe in that preſent war, and confirmed the ſame, by producing the examples of Bajazet M his great grandfather, and of Amurath his father, who had both in vaine made proofe of their ſtrength againſt that city: at length concluded, that in his mind it were beſt for him to raiſe his ſiege, & to depart before he had ſuſtained any further loſſe or diſgrace: but Zoganus the ſecond Baſſa, in great fauor alſo with Mahomet, and ſecretly enuying the greatneſſe of Caly Baſſa, perſuaded

A ſuaded the K. to proceed in his honorable enterpriſe:aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof,and with all the reaſons he could deuiſe, impugned that which Caly Baſſa had ſaid. And of the ſame opinion with Zoganus was alſo the third Baſſa, rather of purpoſe to croſſe Caly Baſſa, and withall to fit the Kings humor,than for any great hope he had in the good ſucceſſe of that he ſo much deſired. Howbeit the ſpeech he & Zoganus deliuered,ſo well agreed with the kings affection,that he reſolued to continue the ſiege:and thereupon gaue full authority to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and generall aſſault to be giuen, reſoluing at once to gage all his forces vpon the winning of the city. Which charge Zoganus gladly took vpon him, & with his good liking,appointed the 29 day of May for the general aſſault,being then the tueſday next following. In the meane time he ſent one Iſmael, the ſon of Alexander Prince of Sinope,embaſ-B ſador vnto the Emperour,to offer him peace : but vpon ſuch hard conditions, as were no leſſe to be refuſed than death it ſelfe. Which thing he did,partly to ſatisfie the minds of his Turks (who were for moſt part of opinion, That God will not proſper them in their aſſaults, except they firſt make with their enemies ſome offer of peace, how vnreaſonable ſoeuer it forceth not)and partly to make proofe what confidence the enemy yet had in himſelf,for the holding out of the ſiege. But that diſhonorable peace ſo offered,together with the intollerable conditions,was by the emperor honorably refuſed : who no leſſe feared the Turks faith(if he ſhould haue accepted therof)than he did the hardnes of the conditions. Three daies before this fatall aſſault was to be giuen,the Turks(according to their maner)kept their ſolemne faſt,eating nothing al that day vntil night;and then making the greateſt cheere & joy they could deuiſe,and C in the winding vp of the ſame,took their leaue one of another, with ſuch kiſſing & imbracing as if they ſhould neuer haue met againe. At the ſame time Mahomet to encourage his ſoldiers, cauſed proclamation to be made thorow his camp,That he would freely giue all the ſpoile of the city for three daies vnto his ſouldiers, if they could win it : and for confirmation thereof, ſolemnly ſwore the Turks great oath, By the immortall God, and by the foure hundred Prophets,by Mahomet,by his fathers ſoule,by his owne children, and by the ſword wherewith he was girt,faithfully to performe whatſoeuer he had to them in his proclamation promiſed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing,Caly-Baſſa diſdaining that his counſel was rejected,and the opinion of his aduerſaries followed ; by ſecret letters aduertiſed the Emperour of the day appointed for the generall aſſault,together with all the preparation made againſt him:perſua-D ding him not to be affraid of them,who were themſelues no leſſe affraid of him;but carefully to prouide to haue all things in readineſſe for the defence of his city, and valiantly to withſtand the raſh and laſt attempt of his enemies.

This wofull Emperour had already done what he could to the vttermoſt of his power for defence of the city all the time of the ſiege : but ſuch was the diſloyalty of the citizens his ſubjects, that many times they could hardly be drawne from their priuate trades and occupations,vnto the wals to withſtand the enemy; fooliſhly affirming,That it was to no purpoſe for them to fight againſt the Turks at the breaches, and to ſtarue for food at home in their houſes. For which cauſe,the Emperor commanded a view to be taken of all the corne in the city (which then began to grow very ſcarce;)but vpon diligent ſearch made, ſuch ſtore was found E in many mens hands,(which was by them either altogether kept in to ſel afterwards at vnrea-ſonable priſes,or els ſo ſparingly vttered,as if they had none to ſpare) as that it appeared, the dearth and ſcarcity which then began to increaſe, to proceed rather of the couetouſneſſe of men, than of any true want of graine : this ſtore the Emperour cauſed to be proportionably diuided vnto euery family at reaſonable priſes, according to their ſpending ; and ſo eaſed the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercinary ſouldiers alſo, regarding more their owne priuate profit than the publike ſeruice, refuſed any longer to go to the wals, than they were ſure of their daily pay : which the poore Emperour, otherwiſe vnable to giue them,was glad to conuert the church plate and jewels into mony, to content them. For he had many times before with tears,in vaine requeſted to haue borrowed F mony of his couetous ſubjects, to haue bin emploied in defence of the city ; but they would ſtill ſweare, that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade : which in few daies after, their enemies found in ſuch abundance, that they wondered at their wealth, and derided their folly, that poſſeſſing ſo much, they would beſtow ſo little in defence of themſelues and their country. But this had beene their vſuall manner of dealing with their Emperours, in that declining ſtate of the empire: as well appeared in the time of the Emperour Baldwin, G who for lacke of mony was glad firſt to ſell away many of the goodly ornaments of the city, and afterwards to pawne his own ſon vnto the Venetian merchants, for mony to maintaine his ſtate, as in the former part of this Hiſtory is declared.

But to returne againe to the courſe of our Hiſtory. The Emperour certainly aduertiſed of the enemies purpoſe, for the generall aſſault ſhortly to be giuen, firſt commended the defence of himſelfe and the city to the protection of the almighty, by generall faſting and praier, and afterwards appointed euery captaine and commander, to ſome certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of Io. Iuſtinianus his Generall, in whoſe valour the Conſtantinopolitans had repoſed their greateſt hope.

But the city being on euery ſide now beſet with the Turks great army, and the defendants H in number but few, for ſo great a city (in compaſſe eight miles) the wals could but ſlenderly in many places be manned, and eſpecially on both ſides toward the ſea, where indeed leaſt danger was. The greateſt ſtrength and beſt ſouldiers, were placed for defence of the vtter wall, where the breach was, and the aſſault expected by land. Iuſtinianus the Generall himſelfe, with three hundred Genowaies well armed, and certaine choſen Greeks, vndertooke the defence of that part of the battered wall, neere vnto the Roman gate, where the fall of the tower Bactatina had filled the ditch as is aforeſaid: againſt which place Mahomet himſelfe lay encamped, with his Ianizaries and beſt men of war. Neere vnto Iuſtinianus lay the Emperor himſelfe, for defence of another part of the wall: and ſo other captains orderly with their companies, all alongſt the vtter wal: and becauſe the defendants ſhould haue no hope to ſaue their liues, more I than their own valour, the Emperor cauſed all the gates of the inner wall to be faſt ſhut vp: and in this ſort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the aſſault ſhould be giuen: at which time they might heare great hurly burly and noiſe in the Turks campe, as they were putting things in readineſſe for the aſſault.

Conſtantinople aſſaulted by the Turks.

A little before day, the Turks approched the wals, and began the aſſault, where ſhot and ſtones were deliuered vpon them from the wals, as thicke as haile; whereof little fell in vaine, by reaſon of the multitude of the Turks, who preſſing faſt vnto the wals, could not ſee in the darke how to defend themſelues, but were without number wounded or ſlain: but theſe were of the common and worſt ſoldiers, of whom the Turkiſh King made no more reckoning than to abate the firſt force of the defendants. Vpon the firſt appearance of the day, Mahomet gaue K the ſigne appointed for the generall aſſault, wherupon the city was in a moment and at one inſtant on euery ſide moſt furiouſly aſſaulted by the Turks: for Mahomet, the more to diſtreſſe the defendants, and the better to ſee the forwardneſſe of the ſouldiers, had before appointed which part of the city euery Colonel with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrowes and ſhot vpon the defendants, ſo thicke, that the light of the day was therewith darkened: others in the mean time couragiouſly mounting the ſcaling ladders, and comming euen to handy ſtrokes with the defendants vpon the wall; where the formoſt were for moſt part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other ſide, the Chriſtians with no leſſe courage withſtood the Turkiſh fury, beating them downe againe with great ſtones and weighty pieces of timber, and ſo ouerwhelmed them with L ſhot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuiſes from aboue; that the Turks diſmaied with the terrour thereof, were ready to retire.

Mahomet renueth the aſſault, Mahomet ſeeing the great ſlaughter and diſcomfiture of his men, ſent in freſh ſupplies of his Ianizaries and beſt men of war, whom he had for that purpoſe reſerued as his laſt hope and refuge: by whoſe comming on his fainting ſouldiers were againe encouraged, and the terrible aſſault began afreſh. At which time the barbarous King ceaſed not to vſe all poſſible meanes to maintaine the aſſault: by name calling vpon this and that captaine, promiſing vnto ſome whom he ſaw forward, golden mountaines; and vnto others in whom he ſaw any ſigne of cowardiſe, threatning moſt terrible death: by which meanes the aſſault became moſt dreadfull, death there raging in the middeſt of many thouſands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by M heapes vpon the ground, yet other freſh men preſſed on ſtill in their places, ouer their dead bodies, and with diuers euent either ſlew, or were ſlaine by their enemies.

In this ſo terrible a conflict, it chanced Iuſtinianus the Generall to be wounded in the arme; who loſing much bloud, cowardly withdrew himſelfe from the place of his charge, not lea-

uing

A uing any to ſupply his roome, and ſo got into the city by the gate called Romana, which he had cauſed to be opened in the inner wall: pretending the cauſe of his departure to be for the binding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether diſcouraged.

The ſoldiers there preſent, diſmaied with the departure of their Generall, and ſore charged by the Ianizaries, forſooke their ſtations, and in haſte fled to the ſame gate wherby Iuſtinianus was entered; with the ſight whereof, the other ſouldiers diſmaied, ran thither by heaps alſo. But whileſt they violently ſtriue, all together to get in at once, they ſo wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of ſo great a multitude got in: in which ſo great a preſſe and confuſion of mindes, 800 perſons were there by them that followed, trodden vnder foot, or thruſt to death. The Emperor himſelf, for ſafegard of his life flying with the reſt, in that preſſe B as a man not regarded, miſerably ended his daies, together with the Greeke empire. His dead body was ſhortly after found by the Turks among the ſlaine, and knowne by his rich apparel; whoſe head being cut off, was forthwith preſented to the Turkiſh tyrant: by whoſe commandement it was afterward thruſt vpon the point of a lance, and in great deriſion carried about as a trophy of his victory, firſt in the campe, and afterwards vp and downe the city.

The Chriſtians forſake the wals.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Chriſtians, preſently aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the vttermoſt wall, crying victory; and by the breach entered as if it had been a great floud, which hauing once found a breach in the banke, ouerfloweth, and beareth down all before it: ſo the Turks when they had won the vtter wal, entered the city by the ſame gate that was opened for Iuſtinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great C artillery; and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further reſiſtance became lords of that moſt famous and imperial city. Some few there were of the Chriſtians, who preferring death before the Turkiſh ſlauery, with their ſwords in their hands ſold their liues deare vnto their enemies: amongſt whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Palaologus a Greeke, and Ioannes Stiauus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deſerue to be had in eternall remembrance: who after they had like lions made ſlaughter of their enemies, died in the midſt of them, embrued with their bloud, rather oppreſſed by multitude, than by true valour ouercome. In this fury of the Barbarians, periſhed many thouſands of men, women, and children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. Many for ſafegard of their liues, fled into the Temple of Sophia, where they were all D without pitty ſlain, except ſome few reſerued by the barbarous victors, to purpoſes more grieuous than death it ſelfe. The rich and beautifull ornaments and jewels of that moſt ſumptuous and magnificent Church (the ſtately building of Iuſtinianus the Emperor) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt down and carried away by the Turks; and the Church it ſelfe built for God to be honored in, for the preſent conuerted into a ſtable for their horſes, or a place for the execution of their abhominable and vnſpeakeable filthineſſe: the Image of the crucifix was alſo by them taken downe, and a Turks cap put vpon the head thereof, and ſo ſet vp and ſhot at with their arrows, and afterwards in great deriſion carried about in their campe, as it had beene in proceſſion, with drums playing before it, railing and ſpitting at it, and calling it, the God of the Chriſtians. Which I note not ſo much done in contempt of the Image, as in the deſpight E of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion.

Conſtantinople won by the Turks.

But whileſt ſome were thus ſpoiling of the Churches, others were as buſie in ranſacking of priuat houſes, where the miſerable Chriſtians were enforced to endure in their perſons whatſoeuer pleaſed the inſolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that ſtood with their luſt, euery common ſoldier hauing power of life and death, at his pleaſure to ſpare or ſpill. At which time riches were no better than pouerty; and beauty worſe than deformity. What tongue were able to expreſſe the miſery of that time? or the proud inſolency of thoſe barbarous conquerours? whereof ſo many thouſands, euery man with greedineſſe fitted his owne vnreaſonable deſire: all which the poore Chriſtians were inforced to endure. But to ſpeake of the hidden treaſure, mony, plate, jewels, and other riches their found, paſſeth credit; F the Turks themſelues wondered thereat, and were therewith ſo enriched, that it is a prouerbe amongſt them at this day, if any of them grow ſuddenly rich, to ſay, He hath beene at the ſacking of Conſtantinople: whereof if ſome reaſonable part had in time beene beſtowed vpon defence of the city, the Turkiſh King had not ſo eaſily taken both it and the city. But euery man was carefull how to encreaſe his own priuat wealth, few or none regarding the publicke ſtate; vntill in fine, euery man with his priuat abundance was wrapped vp together with his G needy neighbor in the ſelfe-ſame common miſery. Yea, the ſecurity of the Conſtantinopolitans was ſuch, that being alwaies enuironed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of ſo much as the inner wall of the city (which for beauty and ſtrength was comparable with the wals of any city in the world, if it had been kept well repaired) but ſuffered the officers which had the charge to ſee to the fortifying of the city, to conuert the greateſt part of the mony into their owne purſes: as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a very poore man; and likewiſe by Neophitus, who then hauing that office to ſee to the fortification of the city, had in ſhort time gathered together ſeuenty thouſand florins, which became all a worthy prey vnto the greedy Turks.

After that the barbarous common ſoldier had thus by the ſpace of three daies without controlment H taken his pleaſure in the city (as Mahomet had before promiſed) and throughly ranſackt euery corner thereof; they then returned into the camp, with their rich ſpoiles, driuing the poore Chriſtian captiues before them, as if they had beene droues of cattell, or flocks of ſheep: a ſpectacle no leſſe lamentable, than was the ſacking of the city. It would haue grieued any ſtony heart to haue ſeene the noble gentlewomen and great ladies, with their beautifull children, and many other faire perſonages, who lately flowed in all worldly wealth and pleaſure, to be now become the poore and miſerable bondſlaues of moſt baſe and contemptiple raſcals; who were ſo far from ſhewing them any pitty, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more miſery vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of dogs. There might the parents ſee the wofull miſery of their beloued children, and the children I of the parents; the husband might ſee the ſhamefull abuſe of his wife, and the wife of her husband, and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the leaſt part of heauy comfort) being in the thraldome of diuers cruell maſters, by whom they were kept aſunder, like in few daies to be diſperſed into diuers far countries, without hope that they ſhould euer find releaſe, or one ſee another againe.

Mahomet ſolemniſeth his feaſts at Conſtantinople with the bloud of the Grecian nobility.

The ſoldiers being all retired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerour, with great triumph entered into the city of Conſtantinople, then deſolate and void of all Chriſtian inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, made a ſumptuous & royal feaſt vnto his Baſſaes and other great captains: where after he had ſurcharged himſelfe with exceſſe of meat and drinke, he cauſed diuers of the chiefe Chriſtian captiues, both men and women (of K whom many were of the late Emperors line and race) to be in his preſence put to death, as he with his Turks ſate banqueting; deeming his feaſt much more ſtately by ſuch effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. Which manner of exceeding cruelty he dayly vſed, vntil ſuch time as he had deſtroied all the Grecian nobility that was in his power, with the chiefe of the late Conſtantinopolitan citizens. At which time alſo diuers of the Venetian Senators, with Bajulus their Gouernor, and many rich merchants of Genua and other places of Italy, were in like manner murthered: ſo that of ſeuen and forty Senators of Venice which were there taken (whereof moſt part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there vnluckily ſhut vp) ſome few found the fauour with exceeding great ranſomes to redeeme themſelues.

Amongſt theſe noblemen thus lamentable executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notaras, L commonly called Kyr-Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great Chancellor of Conſtantinople, a man of greateſt account next vnto the Emperour himſelfe: whom the Turkiſh tyrant ſeemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in ſo great credit with the late Emperor, perſuaded him not in time to haue ſought for peace vpon any condition, or els to haue yeelded vp the city, rather than to haue run that extreme courſe of wilfull miſery. He to excuſe the matter, ſaid, That the late Emperor his maſter was encouraged to hold out the ſiege, by the Venetians and citizens of Pera, from whom he receiued ſecret aid: as alſo by ſome of the greateſt men about his own perſon: for proofe whereof, he drew out of his boſome the letters which Caly-Baſſa had to that purpoſe written vnto the Emperor, and deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping therby to haue found ſome fauour. But when he had ſaid what he could, the eldeſt of his ſons then liuing (for M he had loſt two elder in the time of the ſiege) was cruelly executed before his face, and the yongeſt reſerued for the tyrants luſt: and after all this miſery, had his own head ſtruck off with the reſt appointed for that daies ſacrifice. Out of this generall calamity eſcaped Io. Iuſtinianus the General, who with all ſpeed fled at firſt to Pera, and from thence to Chios, where in few daies after

A after he died, of grief of mind (as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happy if he had honorably before ended his daies vpon the wals of Conſtantinople. Iſiodorus alſo the Cardinall and Legat from the Pope, diſguiſed in ſimple apparell, and being of the Turks vnknown, redeemed himſelf for a ſmall ranſom, as if he had bin a man of none account, and ſo eſcaped. Whom if Mahomet had known, he had vndoubtedly bin made ſhorter by the head.

The glory of this famous City of Conſtantinople continued many hundred yeares, commanding a great part of the world; vntil that by ciuil diſcord and priuat gain it was by little and little ſo weakned, that the Emperors of later times, for the maintenance of their eſtate, were glad to rely ſomtime vpon one, ſomtime vpon another, yet ſtill holding the ſtate and title of an empire by the ſpace of 1121 years, when as (Gods iudgment ſet apart) wonderful and B ſhamefull it is to conſider, how it was by this Turkiſh King Mahomet ſo quickely taken, and the Chriſtian empire of the Eaſt there vtterly ouerthrown. Which hapned on the nine and twentieth day of May, in the year of our Lord 1453. Conſtantinus Palæologus the ſon of Helena, and laſt Chriſtian Emperor, being then ſlain, when hee had reigned about eight years. Since which time it hath continued the Imperial ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperors, and ſo remaines at this day.

The Poteſtats and citiſens of Pera, otherwiſe called Galata, a city ſtanding oppoſit againſt Conſtantinople on the other ſide of the hauen, & then vnder the gouernment of the Genoa's, doubting to run the ſame courſe of miſery with their neighbors, ſent their Orators to Mahomet the ſame day that Conſtantinople was taken, offering to him the keyes of their gates, C and ſo to become his ſubjects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and ſent Zoganus with his regiment to take poſſeſſion of the city. Who comming thither, according to Mahomet his commandement, there eſtabliſhed the Turkiſh gouernment, confiſcated the goods of all ſuch as were fled, and vſed the reſt of the citiſens which ſtayed, with ſuch inſolencie & oppreſſion, as that their miſery was not much leſſe than theirs of Conſtantinople: & becauſe it was doubted that the Genoa's might by ſea giue aid vnto the citiſens, if they ſhould at any time ſeeke to reuolt, he cauſed all the wals and fortreſſes of the city which were toward the land, to bee caſt down and laid euen with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greek empire run, and Mahomet in one day become Lord of the two famous cities of Conſtantinople and Pera; the one taken by force, the other by compoſition; at which time the miſery of Pera was great, D but that of Conſtantinople iuſtly to be accounted amongſt the greateſt calamities that euer hapned to any Chriſtian city in the world.

Pera yeelded to the Turks.

Mahomet had of long time born a ſecret grudge againſt Caly Baſſa, ſomtime his Tutor, for that by his means Amurath his father in the dangerous time of the Hungarian wars had again reſumed vnto himſelf the gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdom, which he had before reſigned vnto him, then but yong. But foraſmuch as he was the chief Baſſa, and had for many years ruled all things at his pleaſure, to the general good liking of the people, during the reign of old Amurath, and was therby grown to be of ſuch wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater vnder any of the Othoman Kings; Mahomet in the beginning of his reign, before he was well eſtabliſhed in his kingdom, durſt not take reuenge of that injury (as E he deemed it) but yet ſtil kept it in remembrance, warily diſſembling his deep conceiued hatred as if he had quite forgot it. Neuertheles ſomtime (for all his warineſſe) words fel from him, wherby the wary Courtiers (who as curiouſly weigh their Princes words, as the cunning Goldſmith doth his fineſt gold) eaſily perceiued the ſecret grudge that ſtuck in his ſtomack againſt the Baſſa, and therby diuined his fall to be at hand. So it happened one day, that as Mahomet was walking in the court, he ſaw a Fox of the Baſſa's tied in a chain: which after hee had a while earneſtly looked vpon, he ſuddenly brake forth into this ſpeech; Alas poor beaſt, haſt thou no mony to giue thy Maſter to ſet thee at liberty? Out of which words curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings diſpoſition toward the Baſſa. This ominous ſurmiſing of the Courtiers (which oftentimes proueth too true) was not vnknown to the Baſſa F himſelf, but troubled him much. Wherfore to get himſelf out of the way for a ſeaſon, more than for any deuotion, hee took vpon him to go in pilgrimage to viſit the Temple of their great Prophet (as they term him) at Mecha, which amongſt the Turks is holden for a right religious and meritorious work; hoping that the young Kings diſpleaſure might in time bee mitigated, and his malice aſſwaged. But Mahomet perceiuing the diſtruſt of the Baſſa, and wherof it proceeded, ſeemed to take knowledge therof, and with good words comforted him G vp, willing him to be of good cheer and not to miſdoubt any thing, neither to regard the vain ſpeech of fooliſh people, aſſuring him of his vndoubted fauour: and the more to put him out of all ſuſpition, continually ſent him rich gifts, and heaped vpon him new honors, as if of all others he had eſteemed him moſt. Vntil that now at the taking of Conſtantinople, it was diſcouered by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late Emperour of Conſtantinople, and his letters produced. For which cauſe, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the tyrant bare againſt him, as alſo for his great wealth, he was by Mahomets commandement apprehended and caried in bonds to Hadrianople; where after hee had with exquiſit torments bin enforced to confeſſe where all his treaſures lay, he was moſt cruelly in his extream old age executed. After whoſe death, his friends and ſeruants (which were many, for H he was a man greatly beloued in the Court) in token of their grief put on mourning apparel, ſo that in the court appeared a great ſhew of common ſorrow: wherwith Mahomet being offended, cauſed proclamation to be made, that all ſuch as did wear ſuch mourning apparel ſhould the next day appear before him: at which time there was not one to be ſeen about the Court in that heauy attyre, for fear of the tyrants diſpleaſure.

Mahomet placeth his Imperial ſeat at Conſtantinople, & is worthily accounted firſt Emperor of the Turks.

After that Mahomet was thus become Lord of the Imperial city of Conſtantinople, as is aforeſaid, and had fully reſolued there to place his Imperial ſeat, he firſt repaired the wals and other buildings ſpoiled in the late ſiege, and by proclamations ſent forth into all parts of his dominions, gaue great priuiledges and immunities to all ſuch as would dwel at Conſtantinople, with free liberty to exerciſe what religion or trade they pleaſed. Wherby in ſhort time I that great and deſolat city was again wel peopled, with ſuch as out of diuers forein countries reſorted thither; but eſpecially of the Iewiſh nation, which driuen out of other places, came thither in great numbers, and were of the Turks gladly receiued. So when he had eſtabliſhed all things according to his hearts deſire, he took vpon him the name and title of an emperor, and is from that time not vnworthily reputed for the firſt Emperor of the Turks.

Now among many fair virgins taken priſoners by the Turks at the winning of Conſtantinople, was one Irene a Greek born, of ſuch incomparable beauty and rare perfection both of body & mind, as if nature had in her, to the admiration of the world, labored to ſhew her greateſt skil; ſo prodigally had ſhe beſtowed vpon her all the graces that might beautifie & commend that her ſo curious a work. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, pre- K ſented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe, as a jewell ſo fit for no mans wearing as his own: by the beauty and ſecret vertues wherof, he found himſelf euen vpon the firſt view not a little mooued. Neuertheles hauing his head as then ful of troubles, and aboue al things carefull for the aſſuring of the Imperial city of Conſtantinople, by him but euen then won, he for the preſent committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and ſent her away, ſo to be in ſafety kept vntill his better leiſure. But thoſe his troubles ouerblown, and his new conqueſts wel aſſured, he then began forthwith to think of the fair Irene; and for his pleaſure ſending for her, took in her perfections ſuch delight and contentment, as that in ſhort time hee had changed ſtate with her, ſhe being become the miſtres and commander of him ſo great a Conquerour, and he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greateſt honor and ſeruice he could. L All the day hee ſpent with her in diſcourſe, and the night in dalliance: all time ſpent in her company ſeemed to him ſhort, and without her nothing pleaſed: his fierce nature was now by her wel tamed, and his care of arms quite neglected: Mars ſlept in Venus lap, and now the ſoldiers might go play. Yea, the very gouernment of his eſtate and empire ſeemed to be of him, in compariſon of her, little or not at all regarded; the care wherof beeing by him careleſly committed to others, that ſo he might wholly himſelf attend vpon her, in whom more than in himſelf the people ſaid he delighted. Such is the power of diſordred affections, where reaſon ruleth not therein. But whilſt he thus forgetful of himſelf, ſpends in pleaſure not ſome few daies or months, but euen one whole year or two, to the lightning of his credit, and great diſcontentment of his ſubiects in general; the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court (men de- M ſirous of imploiment, and grieued to ſee him ſo giuen to his affections, and to make no end therof, began at firſt in ſecret to murmur therat, and ſpeak hardly of him; and at length (after their inſolent maner) ſpared not openly to ſay, That it were wel don to depriue him of his gouernment and ſtate, as vnworthy thereof, and to ſet vp one of his ſonnes in his ſtead. Which ſpeeches

A ſpeeches were now grown ſo riſe, & the diſcontentment of the men of war ſo great, that it was not without cauſe by ſome of the great Baſſa's feared, wherunto this their ſo great inſolencie would grow. But who ſhould tell the tyrant therof, whoſe frown was in it ſelf death? or who durſt take in hand to cure that his ſick mind; which diſtraught with the ſweet, but poiſoned potions of loue, was not likely to liſten to any good counſel, were it neuer ſo wiſely giuen: but as a man metamorphoſed, to turn his fury vpon him who ſhould preſume ſo wholſomly (but contrary to his good liking) to aduiſe him. Vnhappy man, whoſe great eſtate and fierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no not by them who of all others in ſo great a peril ought to haue bin therof moſt carefull, but were now for fear all become ſilent and dumb. Now amongſt other great men in the court, was one Muſtapha Baſſa, a man for his B good ſeruice (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet greatly fauoured; and by him alſo highly promoted: and he again by him alſo as his Soueraign no leſſe honoured than feared. Who no leſſe than the reſt grieued to ſee ſo great a change in the grand Sultan, of whom they had conceiued no ſmall hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and mooued alſo with the danger threatned vnto him by the diſcontented Ianizaries and men of war: eſpying him at conuenient leiſure to be ſpoken vnto, and preſuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to breake with him, and to giue him warning therof.

C How dangerous a thing it is for a ſubject or vaſſall, without leaue, preſumptuouſly to enter into the ſecrets of his dread Lord and Soueraign, the wofull examples of others (moſt mighty Mahomet*) haue ſo ſufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutifull loyaltie I owe vnto your greatneſſe (far dearer vnto me than myne own life) I would not at this time aduenture my ſelfe vnto the haſard of your doubtfull acceptance of my faithfull ſpeech and meaning, but with others keep ſilence, and in ſecret mourn together with my heauy thoughts: which if I ſhould in ſo great a danger both of your life and empire now do, without warning you therof, I were to be accounted vnworthy not onely thoſe your great fauours and honours moſt bountifully on me beſtowed; but as a moſt vile traitor both vnto your ſtate and perſon, to be of all men deteſted and abhorred. The life you haue of late led euer ſince the taking of Conſtantinople, as a man careles of his eſtate, and wholly wedded vnto his own pleaſure, hath giuen occaſion not vnto the vulgar people only (alwaies ready to ſay the worſt) and ſouldiers of the Court, the garders of your per-* D ſon, but euen vnto the greateſt Commaunders of your Armies and Empire, to murmure and grudge, I dare not ſay, conſpire againſt you. Yet pardon me (dread Soueraign) if I ſhould ſo ſay, for that there is no man which with great diſcontentment maruelleth not much to ſee ſo great an alteration in your heroicall diſpoſition and nature: wherby you are become far vnlike that noble Mahomet, who hauing ouerthrown the Greek Empire, and taken the great city of Conſtantinople, promiſed both vnto himſelf and others, the conqueſt of Italy, and the ſacking of Rome, the ſtately Seat of the antient Roman Conquerors. You haue giuen your ſelf ouer (as they ſay) for a ſpoil and prey vnto a poor ſimple woman your ſlaue and Vaſſall, who with her beauty and allurements hath ſo bewitched your vnderſtanding and reaſon, as that you can attend nothing but her ſeruice, and the ſatisfying of your moſt paſſionat and inordinat deſires; which how much the more you cheriſh them, ſo much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your E ſelf (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead, with the like time heretofore by you ſpent in treading Honours ſteps, and you ſhall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the firſt raiſer of your houſe and family, ſo giuen himſelfe ouer vnto pleaſure, you had not now inhabited the countries of Bithynia and Galatia, with others mo alongſt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his ſon Orchanes (the liuely image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed ouer Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bounds of his Empire ſo far as vnto the ſtreits of Helleſpontus. What ſhould I ſpeake of Amurath his ſon, and ſucceſſor in the Empire? who in perſon himſelfe, firſt of the Othoman Kings paſſed ouer into Europ, placed his Imperiall ſeat at Hadrianople, conquered Thracia, Bulgaria, and Raſcia. Yea Bajazet your great grandfather is in his misfortune more than you to be commended, as vanquiſhed in field by mighty Tamerlane, with four F hundred thouſand horſmen and ſix hundred thouſand foot, and not by a ſilly woman: comforting his miſhap with the honor and greatnes of him by whom he was ouercome. Neither may I with ſilence pas ouer your worthy grandfather, the noble Mahomet, who not contented to haue reſtored the ſhaking Empire, conquered alſo a great part of Macedonia euen to the Iconian ſea, and carying the terror of his armies ouer into Aſia, did greater matters againſt the Caramanians and others. As for your father Amurath (of worthy memory) I cannot but to my great griefe and ſorrow ſpeake of him, who by the ſpace of thirty years made both the ſea and earth to quake vnder his feet, and with ſtrong hand more than once vanquiſhed the Hungarians, and brought vnder his ſubiection the Countries of Phocia, Beotia, Ætolia, with a great part of Morea; and to ſpeak of him truly, brake euen the very heart and ſtrength of the Grecians and other his fierce Enemies. Let all theſe moſt famous Conqueſts of your noble Progenitors, whoſe worthy praiſes (as eternall trophies of their honour, are diſperſed into euery corner of the world, awake you out of this heauy lithurgy, wherin you haue too long ſlept, yea, let the remembrance of the conqueſt of this Imperiall City, by you to your immortall glory won, ſtir you vp to greater things: and let it neuer be ſaid of you, That you were able with your ſword to ouercome your greateſt enemies, and not with reaſon to ſubdue your inordinat affections. Think that your greateſt conqueſt, and ſuffer not your ſelf, ſo great a conquerour, to be led in triumph by your Slaue. What auaileth it you to haue won Conſtantinople, and to haue loſt your ſelfe? Shake off theſe golden fetters wherin the wily Greek hath ſo faſt bound you: which at the firſt though it ſeem vnto you hard and painfull, yet ſhall you in time digeſt it, and make you to think it both good and neceſſary for your eſtate. Wean your ſelfe from your deſires, and giue reſt vnto your troubled thoughts. Which if you cannot do at once, ſtriue by little and little to do it: pleaſure groweth greater by the ſeldom vſe therof, and ſaciety bringeth loathſomneſſe. Moderat your ſelf therfore, and again take vp Arms. Your Souldiers if they be not imployd abroad, will to your further trouble ſet themſelues at work at home: Idleneſſe maketh them inſolent, and want of Martiall diſcipline corrupteth their manners. Herof proceedeth their intemperat and diſloyall ſpeeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the honour and inlargement of the Othoman Empire, as did all your moſt noble Progenitors, they will ſet vp another that ſhall, euen one of your own children. And what the common ſoldier fooliſhly ſaith, their great Commanders maliciouſly purpoſe: which what a confuſion it would bring vnto the whole ſtate of your Empire, together with the danger of your Royall perſon, I abhor to think. Wherefore it is time, it is now high time for you to ſhew your ſelf, with the maieſty of your preſence to repreſſe their tumultuous inſolencie before it break further out. Rebellions are by far, more eaſily preuented, than in their heat appeaſed. The diſcontented multitude is a wild beaſt with many heads, which once inraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed: yet do you but ſhew your ſelf maſter of your owne affections, and you ſhall eaſily maſter them alſo. But what is fit for you to do, beſeems me not for to ſay: yea pardon me I beſeech you, that I haue thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) already ſayd; prouoked (by what Diuine inſpiration I know not) euen halfe againſt my will, to diſcouer vnto you the ſecret of my heart, and to lay open vnto you thoſe things, which others knowing as well as I, do yet for fear keepe the ſame from you. And if I haue gon too far, or in any thing that I haue ſaid forgot my ſelfe, impute the ſame (my dread Soueraign) vnto the zeal of my loue and loyaltie towards you, or vnto my fidelity ſo often by you tried, or to our antient education (the ground of your affection toward me) or to what els ſhall pleaſe you, rather than to my preſumption, from which how far I haue always bin, I appeal euen vnto your Maieſties own knowledge.

Hauing thus ſaid, he fell down at his feet, there to receiue his heauy doom of his ſo free ſpeech, if it ſhould be otherwiſe than wel taken of the angry Sultan: who all this while with great attention and many a ſtern look, had hearkned vnto all that the Baſſa had ſaid; for well he knew it to be all true, and that in ſo ſaying hee had but diſcharged the part of a truſty and faithfull ſeruant, carefull of his maſters honor. But yet the beauty of the Greek was ſtill ſo fixed in his heart, and the pleaſure he took in her ſo great, as that to thinke of the leauing of her, bred in him many a troubled thought. He was at war with himſelf, as appeared by his often changed countenance: Reaſon calling vnto him for his honor, and his amorous affections ſtil ſuggeſting vnto him new delights. Thus toſſed to and fro as a ſhip with contrary winds, and withall conſidering the danger threatned to his eſtate, if he ſhould longer follow thoſe his pleaſures, ſo much diſpleaſing to his men of war; he reſolued vpon a ſtrange point, wherby at once to cut off all thoſe his troubled paſſions, and withal to ſtrike a terror euen into the ſtouteſt of them that had before condemned him, as vnable to gouern his own ſo paſſionat affections. Wherupon with countenance wel declaring his inward diſcontentment, he ſayd vnto the Baſſa, yet proſtrat at his feet:

Although thou haſt vnreuerendly ſpoken, as a ſlaue preſuming to enter into the greateſt ſecrets of thy

A thy Soueraign, not without offence to be of thee once thought vpon, and therefore deſerueſt wel to die; yet for that thou waſt a child, and brought vp together with me, and haſt euer bin vnto me faithfull, I at this time pardon thee; and before to morrow the Sun go down, will make it known both to thee, and others of the ſame opinion with thee, whither I be able to bridle myne affections or not. Take order in the mean time that all the Baſſa's, and the chief commanders of my men of war be aſſembled together tomorrow, there to know my further pleaſure. Wherof fail you not.

So the Baſſa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in vnto the Greek, and ſolacing himſelf all that day & the night following with her, made more of her than euer before: and the more to pleaſe her dined with her; commanding, that after dinner ſhee ſhould be attyred with more ſumptuous apparel than euer ſhe had before worne: and for the further B gracing of her, to be deckt with many moſt pretious jewels of ineſtimable value. Wherunto the poor ſoul gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her funerall apparel. Now in the meane time Muſtapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as he was commanded, cauſed all the nobilitie and commanders of the men of war, to be aſſembled into the great hall, euery man much maruelling what ſhould be the Emperors meaning therin, who had not of long ſo publiquely ſhewed himſelf. But being thus aſſembled together, and euery man according as their minds gaue them, talking diuerſly of the matter; behold, the Sultan entred into the palace, holding the fair Greek by the hand; who beſide her incomparable beauty, and other the greateſt graces of nature, adorned alſo with all that curioſitie could deuiſe, ſeemed now to the beholders no mortal wight, but ſome of the ſtately goddeſſes, whom Poets in their C extaſies deſcribe. Thus comming together into the midſt of the hal, and due reuerence don by all there preſent; he ſtood ſtill with the fair Lady in his left hand, and ſo furiouſly looking round about him, ſaid vnto them; I vnderſtand of your great diſcontentment, and that you all murmur and grudge, for that I, ouercome with myne affection toward this ſo fair a paragon, cannot withdraw my ſelf from her preſence: but I would fain know which of you is ſo temperat, that if hee had in his poſſeſſion a thing ſo rare and pretious, ſo louely and ſo fair, would not be thrice aduiſed before he would forgo the ſame? Say what you think; in the word of a Prince I giue you free liberty ſo to do. But they all rapt with incredible admiration to ſee ſo fair a thing, the like whereof they had neuer before beheld, ſaid all with one conſent, That he had with greater reaſon ſo paſſed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therwith. Wherunto the barbarous prince anſwered, Well, but D now I wil make you to vnderſtand how far you haue bin deceiued in me, and that there is no earthly thing that can ſo much blind my ſenſes, or bereaue me of reaſon, as not to ſee and vnderſtand what beſeemeth my high calling: yea I would you ſhould all know, that the honor and conqueſt of the Othoman kings my noble Progenitors is ſo fixed in my breaſt, with ſuch a deſire in my ſelf to exceed the ſame, as that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And hauing ſo ſaid, preſently with one of his hands catching the fair Greek by the hair of the head, & drawing his falchion with the other, at one blow ſtrook off her head, to the great terror of them all: and hauing ſo done, ſaid vnto them, Now by this iudge whether your Emperor is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to diſcharge the reſt of his choler, cauſed great preparation to bee made for the conqueſt of Peloponeſus, and beſieging of Belgrade.

E At the ſame time that the barbarous Turks tooke the Imperiall City of Conſtantinople, Thomas and Demetrius Palæologi, brethren to the late vnfortunat Emperor Conſtantinus, gouerned a great part of Peloponeſus, one of the moſt famous prouinces of Grecia, which in forme of a leaf of a Plane tree, is almoſt in maner of an Iſle, inuironed with the ſeas Ionium and Ægeum, which running far into the land on either ſide therof, ſeparateth the ſame from the reſt of Grecia by two great bayes; leauing but a ſtreit neck of land, called of the Greeks Iſtmos, in bredth about fiue miles, which was ſomtimes by the Grecians, and afterward by the Venetians, fortified by a ſtrong wall, and fiue great Caſtles: neer vnto which place ſtood the great and famous city of Corinth. This prouince is in length 175 miles, and almoſt as much in bredth; wherin are contained the countries of Achaia, Meſſenia, Lacedemonia, Argolica, and F Arcadia, with many famous great Cities and very goodly hauens, wherin it farre exceedeth all the other prouinces of Grecia. Theſe two princes, Thomas and Demetrius, greatly diſmaied with their brothers diſaſter fortune, began now ſo far to diſpair of their own eſtate, that vpon the firſt brute therof they were about preſently to haue fled by ſea into Italy. And as it commonly falleth out, that one euill happeneth not alone; euen ſo at the ſame time it fortuned, that the Albanians roſe in arms againſt the ſaid two Princes their Soueraigns, and vnder the leading of their rebellious captain Emanuel Catacuzenus, grieuouſly troubled both theſe poor Princes. Theſe Albanians were a rough and hardy kind of people, which liuing after the maner of the rude Scythian people, by feeding of cattel, had of long time planted themſelues in Peloponeſus; differing from the natural Greeks both in their maner of liuing & language; which diuerſitie was no ſmall cauſe that they oftentimes ſpurned, as now, againſt the gouernment of the Grecian princes. In this extremity the two diſtreſſed princes not well knowing 1454 which way to turn themſelues, ſought for peace at Mahomets hands, offering to becom his tributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full conqueſt of that countrey; and ſent Turachan gouernor of Theſſalia, one of his greateſt men of war, with an army into Peloponeſus, to aid thoſe princes againſt the Albanians; by whoſe help the maſterful rebels were in ſhort time diſcomfited, and the country of Peloponeſus quieted; yet ſo, that it is now become tributary to the Turkiſh King.

Thomas & Demetrius rebell againſt Mahomet, and are by him ſpoiled of part of their Dominion.

Theſe two princes, Demetrius and Thomas (the laſt of all the Chriſtian princes that reigned in Peloponeſus) hauing loſt their liberty, liued a few yeares as the Turks vaſſals, paying ſuch tribute as they had before promiſed. During which time many diſpleaſures aroſe betwixt the two brothers, being both jelous of their eſtate, and deſirous by all plauſible means to win the hearts of their ſubjects one from another. Wherby it came to paſſe, that whilſt they both deſired to become popular, they weakned their own credit, and had not their ſubiects at ſuch command as beſt ſtood with the ſafety of their ſtate. Neuertheles, as ſoon as they vnderſtood that the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt were making great preparation againſt the Turk; and that Calixtus, the third of that name (then Biſhop of Rome) had already put a fleet of Gallies to ſea, which did great ſpoil vpon the borders of the Turks dominions; they vainly perſuading themſelues that the Turks would in ſhort time be again driuen out of Grecia, refuſed to pay any more tribute to the Turkiſh King, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occaſion Mahomet with a puiſſant army came down and firſt beſieged Corinth; and afterwards entring into Peloponeſus, took diuers ſtrong towns, and deſtroyed the Country before him: forcing the two princes for ſafegard of their liues to fly, the one to Mantinia, and the other into the ſtrong city of Epidaurus, now called Raguſium. The poor Princes deſtitute of ſuch aid as they expected, and altogether vnable to withſtand the power of the mighty Tyrant, began to ſue for peace: which he, hauing now ſpoiled their Country, granted, vpon condition, that all ſuch places as he had already taken, ſhould be ſtill his own; and alſo, that the city of Patras, with the Country adioyning, ſhould be deliuered vnto him; and that for the reſt the ſaid princes ſhould pay vnto him a yearly tribute. Which hard conditions the poor princes, now in danger to loſe all, were glad to accept of; wherupon a peace was for that time againe concluded.

In his return hee took the City of Athens in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciavol by compoſition (by means of Omares the ſon of Turachan one of his great captains) promiſing to giue him the country of Beotia with the city of Thebes in lieu therof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius ſomtime prince of Athens, and had of long time bin brought vp in the Turks court, as one of Mahomets minions, and was of him (as was ſuppoſed) intirely beloued. But when he had receiued the dukedom of Thebes in exchange for his princely ſtate of Athens, he was ſhortly after, as if it had bin in great friendſhip, ſent by Mahomet to Zoganus his Lieutenant in Peloponeſus: by whom he was at firſt curteouſly entertained; but afterwards being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) ſuddenly ſtayed, and when he leaſt feared, cruelly murthered.

Mahomet commeth again into Peloponeſſus

About 3 yeares after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet and the two brethren, Mahomet perceiuing that the Chriſtian kings and princes had combined themſelues againſt him, with a purpoſe to driue him out of Grecia; thought it now high time, and much for the aſſurance of his eſtate, to root out the ſmal reliques of the Grecian Empire which yet remained in Peloponeſus in the aforeſaid two Princes of the Imperiall bloud, Thomas and Demetrius: wherunto hee ſaw a fair occaſion preſented; foraſmuch as thoſe two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themſelues, neither payd him ſuch tribut as they had before promiſed. Herupon he with a ſtrong army came to Corinth, where Arſanes a nobleman of great authority and power in that country, whoſe ſiſter Demetrius had maried, came to him from

A from the prince his brother in law, attended vpon with many gallant Gentlemen his followers, of purpoſe to aid him againſt the other Prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harm to haue bin by the Turk intended againſt himſelfe or his brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned as their friend. But when Mahomet was entred into Peloponeſus, and come to Tegea, he cauſed the ſaid Arſanes with all his chiefeſt followers to be laid hold vpon and caſt into bonds; knowing (as it ſeemed) no man for friend which might any way hinder his ambitious deſignes.

Demetrius ſubmits himſelf to Mahomet.

Demetrius hearing what was hapned to Arſanes, fled to Sparta, now called Mizithra; whither Mahomet in few days after came & laid ſiege to the city. But the poor prince conſidering that he muſt needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the City, and humbly ſubmitted B himſelf with all that he had into his power. Which ſo wel pleaſed the Turkiſh tyrant, that he curteouſly receiued him, comforted him, and promiſed in ſtead of Sparta to giue him other lands and poſſeſſions of like value elſwhere: neuertheles he committed him to ſafe cuſtodie, and caried him about with him as his priſoner, vntil he had finiſhed thoſe wars. After he had taken Sparta, he beſieged Caſtria, where he loſt diuers of his Ianizaries; for which cauſe when he had taken the City, hee put all the ſouldiers therin to the ſword, and cut all the Captaines ouerthwart in two pieces. From thence he marched to Leontarium, called in antient time Megalopolis, which he took, with another city called Cardicea, whither they of Leontarium had before conueyed their wiues and children as vnto a place of more ſafety. There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of thoſe Cities, men, women, and children, in number about C ſix thouſand, of whom he left not one aliue: and yet not ſo ſatisfied, he commanded the very beaſts and cattel of thoſe places to be killed. Many cities of Peloponeſus, terrified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours, forthwith yeelded themſelues; and amongſt others, Salvarium a great and ſtrong city of Arcadia, where he cauſed all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the number of ten thouſand, to be caſt into bonds, looking for nothing but preſent death: all which he afterwards commanded to be ſent Captiues to Conſtantinople, and with them peopled the ſuburbs of that City. After that, he by the counſel of Demetrius ſent one of his Captains called Ioſua, with certain companies of Greek ſoldiers, vnto the ſtrong city of Epidaurus, to command him in the name of the prince to deliuer vnto him the city, with the princes wife and daughter, which lay there. But the Gouernor truſting vnto the D ſtrength of the city, refuſed to deliuer the ſame; yet ſuffering the Princeſſe and her daughter to depart out of the city, being willing to go to her husband; whom the Captain hauing receiued, returned, and preſented them vnto Mahomet: by whoſe commandement they were ſent into Beotia, there to attend his return to Conſtantinople; and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the yong Lady, who had ſo warmed Mahomets affection, that he took her afterwards to his wife.

At this time he alſo ſubdued the moſt part of Achaia and Elis, by Zoganus Baſſa his lieutenant: whither he came not long after himſelf, and laid ſiege to the city Salmenica, which for lack of water was at length yeelded vnto him: but the caſtle was by the ſpace of a whole year after valiantly defended againſt the Turks left to beſiege it, by Prince Thomas; of whom E Mahomet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the country of Peloponeſus he had found many ſlaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant Prince ſeeing the miſerable ruine of his country, and the ſtate therof vtterly forlorn; after he had moſt notably indured a yeares ſiege in the caſtle of Salmenica, got to ſea, and ſo arriued in Italy. Where trauelling to Rome, hee was honorably receiued by Pius ſecundus, then Biſhop there; who during his life allowed him a large penſion for the maintenance of his ſtate. Thus Mahomet hauing thruſt both the Grecian princes out of their dominions, and ſubdued al Peloponeſus (excepting ſuch ſtrong towns and caſtles as bordering vpon the ſea coaſt, were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Baſſa his lieutenant to gouern that new conquered prouince, himſelf returning with great triumph to Conſtantinople, carying with him Prince Demetrius, with his wife & daughter, and F many other noble priſoners. But after he was come to Hadrianople and placed in the Royall ſeat, he remoued the Eunuch from the fair yong lady, and took charge of her himſelf. As for Demetrius her father, hee gaue to him the City of Ænum, with the Cuſtom ariſing of the ſalt there made, as a penſion for him to liue vpon. Thus this moſt famous and populous country of Peloponeſus fel into the Turkiſh thraldom about the year of our Lord 1460, ſeuen years after after the taking of Conſtantinople. Which I haue here together ſet downe, as it is reported by them who liued in that time, and in the ſame countries: omitting of purpoſe other great occurrents of the ſame time (which ſhall in conuenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great Empire, with the common miſery of the delicate Grecians, might appear vnder one view; which otherwiſe being deliuered by piece-meal, as it did concur with other great accidents, according to the courſe of the time, would but breed confuſion, and require the Readers great attention.

The Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially ſuch as bordered vpon the dominions of the Turkiſh tyrant, were no leſſe terrified than troubled with the ſuberſion of the Conſtantinopolitan empire: for they ſaw by the continuall preparations of the Turk, that his ambitious deſires were rather increaſed, than in any part ſatisfied with ſo great & late victories. Wherfore they with all carefulnes fortified their frontier towns, and prouided all things neceſſary for defence of themſelues, and for repulſing ſo mighty an enemy. Among the reſt, George the old Deſpot or Prince of Seruia (whoſe dominions of all other lay in moſt danger of that tempeſt) ſpeedily muſtred his men of war, fortified his ſtrong cities, placed his gariſons, and left nothing vndon that he thought needfull for defence of his Country: for hee had many times before to his great loſſe indured the fury of the Turkiſh Kings, although hee were joined to them in the bonds of neereſt allyance. And hauing thus politiquely ſet all things in order at home, in perſon himſelf took his journy into Hungary, from thence to craue aid againſt ſuch time as he ſhould haue need. But the Hungarians, eſpecially Huniades (who then bare greateſt ſway in that kingdom) hauing before had ſufficient trial of the vncertaintie and light faith of that aged prince, who had ſo often faſhioned himſelf according to the occurrents of the time, that he was accounted neither right Turk, nor right Chriſtian; refuſed to promiſe him any aid, but left him to his own fortunes: wherwith he returned diſcontented, and ful of indignation. But ſhortly after he was come home, he died of a hurt receiued in a skirmiſh with Michael Zilago, gouernor of Belgrade; whoſe brother Ladiſlaus he had but a little before trecherouſly murdered, as he was trauelling by wagon to Belgrade with his ſaid brother Michael, who at the ſame time hardly eſcaped. This was the end of the Deſpot of Seruia, when he had liued 90 years; in which time of his long life he had plentifully taſted of both fortunes. A man aſſuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous vnquiet nature: by profeſſion a Chriſtian, yet a great friend vnto the Turks, whom he many times ſtood in great ſtead: a deep diſſembler, and double in all his dealings; wherby he purchaſed that credit, that he was not of any of his neighbor Princes whilſt he liued, either loued or truſted; and after his death of his ſubiects ſo deteſted, that the people of that country euen at this day in their Country ſongs ſtil term him the faithles and graceles deſpot. Lazarus his yongeſt ſon ſucceeded after him, hauing depriued both his elder brethren Stephen and George of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkiſh King had put out their eies long before, of purpoſe to make them vnfit for the gouernment of ſo great a country: yet theſe blind princes found means to fly away from him to Mahomet, carying with them a great maſſe of mony; and ſo incited him againſt Lazarus their brother, that to keep friendſhip with the tyrant, he was glad to promiſe him a great yearly tribute. But within a few moneths after, Lazarus died, the laſt Chriſtian prince that reigned in Seruia. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe in Seruia for the ſoueraignty; the blind brethren ſtill crauing aid of Mahomet, with whom they then liued: and the deſolat Widow of Lazarus, puting her ſelfe with her three ſons, Iohn, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians; by which means with much trouble ſhe held her ſtate for a ſeaſon: vntil ſuch time as that the Seruians, ſeeing ſmall aſſurance in that kind of gouernment, and weary of the harms they daily receiued from the Turks, yeelded themſelues with their country vnto the obedience of the Turkiſh Sultan Mahomet, who for euer vnited the ſame vnto his empire as a prouince therof, and ſo it remaines at this day.

The death of George Deſpot of Seruia.

Seruia yeelded to the Turks.

Now was Mahomet by the continual courſe of his victories grown to that height of minde, that he thought no prince able to abide his force, neither any enterpriſe ſo great, which hee was not of power to bring to paſſe: wherfore he ceaſed not on euery ſide continually to vex and trouble the princes whoſe countries bordered vpon his. But aboue others, his heart ſwelled moſt againſt the Hungarians, for that by them his Aunceſtors had been more troubled, and their ſtate more indangered, than by any or all other the Chriſtian Princes. Wherefore

A fore he reſolued now to take them in hand, which thing hee had from the beginning of his reign greatly deſired. And becauſe the city of Belgrade, ſtanding vpon the great riuer of Danubius, was accounted the key of that country, he determined there to begin his wars, and by taking therof to make an entrance into the heart of Hungary. Herupon he leuied a great army of 150000 of his beſt ſouldiers; in whom hee repoſed ſuch aſſured truſt and confidence, that he accounted the city already as good as taken, and a faire way made into Hungary. So ready are we to promiſe to our ſelues the things we earneſtly deſire. For the better accompliſhment of theſe his deſignes, he had prouided in readines a fleet of 200 ſhips and gallies, which he ſent vp the riuer of Danubius, from Vidina to Belgrade, to the intent that no reliefe or aid ſhould be brought vnto the city out of Hungary, by the great riuers of Danubius and B Sauus, wherupon the city of Belgrade ſtandeth. With this fleet he kept both thoſe riuers ſo ſtreitly, that nothing could be poſſibly conueyed into the city by water: and not ſo contented, ſent part of his ſaid fleet farther vp the riuer of Danubius, and ſo landing his ſouldiers in many places, ſpoiled the countries all alongſt the riuer ſide. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, and incamped before the city: wherunto at his firſt comming hee gaue a moſt fierce aſſault, thinking to haue taken them vnprouided. But finding greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined, & that the Hungarians were ready to skirmiſh with them without the walls, he began to proceed more warily, and intrenched his Army, and to prouide for the ſafety therof, by caſting vp of deep trenches and ſtrong rampiers againſt the ſudden ſallies of his enemies: and after, planting his battery, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the Walls C with his great Artillery. By the fury wherof he ouerthrew a part therof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great induſtry and labor ſpeedily repaired, by caſting vp of new fortifications and rampiers, in ſuch ſort as it was rather ſtronger than before.

Belgrade beſieged by the Turks.

In the mean time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a moſt worthy Captain) being then Generall for the Hungarians, ſent a fleet of ſhips and gallies well appointed with all warlike prouiſion, down the riuer Danubius from Buda, which incountring with the Turks fleet, took 20 ſail of them, and ſo diſcomfited the reſt, that they were glad to run themſelues aground neer vnto the Kings camp. All which were by Mahomets commandment preſently ſet on fire, becauſe they ſhould not come into the power of the Hungarians. By this means the Chriſtians became maſters of both the riuers Danubius and Sauus, and ſo at their D pleaſure by water conueyed all things into the City, needfull for the defence therof. Huniades alſo himſelf with fiue thouſand valiant ſouldiers, and Io. Capiſtranus a Minorit Frier (by whoſe perſuaſion forty thouſand voluntary Chriſtians out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, were come to that War) entred into the City that way with their ſouldiers and Followers.

The Turks fleet ouerthrown by the Chriſtians.

Mahomet reſolutely ſet down for the winning of the City, had with continuall batterie made the ſame at length ſaultable; and ſo determined the next day to giue a generall aſſault, appointing which part of the wal euery Colonel with his regiment ſhould aſſail. But as they were with great diligence and greater ſtir preparing all things needful for the next daies ſeruice, it fortuned that Carazias Baſſa, Mahomets Lieutenant General in Europ, and his beſt man E of war, was by chance ſlain with a great ſhot out of the town. With whoſe death Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the euil which afterward inſued vnto him and his whole army. For all that, proſecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the aſſault to be giuen, and with the dreadfull ſound of Trumpets, drums, cornets, and other inſtruments of war, brought on the Ianizaries to the breach; who as couragious ſoldiers fiercely aſſailed the ſame, and without any great reſiſtance entred both there and in diuers other places of the City, reckoning the ſame to be now their owne. For Huniades hauing before ſtored euery corner of the City with his moſt valiant and expert ſoldiers, had taken order, that the defendants vpon the firſt charge of the Ianizaries ſhould forſake their ſtations, and as men diſcouraged retyre toward the City, of purpoſe to draw the F fierce enemies faſter on to their greater deſtruction; and vpon a ſign giuen to ſet vpon them afreſh, and to repair to their former places of defence: which was accordingly done, ſo that as ſoon as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turks moſt forward ſouldiers, were in great numbers entred, vpon the retyring of the defendants, & the ſign before appointed in the city giuen, the defendants, as men quickly changd, turning again, fiercely charged the Turks which were en-tred contrary to their expectation : and the valiant Huniades, at the ſame time iſſuing out on euery ſide with his moſt reſolute ſouldiers, ſo oppreſſed the Turks, that few of them that were entred eſcaped with life, but were there in the city either ſlaine or taken priſoners ; and the reſt with exceeding ſlaughter beaten from the wals. Preſently after, Huniades in this confuſion of the Turks, ſtrengthened with the ſouldiers that came with Capiſtranus the Friar, made a ſally out of the towne, and ſet vpon the Turks appointed for the defence of the great ordnance ; which was with ſuch reſolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great ſlaughter to forſake their charge, and to leaue the ordnance to their enemies.

The Turkiſh tyrant ſore troubled and thorowly chafed with the loſſe of his great ordnance, couragiouſly charged the Hungarians afreſh, to haue recouered the ſame againe : but was ſo valiantly repulſed by Huniades, and ſo beaten with the murthering ſhot out of the city, that he was glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades alſo retiring turned the ordnance he had lately won, vpon the Turks campe, and with the ſame did them no ſmall harme.

In this hurle, a great part of the Chriſtian army (which then lay on the other ſide of Danubius) was ſpeedily tranſported ouer the riuer ; and making no ſtay in the city, ioyned themſelues with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the city. Who notably ſtrengthned with this new ſupply, aſſailed the Turks trenches, as if he would euen preſently haue entred their Camp. At which his preſumption the proud Tyrant (neuer before ſo braued) diſdaining, went out of his trenches, & valiantly incountring him, beat him back again to the great ordnance ; from whence he was again by the Chriſtians driuen to his trenches. Which manner of doubtfull and dreadfull fight was on both ſides notably maintained vntill the day was almoſt ſpent : Victory with indifferent wings houering ſomtime ouer one ſide, ſomtime ouer the other.

Mahomet beeing wounded, is caried away for dead.

In theſe hot skirmiſhes and conflicts, Chaſanes captain of the Ianizaries, with many other valiant men were ſlain. And Mahomet himſelfe performing the part as well of a couragious ſoldier, as of a worthy chieftain, was ſo ſore wounded vnder his left pap, that hee was taken vp for dead, and carried into his pauilion, to the great diſcomfort of his whole army. But comming again vnto himſelfe, and conſidering that he had in that ſiege loſt his whole fleet, his great ordnance, with moſt part of his beſt ſoldiers, & yet in no poſſibility of the town, ſecretly in the night aroſe with his army, and in great ſilence ſhamefully departed ; ſtil looking behind him when the Hungarians ſhould haue purſued him into Servia, or haue troubled him vpon his way toward Conſtantinople. At this ſiege (beſides many of his beſt Captaines and chief commanders) were ſlain 40000 of his beſt ſoldiers. The loſſe he there ſuſtained was ſo great, & ſo ſtuck in his mind, that euer after during his life, when he had occaſion to ſpeak of that ſiege, he would ſhake his head and ſigh deeply, & many times wiſh that he had neuer ſeen that city, wherat both he and his father had receiued ſo great diſhonour. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horſemen on that ſide of Danubius, to haue preſently purſued the fearfull enemy, that the whole Army of the Turks might haue there beene ouerthrown. This notable victory was obtained againſt the Turk the ſixt of Auguſt, Anno Dom. 1456.

The death of the moſt famous Captaine Huniades.

Shortly after, this moſt valiant and renowned captain Huniades, worthy of immortal praiſe, died of a hurt taken in theſe wars ; or as ſome others write, of the plague, which was then rife in Hungary : who when he felt himſelfe in danger of death, deſired to receiue the Sacrament before his departure, and would in any caſe (ſick as he was) bee carried to the Church to receiue the ſame ; ſaying, It is not fit that the Lord ſhould come to the houſe of his ſeruant, but the ſeruant rather to go to the houſe of his Lord and maſter. He was the firſt Chriſtian captain that ſhewed the Turks were to be ouercome ; and obtained more great victories againſt them than any one of the Chriſtian Princes before him. Hee was to that barbarous people a great terror, and with the ſpoil of them inriched his country : and now dying, was by the Hungarians honorably buried at Alba Iulia, in S. Stephens Church. His death was greatly lamented of all good men of that age.

Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor, no leſſe deſirous to extend his Empire with the glory of his name, by ſea than by land ; ſhortly after the taking of Conſtantinople put a great fleet to ſea, wherwith he ſurpriſed diuers Iſlands in the Ægeum, and hardly beſieged the City of the Rhodes.

A Rhodes. At which time Calixtus the third then Biſhop of Rome, aided by the Genoa's (for the grudge they bare againſt the Turkes for the taking of Pera) put to ſea a fleet of 16 tall ſhips and gallies well appointed, vnder the conduct of Lodovicus Patriarch of Aquilea, who therwith ſcoured the ſeas, and recouered again from the Turks the Iſland of Lemnos, with diuers other ſmal Iſlands therabout, and incountring with the Turks fleet neer vnto the Iſland of Rhodes, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paul; diſcomfited them, ſunk and took diuers of their gallies, and forced them to forſake the Rhodes. After which victory at ſea, he for the ſpace of three years, with his gallies at his pleaſure ſpoiled the frontiers of the Turks dominions all alongſt the ſea coaſt of the leſſer Aſia, and wonderfully terrified the effeminat people of thoſe countries; and ſo at length returned home, carrying with him many priſoners B and much rich ſpoil.

After that Mahomet was thus ſhamefully driuen from the ſiege of Belgrade, and his fleet at ſea diſcomfited (as is before declared) hee began with great diligence to make new preparations againſt the next ſpring, to ſubdue the Iſles of the Ægeum, eſpecially thoſe which lay neer vnto Peloponeſus. But whilſt he was buſie in thoſe cogitations, in the mean time Embaſſadors from Vſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian King arriued at Conſtantinople, with diuers rich preſents ſent to him from the ſaid King. Where among other things they preſented to him a pair of playing tables, wherin the men and dice were of great and rich pretious ſtones of ineſtimable worth, and the workmanſhip nothing inferior to the matter: which the Embaſſadors for oſtentation ſaid that Vſun Caſſanes found in the treaſures of the Perſian King, whom C he had but a little before ſlain and bereft of his kingdom, and had there bin left long before by the mighty conqueror Tamerlane. Together with theſe preſents they deliuered their Embaſſage, the effect wherof was, That thoſe two mighty princes might join and liue together in amity. And that wheras David the Emperor of Trapezond had promiſed to pay vnto Mahomet a yearly tribute, inforced therunto by George his Lieutenant in Aſia; he ſhould not now look for any ſuch thing, foraſmuch as that empire after the death of the emperor then liuing, ſhould of right belong vnto Vſun-Caſſanes in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Calo-Ioannes the elder brother of David the Emperor, then liuing: and further required him from that time not to trouble or moleſt the ſaid Emperour his friend and neer allyance; ſo ſhould he find him his faithful and kind confederat: otherwiſe it was (as they ſaid) in his choice, to D draw vpon himſelf the heauy diſpleaſure of a moſt mighty enemy. Mahomet before enuying at the riſing of the Perſian King, and now diſdaining ſuch peremptory requeſts, little differing from proud commands, in great choler diſmiſt the embaſſadours with this ſhort anſwer, That hee would ere long himſelfe bee in Aſia, to teach Vſun-Caſſanes what to requeſt of one greater than himſelf. This vnkindnes was the beginning and ground of the mortall Warres which afterwards inſued betwixt theſe two, then the greateſt Princes of the Eaſt, as ſhall bee hereafter more at large declared. The Embaſſadors being departed, and Mahomet his fleet of 150 ſail ready to put to ſea, he altred his former determination for the Iſlands of the Ægeum (which after the loſſe of Conſtantinople had for the moſt part put themſelues vnder the protection of the Venetians) and commanded his admiral with that fleet to take his courſe E thorow the ſtreits of Boſphorus into the great Euxine ſea (now called the Black ſea; and ſo ſailing along the coaſt, to come to anchor before Sinope, the chief city of Paphlagonia, there to expect his comming thither with his army by land. This great city of Sinope ſtands pleaſantly vpon a point of the main which runs a great way into the Euxine, ſomtime the metropolitical city of that prouince; but as then, with Caſtamona, and all the Country therabout, was vnder the gouernment of Iſmael a Mahometan prince, vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for no other cauſe than that he was in league with Vſun-Caſſanus the Perſian King. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a ſtrong army, and paſſing therwith ouer into Aſia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. Iſmael ſeeing himſelf ſo ſuddenly beſet both by ſea & land in his ſtrongeſt city, although he wanted nothing needful for his defence, F hauing in his city four hundred pieces of great artillery, and ten thouſand ſoldiers; yet doubting to be able with that ſtrength to endure the ſiege, offred to yeeld vp the city to Mahomet, with all the reſt of his Dominion, vpon condition that hee ſhould freely giue him in lieu thereof the City of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the Country thereunto adjoyning. Of which his offer Mahomet accepted: and ſo taking poſſeſſion of Sinope, with the ſtrong city of Caſtamona, mona, and all the reſt of the princes territory, ſent him away with all his things to Philippopolis, as he had promiſed. This Iſmael was the laſt of the honourable houſe of the Iſfendiars, who had long time reigned in Heraclea and Caſtamona in Pontus. From Sinope he marched on forward with his army to Trapezond. This famous city ſtandeth alſo vpon the ſide of the Euxine or black ſea in the country of Pontus, where the Emperors of Conſtantinople had alwaies their deputies, whilſt that empire flouriſhed & commanded the Eaſt part of the world as far as Parthia: but after it began again to decline (as all worldly things haue but their time) one Iſaac (whoſe father Emperor of Conſtantinople, the Conſtantinopolitans had for his euill gouernment ſlain) flying to Trapezond, took vpon him the gouernment of that city, with the Countries of Pontus and Cappadocia, with many other great prouinces, and was at the firſt called the King of Trapezond: but after hee was well eſtabliſhed in the gouernment, both he and his ſucceſſors took vpon them the name and title of emperors, which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, and therfore are of moſt accounted for Emperors. He that then reigned was called Dauid Comnenus; which moſt honorable family of the Comneni had long time before reigned in Conſtantinople; and out of the ſame were many other great princes deſcended, who ruled in diuers places of Macedonia, Epirus, and Grecia. Mahomet comming to Trapezond, layd hard ſiege vnto the ſame both by ſea and land for the ſpace of 30 daies, and burnt the ſuburbs therof, as he had before at Sinope. The fearfull Emperor diſmaied with the preſence of ſo mighty an enemy, & the ſight of ſo puiſſant an army, offered to yeeld vnto him the city with his whole empire, vpon condition that hee ſhould take his daughter to wife, and deliuer vnto him ſome other prouince which might yeeld vnto him ſuch yearely profit as might ſuffice for the honorable maintenance of his ſtate. Mahomet perceiuing the weaknes of his enemy by his large offers, refuſed to accept therof, and attempted by force to haue taken the city; which not ſorting to his deſire, the matter was again brought to parly: where after long debating to and fro, it was at laſt agreed vpon, That the Emperor vpon the faith of the Turkiſh King for his ſafe return, ſhould in perſon meet him without the city, if haply ſo ſome good attonement might bee made betwixt them. Wherupon the Emperor following the Turks faith before ſolemnly giuen for his ſafe return, as was before agreed, went out of the City to meet him, in hope to haue made ſome good agreement with him. But as ſoon as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and helliſh doctrine of his falſe prophet (That faith is not to be kept with Chriſtians) preſently cauſed the Emperour to be caſt into bonds, and ſo to be detained as priſoner. Which when it was bruted in the city, the citiſens vtterly diſcouraged, without further reſiſtance yeelded themſelues with the city into his power.

Trapezond beſieged by Mahomet.

Trapezond yeelded to the Turks.

Mahomet now Lord of Trapezond, entring the city, took priſoners the Emperors daughter, with all the reſt of his children and kindred, and all ſuch of the Nobility as he found within the city; whom he cauſed forthwith together with the Emperour, to be ſent by ſea as it were in triumph to Conſtantinople. Of the reſt of the citiſens he choſe out ſo many as he pleaſed for his own ſeruice; and appointed eight hundred of the Chriſtian children, in whom appeared moſt towardlines, to be brought vp for Ianizaries: many alſo of the other Citiſens were ſent Captiues to Conſtantinople: the beautiful women and virgins he diuided amongſt his friends and men of war, certain choſen paragons of whom he ſent as preſents to his ſons. After he had thus taken his pleaſure in the city, and left none there but the baſeſt of the people, he put a ſtrong gariſon of his Ianizaries into the caſtle, and a great gariſon of common ſoldiers into the city, appointing his Admiral to gouern the ſame. The reſt of the emperors ſtrong Towns, diſcouraged with the taking of Trapezond, and the miſeries therof, in ſhort time ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turkiſh thraldom, wherin they haue euer ſince moſt miſerably liued. So Mahomet in the ſpace of a few months hauing reduced that empire into the form of a prouince, returned in great triumph to Conſtantinople; when hee had in this expedition ſubdued Paphlagonia, Pontus, and a great part of Capadocia, with ſome other prouinces neer vnto the Euxine ſea. When he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſent the Emperor with his children priſoners to Hadrianople. But afterwards vnderſtanding that the Perſian Queene, the wife of Vſun-Caſſan, ſought means to get ſome one of her vncles children, whom by the power of her husband ſhe might, if it were poſſible, aduance vnto her fathers empire; hee ſent for Dauid the wofull Emperour to Conſtantinople, and there cruelly cauſed him, with all

A all his ſonnes and kinſmen, to be put to death; and to the vttermoſt of his power rooted out all that moſt honourable family of the Comneni, excepting George the Emperors youngeſt ſonne, who at his firſt comming to Hadrianople turned Turke: whoſe ſiſter (the emperors daughter) Mahomet afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Chriſtian empire was by the Turkiſh tyrant Mahomet thus miſerably ſubuerted and brought to nought in the yeare of our Lord 1461.

The ruine of the empire of Trapezond.

The yeare following, which was the yeare 1462, Mahomet hauing intelligence, that Wladus Dracula, Prince of Valachia, his tributary, was reſolued to caſt from him his obedience, and to ioyne himſelfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it beſt to proue if he could by policy circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpoſe he B ſent Catobolinus his principall ſecretary vnto him to bring him vnto the court, promiſing him greater fauors and promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time inioyed: and by the ſame truſty meſſenger, he commanded Chamuzes Baſſa, Gouernour of Bidina and the country lying ouer againſt Valachia, on the other ſide of Danubius, to do his vttermoſt deuoir for the entrapping of Wladus: promiſing him great rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deuiſed with the ſecretary, that when he had done his meſſage to the Prince, and with all his cunning perſuaded him to take that iourney vpon him, he ſhould ſecretly before hand giue notice vnto him of the certain day of his returne backe againe from the Prince: at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courteſie of himſelfe bring the ſecretaire well on his way, being a man of ſo great acount in the court, or at leſtwiſe not refuſe ſo to do, being therto requeſted by the ſecretary: at which time the Baſſa ſecretly paſſing ouer C Danubius with certaine troups of horſemen, and lying cloſe in ambuſh vpon the way, ſhould ſuddenly ſet vpon the Prince, and ſo either take him, or elſe kill him. The plot thus laid, and euery circumſtance agreed vpon, the ſecretary held on his way; and comming to the Prince, forced his wit to perſuade him to go to the court: ſomtime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelity & valor; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of great honors and princely preferments he was to receiue at the Emperors hands. But when he had ſaid what he could, he obtained no more of the wary Prince, but good words again, and that he would in courteſie conduct him on his way to the ſide of Danubius: whereof the ſecretary by ſpeedy meſſengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence: who ſecretly paſſing ouer Danu- D bius with certain troups of horſmen, and riding a good way into the countrey, lay in ambuſh vpon the way whereby the Prince and the ſecretary muſt needs paſſe: according as was before appointed, the ſecretary accompanied with the Prince, put himſelfe vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambuſh with his horſemen: who ſuddenly ariſing, & on euery ſide aſſailing the Prince, ſlew diuers of his men before they were well aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baſſa had ſuppoſed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a ſtrong gard of valiant and ſtout men) ſo receiued Chamuzes and his Turkes, that he ſlew many of them, and at length after a hard conflict took him with the reſt priſoners: whoſe hands and feet he cauſed to be cut off, and their bodies afterwards to be thruſt vpon ſharp ſtakes ſet faſt in the ground, to the E terror of all that ſaw them: and did the Baſſa ſo much honor as to hang him and the ſecretary vpon a gibbet a great deale higher than the other Turks. And not ſatisfied with this reuenge, preſently gathered his forces, and paſſing ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, burnt all the country before him along the ſea ſide, killing man, woman, and child, without mercy: after which great ſpoyle & ſlaughter made, he returned again to Valachia. The report of this news being brought to Mahomet, ſet him in ſuch a choler and rage, that he commanded the great Baſſa Mahomet, which firſt told him thereof, to be cruelly whipt: which ſeruile puniſhment in that tyrannicall gouernment hath vſually bin inflicted euen vpon the greateſt Princes of the court, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the tyrants, eſpecially if they be not naturall Turks born; accounting the reſt in their anger but as their baſe and contemptible ſlaues, as well appeareth F by the wofull end of many, euen of the greateſt of them. But when he vnderſtood by moſt ſure aduertiſements that all was as the Baſſa had before reported, or rather worſe, it is not to be in words expreſſed into what a rage he fell: the ſpoyle of his country grieued him much, but the ſhamefull death of the ſecretary his Embaſſador, and of Chamuzes the Baſſa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation & deſire of reuenge. Wherſore with all ſpeed poſſible he

he aſſembled his ſoldiers and men of war, out of all parts of his dominions to Philippopolis; G and had in ſhort time raiſed ſuch an army, as the like he had not at any time imployed ſince the winning of Conſtantinople. At the ſame time alſo, he ſent his Admirall with 25 gallies, and 150 ſaile of other ſmall veſſels by the Euxine, to enter the riuer Danubius, and there landing his men, to ioine his forces with the prince of Podolia: who for a grudge he bare againſt Wladus, had promiſed to ayd the Turke againſt him. When all things were now in readines, he marched with his army from Philippopolis, and paſſing ouer Danubius, entred into Valachia; before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the help of the Podolian, had burnt the city of Prailaba, the greateſt towne of trade in all Valachia; and was beſieging Cebium, called in antient time Lycoſtomos: where after they had lien a while and receiued ſome loſſe, they left the ſiege and departed, the Podolian backe againe into his countrey, and H the Admirall to his fleet.

Mahomet himſelfe in perſon inuadeth Valachia.

Mahomet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made hauocke of all that came in his way. As for priſoners, he tooke but few; for the Valachies before his comming, had retired their wiues and children, and all that were vnfit for wars; either into their ſtrong cities, or into the refuge of great and thick woods (whereof there is in that countrey plenty) or elſe into the high and rough mountaines where they were in more ſafety than in any their ſtrongeſt holds: and all ſuch as were able to beare armes, followed the Prince, who euer kept the woods and mountaines, ſtill following the Turks army ſo neere as he poſſibly could with ſafety; and many times cut off ſuch as ſtragled any thing far abroad from the army, into the country: yet neuer durſt ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull I in compariſon of the Turks multitude. Mahomet to ſmall purpoſe roaming vp and downe the country at his pleaſure, ſtaid neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of ſuch a weak enemy as durſt neuer ſhew himſelfe, pitcht his tents ſtill in the open plaines, and ſo lay with his army in great ſecurity, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his eſpials vnderſtanding of this the manner of Mahomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, & with all his power furiouſly aſſailed that quarter of the Turks camp where the Aſian ſoldiers lay, and ſlew many of them in their tents; the reſt terrified with the ſuddenneſſe of the Alarum, fled out of their tents for refuge vnto the Europeian ſouldiers: the Prince following them at the heeles, and entring into that quarter of the camp alſo, did there great harme, and ſtruck ſuch a generall terror and feare into all the Turks army, that they were euen vpon the point to haue wholly forſaken K their tents and betaken themſelues to flight. Yea Mahomet himſelfe, diſmaid with the terror of the night and tumult of his camp, and fearing leſt the Hungarians had ioyned their forces with the Prince; not knowing which way to turne himſelfe, had vndoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Baſſa, a man of great experience in martiall affairs, perſuading him otherwiſe, and by generall proclamation made through the camp, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death, forſake the place wherin he was encamped, ſtaid the flight; and with much ado enforced them to make head againſt the prince. Wladus perceiuing the Turks now to begin to ſtand vpon their guard, and to make reſiſtance; after great ſlaughter made, returning, tooke the ſpoyle of the tents forſaken by the Aſian ſouldiers, and vpon the approch of the day, again retired with victory into the woods. As ſoon as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certaine companies L of ſelect ſouldiers, to purſue the Valachies: who ouertaking part of the Princes army, tooke a thouſand of them priſoners, and put the reſt to flight: all which priſoners were by the tyrants command, preſently put to the ſword. From that time Mahomet euery night entrenched his army, and cauſed better watch and ward to be kept in euery quarter of his camp, than before.

A moſt horrible ſpectacle.

As he marched along the country, he came to the place where the Baſſa and the Secretary were hanging vpon two high gibbets, and the diſmembred Turks, impailed vpon ſtakes about them: with which ſight he was grieuouſly offended. And paſſing on farther, came to a plaine containing in bredth almoſt a mile, & in length two miles, ſet ful of gallows, gibbets, wheels, ſtakes, and other inſtruments of terror, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carkaſes M of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twenty thouſand. There was to be ſeen the father, with his wife, children, and whole family, hanging together vpon one gallowes; and the bodies of ſucking babes, ſticking vpon ſharp ſtakes; others with all their limbs broken vpon wheels, with many other ſtrange & horrible kinds of

A death : ſo that a man would haue thought, that all the torments the Poets feigne to be in hel, had bin there put in execution. All theſe were ſuch as the notable, but cruell prince, iealous of his eſtate, had either for iuſt deſert, or ſome probable ſuſpition, put to death ; and with their goods rewarded his ſouldiers: whoſe cruel manner was, together with the offender to execute the whole family, yea ſometimes the whole kindred. Mahomet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell diſpoſition, wondred to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſpectacle of extreme cruelty: yet ſaid no more but that Wladus knew how to haue his ſubiects at command. After that, Mahomet ſent Ioſephus, one of his greateſt Captaines, to skirmiſh with the Valachies, who was by them put to the worſe: but by the comming in of Omares the ſon of Turachan, they were againe in a great skirmiſh ouerthrowne, and two thouſand of their heads brought by the Turks vpon B their launces into the Kings camp : for which good ſeruice Omares was by the King preferred to be Gouernour of Theſſalia.

Two thouſand of the Valachies ſlaine.

When Mahomet had thus traced Valachia, and hauing done what harme he could, ſaw it to be to no purpoſe, with ſuch a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemy, which ſtil kept the thick woods or rough mountaines: he returned againe to Conſtantinople, leauing behind him Haly-Beg with part of his army, to proſecute that war : and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was alſo called Wladus, as a ſtale to draw the Valachies into rebellion againſt the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought vp in Mahomets court, and for his comely feature of him moſt paſſionatly affected: which inordinat perturbation ſo preuailed in the intemperat nature of the laſciuious prince, that he ſought firſt by fair C words and great gifts to corrupt the youth ; and not ſo preuailing, attempted at laſt to haue forced him ; wherewith the noble youth being inraged, drew his rapier, and ſtriking at him to haue ſlain him, grieuouſly wounded him in the thigh, and therupon fled. Neuertheleſſe being drawne backe againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and ſo became his Ganimede ; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honored, and now ſet vp for a ſtale (as is beforeſaid) for the Valachies his countrymen to gaze vpon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the king, diuers Valachies came to Haly-Beg the Turkiſh Generall, to ranſome ſuch friends of theirs as had bin taken priſoners in thoſe wars, and were yet by him detained ; to whom the younger Dracula by way of diſcourſe declaring the great power of the Turkiſh Emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endles D miſeries of his natiue countrey, cunningly imputed the ſame vnto the diſordred gouernment of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes : aſſuring them of moſt happy and ſpeedy redreſſe, if the Valachies, forſaking his fierce brother, would cleaue to him as their ſoueraigne, in ſpeciall fauour with the great Emperour. Which ſpeech he deliuered vnto them with ſuch liuely reaſons, and in ſuch effectuall termes, that they there preſent, perſuaded by him, and others by them, in ſhort time all, as if it had been by a ſecret conſent, forſooke Wladus the elder brother, and choſe Dracula the younger brother to be their prince and ſoueraigne. Who ioyning vnto him the Turks forces, by the conſent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernment of that warlike countrey and people; yet holding the ſame as the Turkiſh tyrants vaſſaile, the readieſt way to infidelity. Wladus ſeeing himſelfe thus forſaken of al his ſubiects, and his E yonger brother poſſeſſed of his dominion, fled into Tranſiluania ; where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian king, apprehended and laid faſt in ſtreit priſon at Belgrade, for that he had without iuſt cauſe (as it was laid to his charge) moſt cruelly executed diuers Hungarians in Valachia: yet ſuch was his fortune, after ten yeares hard impriſonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battell againſt his antient enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of Valachia to Conſtantinople, ſent the ſame fleet which hee had vſed in his late warres, into the Ægeum, to take in ſuch Iſlands as being before vnder the Conſtantinopolitan empire, had vpon the loſſe of the city put themſelues vnder the protection of the Venetians ; but eſpecially the Iſle of Mitylene, called in antient time Lesbos: pretending that Nicholaus Cateluſius Prince thereof, did harbor the pyrats of Italy and other places ; and F alſo bought of them ſuch priſoners, and other booty, as they continually tooke from the Turkes at ſea, or alongſt the ſea coaſt, out of many places of his dominions : pretending alſo the chaſtiſing of the ſaid Prince, for that he had by treacherie ſlaine his eldeſt brother, and ſo vniuſtly taken vpon him the gouernment. His fleet thus ſet forward, hee himſelfe with a Mitylene beſieged.

Mitylene yeelded to the Turke.

ſmall army paſſed ouer into Aſia,and came by land to Poſſidium a city of Ionia ouer againſt G Mitylene. From whence he imbarked himſelfe ouer the narrow ſtreit,into the Iſland,where after he had once landed his army, he in ſhort time ouerran the whole Iſland, and miſerably ſpoyled the ſame,leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuity ; who ſhortly after were ſold at Conſtantinople like flocks of ſheepe,and from thence diſperſed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrey,and left nothing therein vnſpoyled,he beſieged the Prince in the city of Mitylene,whereof the Iſland now taketh name:and with his great ordnance continually battered the ſame by the ſpace of 27 dayes (in which time many ſharp aſſaults were alſo giuen by the Turks,whereby the defendants were greatly diminiſhed and waſted. The Prince perceiuing himſelfe not able long to hold out,offered to yeeld vp the city, with all the ſtrong holds in the Iſle, vpon condition that Mahomet ſhould therfore giue H vnto him ſome other prouince,of like value to the Iſland : which his offer Mahomet accepted, and by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe for performance of that he had promiſed. Whereupon the Prince came out of the city, and humbled himſelfe before him,excuſing himſelfe for the receiuing of the men of war(wherwith he was charged)as done for no other purpoſe, but that they ſhould forbeare to ſpoyle his owne country, much ſubiect to their fury:vtterly denying that he had at any time bought,or ſhared,any part of ſuch prizes as had by thoſe pyrats by ſea or land bin taken from the Turks. With which his excuſe, Mahomet ſeemed to be reaſonably well contented,and with good words cheered him vp:neuertheleſſe as ſoon as the city,with all the other ſtrong holds in the Iſle, were by the Princes meanes deliuered into his hands, he no longer made reckoning of his Turkiſh faith,but cruelly cauſed many of the chief citizens of I Mitylene to be put to death;and three hundred pyrats,whom he found in the city, to be cut in two peeces in the middle,ſo to die with more paine. And when he had placed conuenient gar-riſons in euery ſtrong hold in the Iſle,he returned to Conſtantinople,carrying away with him the Prince,and all the better ſort of the inhabitants of Mitylene,that were left aliue,together with all the wealth of that moſt rich and pleaſant Iſland, leauing it almoſt deſolate, none remaining therein more than his own garriſons,with a few of the poore and baſeſt people. Maho- met after he was arriued at Conſtantinople,caſt the Prince Nicholaus & Lucius his coſin(whoſe helpe he had before vſed in killing of his elder brother) into cloſe priſon : where they ſeeing themſelues euery houre in danger of their liues,to win fauor in the tyrants ſight,wickedly offered to renounce the Chriſtian Religion,and to turn Turks. Which Mahomet vnderſtanding, K cauſed them both to be richly aparrelled,and with great triumph to be circumciſed,and pre-ſently ſet at liberty:yet ſtill bearing in minde his old grudge,he ſhortly after,when they leaſt feared any ſuch matter,clapt them both faſt again in priſon,and there cauſed them to be moſt cruelly put to death. A iuſt reward for their bloudy murthers and Apoſtacy, who to gaine a little longer life, were content to forſake God.

1464 Shortly after it fortuned,that Stephen king of Boſna(in antient time called Mæſia Superior)who ſupported by the Turkiſh Emperor,had wrongfully obtained that kingdome againſt his owne brethren , refuſed now to pay ſuch yearely tribute as hee had before promiſed : for which cauſe Mahomet with a ſtrong army entred into Boſna , and layd ſiege vnto the City of Dorobiza : which when hee had with much adoe taken , he diuided the people thereof into L three parts ; one part whereof he gaue as ſlaues vnto his men of war, another part he ſent vnto Conſtantinople, and the third hee left to inhabit the City. From Dorobiza he marched to Iaziga,now called Iaica, the chiefe city of that kingdome,which after foure moneths ſiege was deliuered vnto him by compoſition:in this city he took the Kings brother and ſiſter, pri-ſoners, with moſt of the nobility of that kingdome, whom he ſent as it were in triumph vnto Conſtantinople. The other leſſer cities of Boſna following the example of the greater,yeelded themſelues alſo. But Mahomet vnderſtanding that the King of Boſna had retired himſelfe into the fartheſt part of his kingdom,ſent Mahometes his chief Baſſa with his Europeian ſoldi-ers to purſue him : wherein the Baſſa vſed ſuch diligence,that he had on euery ſide ſo incloſed him before he was aware,that he could by no means eſcape,which was before thought a thing M impoſſible. So the King for ſafegard of his life was faine to take the city of Clyſſa for his refuge : where he was ſo hardly laid to by the Baſſa , that ſeeing no other remedy, he offered to yeeld himſelf vpon the Baſſa's faithfull promiſe by oath confirmed,that he ſhould be honorably

A bly vſed, and not to receiue in his perſon any harme from the Turkiſh Emperor. Whereupon the Baſſaes oath to the ſame purpoſe was with great ſolemnity taken; and for the more aſſurance conceiued in writing, firmed by the Baſſa, and ſo deliuered to the king: which done, the king came out of the city and yeelded himſelfe. The Baſſa hauing thus taken the king priſoner, carried him about with him from place to place, and from city to city, vntill he had taken poſſeſſion of all the kingdome of Boſna, and ſo returning vnto his maſter, preſented vnto him the captiue king: who was not a little offended with him, for that he had vnto him ſo farre engaged his Turkiſh faith. But when the poore King thought to haue departed, not greatly fearing further harm, he was ſuddenly ſent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worſt, caried with him in his hand the writing wherin the Baſſaes oath for his ſafety was compriſed: B neuertheleſſe, the faithles tyrant, without any regard therof, or of his faith therein giuen, cauſed him preſently to be moſt cruelly put to death, or as ſome write to be ſlaine quicke. Thus was the Chriſtian kingdome of Boſna, ſubuerted by Mahomet in the yeare 1464: who after he had at his pleaſure diſpoſed thereof, & reduced it to the forme of a Prouince, to be (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Baſſaes; in great triumph returned to Conſtantinople, carrying away with him many a woful Chriſtian captiue, and the whole wealth of that kingdome.

Mahomet following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his reign by one or other of his great Baſſaes or expert captains ſtill maintained war againſt Scanderbeg the moſt valiant and fortunat King of Epirus: the greateſt part wherof, although it did in the courſe of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by peecemeale haue been C amongſt the ſame in their due time and place inſerted; yet I haue of purpoſe for diuers reaſons wholly reſerued them for this place: firſt, for that I would not interrupt the courſe of the hiſtory before rehearſed, with the particular accidents of this war: and then, for that the greateſt heat of this hereditary war, deliuered as it were from hand to hand, from the father to the ſon, hapned not long after this time, when as Mahomet hauing conquered the kingdom of Boſna, had ſurrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion; wherein he had reſpect alſo vnto the Readers eaſe, who may with greater pleaſure and content, and leſſe paines alſo, view the ſame together, than if it had bin diſperſedly ſcattered and intermedled with the other greater occurrents of the ſame time. In which diſcourſe I will but briefly touch many things well worthy of a larger treatiſe. And if forgetting my ſelfe, I ſhall, in ſome places happen to ſtay D ſomthing longer than the Readers haſt would require, yet I hope, that the zeale and loue he beares vnto the worthy memory of moſt famous Chriſtian Princes, together with the ſhortneſſe of the hiſtory, in compariſon of that which is thereof written in iuſt volumes by others, ſhall eaſily excuſe a larger diſcourſe than this: But againe to our purpoſe.

The great war betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius in 13 books, De vita & geſtis Scanderbegi, from whence this hiſtory is taken: and were done betwixt the yeres 1450. and 1467.

Mahomet in the beginning of his reigne ſent embaſſadors to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, ſo that he would grant to pay vnto him ſuch yerely tribute as his father Amurath had in his life time demanded: which embaſſage the crafty tyrant ſent rather to proue what confidence Scanderbeg had in himſelfe, than for any hope he had to haue his demand granted. This diſhonorable offered peace Scanderbeg ſcornfully reiected, and ſo returned the Embaſſadors as they came: and preſently vpon their departure entred with his horſmen into that part of the Turks E dominion which bordereth vpon Epirus: and when he had waſted the country, returned home laded with the ſpoyle therof. In reuenge of which deſpight, Mahomet ſhortly after ſent Ameſa one of his beſt men of war, with 12000 horſemen into Epirus, to requite Scanderbeg with the like ſpoyle of his people & country. But Scanderbeg vnderſtanding by his eſpials of the Turks comming, lay cloſe in ambuſh with 6000 ſouldiers vpon the great mountaine Modriſſa, ouer which the Turks muſt of neceſſity take their way: and as they were about by night to haue paſſed ouer that rough and ſteep mountaine, and were with much difficulty almoſt got vp to the top therof, they were ſuddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who hauing the aduantage of the place, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and draue them downe the mountain amaine; at which time their horſes ſtood them in no ſtead at all, but were rather vnto them an F hinderance in that vneuen and troubleſome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and diſorder againe fiercely aſſailed on the one ſide by Scanderbeg, & on the other ſide by his nephew, called alſo Ameſa, who before the Turks comming had placed themſelues with their horſmen in places of moſt aduantage: ſo that the Turks hardly beſet, and forced on euery ſide, were in ſhort time ouerthrown and put to flight.

In this conflict ſeuen thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, and Ameſa Generall of the Turks army with diuers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg ſent priſoners to Croia: for ioy of this victory at Scanderbegs returne, great triumph and feaſting was made at Croia: during which time, Scanderbeg cauſed Ameſa the Turke, with the reſt of the Turkiſh captains, to be inlarged, to be petakers of that ioy, whereof they againſt their wils had giuen the occaſion; and afterwards vſed them with all kind of courteſie during the time of their abode. This Ameſa requeſted of Scanderbeg, that he might ſend a meſſenger to Conſtantinople, to certifie Mahomet how the caſe ſtood with him and the reſt, whom haply he might think to haue bin ſlain in the battell; and to procure from him their ranſom: which his requeſt Scanderbeg eaſily granted, and ſet down their ranſome at thirteene thouſand Duckats. The news of this ouerthrow ſore grieued the Turkiſh tyrant, but afterwards when he ſaw the remainder of his army without their Generall and leaders, hauing for moſt part loſt their enſignes and armour, and alſo the meſſenger was ſent from Ameſa; he fell into ſuch a rage that he denied to giue any thing at all for his ranſome: imputing all the loſſe to his treachery, folly, or cowardiſe. Howbeit he was afterwards perſuaded by his Baſſaes, and other great courtiers, Ameſa his friends, to think better of the Generall, of whoſe faithfulneſſe and valor he had of long time had great experience, and alſo to ſend his ranſome: by denying whereof, he ſhould, (as they ſaid) diſcourage his other Generals and captains, who by chance of war might hap to fall into the like danger. By whoſe perſuaſion Mahomet ſent an Embaſſador to Scanderbeg, with the ranſome demanded, and other great preſents alſo. Vpon receit whereof, Ameſa with the other captains were ſet at liberty, and ſent with ſafe conuoy out of Epirus. All the money ſent for the Turks ranſome, Scanderbeg diuided amongſt his captains and ſouldiers.

This late receiued ouerthrow filled the proud tyrant with deſire of reuenge, ſo that he determined forthwith to ſend another army into Epirus: the leading whereof, diuers of his great and moſt expert captains ambitiouſly ſought for. For Mahomet had promiſed great rewards and moſt honourable preferments to him whoſe hap it ſhould be to vanquiſh Scanderbeg. Among the reſt, one Debreas (a man for his forwardneſſe and courage, in great fauor with his ſoueraigne) by great ſuit obtained to haue that charge: promiſing with exceeding confidencie vnto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better ſucceſſe in his warres of Epirus, than others thither by him before ſent: for the accompliſhment whereof, he required to haue no greater power than was ſent the yeare before. But after that Ameſa was returned to the court, & had with long diſcourſe ſet forth the vertues and valor of Scanderbeg, with the inuincible courage of his ſouldiers, Debreas became more temperate in his ſpeech, and was contented to receiue a new ſupply; ſo that he had vnder his charge fourteene thouſand ſoldiers: with which army he marched towards Epirus, and was come to a place called Pologus, where he lay with his army encamped in a plain in great ſecurity, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies country, neither as he ſuppoſed, neere the enemy. Of all this preparation, and of the comming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence, and being reſolued not to expect the comming of the Turks into Epirus, made choice of ſix thouſand of his beſt horſmen, with whom he marched with as much ſpeed as was poſſible into the enemies country, & came by night vnto the plain where the Turks lay, hoping to haue bin vpon them before they were aware, and ſo to haue ouerthrowne them; wherein he was much deceiued: for by the light of the Moone (which then ſhined all night, he was by the Turks in time deſcried, yet the ſuddennes of his approch with the ſtrangeneſſe of the attempt, exceedingly diſmaied the whole army of the Turks. But Debreas mindfull of the promiſe he had made vnto his Lord and Maſter, with cheerfull words encouraged his ſouldiers, and preſently ſent out certain troups of light horſmen, to receiue the firſt charge of the enemy, vntill he might ſet his whole army in order of battell. Betwixt theſe troups, & others ſent out by Scanderbeg, began a ſharp skirmiſh; both the armies ſtanding faſt, as beholders, carefully expecting the euent thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his ſoldiers ſhould in his firſt encounter be put to the worſt, it might tend to the great diſcouraging of the reſt of his army; ſeconded his men with other freſh troups vnder the leading of Moſes and Ameſa; by whoſe comming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten back, and chaſed euen to their main battell. In the heat of which chaſe, Moſes forgetting hamſelfe, had with great danger in following on too faſt, bin incloſed by the Turks, had not this fury bin in good time ſtayed by Ameſa: for which ouerſight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not with greater moderation vſe his good fortune; commending ſuch forwardneſſe in a priuat ſoldier, but not in ſo great a commander. When Moſes and Ameſa had thus put the Turks to flight, Scanaerbeg brought on his whole army, and fiercely aſſailed the Turks, yet troubled with the diſcomfiture of their fellowes. Debreas on the other ſide, with cheerfull ſpeech, and his owne valor, ſo encouraged his ſouldiers, that Scanderbeg was there notably reſiſted, and his fortune as it were at a ſtand: vntill that Muſachius, with certaine troups of reſolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbegs army, gaue ſuch a fierce charge vpon the ſide of the Turks army, that he brake their ranks, & ſore diſordered that part of the army: which when Debreas perceiued, he withdrew himſelfe out of the front of the battell wherein he had valiantly ſtood againſt Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Muſachius had diſordered the battell, and with ſuch courage cheered vp his troubled ſouldiers, that his onely preſence and valor ſeemed to be the very life and heart of his whole army. Whilſt Debreas was thus buſied againſt Muſachius, Scanderbeg in the meane time with might and maine ſtill charged the front of the enemies army: who now in the abſence of their Generall began to loſe their order & to giue ground, making no ſuch reſiſtance as before. At which time, Moſes forcibly breaking into the midſt of them, took one of their enſignes, which he threw back among his followers: wherewith they encouraged, ſo preſſed vpon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therwith diſcouraged, and their battel diſordred, were almoſt ready to turne their backs and to fly. Debreas ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, haſted with all ſpeed vnto the place where he ſaw moſt perill, and did what was poſſible to haue reſtored the battel, and encouraged his ſouldiers: where preſſing in among the formoſt, he was by Scanderbeg himſelfe encountred hand to hand, and ſo by him ſlaine: with whoſe fall the whole army diſcouraged, without further reſiſtance fled. Moſes purſuing them on the one ſide, and Muſachius on the other, with furious hand ſlew more in that chaſe than were ſlaine in the battell. Of the Turks were ſlain in this battell 4120, and ſome priſoners taken, but of the Chriſtians few or none: ſo that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a victory giuen. All the ſpoyle taken from the enemy, together with the priſoners, was by Scanderbeg equally diuided among the ſoldiers. Vnto Moſes he gaue Debreas his horſe and armor: and vnto Muſachius a priſoner, which by his port and behauiour ſeemed to be a man of ſome account. This Turke agreed with Muſachius vpon a ranſome of 200 duckats, and preſently vpon agreement made, drew forth the money out of a little bag which he had kept ſecretly about him, and offered it to Muſachius for his ranſome, who receiuing the money, told the Turke, that he muſt prouide another ranſome, foraſmuch as that money was his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his perſon. The Turk on the other ſide alleadged for himſelfe, the agreement already made, with the paiment of the full ſum agreed vpon. This controuerſie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleaſure heard them both what they could ſay: Muſachius laying hard for another ranſome, and the Turke for his liberty vrging the agreement. Who when they had both ſaid what they could for themſelues, Scanderbeg ſmiling, told them, that they both contented for that which was in right his, & neither of theirs: for the priſoner with the money were both mine (ſaid he) at the firſt taking of him, ſince which time I haue giuen to you Muſachius the priſoner, which I knew, but not the mony which I knew not of: neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (ſaid he to the Turke) who had by law of arms loſt your ſelfe, together with all that you had about you. After he had thus pleaſantly diſcourſed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded to Muſachius the mony he agreed for, and to the Turke his deſired liberty: who glad thereof, and hauing alſo receiued his horſe and armor of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, ſpeaking all the honor he could of ſo noble a conqueror. After this victory Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to Croia.

Debreas ſlain, by Scanderbeg, and his army ouerthrowne.

A pleaſant contẽtion betwixt Muſachius and a Turke for his ranſome.

When Mahomet vnderſtood that Debreas was ſlaine, and his army ouerthrowne, he became exceeding melancholy, but after he ſaw ſo many of his ſouldiers returned as had been ſufficient to haue reſtored a loſt battell, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed with that cowardiſe, as that hee could not endure the ſight of them. The death of Debreas grieued none more than the King himſelfe: for the captains generally either enuied at his hardineſſe, or elſe hated his inſolency. Ameſa among the reſt took no ſmall pleaſure, that his proud ſucceſſor had taken part of his euill fortune, and ſo in part eaſed his former infamy. The great Baſſaes and men of war ſeeing their ſoueraigne ſo deſirous of reuenge, offered to ſpend their liues in that ſeruice: whoſe forwardneſſe he ſeemed not to refuſe: howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another manner G of reuenge. He was not ignorant, what great matters his father Amurath had brought to paſſe, by ſowing diſcord among the Princes of Græcia: which foule practiſe hee purpoſed now to put in practiſe himſelfe. There were at that time many famous chiefetaines of Epirus, of Scanderbeg both beloued and truſted; among whom, he was in hope to find ſome one who for deſire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to giue ſome deſperat attempt againſt the life or ſtate of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moſes Golemus of Dibra (a man honourably deſcended) was moſt inward with Scanderbeg, and for his prowes and experience in martial affaires, of all men accounted the beſt captain in all Epirus, next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe: him, the crafty tyrant moſt deſired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as fitteſt to ſerue his purpoſe, & eaſieſt without ſuſpition to be dealt withall, becauſe he commonly lay with a ſtrong garriſon in H Dibra, vpon the very frontiers of Epirus. Wherefore he directed his letters vnto the Gouernor of Sfetigrade, commanding him by all means he could poſſibly deuiſe to withdraw Moſes from Scanderbeg; and not to ſpare for any gold or golden promiſes wherby to allure him: promiſing alſo vnto the Gouernor himſelfe great preferments, if he could win him. Vpon receit of which letters, the Gouernour began forthwith carefully to deuiſe, how he might beſt attempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuiſes, he at laſt thought vpon a ſhrewd headed fellow, one of the Chriſtians which dwelt in Sfetigrade; whom for that he was a Chriſtian, he might without ſuſpect vſe as an inſtrument in ſo dangerous and important an action. This Chriſtian the gouernor called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promiſes won him to vndertake the matter, he ſent him away, fully before armed with plenteous I inſtructions, full of treaſon and deceit. When this ſubtill meſſenger was come vnto Moſes, and vnder pretence of great and ſecret matters of importance, had obtained to ſpeak with him in priuat; he after ſome diſcourſe had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length vnder the couert of faire glozing words to vtter his poyſon: ſhewing vnto him (as a meſſenger from the Gouernor) the great and good opinion the Turkiſh Emperor had of long time conceiued of his valour and proweſſe: for which cauſe his heroicall nature could not but honor him, although he were his enemy; and therewith alſo maruell, that hee being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whoſe ſtate was by him chiefly vpholden whereas if he would do wiſely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an Emperour of greateſt magnificence and power, he ſhould quickly in his Court find ſuch honourable entertainment, K as were to be preferred before the ſtate of Scanderbeg: or if the ſoueraignty of Epirus his natiue countrey did better pleaſe him, he might eaſily be thereunto aduanced, by ioyning his owne endeuor vnto Mahomets great power. It pleaſed Moſes wel to heare his own praiſes (a thing incident to haughty minds) and he liked well that he was ſo fauoured of the Turkiſh Emperor: but the hope of the kingdome of Epirus, began to work in him new conceits, and moued him more than al the reſt: ſuch is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things ſaue themſelues: ſo glorious a thing it is to ſtand in the higheſt place: for all that, Moſes neither in word or countenance made any ſemblant of liking, or diſliking the meſſage. Which the wily meſſenger taking for a ſecret conſent, and heartily glad that he had bin ſo well heard; not deſiring as then any further anſwer, craued leaue to depart; promiſing L in ſhort time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this meſſenger many troubled thoughts began to ariſe in the mind of Moſes: his mirth was changed into melancholy, and the cheerfulnes of his countenance was abated; his hauty thoughts were his ſolitary companions, and the imagined kingdom the Idol he in ſecret worſhipped; ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed to the wiſer ſort as a man altogether metamorphoſed. Some were ſo bold, as for to aſk the cauſe of the meſſengers comming: vnto whom he anſwered, That he was one, from whom he receiued intelligence of matters concerning the good of the ſtate: which his anſwer was holden for true; for who durſt once miſtruſt Moſes? Whileſt he thus was toſſed vp and downe with his owne thoughts, as a ſhip with the billows of a wrought ſea, the ſame ſlie meſſenger, according to his promiſe came againe; M and for his more credit, in ſecret brought with him ſuch Preſents as well might ſeeme to haue been ſent from the great Turke, with his meſſage better framed than before. Of all which that was ſent, Moſes is reported to haue receiued nothing but the worſt, which was, the very treaſon it ſelfe. And ſo returned the meſſenger with anſwer, that he could not but in good part accept of the Turkiſh Emperors great fauors; and

A for the reſt of his requeſts, whatſoeuer he ſhould chance to doe therein, hee ſhould not from thenceforth find him any great enemy: commanding the meſſenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of ſuſpition.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into Dibra, to ſee how all things ſtood there, and to conſult with Moſes for the beſieging of Sfetigrade; which city it grieued him to ſee in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Moſes to auert Scanderbeg from that enterpriſe, wherein he muſt of force be driuen to ſhew himſelfe, told him, That he vnderſtood of late by a certaine meſſenger which came to him out of Sfetigrade, that the city was ſo well ſtored by the Turks, of all things neceſſary for the defence thereof, that it were but loſt labour to attempt any thing againſt the ſame: wherefore he aduiſed him rather to beſiege Belgrade (not that Belgrade B which is ſcituated vpon the riuer of Danubius, but another of the ſame name in the confines of Epirus, then holden by the Turks, but diſtant from Sfetigrade about an hundred and forty miles) of the taking whereof, there ſeemed to be more hope. By this perſuaſion, Scanderbeg reſolued with himſelfe to make prouiſion for the beſieging of Belgrade. And foraſmuch as his ſouldiers of Epirus alwaies vſed to the field, were not ſo fit for the beſieging of townes, hee thought it good to pray ayd out of Italy, from his old friend Alphonſus King of Naples, with whom he had of long time bin acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he ſent two of his noblemen embaſſadors vnto him, with certain rich Preſents, and familiar letters of this purport.

Scanderbeg* craueth ayd of Alphonſus king of Naples.

C Our ſouldiers of Epirus, know only how to fight with men, and them to vanquiſh: with wals they know not how to deale. You Italians (as I vnderſtand) haue skill in that kind of ſeruice, and take pleaſure therein: wherefore now at this preſent, I haue need of your help and cunning. There be certaine townes of our enemies in Epirus, yea almoſt in the heart of our kingdome, which eye-ſore I haue of long deſired (if it pleaſed God) to take out of my ſight: but being occupied with continuall wars, had no leiſure till now, happily to attempt any thing againſt them. This time I haue choſen as moſt fit, to ſatisfy my deſire, both for the ſeaſonableneſſe of the time of the yeare, and for that Mahomet ſpareth me leiſure; whoſe fury I haue twice calmed. You vnderſtand in few words, what I haue need of: all other things are almoſt in readines, and we only look for your help. Lend me ſuch ſouldiers as know how to fight afar off, I meane harquebuſiers and canoniers, for of others we haue ſtore plenty. But happy is Apulia, my Alphonſus, vnder thy gouernment D from whence men fit for all ſeruices may be drawn, as out of a moſt plentifull treaſury. Whenſoeuer we haue requeſted men fit for ſeruice, either in peace or war, you haue beautified both our court and camp. By you the kingdom of Epirus hath bin ſomtime ſupported with ciuill policy, and warlike ſtrength: all ſorts of people, of what condition ſoeuer, yea euery corner of Epirus ſoundeth forth thy praiſe, both at home and abroad. But for mine owne part, I do ſo louingly embrace your kindnes, and ſo firmly retain the remembrance of your deſerts toward me, that ſome time I wiſh you that fortune (although in ſo doing I may ſeem vnkind) which (as the common ſaying is) prooueth, but getteth not friends: to the intent, that you might by ſome more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you deuoted.

When Scanderbeg had ſent away his Embaſſadors, he with all diligence began to prouide E things neceſſary for the ſiege of Belgrade: wherein he had purpoſed alſo to haue vſed the ſeruice of Moſes. But he now in heart a traitor both to his prince and country, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuſes to ſtay at home in Dibra; alleadging firſt, that it was to be thought that ſo ſoon as the Turkiſh king ſhould heare of the ſiege of Belgrade, he would inuade ſome part of Epirus, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the ſiege: and then, that no part of all Epirus lay neerer to the Turks, or more in danger than Dibra; and that therefore he could not do any better ſeruice, than to ſee vnto the ſafety of that countrey, long before committed to his charge, and in which alſo moſt part of his liuing lay. Theſe his excuſes, proceeding indeed from deep treaſon, were yet neuertheleſſe thought reaſonable, and he for his prouident care highly commended: and authority giuen him with new ſupplies to augment the garriſon F vnder his command, as time and occaſion ſhould require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended ſiege, the embaſſadors before ſent to Alphonſus, were returned into Epirus, and with them ſuch ayd as Scanderbeg had before requeſted, and a great deale more; For Alphonſus fearing the greatnes of the

Alphonſus* ſendeth ayd vnto Scanderbeg.

Turkiſh Emperor, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg his actions,reckoning Epirus not aboue 60 miles diſtant from his dominions,to be the ſtrongeſt wals of his kingdome in Apulia (as not many yeres after,it by proſe appeared, when as the Turks hauing taken Otranto,put all Italy in no ſmall feare.) With this aid he alſo wrote louing letters to Scanderbeg, thanking him for his preſents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things,as of his owne. But when he came to make mention of the ſoldiers he had ſent, Alphonſus, after the manner of his pleaſant nature, merily wrote vnto Scanderbeg, That he had ſent him Italian ſouldiers which could according to his deſire, fight well both with men and wals,but better with women:and that therefore the Epirots were beſt to take heed, that they whoſe help they required for fight afar off,proued not alſo good warriours at hand at home in their houſes. The great commendation Scanderbeg had giuen of the King, was by him referred vnto the exceſſe of his loue,and by the King requited with like.

Scanderbeg beſiegeth and diſtreſſeth Belgrade.

Scanderbeg now furniſhed with all things needful, ſet forward, and according to his former determination,came and encamped before Belgrade,with an army of 14000 good ſouldiers: & in ſhort time had ſo diſtreſſed the city, that the Turks were glad to take truce with him for ſixteen dayes,which time expired,they promiſed to deliuer the towne, if they were not before relieued. Vpon concluſion of this truce, Scanderbeg encamped himſelfe vpon an high hill, neer vnto the city,with three thouſand horſe,and a thouſand foot:and appointed Muſachius and Tanuſius,with the reſt of his army,to remoue farther off into a large plaine,where they might encamp themſelues in a more wholſom and freſh aire,in that hot ſeaſon of the yeare,during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed alſo 25 ſcouts to keep continuall watch vpon the top of the higheſt mountaine,to diſcouer a far off the comming of the enemy,and to giue warning thereof to the camp,by making a fire vpon the mountain:by the negligence of which watch, Scanderbeg receiued a great ouerthrow,as hereafter followeth.

The news of the ſiege of Belgrade was brought vnto Mahomet, at ſuch time as he was ready to haue paſſed into Aſia againſt the Emperour of Trapezond : which great enterpriſe hee was loth to giue ouer, for the reliefe of Belgrade ; and yet to loſe that city vnto Scanderbeg, grieued him much : wherefore he reſolued with himſelfe ſo to doe the one, as that he would not altogether neglect the other. And ſo holding on his intended journy into Aſia himſelfe,with ſuch fortune as is aforeſaid,he ſent Sebalias one of his great Baſſaes,with forty thouſand horſmen to relieue Belgrade , promiſing him great rewards if hee could bring him Scanderbeg either aliue or dead. This Baſſa was of the Turks accounted for a wary captaine,but not ſo couragious,alwaies more politick than forward : he hauing receiued his charge,ſet forward with all ſpeed poſſible,no leſſe carefull of that he was commanded,than was Mahomet himſelfe,and by great journies came on ſo faſt,that he ſtill preuented the fame of his comming;and by his forerunners intercepted, or rather (as ſome write) corrupted the watch which Scanderbeg had before placed vpon the mountains;ſo that no ſigne was giuen vnto the campe of the enemies, as was expected. By meanes whereof Sebalias with all his power were vpon that part of Scanderbegs army,which lay in the plaines, before they were well aware of his comming : ſo that moſt part of them had not ſo much leiſure as to bridle their horſes, or to put on their armor, In which ſo ſudden a feare, Muſachius armed himſelfe,and put his ſouldiers in ſuch order, as the ſhortneſſe of the time and the enemies approch would permit ; doubting much,whether it were better to fight or to flie : but ſeeing no leſſe danger in flight than in fight,he reſolutely receiued the enemies charge,as a man deſirous before hand to reuenge his own death:and at length (ſeeing his men ſlaine about him by heaps, and that courage muſt needs giue place vnto fortune) fiercely attempted to haue broken through the midſt of his enemies, and ſo to haue fled to the mountain where Scanderbeg lay : but he was ſo beſet, that no way was poſſible to be made ; wherefore reſoluing there to die,he deſperatly fought to the great admiration of his enemies,vntill that he,with all there with him,were euery man ſlain. Tanuſius on the other ſide,after he had giuen diuers braue attempts to haue reſcued his coſin Muſachius, finding by proofe, that he could do him no more good therin but to become the woful companion of his death, exhorted all the reſt yet left, for ſafegard of their liues to flie:in which doing,moſt of them were ſlaine,for the Baſſa's great army ſo filled all places thereabout, and ſo eagerly purſued the victory, that it was almoſt impoſſible any way to eſcape. Scanderbeg lying vpon the moun-

Muſachius ſlain, and the Epirots put to flight.

A mountaine,and ſeeing the ouerthrow of moſt part of his army,was about many times to haue deſcended from the hill,to haue holpen them in what he might, or els to haue there died with them:but yet ſtayed,being thereto earneſtly requeſted by his other moſt expert captains,and perſuaded, not deſperatly to thruſt both himſelfe and them all into the manifeſt perill or aſſured death.

Scanderbeg ſeeth his men ſlain,and is not able to relieue them.

Sebalias hauing ſlaine Muſachius, and put Tanuſius to flight, followed the chaſe with the greateſt part of his army,ſo that few were left in the great plain, except ſuch as ſtayed to rifle the dead. Scanderbeg taking that opportunity,came down from the hill whereon he ſtood,with his foure thouſand ſouldiers, and in a moment ſlew all ſuch Turks as he found in his way:and after following in the taile of the Turks army, cut off a great number of them, and brought a B generall feare vpon the whole army: inſomuch, that Sebalias perceiuing that he gained not ſo much in chaſing of Tanuſius, but that he loſt more in the rereward of his army, by the purſuit of Scanderbeg,left the chaſe,and turned vpon his fierce enemy:where after a ſharp skirmiſh begun, the wary Baſſa fearing in the maintaining of that diſordred fight to haue the victorie wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, ſo to call together his diſperſed ſoldiers, and in better order to encounter his daungerous enemy. Scanderbeg in the meane time hauing aſſembled the remainder of his army, valiantly againe encountred the Turks, who thought in this battell to haue made an end of the warres in Epirus:and with his owne hand ſlew Achmat and Barach, two valiant ſoldiers of the Turks;which like ſtout champions had before ſworne vnto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they ſhould chance to meet C with him. In this laſt skirmiſh a great number of the Turks were ſlaine:but night drawing on, Sebalias retired with his army to a mountaine neere vnto the city, and Scanderbeg likewiſe to another almoſt two miles off:and in the dead time of the night riſing with his army, returned in ſafety into Epirus, leauing ſtrong garriſons vpon all the ſtreit paſſages as he went, for feare leaſt the Baſſa proud of this victory,ſhould forthwith breake into Epirus. This was the onely and greateſt ouerthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto receiued of the Turks:wherin he loſt two thouſand horſe and three thouſand foot(moſt part wherof were of the Italians ſent from king Alphonſus) together with his tents and great artillery, and about eighty of his men taken priſoners. And of the Turks were alſo ſlaine three thouſand.

Scanderbeg flieth by night into Epirus.

The next day Sebalias perceiuing that Scanderbeg was retired,commanded the bodies of the D ſlain Turks to be ſought out and buried: but of ſuch Chriſtians as they yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their hands and feet, and ſo left them among the dead. The head of Muſachius and of many other the ſlain Chriſtians, which by their armor or apparrell were thought to be of the better ſort,were by the commandement of Sebalias cut off;which becauſe hee could not for the diſtance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoiance carry with him to Conſtantinople, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is,he cauſed them to be ſlaine, and ſtuffed with chaffe, and ſo to be carried as the vaine trophies of his victory. Afterwards, when he had repaired the battered wals of Belgrade, and put a new ſupply of ſeuen hundred freſh ſoldiers into the city,beſide the old garriſon therein before,and ſet all things in good order,he retrrned with great triumph to Conſtantinople. And the more to ſet out the glory of E his victory,at ſuch time as he entred the city, he firſt cauſed the captiue Chriſtians to be led in chains before him;after whom were borne the enſignes taken from the Chriſtians,with the aforeſaid heads thruſt vpon lances, and after them all the ſpoyle:laſt of all came Sebalias himſelfe with his ſoldiers,as great conquerors, and was of the people receiued with ſuch applauſe and ioy, as if he had conquered ſome great kingdome. No man was now ſpoken of but Sebalias, his praiſes were in euery mans mouth,he was the onely man (as they ſaid) that did ſhew that Scanderbeg was to be ouercome,no preferment was now thought too great for him, or reward ſufficient to counteruaile his deſert. The poore Chriſtian captiues were afterwards for the moſt part ſould:of the reſt, ſome were aliue thruſt vpon ſharp ſtakes,ſome hanged on yron hooks, ſome otherwiſe cruelly at the victors pleaſure tortured to death.

F Moſes lately before corrupted by the practiſe of the Gouernour of Sfetigrade, hearing of the great loſſe Scanderbeg had receiued at Belgrade, thought it now a moſt fit time for his reuolt. But foraſmuch as the fact,in the nature of it ſelfe foule,ſeemed euen to himſelf the doer thereof,a great deale fouler and more diſhonorable,for that he had therein no complices: he thought good, if it were poſſible,to alure ſome others into the fellowſhip of his treaſon, ſo to diminiſh the infamy of himſelf, in communicating the ſame with many, and to appeare with greater credit before the Turkiſh tyrant, than if he ſhould as a contemptible fugitiue come al alone. Wherefore vpon the bad news from Belgrade, he ſeemed at the firſt very penſiue, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common miſery of the country of Epirus, with many words amplifying the ſame: and then on the contrary part, ſetting forth to the vttermoſt the force and power of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, thereby to ſtrike a greater terror and diſtruſt into the minds of them with whom he was conuerſant: but to ſuch as were more ſecret and inward with him, he diſcouered the great affection and fauour the great Emperor Mahomet had of long born him, with the large offer of his gifts & preferments, aſſuring them of the like alſo, if they would conforme themſelues vnto his appetite; ſeeking hereby ſo much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his moſt execrable treaſon: yet when he had ſaid what he could, he found none but a few of the baſer ſort of the common ſoldiers, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moſes ſaw how much he had laboured, and how little preuailed, fearing to be diſcouered, he fled by night to Sfetigrade, accompanied with a few baſe fellows, and eaſily obtained the Gouernours paſſe, with ſafe conduct to Conſtantinople, where he arriued a little before the returne of Sebalias from Belgrade, and was of Mahomet both ioyfully receiued and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg vnderſtood that Moſes was thus reuolted, at the firſt report therof he was ſo troubled with the ſtrangnes of the fact, that he ſtood ſpeechles as a man aſtonied: but after he had pauſed a while, & vpon further enquiry had found it out to be true, he according to his heroical diſpoſition, ſaid no more, but that he could eaſily haue Moſes excuſed, for that he was carried away with the violence of ſuch fortune as might haue alienated the mind of a right conſtant man. And when diuers of his friends (according to the maner of the world) with hard ſpeeches ſeemed to aggrauate his offence: he could not abide to heare the ſame, but commanded them to hold their peace, and no more to vſe ſuch ſpeeches: wiſhing that all treaſon and euill fortune were together with Moſes gon out of Epirus. Vpon this news Scanderbeg accompanied with Ameſa his nephew, and a troup of horſmen, preſently entred into the countrey of Dibra, and there with all care cauſed moſt diligent enquiry to be made, if any could be found partakers of the conſpiracy with Moſes. But finding none, he much reioyced in the fidelity of his ſubiects, & hauing ſet al things in good order in that prouince, returned himſelf to Croia.

Moſes remaining in the Turks court, ceaſed not to ſolicit Mahomet to proceed in his wars againſt Scanderbeg, promiſing to do therin great matters, euen to the ſpending of his life in that ſeruice. But the crafty tyrant thinking it not good to truſt him too far before he had further triall of him, delaied him off to the next Spring, pretending that the yeare was too farre ſpent to begin wars. In the mean time he cauſed all Moſes talke, his behauior and actions, to be diligently obſerued and noted; and oftentimes himſelfe diſcourſed with him concerning the managing of that war: all which he did eſpecially to ſound the depth of Moſes his thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the moſt aſſured and vndoubted ſignes of a mind deuoted to his ſeruice, and altogether eſtranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteene thouſand horſemen for the inuading of Epirus, ſuch men as Moſes himſelfe ſhould make choice of: for a great number he required not for the vanquiſhing of Scanderbeg. Theſe ſouldiers although they deteſted (ſo few in number) to enter that fatal countrey of Epirus, as men faire warned by other mens harms, yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceiued of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his means to find friends in that countrey to ioyne with them, were the willinger to go. So Moſes furniſhed with a notable army, and all warlike prouiſion he could deſire for the deſtruction of his country; and blinded with the imagination of a kingdome, ſet forward, & marching through Thracia and Macedonia, forgetting the loyalty due vnto his Soueraigne, and the loue he ought to haue borne vnto his natiue countrey, came and entred into Dibra.

Scanderbeg by his eſpials vnderſtanding of the comming of Moſes, as alſo what ſtrength he was of, ſtood not now vpon any policy againſt him who had of long bin priuy to all his ſtratagems, but was ready euen at his firſt entrance with true valour to encounter him. As both the armies ſtood ranged in order of battell, a meſſenger came from the Turkes campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his army durſt to proue his fortune hand to hand againſt one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battel. By which meſſenger anſwer was returned, A combat betwixt a Turke and a Chriſtian.

A That the challenge ſhould be accepted. The name of the Turke which made this braue challenge was Ahemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name amongſt the Turks. Vpon this proud challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a gentleman of no leſſe reputation among the Chriſtians, haſtily ſtept forth before Scanderbeg (as if he had beene afraid to haue beene preuented by ſome other) and requeſted, that he might be the man to abate the Turks pride. Scanderbeg embracing him, commended his noble mind, and wiſhing him good fortune, gaue him leaue to carry with him into the field the firſt honour of the Chriſtian army. As he was arming himſelfe, his companions and fellowes in armes ſtanding about him, wiſhed vnto him not more courage or ſtrength than he had, but onely the fortune of Maneſſi. Vpon his armor he put on many rich jewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the reward of the enemy, if hee B could vanquiſh him. The Turkiſh champion was no ſooner come into the plain betwixt both armies, and made ſhew of himſelfe in great brauery, as if his match had yet bin ſcarcely found, but he ſaw Zacharias come forth brauely mounted, and ready to charge him: to whom Ahemaze calling aloud, ſaid there would be time enough for him to haſten to his death, and therefore requeſted to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded ſuch like conditions of the combat, as had bin long before derided by Maneſſi: whereof Zacharias in no better ſort accepted. In few words it was agreed vpon betwixt them, That each of them ſhould abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or aid of others; and that the victor ſhould haue full power ouer the body & ſpoile of the vanquiſhed. Thus agreed, they withdrew themſelues one a good diſtance from another, and with their C Launces charged, ran together with ſuch force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their Launces one vpon the other, and were both horſe and man ouerthrowne. But vnhorſed, they nimbly recouered themſelues, and with their ſcimitars fiercely aſſailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it ſhould ſeem had determined to beautifie that combat with variety, ſtanding a great while indifferent to both. After many ſturdy ſtrokes giuen, without any hurt don, by reaſon they were ſo ſtrongly armed, it fortuned that both their ſwords were beaten out of their hands: then grapling together with their bare hands, as if they had bin two vnarmed wreſtlers, after long ſtrugling till they were both almoſt out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying vpon him, with his dagger, aboue the gorget thruſt him into the throat, and ſlew him: and ſo riſing vp, with the ſword that firſt came to his hands, cut off the D Turks head: at the ſight whereof the Chriſtian army gaue a great ſhout for joy, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks. To be ſhort, Zacharias deſpoiling the Turk of his armor, and what els he thought good, returned loded with the ſpoile of his enemy, and preſented vnto Scanderbeg the proud Turks head: for which he was of him afterwards moſt honourably rewarded.

Into this place yet reeking with the bloud of the laſt ſlaine Turke, came Moſes, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not haue aduentured his perſon: but when he ſaw him ready to come forth, he ſhamefully forſooke the place, and returned with ſhame enough into his army.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Moſes.

Preſently after, both the armies vpon ſignall giuen ſet forward, and ſo began to joine battel: where at the firſt onſet Scanderbeg ſo valiantly charged the vauward of the Turks army, that E they were glad to giue ground: which Moſes perceiuing, releeued them with new ſupplies, and riding now here, now there, with his preſence and courage reſtored the battell, in many places almoſt loſt. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, ſtill preuailed vpon their enemies, and after great ſlaughter made, came to the ſtrength of their battell: where Moſes had placed mo[illegible] of his beſt ſoldiers, as his moſt aſſured and laſt refuge: in this place the Turks fought with exceeding courage, and Moſes warily obſeruing in what part of the battell Scanderbeg himſelfe was, directed his moſt forces againſt him, of purpoſe, if poſſibly he might to haue ſlaine him; whereof he miſſed but a little: for a couragious ſoldier of the Turks by chance encountring with Scanderbeg, with his horſemans ſtaffe bare him quite backeward vpon his horſe, in ſuch forcible manner, that the Turks for joy gaue a great ſhout, F thinking verily that he had bin ſlain: but Scanderbeg recouering himſelfe again, & chafed with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, furiouſly aſſailed the ſame Turke with his ſword, and after a great fight ſlew him. A great part of the Turks army being already ouerthrown by them that had the leading of the wings of Scanderbegs army, diuers of the common ſoldiers thruſt the heads of the ſlaine Turks vpon the points of their ſpeares, in token of victory, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Turks: and now ioyning themſelues with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the G maine battell of the Turks than before. Neuertheles, Moſes encouraging his ſoldiers, did what was poſſible for a man to do, and euen with his owne valour a great while ſtaid the courſe of the victory: vntill he ſeeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his beſt ſoldiers; and that there was no remedy but that he muſt either fly, or there die; turned his backe and fled. In which flight many of the hindermoſt of the Turks were ſlaine: as for Moſes himſelfe, he eſcaped by waies to him well knowne, onely with foure thouſand men, the poore remainder of ſo great an army: the reſt, to the number of about eleuen thouſand, all choiſe men, were ſlaine: whereas of the Chriſtians were not paſt an hundred loſt, and about eighty wounded.

Of all the Turks that were taken, only one was ſaued, who being a man of good account, had yeelded himſelfe to Zacharias, and was afterward ranſomed; the reſt were all by the common H ſouldiers, without pitty tortured to death, in reuenge of the cruelty by them ſhewed at Belgrade: Scanderbeg himſelfe not knowing thereof, or winking thereat.

Moſes condemned of the Turks.

Moſes flyeth from Conſtantinople.

Moſes with the reſt of his diſcomfited army, lay ſtill a while vpon the borders of Epirus, and would faine haue perſuaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to haue followed him againe into Epirus, to haue ſurpriſed the garriſon left in Dybra, in number not aboue 2000; promiſing to bring them vpon the ſame garriſon, before they ſhould be aware of their comming.
But the Turke hauing him now in contempt, were about by generall conſent to forſake him, and to return home. And ſo Moſes ſeeing no remedy, returned with them to Conſtantinople, with countenance as heauy as if he had bin a condemned man now carried to the place of execution: and the Turks which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting I that he ſhould haue ended the wars in Epirus, began now to diſgrace him as faſt, and to ſpeake all the euill of him they could deuiſe. Yea the tyrant himſelfe (although he could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was ſo highly offended with him for the loſſe of his army, that he had vndoubtedly put him to moſt cruell death, had not the great Baſſaes, and others neere about him, perſuaded him otherwiſe, ſaying, That in ſo doing, he ſhould alienate the minds of all others from reuolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his ſeruice.
So was he by their mediation pardoned his life; but withall, ſo diſgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his neceſſary maintenance: all which deſpightfull contumelies he outwardly ſeemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly ſo tormented with melancholy and griefe, that he could neither eate nor drinke: the remembrance of the foule treaſon K committed againſt his Prince and country, was day and night before his eies; and the diſgraces of the Turks court inwardly tormented him with intollerable griefe: the ſight of the tyrant (who meaſured all things by the euent) filled his heart with ſecret indignation; and to return again to his naturall Prince, of whom he had ſo euill deſerued, he was aſhamed; ſometime the clemency and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, ſlow to reuenge, and eaſie to be intreated to forgiue, heartned him on to thinke of returne; and by and by, the conſideration of his foule treaſon ouerwhelmed him with deſpaire. Thus with contrary thoughts plunged to and fro, tormented with the vnſpeakeable griefs of a troubled conſcience, not knowing what to do, purpoſing now one thing, and by and by another, at laſt he reſolued to forſake the inſolent tyrant, and to ſubmit himſelfe to the mercy of Scanderbeg; wiſhing L rather to die in his country for his due deſert, than to liue with infamy, derided in the Turkes court. Reſting himſelfe vpon this reſolution, one euening he got ſecretly out of the gates of Conſtantinople, and trauelling all that night and the day following before he reſted, by long and weary iournies, came at laſt vnto his natiue country of Dybra. The gariſon ſoldiers beholding their old Gouernor all alone, full of heauineſſe, as a man eaten vp with cares; moued with compaſſion, and forgetting the euils he had bin the occaſion of, receiued him with many teares and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not far off.
Moſes comming vnto him with his girdle about his necke, in token that he had deſerued death (as the manner of that country was) found him walking before his tent, and there with heauy cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, ſubmitted himſelfe vnto his mercy, and with M great humility and ſignes of repentance, craued his moſt gracious pardon. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg preſently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kiſſed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him: and within a few daies after, cauſed all ſuch things of his as were before confiſcat, to be againe reſtored vnto him; with all ſuch offices and promotions

A tions as he had before injoyed:and by open proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man ſhould either publikely or priuatly ſpeake of that Moſes had treſpaſſed. Mahomet vnderſtanding that Moſes was returned againe into Epirus,and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much grieued thereat, and fumed exceedingly: firſt, for that he had at all truſted him;and then,that he had ſo let him ſlip out of his hands; being verily perſuaded, that all that Moſes had done,was but a fineneſſe of Scanderbeg to deceiue him.

Shortly after that Moſes was returned into Epirus, Mahomet by like practiſe allured vnto him Ameſa,Scanderbeg his nephew; promiſing to make him king of Epirus in his vncles ſtead. For by that meanes, the crafty tyrant thought it a more eaſie way to draw the minds of the people of Epirus from Scanderbeg vnto him deſcended of the Princes bloud, than to Moſes, or B to any other ſtranger he ſhould ſet vp. Ameſa vpon this hope of a kingdome, fled to Conſtantinople: and becauſe he would cleere the mind of the tyrant from all ſuſpition and diſtruſt, he carried with him his wife and children, as the moſt ſure pledges of his fidelity. This Ameſa was of ſtature low,and the feature of his body not ſo perfect as might ſufficiently expreſſe the hidden vertues of his mind: he was of courage haughty aboue meaſure, ſubtill,and of a pregnant wit;wonderfull painfull,and thereto courteous and bountifull (the chiefe means whereby aſpiring minds ſteale away the hearts of men) whatſoeuer he got of himſelfe,or had by the gift of his vncle,he diuided it amongſt his ſouldiers or friends: he was very affable,and could notably both couer and diſſemble his affections: for which things, he was aboue all others both beloued and honored of all the people of Epirus,next to Scanderbeg himſelfe. At his firſt C comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promiſes and vaine praiſes of himſelf, as had Moſes; but only excuſing his owne reuolt, laboured to perſuade him, That he had for juſt cauſes left his vncle,with a deſire now faithfully to ſerue him. And to that purpoſe ſpake vnto him as followeth:

Ameſa his firſt ſpeech vnto Mahomet.

If it ſhould pleaſe thee (moſt noble Mahomet) to call to remembrance the old injuries, and antient diſpleaſures by vs committed againſt thine imperiall Majeſty: we might ſeeme now rather to haue come hither to receiue the juſt guerdon of our euill deſerts, than vpon any hope of honour or preferment. For what could haue bin done more in diſgrace of the Othoman Empire,than that you haue ſeene long ſince done by vs,in the moſt dangerous time of the Hungarian war; rather of a malicious and ſet purpoſe, than D for that we were juſt enemies? Whereas in the ſame perfidious courſe, I my ſelfe being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuſe is to be pretended for our doings,more than repentance) your fathers army was betraied at Moraua, and the kingdome of Epirus by great treachery wreſted out of your fathers hands; the only cauſe of ſo many calamities, and of ſo much bloudſhed. But vaine is this feare, and our ſuſpition needleſſe,with ſo wiſe and mercifull a Prince; eſpecially for that my yeres then greene,and youth prone vnto the harme of it ſelfe, and a mind not reſting vpon his owne reſolutions, deceiued me. I beleeued mine vncle (for the ignorant beleeue many things) and allured with the deſire of ſoueraignty (the proper diſeaſe of that age) and too much credulous, I forſooke you and followed his promiſes, but diſcretion growing with yeares, I haue by little and little perceiued both the ſly perfidious dealing of mine vncle, as alſo that my reuolt from you was more hurtfull vnto my ſelfe than to any other. Scanderbeg recouered, E and alſo enlarged the kingdome of Epirus; but not without my great labour and helpe. I expected long time,that he ſhould haue giuen me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at leaſt ſome part thereof, as a ſmall reward of my ſo great trauell and danger. Not long after, he married a wife, and hath begot a young heire,a new ſucceſſor in his kingdome: vnto me for ſhame of the world,becauſe I ſhould not altogether leade a priuate life, he hath aſsigned a baſe corner of Epirus; where he enjoying the reſt, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this caſe I had mnch adoe to bridle my affections, and could neuer diſgeſt that injury: yet the iniquity of the time, with the inſolent diſpoſition of the man,compelled me to ſmother vp my thoughts, and to make faire weather, leaſt finding ſome ſuſpition, he ſhould craftily haue intrapped me, as he did of late George Streſie his ſiſters ſonne; whom wrongfully charged with fained ſurmiſes, he hath almoſt depriued of all his poſſeſsions. I would willingly haue fled vnto the feet of your F highneſſe,I would gladly haue forſaken my ingratefull vncle with the ſtaines of his infamous kingdome; but that the remembrance of the old rebellion,and many injuries ſithence done, did make me afraid: vntill that now (God I thinke ſo appointing it) I came moſt gladly,following your moſt royall faith and promiſe. You had ſcarcely beckned vnto me, you had ſcarcely inuited me, hauing of long intentiuely waited euery occaſion, but ſtraightway I came with ſuch ſpeed, as if I would haue flowne: I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg or his euill hap, or your more proſperous ſucceſſe, as of late did Moſes; leaſt I might thereby juſtly ſeeme either for feare or regard of ſome eminent danger, rather to haue prouided for mine owne ſafety than to haue embraced your magnificence. Neither haue I left any thing for you in me to ſuſpect, nor any cauſe wherefore I ſhould deſire to returne againe into Epirus: here are preſent moſt ſure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyalty. Behold (worthy Mahomet) you haue whatſoeuer is deare vnto me, yea whatſoeuer nature could giue, pleaſing vnto men in the courſe of mans life. Theſe haue I brought vnto thee, which ſhould with violence haue beene taken from an enemy: ſuch pawnes as might aſſure thee of the faith of a moſt doubtfull man. More than this, haue I brought nothing: for in ſo great ſpeed and ſecret departure, I could not haue regard of my ſubſtance. And if I might haue had time to haue truſſed vp my traſh at leiſure; yet I know not how, I ſhould haue thought it a kinde of buſineſſe, to haue brought with me any part of the poore reliques of mine old fortune: eſpecially vnto thee, of all other the richeſt. Only my fidelity I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I haue not: and if thou deſire of me any other bond for more aſſurance, I refuſe not whatſoeuer your highneſſe ſhall appoint: for I came not hither to ſet downe couenants and agreements of my ſelfe, but to receiue them from you. I dare not promiſe to vanquiſh mine vncle, and to ſubdue Epirus with an army of fifteen thouſand men: the misfortune of Haly-Baſſa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare victory of Sebalias, with great bloudſhed gained, may ſerue for examples. In me you ſhall neither want diligence nor faithfull ſeruice: as for other things concerning the euent of this war, and for the reuenge of the injuries by you receiued; you being a Prince of power inuincible, and of a moſt deepe judgement, are not to be aduiſed by me your vnskilfull vaſſaile.

Ameſa honorably entertained by Mahomet.

This ſpeech of Ameſa ſeemed vnto Mahomet free from all diſſimulation, foraſmuch as he knew moſt part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his preſence, confirmed the reſt. Wherefore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertaintent, referring other matters vnto a further time.

Vpon the approch of the Spring, Mahomet deſiring nothing more than to be reuenged vpon Scanderbeg, entred into conſultation with his great Baſſaes, concerning the inuaſion of Epirus: vnto which counſell Ameſa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuiſe for the deſtruction of his country, of all others beſt liked. After the matter had been long to and fro debated, it was concluded, That Iſaac the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, ſhould with an army of fifteen thouſand be ſent againſt Scanderbeg, and Ameſa with him, hauing the charge of fiue thouſand horſemen: and the Baſſa to proclaime Ameſa King of Epirus; thereby to perſuade the Epirots, that Mahomet inuaded Epirus rather for the diſpleaſure he bare againſt Scanderbeg, and for the aduancement of Ameſa, than for any ambitious deſire he had to take vnto himſelfe that kingdome.

Great was the preparation for this war, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying fame had in ſhort time filled euery corner of Epirus with the report of theſe newes; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay ſent for his great captaines and men of war into Dybra, where that tempeſt was firſt to be expected: and when they were all aſſembled, he declared vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger, and what he thought thereof himſelfe as followeth:

A notable ſpeech of Scanderbeg vnto his captaines, how the Turks were to be withſtood at their comming to Epirus.

Amongſt all other things which God hath left to vex and grieue the minds of men in ſo great variety of worldly affaires, we ſee (right worthy ſouldiers) theſe two the greateſt, Hope, and Feare. The firſt a more comfortable thing, and proper to couragious minds (I may not ſay) of light beleefe: the other a thing of more diſcretion and ſafety, which although it vſe to defer the deſires of men, yet hath it power at length exceedingly to cure and ſeaſon the ſame. Hereupon it is eaſily to be gathered, That the great chiefetaines of former times haue gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in ſhew more hardy, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Carthaginentian captaine vſed to call Q. Fabius (whom the Romans euer thought too ſlow and too fearefull) his great enemy: but Terentius Varro he called a greater enemy vnto his owne country and the people of Rome, than to himſelfe. But wherefore do I wrongfully call that Feare, which might more truely be called Diſcretion, or wholeſome policy? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can deny, That thereof

A hath riſen the antient diſcipline of war, and the old ſeuere gouernment of martiall affaires. This aduiſed carefulneſſe cheriſheth and nouriſheth Hope it ſelfe, it doth nothing raſhly, it hath eies before, behind and on both ſides; it weigheth in indifferent ballance things paſt, preſent, and to come. You may now perceiue to what end my ſpeech tendeth. I would firſt confer with you, and know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this war; that either I might yeeld vnto your opinion, or elſe you (as you haue alwaies hitherto done) to mine. You heare now with your eares, what preparation, what warlike prouiſion is dayly made againſt vs. Loe, the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, all the floure of Europe, and whole ſtrength of the Othoman Kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither euer did) to proue my fortune againſt him, not without your honour: But I thinke it better to vſe policy and wary heed againſt ſo great an enemy, than our wonted force and courage. That notable ouerthrow of Haly-Baſſa, ſo B many great victories by vs atchieued, our minds by ſo many good haps confirmed, perſuade me to thinke that we haue both courage and ſtrength to encounter him in plaine battell: but the vncertaine euents of war, and fortune neuer ſufficiently knowne, maketh wiſe men to forget what is paſt, and to feare that is to come. It was neuer proper to any man, it was neuer giuen by inheritance, alwaies to ouercome; new occurrents require new correſpondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yeſterday, preſume to aſſure your ſelfe to diuide the ſpoile of your enemies to day. Victory is like a trauellour, and goeth hither and thither, not reſting long in a place: and although it be for moſt part both gotten and kept by courage and diſcretion, yet oftentimes, when you haue moſt carefully and politikely diſpoſed of all things, the fortune and chance of war haue therein a great ſway. I was wont to require (I remember it well) onely valour and courage in my ſouldiers, contemning all externall accidents and fortunes haps; if you did promiſe vnto C me couragious minds, I aſſured you of all good hap and proſperous ſucceſſe: but that loſſe we receiued at Belgrade (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth and alwaies abhorreth to thinke vpon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme far otherwiſe of worldly matters, and the vncertainty of fortune. What if that day had beene longer? or Sebalias of more courage? might not the ſtate of Epirus haue that day bin vtterly ouerthrowne? We were then rather by God preſerued, than by any thing that was in our ſelues: what remained more, but that we ſhouuld like cowards haue yeelded our ſelues to haue beene bound of the conquerors? The night defended vs, yea, euen God himſelfe defended vs; who tooke from them both policy and force, and gaue vs time to breath and eſcape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the comming of the victor: Howbeit he tooke nothing from vs, he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much carefull to keepe the honour he had already gained, and peraduenture D in feare of them of whom he was not without cauſe moſt feared. I ſpeake not this of purpoſe to terrifie any of you, but rather to admoniſh you, and to conſult with you, how ſo great preparations may be fruſtrated and ouerthrowne, and ſome notable victory by vs atchieued, without the price of our bloud, or the loſſe of ſuch things as we haue. The number of our enemies is great, and ſo great, as vntill this day we neuer ſaw in Epirus greater, except at ſuch times as they came to beſiege our cities, and to deuoure vs all. Now if we ſhall meet them in the plaine fields in a ſet battell, the euent thereof will be doubtfull, many of vs muſt needs fall, many of vs muſt die (I would I might be a falſe Prophet) before ſo great an army will either fly or be ouercome, your victory ſhall be mingled with teares, and the heauineſſe of the conqueror not much vnlike the ſorrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we loſt at Belgrade? is that loſſe ſo to be recouered: What floure of Chiualry, hardly to be in many yeares reſtored: how many worthy men were there ſlaine? Epirus muſt needs in ſhort time be vnpeopled, if we ſhall ſo deſperatly onely ſeeke for E ſuch glorious victories. Wherefore if we will do well, we muſt ſo fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow alſo. Neither are our enemies and we in like caſe. The loſſe of forty or fifty thouſand is leſſe vnto the Turkiſh tyrant, than the loſſe of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but few; and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our owne ſakes, yet let vs doe it for our wiues and children, whoſe welfare and liberty dependeth of our liues: I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almoſt euery one of your names, which maketh me alſo more carefull of your health. And yet I would not refuſe to try the whole fortune of this battell in plaine field, if wee might thereby end all the wars againſt the Turks for euer; if I were in hope ſo to finde an end of our labours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours, for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our poſterity: but a new F enemy alwaies ariſeth, and we muſt ſtill looke for new wars. When this Iſaac is gone, another Iſaac will ere long come in his place: we ſhall be alwaies exerciſed with new warres, and incloſed with new dangers:
It is the deſtiny of Epirus (as farre as I can ſee) and we our ſelues are borne thereto. Wherefore we muſt gather our wits together, we muſt well husband our forces, and ſo diuide our patrimony, as that we may

alwaies haue ſomething to content our creditors, when they ſhall chance to come vpon vs. Yet ſhall God (no doubt) giue an end alſo vnto theſe troubles: for extremity cannot be of long continuance, and you your ſelues ſhall at length take reſt: yea, the ſtrong and puiſſant enemy, wearied with ſo many vaine attempts, will at laſt haue enough thereof, and leaue off his perpetuall hatred againſt vs: then ſhall it be to you no ſmall pleaſure to remember ſo many labors and dangers paſt. Thus haue I declared vnto you the commodities and incommodities enſuing the victory in plaine battell. But what if we be vanquiſhed? Where haue we any hope of reliefe left? From whence may we expect helpe? Will the bloudy enemy, inflate with victory, expect whileſt we againe recouer our ſtrength and encounter him againe with new forces? No, he will purſue vs and chaſe vs ſo long as any of vs are left: and hauing ouercome vs, will poure out the reſt of his fury vpon our townes and countrey, then ſubiect to his iniury. But ſome of you peraduenture will ſay, that they are by policy to be ouertaken, and not to be met in open field: of which opinion I alſo am my ſelfe; yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the ſame. Then I thinke it beſt to deceiue them, when they thinke they cannot be deceiued: when as they being as it were in poſſeſſion of a ſuppoſed victory, like men ouerioyed, ſhall caſt no perill. Now they come euen from the gates of Conſtantinople, full of diſtruſt, prying into euery corner, as men before warned by others harmes, and ſo many dreadfull examples of their fellowes: Beſides that, they haue with them my graceleſſe nephew and domeſticall foe Ameſa, who will teach them to foreſee and ſhun ſuch ſnares as in times paſt he with vs was wont to lay for them. Wherefore we muſt now tower vp vnto the height of ſome notable and ſtrange policy, whereby both our countrey may be from danger preſerued, and alſo ſome great victory, without our owne bloudſhed (which ſeldome chanceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our antient glory and renowne, we haue to this day by many moſt notable victories gained: but time and ſpace, and the ſight of the enemy, ſhall furniſh vs with this deuiſe. Now (that my diſcourſe may come to the purpoſed end) firſt of all, all things ſubiect either to the fury or victory of the enemy, are to be remoued out of the way; all people, of what age, ſex, or condition ſoeuer, are to be brought out of the country into places of ſafety; and then, our townes are to be furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons and all other neceſſary prouiſion, againſt all the chances of fortune. Beſides, who knoweth the ſecret deſignes of the tyrant? or whether he himſelfe (of long time deſirous of reuenge, and thirſting after our bloud) will follow the Baſſa at the heeles, or no. Perhaps I may beleeue and feare more than is needfull; but it is good to feare all that may be feared, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things ſhall thus be ſet in order, if there ſhall nothing be left in the fields or in the villages, that may enrich feed, or feare our enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our enemies, vndoubtedly we ſhall be victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in theſe wars, I will aſſuredly deliuer your enemies into your hands to be ſlaine at your pleaſure; and (by the leaue of God) will make the name and valour of the Epirots more terrible vnto the Turke, than euer it hath bin in the time of our anceſtors. I flatter not my ſelfe, I deceiue you not: if any thing may be promiſed in worldly actions, thus I aſſure you of, and this will I take vpon me. But theſe things are better done than ſaid. In the meane while, to ſpend no more time in longer talke and diſcourſe (than which, no greater loſſe can be to ſoldiers) let euery one of vs take a part in this charge, for the good diſpoſing of all things, and how to withſtand the enemy. I will not command any thing to others which I will not my ſelfe do: I will refuſe nothing, or reckon any thing baſe, which may tend to the common honour or profit of vs all.

This ſpeech of Scanderbeg was well liked and joyfully receiued of all the hearers, ſo that many beſought him to manifeſt to them how he purpoſed to proceed in thoſe wars: whereunto he with cheerfull countenance anſwered, That it was enough for him, if they did but beleeue him, promiſing himſelfe in perſon to be in the moſt dangerous actions as far as any of them: wherewith they reſted contented. And preſently diſpatching his lieutenants into diuers parts of his kingdome, as he thought moſt conuenient, prouided, that all things were in ſhort time conueiued out of the country into the ſtrong townes and other places of refuge. No corne, no cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the country; but all left deſolate, in like manner as was before at the comming of the great King Amurath to the ſiege of Croia.

The Epirots remoue all their things out of the country into the ſtrong townes before the comming of the Turks.

By this time Iſaac the great Baſſa was come into Epirus, accompanied with Ameſa: and as he marched, ſtill ſent before him his ſcouts and eſpials, carefully to view euery corner of the country, for feare to be entrapped as others before him had beene; directed in his journey for moſt part by Ameſa. Scanderbeg had in readines ſuch an army as he had purpoſed to vſe againſt

A his mighty enemy, but lay with ſix thouſand horſemen only in ſhew, as if he had determined with them to haue giuen them battell, but meaning indeed nothing leſſe. For as ſoone as the Baſſa was come in ſight, he with thoſe horſemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had bin diſcouraged with the very ſight of the Turks, turned his backe and fled. And becauſe he would not giue them any occaſion to ſuſpect it to be done for ſome policy or fineneſſe, and ſo to make them more carefull, he fled not into the mountains or woods, as his wonted maner was, but directly toward Lyſſa, a towne of the Venetians ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt, as if he had quite deſpaired of the keeping of Epirus, and fled thither for refuge. The Baſſa ſeeing him fly, was glad thereof, and ſent certain troups of horſemen to purſue him, and diligently to marke which way he tooke: but encamped himſelfe with his army in the plaines of B Dibra, neere vnto Oronychium, where Scanderbeg lay before: and there reſted his army, weary of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horſemen, ſent after Scanderbeg. But vpon their returne, when it was for a certainty reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled out of Epirus, and not an enemy to be ſeene, the Turks began to rejoyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any loſſe driuen the enemy out of the country; yet much grieued, that they could no where find any thing to ſatisfie their greedy deſires: for why, all things were ſo clean gon, as if the country had bin ſwept againſt their comming, which might haue been a ſufficient cauſe for them to haue diſtruſted ſome great matter, but they flattering themſelues, ſuppoſed all this to be done for feare of them, vpon extreme deſperation: ſuch is the fraile condition of men, to loſe ſtrength of body, common ſence, yea, their reaſon and C vnderſtanding, when ſome great miſchiefe is appointed for their ouerthrow or deſtruction. The Baſſa ſeeing the enemy fled, and now no cauſe of feare, conſulted with his chiefe captains, what were now beſt to be done? Ameſa ſtill perſuading him not to remoue, but there to ſtay a time, and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whoſe opinion preuailed, ſaid it was better to go farther into the country, and to take the ſpoile thereof before the country people ſhould conuey away all their ſubſtance into places of ſafety, as they had done there in Dibra, and leaue them nothing but the bare ground and empty cottages. By this perſuaſion, the Baſſa early next morning in good order ſet forward: commanding by generall proclamaton, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould breake his array or ſtraggle from the army. Yet befor he ſet forward, he called Ameſa vnto him, whom after he had highly commended, D and with great vehemency inuayed againſt Scanderbeg, he with the great applauſe of the whole army in the name of Mahomet created him King of Epirus. That day he marched not far, by reaſon of the great heat: for it was then about the midſt of Iuly. Yet when he had well wearied himſelfe with that daies trauell, finding neither enemy nor any thing elſe worthy to be accounted in any part of a victory, he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and ſending forth his ſcouts euery way, but eſpecially towards Lyſſa. The next day, which was the third day after the Baſſaes comming into Epirus, he ſet forward againe, and came at length into Æmathia, and there encamped that night. —

Ameſa is by the Baſſa created king of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turks ſuppoſed) was gone a great way out of their ſight towards Lyſſa, and come euen to the borders of his kingdome, he there ſtaid all the reſt E of that day. And a little before the going downe of the Sun, he with a few ſelect horſmen departed from the army, and with painfull trauell got vp to the top of the high mountains, from whence a man might by day wel diſcouer all the plains of Æmathia. There he appointed one Peieus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horſemen to marke diligently which way the enemy held, and by certain ſecret and appointed waftings and ſignes, to giue knowledge thereof to the army. After ſuch order taken, he returned himſelfe, and came again to the campe after midnight. And preſently riſing with his army, and fetching a compaſſe about, came vndiſcouered, and ſecretly encamped himſelfe as neere as he could vnto the mountains where his ſcouts lay, with eagles eis waiting for the leaſt mouing of the enemy. The Baſſa deſirous to get as far as he could into the country, before the heat of the day, began early in F the morning to ſet forward, and came to the plains of Pharſalia, through the world ſpoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, betweene the two moſt famous chiefetaines Cæſar and Pompeius: and now once more to be made famous, by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Here the enemy finding ſome ſtragling cattel, & other ſmall things which the country people had in their haſty flight left behind them, fel to ſeeking after booty, & as men without feare,ſpent that day in roaming vp and downe the country, in hope to find ſomething:and at G night encamped without any great watch,but towards Lyſſum, from whence they (in great ſecurity) looked for the comming of Scanderbeg,and as it were in diſgrace of him, carried Ameſa in triumph vp and downe the campe, as if he had beene already poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Epirus. Scanderbeg lying on the other ſide of the mountains, perceiued by his eſpials,which way the enemy lay: and with great ſilence vnder the couert of the mountaines and woods, ſecretly bent his courſe the ſame way,vntill he came to a mountain called Tumeniſt,at the foot wherof he encamped that night. The next morning the Baſſa holding on his way,came and incamped not far from the ſame mountain,and there ſtaid himſelf with halfe his army, and ſent Ameſa with the other halfe to burne and ſpoile the country: who about noone returned to the campe with ſuch prey as he had got,with his ſoldiers well wearied with trauel,and the heat of H the day. Scanderbeg like a carefull houſholder, who being about to entertaine and feaſt ſome honorable perſonages, truſteth not to his wife and ſeruants, but looketh to the beſtowing of his prouiſion himſelf,carefully ordering and diſpoſing and ſetting forth all things,eſpecially if his prouiſion (for want of ability) be ſhort,to welcome ſo great gueſts,and ſetting al things forth to the greateſt ſhew,ſeeketh at leaſt to fil the eies of his gueſts,although he doubt to ſatisfie their appetites: ſo he carefully viewing of all the mountains and thicke woods thereabouts without reſting, ſet Moſes in one place, Tanuſius in another,and all the reſt in places moſt conuenient. He appointeth euery man what to do,and inſtructeth them, & conſidereth of euery particular circumſtance himſelf:and ſo diuideth his forces,as might beſt ſerue his purpoſe, and make the moſt terrible ſhow to the enemy: for which purpoſe he in euery company placed I moe trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of war, than he had before at any time vſed.

When he had ſo to his moſt aduantage beſtowed ſo many of his captaines and ſoldiers as he thought good, and as the nature of the places would giue leaue,he with 4000 horſmen and the like number of foot, ſpeedily marching vp the rough mountaine of Tumeniſt, from thence plainly beheld in what order the Turks campe lay in the plains below. The Turks,eſpecially they which were lately returned with Ameſa from the ſpoile of the country, lay ſcattered abroad in the fields,with their horſes vnbridled and vnſadled, reſting their weary bodies:ſome got vnder the ſhadows of trees were victualling themſelues; ſome hauing filled their bellies, lay faſt aſleep on the green graſſe; the reſt were paſſing the time, ſome with one kind of ſport, ſom with another,as ſoldiers do in field when they haue little or nothing to do:for it was then K the hotteſt time both of the yere,and of the day,being about the midſt of Iuly,and the noonetime of the day. The like negligence was alſo in that part of the camp where the Baſſa himſelf lay;euery man taking his eaſe and pleaſure,with ſmall regard of horſe or armor:for being out of feare of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to haue bin a great way off at Lyſſum, they lay as men without care wrapt vp in ſecurity,the common deſtruction of great armies and commonwealths.
Ameſa with the great captains,were at the ſame time all together in the Baſſa's pauilion, conſulting what courſe they were beſt to take,to do ſomthing to the contentment of Mahomet, and their own commendation: ſome ſaid it were beſt with fire and ſword to deſtroy all they could in Epirus;and ſo hauing laid the country waſt,to returne. Others thought it better to march directly to Croia,to proue if the citiſens could be perſuaded to yeeld themſelues & L receiue Ameſa for their king;otherſome to threaten them with a continuall ſiege,and vtter ruine of the country, if vpon the vaine expectation of helpe from Scanderbeg they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit themſelues. As for Scanderbeg himſelfe,who then lay houering ouer their heads, he was in all that conſultation leaſt feared:who from the top of the mountaine,beholding the ſecurity & diſorder of the Turks camp,and delighted with the ſight therof; encouraged his ſoldiers, and martialled them in ſuch order as they were to follow him, for the charging & terrifying of the enemy. But firſt of all he determined to oppreſſe the Turks ſcouts, which lay at the foot of the mountain: for which purpoſe he himſelfe with a few horſmen firſt ſecretly deſcended the mountain,the reſt of his army following ſhortly after, & ſo ſuddenly came on the ſcouts,that he ſlew them all except one,who eſcaping by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, came running M to the camp as one halfe afrighted,crying out that Scanderbeg was comming. The Turks ſuſpecting nothing leſſe than the comming of him that way, at the preſent inſtant hardly beleeued that he was ſo nigh:when as he following him at the heeles as faſt as he could,with his horſmen & his footmen after them,was in a moment as if it had bin a ſudden tempeſt,broken in

The Turks campe buried in ſecurity.

amongſt

A amongſt the vnarmed Turks, and there making great ſlaughter of them, filled all the campe with ſudden tumult and feare. Ameſa, who at the firſt noiſe had ſpeedily got him to his charge, with his ſouldiers ſome halfe armed, ſome on foot, hauing no leiſure, to bridle their horſes, was the firſt that made head againſt Scanderbeg. The Baſſa alſo did what he might in that ſudden feare and ſhortneſſe of time, to arme his men, and to put them in order: but whileſt thoſe things were in doing, the ſouldiers which lay in ambuſh in the woods, came down the mountaines with ſuch horrible ſhouts and noiſe of inſtruments of war, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently gone together; the hils and vallies with their hollow echoes, encreaſing the terror of the alarum. Inſomuch that the Turks diſmaied, and fearing that all the force of Epirus with the countries adjoyning had come vpon them, began to fly on euery ſide, before that B Moſes and the reſt that lay in ambuſh were come into the plaines. Ameſa acquainted with his vnckles ſtratagems, as much as he could encouraged the Turks; crying aloud & telling them, That ſuch vaine tumults and terrors were not to be feared, being but the bare ſhifts and deuiſes of their enemies to couer their owne weakeneſſe: and by his owne valour ſtaied many which before were about to haue fled. In this while the Baſſa hauing put his men in beſt order he could, was comming to the aid of Ameſa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg: but in his ſetting forward, he was ſo valiantly encountred on the one ſide by Moſes with his horſemen, and on the other by Tanuſius and Emanuel with their footmen, that he was inforced, not without great loſſe, againe to retire vnto his trenches.

Scanderbeg ſuddenly aſſaileth the Turks.

All the hope of the battell depended vpon Ameſa, who ſtill with great courage withſtood C his vnckle, exhorting his ſouldiers valiantly as men to endure that firſt aſſault, which ſhould afterwards bring them moſt aſſured victory: heartening them on with hope of ſpeedy helpe from their fellowes, if they would but a while endure the fury of their enemies, whoſe hearts (as he ſaid) would preſently be diſcouraged, if they preuailed not in that their firſt and deſperat attempt, hauing nothing elſe to truſt vnto. By which perſwaſion the Turks were againe encouraged, accounting it a great diſhonour to fly and leaue their chiefetaine in the field. But when they ſaw Scanderbeg ſtill to preuaile vpon them, and that no helpe came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbegs horſmen ſlaine as they were arming themſelues; many were by the way cut off as they were comming, and the reſt put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Ameſa, turned their backs and fled alſo. Scanderbegs horſemen purſuing the chaſe, D made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and in the ſame chaſe tooke Ameſa priſoner. Scanderbeg hauing ouerthrowne that part of the Turks battell, was comming with a thouſand footmen and ſome horſemen, to haue aided Moſes againſt the Baſſa: but before his comming, Moſes to blot out his former infamy, had with inuincible courage put the great Baſſa with all his army to flight: and Scanderbeg following the chaſe, gaue him not leaue to looke behind him, vntill he was got out of Epirus. Many were in this chaſe taken priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Meſites a Sanzacke, a man of great account among the Turks. In this battell beſide the priſoners, were taken twenty of the Turks faireſt enſignes. As for horſes, armor, and other ſpoiles taken in the field, and in the campe, all which fell to the ſouldiers ſhare, it is almoſt incredible to be told. The number of the ſlaine Turks is of diuers diuerſly reported; they which write of the E moſt, reckon vp thirty thouſand; and they which ſpeake of the leaſt, account twenty thouſand. Of the Chriſtians were loſt but ſixty. Now if any account it ſtrange, that ſo great a victory ſhould be gained with ſo little loſſe; not to ſpeake of that is written in holy Writ, let him but reade the antient hiſtories of the Romans, or the Chronicles of our own Country, and he ſhall in them find victories no leſſe ſtrange. There was to be ſeene the ſudden and ſtrange alteration of theſe worldly things, no more indeed (whatſoeuer we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we haue not. Scanderbeg poſſeſſeth the rich pauilion, erſt belonging to the great Baſſa; and other of his captaines enjoy tents, with much other rich furniture neuer prepared for their vſe. Ameſa which the ſame day as a victorious conqueror ouerran a great part of Æmathia with his horſemen, and was carried in triumph with the generall acclamati- F on of many thouſands of valiant ſouldiers, and honoured as a King, and of them ſo called; is now led through the Chriſtian army to his vncle, with his hands bound behind him as a ſlaue, ſpeechleſſe and confounded, vnable to hold vp his head for ſhame: whoſe miſery moued moſt of the beholders to compaſſion, and forced teares out of the eies of many.

A notable victory of the Chriſtians.

The next day after this great victory, Scanderbeg cauſed the bodies of the ſlaine Turks to be buried, together with their horſes; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their loathſome carkaſes ſhould not infect the country: and after that, returned in great triumph to Croia. By the way as he went, the country people, which were before for feare of the Turks fled into the woods and mountaines in great multitudes, met him, as he did others alſo out of the cities, whoſe mouthes were all full of his worthy praiſes. Before him went the captiue Turks with their hands bound behind them, excepting ſuch as ware enforced to carry the Turks enſignes. Next vnto them followed the great Baſſaes rich pauilion, in ſuch manner ſupported by the ſoldiers, as if it had bin in the field. Then came Scanderbeg himſelfe with the Turkiſh Sanzacke, and Ameſa following him; for Ameſa had with great and humble ſuit obtained of his vncle, that he might not as he well deſerued, be carried bound among the other captiues. Laſt of all came Scanderbeg his victorious ſouldiers in goodly order, euery man leading a ſpare horſe taken from the enemy, and loaded with ſpoile. So when he was come to Croia, and there of his ſubjects joyſully receiued, he brake vp his army, and gaue euery man leaue at his pleaſure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Ameſa were committed to ſafe keeping, vntill further order was taken for them. Ameſa afterwards was for his treaſon worthily condemned to perpetuall priſon, and by an Embaſſadour from Scanderbeg ſent vnto King Alphonſus to Naples, there to be kept in durance; and with him was alſo ſent an honourable Preſent of part of the ſpoile taken from the Turks, in token of the victory. What became afterwards of this Ameſa, concerneth not much the courſe of our hiſtory; yet to ſatisfie the deſirous, I thinke it not amiſſe with him to ſtray a little out of the way.

When Ameſa had remained a yeare in priſon at Naples, Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of the death of Alphonſus, by his Embaſſadour requeſted of Ferdinand his ſon, to haue Ameſa reſtored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into Epirus, and caſt in priſon at Croia; but not in ſuch ſtreight manner as before: for Scanderbeg according to his accuſtomed clemency, began now to forget the injury to him before done; and at laſt ouercome with the continuall ſupplication and tears of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and reſtoring him to his former liberty, receiued him alſo into his former fauour. But Ameſa remembring what pledges of his loyalty he had left with Mahomet at Conſtantinople, and fearing what would become of his wife and children, if he ſhould haſtily vſe that his liberty, giuing his vncle moſt humble thanks, brake vnto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth:

The ſpeech of Ameſa to Scanderbeg.

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodneſſe onely, without any deſert of mine, haue regarded my life and welfare, it behoueth me alſo to be carefull for the life of others: leſt whileſt I receiue your exceeding bounty with too much deſire of mine owne health and honour, I do at this preſent, by this ſame benefit of yours, caſt away them, whom I haue long ſithence by mine owne trechery vndone. Mine vnfortunate and guiltleſſe Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent children are with him alſo: theſe yet liue, and ſhall liue, ſo long as the tyrant ſhall thinke, that I liue in heart his; but when he ſhall once perceiue by this your gratious dealing, that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will forthwith cut and rend in pieces the pledges of my faith, and their innocent bloud ſhall pay the guilt of their Fathers offence. Wherfore the Othoman tyrant is of me by ſome deuice to be deceiued, that I may in the meane time preſerue thoſe pledges, vntill I may by ſome fit occaſion afterwards redeeme the ſame. I will by your leaue this night take my flight out of Croia, as if I had broken priſon, and eſcaped againſt your will, and ſo fly vnto Mahomet, making the greateſt ſhew I can of my wonted loue and loyalty towards him: not omitting to heare, or ſpeake vnto that credulous King ſuch things concerning your eſtate, as I was wont in my better fortune: that hauing ſo cleared my ſelfe of all ſuſpition, which he perhaps hath conceiued by reaſon of my captiuity and long ſtay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, ſo eſcape from him: Wherein you may helpe me much, if you ſhall openly make ſhew as if you were grieued with my eſcape, and ſeeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the priſon for the ſame. In the meane time, whileſt I ſhall ſtay in the tyrants court expecting ſome fit time for my eſcape; I will ſtand you in ſtead of an intelligencer, ſo that your enemy ſhall not to my knowledge either attempt or goe about any thing againſt you, which ſhall be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refuſed to grant whatſoeuer he had requeſted, but ſaid vnto him:

A Ameſa, ſithence we haue granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not prohibit you to vſe that our gift to your moſt good, and to the preſeruation of them who for euer may moſt juſtly call vpon you, as debtor vnto them, for their welfare and liberty. Goe thy waies, proceed, take thy time and occaſion as it ſeemeth vnto thee beſt; and at length reforme thy ſelfe, whileſt thou yet haſt ſufficient time and ſpace. We now beleeue you in all things, and well like of this your deuice: Ameſa, you ſhall herein deceiue no man but your ſelfe, if you ſhall longer follow the faith and court of the barbarous King, whereas like danger is both of body and ſoule both to thee and thine. Whenſoeuer thou ſhalt returne vnto vs, thou canſt not do vs a greater pleaſure: and in what regard thou haſt heretofore been with vs, in the ſame thou ſhalt be with vs againe.

The anſwer of Scanderbeg to Ameſa.

B The ſame night Ameſa by ſecret order from Scanderbeg, eſcaped both out of priſon and out of Croia: and in the morning it was all ouer the city, that he was gone, and the keepers ſharply rebuked for their negligence. He comming to Conſtantinople, eaſily perſuaded Mahomet, that he was by chance eſcaped, with all things elſe that he told him: yet was he not for all that, ſo well graced of him as before; not for any diſtruſt he had in the man, but for the euill ſucceſſe he had in the former wars. Now whether Ameſa neglected his promiſed returne, or could find no opportunity to performe the ſame, is vncertaine: but certaine it is, that ſhortly after he died at Conſtantinople, poiſoned as was thought by the commandement of Mahomet, who could no longer indure the ſight of him, whom he reckoned the author of that notable ouerthrow receiued in Æmathia. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant man, well C worthy of remembrance, had not his haughty thoughts ſoared too high with the deſire of Soueraignty.

The death of Ameſa.

When Mahomet vnderſtood in what manner Iſaac Baſſa was ouerthrowne, and his army diſcomfited, he was therewith much grieued, and juſtly blamed the Baſſaes ſecurity: yet ſuch was his credit with his Soueraigne, that the matter was in better ſort paſſed ouer than was ſuppoſed it would haue been. Neuertheleſſe, Mahomet in reuenge thereof would willingly haue imployed all his forces vpon Scanderbeg, if his more vrgent affaires would haue ſo permitted. For at the ſame time, beſides that great warres began to riſe betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeres after) he was certainly informed, That the Chriſtian Princes were making a ſtrong confederation againſt him. At which time Mahomet diſdaining D openly to ſue for a peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practiſed by ſuch as were ſent to redeem the priſoners, & alſo by the Sanzack himſelf, to perſuade Scanderbeg to require peace of him; aſſuring him, that if he did but aſke it, it would for a long time be eaſily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg (well acquainted with the Turkiſh policy, vtterly refuſed to do. Wherefore Mahomet for the defence of his countries bordering vpon Epirus, ſent two of his moſt expert captains, Sinam and Hamur, with each of them 14000 ſoldiers into Macedonia, expreſly charging them not to enter at any time or vpon any occaſion, into Epirus, or by any means to prouoke Scanderbeg: which his commandement they ſo well obſerued, that the Epirots by the ſpace of almoſt two yeres enjoyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old injuries wearing out with time, at length by the E mediation of the ſame captains, a peace for a yere was agreed on betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. In which time he paſſed ouer into Apulia, and there notably aided King Ferdinand againſt the French, the proceedings wherein, as not pertinent to our hiſtory, I of purpoſe paſſe ouer.

A peace for a yeare concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet as he deſired, he reſolued according to his wonted manner to trouble the quiet eſtate of Scanderbeg: and ſo ſending a new ſupply of ſoldiers to Synam-beg, who then lay with a ſtrong garriſon vpon the frontiers of Epirus, commanded him with all his power to make wars vpon Scanderbeg. Synam accordingly, with an army of 20000 men entered into Epirus, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his army vtterly ouerthrowne, ſo that but few eſcaped by flight with Synam himſelf. Preſently after he ſent Aſam-beg, another of his F captaines, into the ſame ſeruice, with an army of thirty thouſand, whom Scanderbeg alſo in plaine battell vanquiſhed at Ocrida; in which battell Aſam himſelfe was ſore wounded, and finding no way to eſcape, was glad to yeeld himſelfe priſoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteouſly vſed, and afterwards ſet at liberty. Iuſſum-beg following Aſam with eighteene thouſand into Epirus, was ſet vpon by Scanderbeg alſo, and hauing loſt part of his army, was glad by ſpeedy flight to ſaue himſelfe with the reſt. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old captaine G and a man of great experience (who had bin a great commander, & a companion with Scander- beg in the time of old Amurath) requeſted of Mahomet, that he might proue his fortune againſt his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, aſſuring him of better ſucceſſe than before. The long and ap-proued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in ſuch hope of good ſpeed, that he gaue preſent order for the leuying of ſuch an army as Caraza had requeſted, and for ten thouſand mo than he had at the firſt required. With this ſtrong army, in number almoſt forty thouſand, Caraza ſet forward, hauing before filled the minds of men with the expectation of ſome greater matter to haue bin by him done. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding certainly that Caraza was com-ming, ſtood more in doubt of the man than of his power: and therfore aſſembled greater forces than he had vſually done before: and to welcome him, ſent two thouſand of his beſt and H moſt expert ſouldiers ſecretly into the enemies countrey; who lying in ambuſh amongſt the woods and mountaines, whereby Caraza muſt needs paſſe, ſuddenly ſet vpon foure thouſand horſemen (the forerunners of Caraza his army) who marching diſorderedly, and fearing no ſuch matter, were in a trice ouerthrown, and moſt part of them ſlaine: thoſe few that eſcaped fled backe againe to the army, as if they had come in poſt to bring tidings of ſome haſty news to the Generall. With which ſo vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was ſo diſcomfited, that if he might for ſhame, he could haue bin content to haue returned againe and gone no farther: yet for his honours ſake holding on his way, he came into Epirus; where whileſt he was (after the manner of old men) long in reſoluing what courſe to take, he was vpon the ſudden aſſailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his men in order of battell. At which time there fell ſuch I a vehement ſhower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three daies together it rained continually (for it was about the latter end of Autumne) all which time Scanderbeg ceaſed not in one place or other to trouble the Turks camp: ſo that the old Generall, partly diſtempered with the extremity of the weather, which for the violence thereof he tooke to be ominous; and more diſcouraged with the reſtleſſe attempts of Scanderbeg, roſe with his army, and retiring back by the ſame way he came, returned to Conſtantinople. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that hauing promiſed ſo much, had performed ſo little: yet afterwards was againe by him in ſome ſort commended, for that he had with leſſe loſſe looked vpon Scanderbeg than other Generals before ſent againſt him.

Mahomet perceiuing that Scanderbeg was not to be ſubdued but with ſuch forces as he was K not then at leiſure to imploy on him, thought it not amiſſe to proue if he could by faire ſpee-ches & glorious ſhews of fained friendſhip get within him, and ſo bring him to confuſion: for which purpoſe he ſent vnto him an Embaſſador with rich preſents, and letters of this purport:

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, Prince of Albania and Epirus, ſendeth greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I Thinke, friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendſhip more firme, than that which hath growne of long and mutuall conuerſing and liuing together, and eſpecially if the ſame L haue taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done betwixt vs two; who haue of long time, euen from our childhood, liued together in great loue and friendſhip, when as you firſt lay as hoſtage in my fathers court. Wherefore beloued Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all thoſe things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted, and being mindfull alſo of all thoſe things which you haue oftentimes done for the aduancement of our Empire and Kingdome, and for the glory of the Othoman family, I cannot chuſe but embrace thee with ſingular zeale and affe- ction. For I take God to witneſſe, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleaſing vnto me in my life, than to haue thee with me, and for a while to enjoy thy company. Neither needeſt thou to feare any thing to come vnto me, for that my ſouldiers without my knowledge or commandement haue of late broken in and ſpoiled thy Kingdome: which thing, as reaſon required, was vnto me exceedingly diſpleaſing: M neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquiſhed and ouercome, and ſo receiued the juſt reward of their euill deſerts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equity of thy cauſe, and as thy heart could haue deſired. But to let theſe things paſſe, the remembrance of our old loue and friendſhip perſuadeth me to come to agreement, and to joyne together with thee in a perpetuall league

A of amity: to the intent that our antient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reaſon of long abſence is almoſt worn out, may again take life, increaſe and be confirmed. Of which peace let theſe be the capitulations, if they ſhall ſeem vnto you reaſonable: for I know it belongeth vnto him that requireth not the peace, to appoint the conditions of the ſame. Firſt, we require you freely and peaceably to ſuffer our Armies to paſſe thorow your kingdom, for the beſieging of the cities and inuading of the countries ſubiect vnto the Venetians our enemies. Then, To deliuer vnto vs your ſon Iohn in hoſtage, whom we will alwaies vſe as one of our own naturall children. And afterwards, That our Merchants and men of trade may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your Kingdome with their Merchandiſe, and there freely and ſafely vſe their negotiation. Laſt of all, That your ſelf in perſon may at your pleaſure ſafely and without all fear repair vnto vs, and in like manner return again. In which things if you will yeeld vnto B vs, I promiſe vpon the faith of a King to grant vnto your Kingdome a ſincere peace, with perpetuall tranquilitie; and that there ſhall not be any more dear vnto me than your ſelf; and wil neuer to the vtmoſt of my power permit your kingdom to be infeſted or moleſted by any of our ſubiects or others. Whatſoeuer you ſhall further receiue from vs by the mouth of our Embaſſador Muſtapha, you may therto giue full credence. Fare you well.

From our Imperial Palace at Conſtantinople, the 10 of May, 1461.

Scanderbeg hauing receiued theſe letters, and wel conſidered of the ſame, returned him anſwer as followeth:

The Soldier of CHRIST IESVS, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, vnto Mahomet Prince of the Turks, greeting.

Scanderbeg his anſwer to Mahomets former Letters.

YOur Letters (moſt Magnificent) are deliuered vnto vs, wherin you write of your exceeding loue and ſingular affection toward vs, confirmed as you ſay by old acquaintance, which being grown vp betwixt vs, and by tract of time firmly rooted, and as it were into nature conuerted, ſhall alwaies retaine his force and ſtrength. But foraſmuch as it ſeemeth good vnto you to awake the ſame, hauing a long time D and many years lien as it were aſleep; and to make a motion that we ſhould enter into a certain new league and confederation, whereof amongſt other conditions of the League by you propounded, this is one, That your Forces may freely paſſe through my Kingdom to inuade the Venetians. Vnto this your requeſt, worthy Mahomet, it ſtandeth neither with equitie nor with myne honor to conſent, forſomuch as the Venetians are myne eſpeciall good friends and confederats. And for that you deſire to haue my ſon Iohn with you in hoſtage, for the better aſſurance of the peace betwixt vs; I ſhould peraduenture do it (moſt Noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would giue me leaue. But ſithence I haue no more but him, and hee as yet a tender childe; it is not for the good of either of vs, to haue him now taken from vs, when as he ought of vs to be moſt tenderly cheriſhed, and carefully inſtructed. As for that you requeſted concerning your Merchants, That they may freely and ſafely traffique into my Kingdom, I can be content to yeeld there- E unto, and wiſh heartily that there might be a free intercourſe of our Merchants indifferently with their commodities into both our Kingdoms. Further, Whereas you earneſtly perſuade mee, boldly and without fear to come vnto you, that by ſuch interview and perſonall preſence, our great deſire, grown of long abſence, might be the better ſatisfied: in this thing (moſt excellent Prince) I cannot but praiſe your moſt honorable diſpoſition, and commend your good nature; and would therfore boldly follow your perſuaſion, if my other vrgent affairs, and the gouernment of my kingdom would ſo permit. But what ſhall I doe? my ſon Iohn (as I ſaid before) but little, and as yet vnfit to gouern; and my people (as you know) loue alwaies to haue ſomthing to do; being by nature a fierce and reſtles nation, whom I my ſelf haue much a do to rule and gouern. For all that, I will come vnto you according to your deſire, expecting only a more commodious time. So fare you well.

From our Camp the 30 of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had receiued theſe Letters, and wel peruſed the ſame, he writ to him again in manner following:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of all the parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, greeting.

Mahomets letters to Scanderbeg, for the concluding of a perpetual peace between them.

YOur Letters we haue receiued by our Embaſſadour Muſtapha, wherin you giue vs to vnderſtand, That you like of none of the conditions of peace by vs propounded, but only that concerning our merchants and men of trade, that they might freely and at their pleaſure vſe their traffique and trades with their merchandiſe to and fro, and vpon this condition only you grant vs peace. This your offer wee accept of, and all the reſt of your excuſes we willingly admit: wherfore I promiſe vnto thee, my louing Scanderbeg, and will perform all that thou doſt require, and vpon that reſolution reſt; and wil ſo long as I liue obſerue and keep a ſincere and inuiolable peace with thee for euer, except thou firſt giue cauſe for the violating of the ſame. And for that purpoſe haue wee with our vſuall and Imperiall Seal ſigned theſe our Letters, which we by our Embaſſador Muſtapha haue ſent vnto thee, as therby confirming to thee this perpetuall peace. Wherfore you alſo (if you be ſo content) may ſubſcribe, and with your Seal confirm this of ours; that I in like maner may haue alſo your like conſent and agreement. And would further, That you would command knowledge therof to be made by open proclamation through all your kingdome, as I will in like maner cauſe to be don through myne. And for the more manifeſtation of this my loue toward you, I would alſo that you ſhould vnderſtand, That of myne own meer motion and bounty, I do freely giue vnto you all thoſe things which you by force of arms haue taken from my father in Albania and Epirus, ſo that you may poſſeſſe and enioy the ſame as if they had alwaies bin yours and your Aunceſtors. Wherfore I giue, grant, and confirm vnto thee and thy heirs, all the right, title, or intereſt, which I hertofore had therin, and from henceforth will alwaies account and repute thee as a Prince of Albania and Epirus, and ſo call thee. And as I haue promiſed thee in the faith of a King, will neuer herafter with wars moleſt thee or thine, except thou thy ſelf giue cauſe therof. Wherfore after you haue with your ſeal confirmed theſe things, you may commend them to our faithfull Embaſſador Muſtapha, to be by him brought vnto vs; to whom I would you ſhould in all things giue full credit. So fare you well, and render vs loue for loue.

From our Imperiall Palace at Conſtantinople, the 22 of Iune, 1462.

A peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Vpon receit of theſe letters a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg & the ſame by publique proclamations ſolemnly publiſhed through both their kingdomes, to the great rejoicing of many. Which peace was for a ſeaſon faithfully kept on both ſides, vntill that the Turks lying in garriſon vpon the frontiers of Epirus, began after their wonted maner again to fetch preys and booties out of the country. Of which iniuries Scanderbeg by Letters complained to Mahomet: who anſwered, that he was altogether ignorant therof, and ſeemed to ſhew to be much offended with the inſolencie of the doers therof, and forthwith cauſed many things to be again reſtored. By which means the peace before concluded, was ſtill as before continued.

A little before the concluſion of the aforeſaid peace, great wars began to ariſe betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, who all this while being in league with the Turkes, peaceably followed their traffique and trades of merchandiſe, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbors harms and miſeries, vntil that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their own houſes, and as it were to waken them out of a dead ſleep. For Mahomet after he had ſubverted the empire of Conſtantinople, and driuen Thomas and Demetrius the Emperors brethren out of Peloponeſus (now called Morea) reſted not ſo contented, but by his lieutenants and other great captains diſturbed the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their poſſeſſion, Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with diuers other ſtrong towns in Peloponeſus ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt. And now it chanced that about this time, Ioſhue, Mahomets lieutenant in Peloponeſus, had by the treaſon of a Greek prieſt, vpon a ſudden ſurpriſed the city of Argos: and Omares another of his great Captains, hauing firſt ſpoiled the Countrey about Naupactum (now Lepanto) entred farther into the territory of the Venetians about Methone & Corone, making hauock of all that came in his way. With which injuries, plainely tending to open war, the Venetian Senators being much troubled, ſat oft times in counſel, deliberating with much care, what courſe to take in a matter of ſo great importance. Some being of opinion,

A that it were beſt to ſend Embaſſadors to Mahomet, ſo to make proof if the matter might by fair means be redreſſed. Others contrariwiſe deemed it to no purpoſe ſo to do; forſomuch as ſuch great and manifeſt outrages, nothing differing from plain hoſtility, could not poſſibly be don without the Tyrants knowledge and expreſſe command. After the Senators had often met together, and with many great reaſons debated the matter to and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing (as in conſultations of great matters with a multitude, it moſt commonly falls out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time to bring the multitude vnto ſome certain reſolution, than it is afterward to performe the action) in this ſo great a diuerſitie of opinions concerning ſo weighty a cauſe, at length one Victor Capella, a noble Gentleman and graue Senator, ſtept vp in the midſt of the Senat, and there frankly deliuered this notable B ſpeech vnto the reſt, concerning the matter propounded, as followeth:

The notable ſpeech of Victor Capella, to perſuade the Venetians to take vp arms againſt Mahomet.

I haue before this, at other times by long experience often noted (moſt noble Senators*) that in all our* greateſt conſultations of matters concerning our common ſtate, ſome are alwaies ſo addicted, or rather wedded to their own conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to heare the reaſonable opinion of others contrary to their own, the chief cauſe of our ſlow reſolutions. Wherfore I haue thought good briefly at this time to call vpon you for reſolution, forſomuch as I ſee we muſt of neceſſity take vp arms, be we neuer ſo loth or vnwilling: for to my vnderſtanding, you do but betray the State, in delaying the time to make preſent war vpon the barbarous enemy. Yet many principal men among vs aduiſe vs to beware that we do not raſhly or vnaduiſedly determin of matters of ſo great conſequence; and think it requiſit that we C ſhould ſend embaſſadors vnto the Tyrant to expoſtulate with him his vniuſt dealing in breaking his faith and league; and withall to requeſt him to obſerue the conditions of the peace before agreed vpon, if haply he may rather by perſuaſion than by arms be moued to change his purpoſe: and if by this means nothing may be obtained, then at length they think it neceſſary to reſolue to make war vpon him. They alledge further, that if we ſhall attempt war, our cities in the continent, bordering vpon the Ionian in Peloponeſſus, with diuers others of ours in the firm land, will not be able to hold out long, but for want of neceſſaries muſt needs periſh with the firſt of the trouble. Beſides that, if thoſe places ſhall be waſted and ſpoiled, great loſſe (as they ſay) ſhall enſue therby vnto moſt of vs in priuat: The greateſt motiue (perhaps) wherfore they think it moſt conuenient to defer the wars, and for that purpoſe to ſend our Embaſſadours vnto him.
Of which Embaſſage firſt by your leaue a few words. At ſuch time as theſe our Embaſſadours, men of D great wiſdom and reach, not long ſince came vnto him, he had of them no regard, but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitfull, and gloſing ſpeeches, did indeed ſuch things to the contrary as we leaſt hoped.
Wherfore I cannot well deuiſe (if we ſhould ſend them or ſuch others againe) what eſpeciall thing of all that we then gaue them in charge, they ſhould now propound vnto him, hauing already ſaid what is to bee ſaid: except they ſhould ſay, That wheras we are not of ſufficient ſtrength and power to wage war againſt him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talk, and by that ſimple means to redreſſe our injuries; and vpon the matter, to ſhew our ſelues preſt and ready to fall to agreement with him, according as ſhall ſtand with his good pleaſure and liking. Truly this were good plain dealing, but it will not ſerue our turn. Argos is already taken from vs, and he maketh open war vpon vs: wherein hee doth but prooue our courage, and try how long we will put vp theſe injuries: if we will quietly digeſt theſe, he will then confidently E and without fear proceed further. But if we ſhall (as beſt beſeemeth vs) valiantly reſiſt him, he ſhall be glad of ſuch reſt as we will giue him; and when he knoweth not well which way to turn himſelf, ſhal be as glad as we to lay down arms, and to ſeek for peace: wheras if we ſhall do otherwiſe, I fear we ſhall repent our ſelues when it will be too late. It is reported, That as ſoon as he was come into Peloponeſus, he went himſelf in perſon vnto Eubœa, to view the city of Chalcis*: and going a ſecond time out of* Peloponeſus, he ſounded the depth of the paſſage, and came within ſight of the city, of purpoſe to haue aſſaulted it, if he had found opportunitie: at which time he himſelf rid ouer that ſtreit of the ſea betwixt Bœtia and Eubœa, and curiouſly viewed in what place he might moſt conueniently paſſe ouer with his Army to beſiege the city. Verily theſe are the moſt manifeſt ſignes of war, wherby any man may ſufficiently proue, that he hath long ſince reſolued, ſo ſoon as he is ready, to make war vpon vs. Whileſt wee are yet dreaming in the midſt F of our long conſultations, he will proceed in the wars he hath begun, and cutting vs ſhort, augment his own dominions. Then will he blame his Lieutenants and Captains as authors therof; but ſtill be doing that beſt ſerueth his purpoſe. And whilſt no man oppoſeth himſelf againſt him, his power daily increaſing, he will do the beſt he can ſuddenly to ſwallow vs vp, being vnprouided. For he may eaſily raiſe great forces, that by ſufferance of others maketh himſelf of great ſtrength there where he had before no footing. Shall G we then ſay that we haue no wars with this incroching Tyrant? Some I know feed themſelues and others alſo with vain hopes, ſaying, That he will neuer turn his forces vpon vs, nor ruinate our eſtate, although he might at eaſe do it: Wherfore (ſay they) let vs refrain from wars, and vſe our peace and quietnes; yet omitting nothing in the mean time that ſhall be needfull for our ſafety. But forſomuch as it plainly appeareth vnto all men, by that which is before ſaid, that he hath already indeed proclaimed war againſt vs, inuading our countries, ſurpriſing our cities, and killing our people: Whether think you it more expedient or profitable for vs to ſit ſtill and ſuffer our dominions to be taken from vs, or rather by open war to make the barbarous King know the greatnes of our power and ſtrength? For if we ſhall enter into open war, we being in arms ſufficiently prouided againſt all euents, and with carefull eye attending all his attempts, ſhall eaſily auoid both himſelf and all his deuiſes. Who if he be ſuffered to runne ſtill on forward H with his proſperous ſucceſſe, people will daily more and more fall vnto him, in hope to liue the better as his friends. For which cauſe I think it better to prefer an honorable war before a doubtfull peace. As for delay, it hath hurt many great States, and our ſelues moſt of all; wherby we haue in ſome ſort betrayd the Empire of Greece, with the wofull Emperor himſelf, when as this Tyrant battered the walls of Conſtantinople: for our traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then left to themſelues. After that, we deſpiſed and rejected the pittiful complaints of the Princes of Peloponeſus, who with tears craued our aid: and now we ſee that famous country loſt, and fallen into his hands through our ſloath and negligence. Of late, when as the King of Boſna humbly requeſted our aid, and promiſed fully to requite our curteſie, and whatſoeuer els we ſhould do in his behalf, we ſuffered his kingdom to be loſt, and himſelf to be cruelly murthered by the Turks. For all theſe things of vs thus neglected, we cannot eſcape the infamous report of the I reſt of the nations of Europ, but that we for the greedy deſire of trade and filthy gain, haue forſaken, and for our parts betrayed whole kingdoms and nations, agreeing with vs both in maners and religion; and to haue ſtood ſtill and looked on, vntill they were ſubdued and brought into thraldom by the Turks. Wherfore in few words to ſhut vp the matter, if we ſhould ioyn in league with the Hungarians, and enter into arms, we ſhould ſo be able to keep our own: wheras if we ſhall vſe delayes, and hunt after peace, we ſhall in ſhort time ſee that he will ſuddenly deuour vs, being vnprouided, and wreſt from vs all our prouinces and territories which border vpon him. And therfore it is in my opinion beſt to ſend our Embaſſadors into Hungary, with a great maſſe of mony, to ſtir vp that warlike nation into the fellowſhip of this war. And beſide the navy we now haue in readines, to put to ſea as many more ſhips and gallies as we are able. The great Biſhop alſo is not to be forgotten, but by all means to be drawn as a chief man into this War. Beſides all K this, we muſt do what we can to raiſe vp rebellion againſt the Turk in Peloponeſus: which will be no hard matter to bring to paſſe. For if the Peloponeſians riſe vp in arms with one of their poor princes hich revolted from the Turkiſh King, and forſaking all that they had, adventured themſelues into all manner of peril and danger; what think you they will do when they ſhall ſee ſo great forces comming both by ſea and land againſt the Turkiſh King? It were good alſo, that we ſhould ſend two thouſand Italian Horſmen into Peloponeſus, to animate the people. Who when they ſhall ſee vs thus to proceed, will vndoubtedly preſently revolt from the Turks, and yeeld themſelues and their countrey vnto vs, from whence we may moſt commodiouſly vex and moleſt this Tyrant. For there is no where better entrance into his Kingdome, than by the way of Peloponeſus. So that ioyning in league with the Hungarians, we ſhall beſet him on euery ſide: they all along the riuer of Danubius, and we out of Peloponeſus. Let vs not therfore ſit ſtil with our hands L in our boſoms, ſuffering our countries to be taken from vs, and our ſubiects made bondſlaues to the Turks; but incouraging them by our example, animate them to take vp arms, and valiantly to reſiſt the cruell and barbarous Tyrant.

The Venetians take vp Armes againſt the Turks.

The greater part of the Senat mooued with this graue Senatours ſpeech, decreed without delay to make Wars, and to ſend their Embaſſadors to the Pope, the King of Hungary, and other the Chriſtian Princes their Neighbors, to craue aid of them in theſe Wars againſt the Turks. According to this Decree, the Venetians for defence of their territory ſent one Bertholdus Eſte a valiant Captain, with an Army into Peloponeſus: where at his firſt comming, he in ſhort time recouered the City of Argos before loſt. And departing thence, marched M through the country with his army of fifteen thouſand men, vnto the ſtreight of Corinth, called Iſthmus. At which place Alouiſius Lauretanus, Admirall of the Venetians (by appointment before made) did meet him: and there ioyning their forces together, with great labour in the ſpace of fifteen daies fortified all that ſtreit from the Ionian to the ſea Ægeum, with a continual rampier and double ditch in length about fiue miles. In which work they vſed the help of thirty thouſand men, and in doing therof were much furthered by the ruins of the old wall before deſtroied by Amurath. The Venetian Commanders hauing fortified this ſtreit, incamped before Corinth, and laid ſtreit ſiege vnto it: where at the ſecond aſſault, Bartholdus the General deſirous by his own forwardnes to incourage his ſoldiers, was in that aſſault grieuouſly wounded with a ſtone caſt down vpon him from the wall: of which hurt he ſhortly after died. Neuertheles the ſiege was ſtil continued by Betinus Calcinatius, who ſucceeded Bartholdus in his place. But whilſt the Venetians lay thus at the ſiege of Corinth, ſuddenly news was brought vnto the camp, That Mahomet was comming with a great army himſelfe in perſon, to raiſe the ſiege, and to deſtroy the new fortifications at Iſthmus. Wherupon the Venetians left the ſiege, with purpoſe to haue defended the late fortified ſtreit: but after. that it was certainly known that Mahomet was euen now at hand with an Army of fourſcore thouſand Turks, Betinus diſtruſting with his ſmall number to be able to defend the ſtreit againſt ſo puiſſant an army, left the place ſo lately before fortified, and with all his Army retyred to Neapolis, there to keep the ſea coaſt.

Shortly after, Mahomet without any reſiſtance at all entred with a world of men by the ſtreit into Peloponeſus; and when he had with the great ſlaughter of the country people romed vp and down about Argos, he came to Neapolis, and in moſt terrible maner aſſaulted the city twice; both which times he was notably repulſed by the Venetians, and many of his men ſlain. Departing thence, he deſtroied and waſted the country about Methone (now Modon) and Corone, and aſſaulted the city of Iuncum, but with no better ſucces than he had before Neapolis. Wherfore Winter now drawing on, he returned again with his army to Conſtantinople.

After his departure, the Venetians ſpoiled all that part of Arcadia which was ſubiect to the Turk, requiting him with like injuries as he had don them before. Not long after, Lauretanus the Venetian Admiral had the Iſland of Lemnos deliuered vnto him by one Cominius a famous pyrat, who had ſurpriſed the ſame and taken it from the Turks; but diſtruſting how he ſhould be able to keep the ſame, deliuered it ouer vnto the Venetians. Shortly after, Vrſatus Iuſtinianus a great Magnifico among the Venetians, was ſent to ſucceed Lauretanus their Admiral: but whilſt he was ſcouring the Ægeum with a fleet of 32 great gallies, Andreas Dandalus General of their forces at land, inconſiderately incountring with the Turkes horſemen between Mantynia and Pytheme, was by them ouerthrown and ſlain, and with him diuers other gentlemen of great account: in which skirmiſh fifteen hundred of the Venetians were ſlaine together with their General. And as fortune is neuer more conſtant than in miſchief, ſo at the ſame time Vrſatus General at ſea, landing his men in the Iſland of Lesbos, beſieged the city of Mytelene, and gaue therunto two great aſſaults, wherin he loſt fiue thouſand men: And vnderſtanding that the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the city, raiſed the ſiege and ſailed into Eubœa, and from thence paſſed ouer into Peloponeſus, where he ſhortly after died with ſorrow and grief of mind. In whoſe place the Venetians ſent another famous Captaine called Iacobus Lauretanus.

The Venetians enter into Confederatiõ with other Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turk.

The Venetians wel conſidering the great power of the Turkiſh Emperor, labored by their Embaſſadors to draw as many of the Chriſtian Princes as they could into the fellowſhip of this war; but eſpecially the Great Biſhop, by whoſe meanes they were in good hope to bee greatly ſtrengthned. Pius the ſecond of that name was then the Great Biſhop; who at firſt anſwered the Venetian Embaſſadors, That he muſt take away the little Turke, before he had any thing to do with the great: meaning thereby Sigiſmundus Maletaſta Prince of Ariminum, whom he deadly hated, for that he took part with the French againſt the Aragonians. Howbeit the wars in Italy being wel appeaſed, and Pius ſtil ſolicited by the Venetians, made great preparation againſt the Turks; giuing it out, that he would in perſon himſelfe go vnto thoſe Wars: and by his authority (then much regarded) procured great aid out of Germany, France, Spain, and other Countries alſo farther off. At which time alſo voluntary men in great number reſorted out of all parts of Chriſtendome, into Italy, ready to aduenture their liues in thoſe Religious Warres. At the ſame time alſo the Venetians had with much adoo by the working of Paulus Angelus Archbiſhop of Dyrrachium, perſuaded Scanderbeg to renounce the league which he had before made with the Turke, and to enter into Arms again; which he preſently did, and ſpoiled the borders of the Turkes Dominions next vnto him. Wherwith Mahomet was no leſſe troubled, than with all the reſt of the great preparation of the Chriſtian army, which Mahomet feared might tend to the vtter ruin of his Kingdome. So dreadfull was the name of Scanderbeg among the Turks. Wherfore thinking it moſt conuenient for his affairs to reconcile him if it were poſſible, by his embaſſador ſent for that purpoſe wrot vnto him as followeth. G

Sultan Mahomet, Emperor of the Eaſt and of the Weſt; to Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, Greeting. H

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I Haue alwaies had thy fidelity and vpright dealing in great admiration, most noble Prince Scanderbeg: for which cauſe I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a Prince of ſuch an heroical and princely perfection, ſhouldſt ſo inconſiderately and without any occaſion break the faith and league which thou not long ſince ſolemnly contractedſt with me. For as I am aduertiſed, thou haſt entred into the confines of our dominion with a great army, and with fire and ſword deſtroying all that thou couldſt, haſt caried away with thee a great booty. Of which thing I know right well that the Venetians are the only cauſe, by whoſe counſell and perſuaſion thou haſt bin ſet on to do this deed; and ſeduced by their allurements and ſubtill perſuaſions, haſt made war vpon me, and art become the faithles breaker of thine own league, and of the ſacred law of Nations. Yet do I little or nothing blame thee therfore, regarding more the cauſe of the ignominie, than the deſpight it ſelf, and lay the blame vpon them who haue alwaies bin my foes and capitall enemies, rather than vpon thee. I But alas what is this vnto me (Scanderbeg) that thou haſt done, which poſſeſſe ſo many and ſo large dominions? Didſt thou think to do ſo great hurt vnto our kingdome, by ſpoiling a little piece of our country, and by ſtealing our cattel, more like a theef and robber, than an open enemy? Which thing I yet account not worth the name of an injury. But if thou thinkſt ſo good, proceed not in theſe thy doings; for I make more account of thy friendſhip and loue, than of whatſoeuer to mee is deareſt: becauſe (as thou knoweſt) I haue alwaies born vnto thee an eſpeciall fauour, and loued thee moſt entirely. And therfore as often as I call to remembrance our tender years and old familiaritie whilſt we liued together in my fathers court at Hadrianople, I canot but think my ſelf bound vnto thee in all curteſie. And therfore (my good Scanderbeg) I moſt heartily requeſt and intreat thee, that we renuing the former concluſions of peace, may of new confirm the ſame with ſolemne Oath: wherewith if the former peace had bin eſtabliſhed, thou wouldſt not haue ſuffered thy ſelf to haue bin now of the Venetians ſo circumuented or ſeduced. K It is therfore needfull that we now again for euer confirm a league and peace betwixt vs by ſolemn and ſacred oath on both ſides: which if thou ſhalt do, (as I hope thou wilt, and in this be aduiſed by me) thou and thy poſterity ſhall vndoubtedly alwaies reign in peace, and in ſafety poſſeſſe whatſoeuer is yours. Wheras if thou ſhalt do otherwiſe, beleeue me it wil repent thee, and that right quickly. Thou knoweſt already my force, which whether thou be able to withſtand or not, thou wert beſt to bee well aduiſed. The poor Princes thy neighbors, the Venetians thy ſeducers, canot deliuer thee from my force and power. Doſt thou not ſee the Grecians almoſt all rooted out before thy face? the emperors of Conſtantinople and Trapezond by vs depriued of their empires? the Princes of Servia and Raſcia deſtroyed? the King of Boſna put to death? and all the Kings of Aſia, with many other Kings and Princes moe vanquiſhed and ouerthrown, and made ſubject to me? L Wherfore Scanderbeg I aduiſe thee in this to follow my counſel, keep thy promiſe, and ſo beleeue me thou ſhalt not be deceiued. Concerning theſe matters we haue giuen further commandment to our Embaſſador and ſeruant Muſtapha, who comes vnto thee. To whom doubt not to giue credit in any thing. Farewel. From our Imperial city of Conſtantinople, the 7 of Ma. 1463.

Scanderbeg hauing by the aforeſaid meſſenger receiued theſe letters, and wel conſidered of the ſame, returned anſwer as followeth.

The Champion of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albaneſes and Epirots; to the moſt excellent Mahomet King of the Turks, Greeting. M Scanderbeg his anſwer to Mahomets letters.

You maruell (moſt noble Mahomet) that my ſoldiers (as you ſay) contrary to the League and the conditions

A conditions of our peace, haue entred into your confines, and from thence carried a great booty. Of which thing you ſay the Venetians are the authors, whom you call your mortal Enemies: inferring afterwards, that you are little therwith offended, for that you are a moſt mighty Prince, and can eaſily diſgeſt ſuch vnkindnes, for the great loue you bear vnto me: and the rather, for that I did it deceiued (as it pleaſeth you to ſay) by others. All theſe things you can eaſily forgiue and forget, ſo that I will by ſolemn Oath confirm the ſame conditions of peace that were in our former League betwixt vs agreed vpon. And therunto you do greatly vrge me, you admoniſh and counſell me to follow your aduice, as tending to the great profit and ſecuritie of me and my poſterity, leſt haply whilſt I ſeek to pleaſe the Venetians, I incur your heauy diſpleaſure.
Beſides this, the more to terrifie me, you reckon vp as it were in a catalogue, the people, nations, Kings, and Princes, by you ouercome and ſubdued. But what is that which is ſo ſtrange (I pray you) and B which you ſo much maruel at (moſt noble Mahomet*?) Is it not for that my ſoldiers did that in the confines* of your dominions, wherof they were (of right) ſorry, and had therof to me complained, that your ſoldiers had before don the like in their goods and poſſeſsions. Wherfore if they alſo vpon a military brauery (as is your manner of phraſe) haue made themſelues whole, and done one ſhrewd turn for another, reuenging injury receiued, and not inferring any of new; there is no cauſe that you ſhould either think it ſtrange, or blame me. I would my ſelf haue reſtrained my ſouldiers, although they were grieuouſly injured (I wil plainly confeſſe vnto you a troth) I would haue appeaſed their angry minds, inflamed with deſire of reuenge; if you (a Prince of all others moſt rich and bountifull) would either haue taken order, that ful reſtitution might haue bin made vnto them of all ſuch things as they had loſt, or els would with condigne puniſhment haue chaſtiſed the inſolencie of your ſoldiers: which you would ſeem to couer with the term of military wantonnes or brauery; an excuſe ſcarſe currant amongſt children. For although offences are in C all places grieuous, yet ought they moſt of all ſo to be deemed in martial affairs. What I pray you, would you haue me take it for a laſciuiouſnes in your men of war? eſpecially when I had receiued ſo great loſſe; when as you might with a word firſt haue reſtrained them from doing it, and at your pleaſure corrected them after the deed was done. Wherfore (moſt excellent Mahomet*) take you alſo in good part theſe our* tearms, which you haue accuſtomed hitherto moſt gloriouſly to giue and ſell vnto vs, whilſt you alwaies couer your reach with ſome excuſe or ſhew of right. As for that in excuſing me vnder colour of old acquaintance and friendſhip, you invey againſt the Venetians, verily you do them wrong; for why, thoſe good, iuſt, and vertuous Princes are not to be ſlandered by you, as ſeducers of me or others. Beſides, what need that inuincible State to enter into counſell with me, or (as it pleaſeth you to ſay) to allure me to fall at ods with you, or to proſecute you as an enemy? who of themſelues, yea (I ſay) of themſelues alone, when D occaſion ſhall require, are able to dare you in plain battell, and to abate your pride. Furthermore, wher as you aduiſe me to reiect their friendſhip, your labor is therin but loſt; for what man is ſo deſperat, or hated of his ſubiects, that would not chuſe rather to erre with that moſt honorable Senat, than to be in the right with you? eſpecially I, who haue of long time bin confederat with them, and am of all others vnto them moſt dear: which you for all that had no regard of, but according vnto your vntruſty dealing, breaking inſunder the bonds of peace, ſpoiled and waſted their territory in Peloponeſus. Neither can your great threats terrifie me, which you after the Turkiſh manner thunder and pour out againſt me, except I will be ouer-ruled by you. For it is the part of an Albaneſe, both to endure when need ſhall require, and alſo to do ſuch things as beſeem a man of courage. You canot make me afraid, being but a ſmall Prince, with my honorable friends the Venetians. And what are you? ſo great an Emperor of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and E of all parts of the world, as you vainly term your ſelf? Truly you make mee ſmile, and other Chriſtian Princes laugh you to ſcorn, in vſurping falſly to your ſelf the ſtately title of the Emperour of the World.
What poſſeſſe you in Aſia the greater? Verily nothing. Is all yours in Aſia the leſſe? Not ſo. What haue you in Europ, except Thracia, Myſia, part of Grecia, and Peloponeſus, with the Iſle of Mytelene? As for Afrik, you neuer ſet your foot therin. Is this to be Emperour of the world? But ſuppoſe, ſuppoſe (I ſay) [illegible] Mahomet*, that all from the fartheſt part of the Ocean were yours, you ought not therfore ſo to* ſwell, as to contemn all others. Ceaſe to boaſt, and learn now if you can the ſpecial, but true examples of humane fragility. Where are now the Aſſyrians which ſometime ſwayed the world? Where be the Medes? where the Perſians and the Greeks, where are the Romans the great Commanders of all? Verily, Tamberlane the Scythian King (called the Terror of the world) was farre greater than you, who in triumph F drew before his chariot thy great grandfather Baiazet in a chain, who had before won ſo many victories; whom neuertheles he ouerthrew in the plains of Armenia, with three hundred thouſand Turks, hauing in his army (as is reported) twelue hundred thouſand men, greater than Xerxes or Darius*, whoſe Armies*

couered the ſeas, and dried vp the riuers before them as they went; yet for all this (noble Mahomet) they are all caſt out by him that caſteth out all Nations, the finger of the Higheſt hath brought them all to nought. Wherfore learn to know your ſelf to be a man alſo; truſt not too much to the multitude of your ſoldiers, and ſtrength of your armies; for oftentimes great and puiſſant Armies haue bin ouerthrown with far leſſe, as all hiſtories bear witnes: wherof it is commonly ſaid, Thou ſhalt not praiſe the valor of the Generall, before he be brought to the triumph. And do you not think, Mahomet, that God will fauor the better cauſe? You know, you well know, that all your kingdom is violently gotten, that it is wrongfully and vniuſtly poſſeſſed: for which cauſe I am not afraid not only to withſtand you when you ſhall come, being ſo great a Prince; but alſo valiantly and couragiouſly to dare you into the field, and by the power of God both to hope for and haue a notable victory ouer you. We haue ſoldiers alſo who know how to vſe their weapons, to march before their enemies, and how to bear themſelues in the heat of the battell. Wherfore, to that you ſay vnto me for the renuing of the former league, you labor now but in vaine to circumuent me with ſuch fair gloſſes; I haue your faith in ſuch diſtruſt, and your friendſhip in deteſtation: foraſmuch as you cunningly and ſubtilly, after the maner of your Anceſtors, whatſoeuer you do, or whatſoeuer you promiſe vnto me, it tendeth all to no other end than to thruſt me out of my kingdom. Yet thus long I haue by Gods help well eſcaped all your policies, all your crafts and deceits. But I hope there will in ſhort time be an end of all theſe matters, when all your ſleights and deuiſes ſhall not eaſe you, neither your working head or Turkiſh pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that ſo much ſtomack you; there commeth after me a great number of Chriſtian Princes: behold, the whole Chiualry and glory of the Chriſtian commonweal is in arms and comming againſt thee with all their force: all the Kings and Princes of Chriſtendom haue combined themſelues together, with the great Biſhop, againſt thy ſtate, and will in ſhort time be preſent to deſtroy thee and thy Kingdome. Wherefore (worthy Mahomet) I haue thought it good in regard of our old friendſhip (although the ſame hath by you beene greatly impaired and violated) to forewarne you of all theſe things, that you might gather your wits together; and in time prouide for the ſafety of your ſelf and kingdom. You ſee the force and power of many great Princes, from which whether you can eſcape or no I know not: yet you may, if you will follow my aduice, you may, I ſay, make both your name and empire, of great greater, of famous moſt renowned, of fortunat moſt happy and bleſſed: if caſting from you the groſſe errors of the Mahometan ſuperſtition, you will embrace the faith and truth of Chriſt Ieſu, and at length haue regard of your ſouls health. And you which excell all your predeceſſors in highnes of ſpirit and pregnancie of wit, ſuffer not your ſelf and your ſubiects as it were by inheritance to be longer blinded in your wilfull errors: but do that (as a wiſe Prince) of your own accord, which otherwiſe you wil ſhortly of neceſsity be conſtrained to do. To ſay, Had I wiſt, hath euer bin accounted a great diſgrace from the mouth of an Emperor. At length amend and meaſure your ſelf. Behold, Almighty God doth offer you means, wherby you may quiet the whole ſtate of your kingdom, and all our Kings and Princes loue, honour, and reuerence you. Neither let the ambitious deſire of ſoueraignty, or immoderat care of thoſe things you poſſeſſe, trouble you from ſo doing: for whatſoeuer you haue vniuſtly and vnlawfully vſurped, the Chriſtian Princes will grant, confirm, and eſtabliſh vnto thee, as if they had bin your own by antient inheritance. So ſhall you be a true Monarch indeed, and rule and reign lawfully, if you ſhall embrace this faith, and worſhip God aright: which ſo ſoon as you ſhall feel the ſweetnes of, you wil be ſorry you knew it no ſooner, you will grieue at the time you haue loſt, and vtterly deteſt and abhor all that filthy ſuperſtition which the moſt filthy falſe Prophet Mahomet hath left amongſt you.

From our Camp, the 26 of May, 1463.

With theſe letters Scanderbeg diſmiſſed the Turks Embaſſador. About which time he receiued letters from the great Biſhop, that he, accompanied with the Chriſtian princes, would without delay come ouer into Epirus with a ſtrong army of valiant Chriſtians, to join their forces with his againſt the common enemy of the Chriſtian Religion: exhorting him in all their names to denounce war againſt the Turkiſh king. Which thing Scanderbeg moſt joifully vndertook, and without delay with all his power brake into the Turks dominion, burning and deſtroying the country before him as he went: from whence he returned laden with the ſpoil there gotten.

When Mahomet had peruſed Scanderbegs letters, and certainly vnderſtood of the great preparation made againſt him in Italy, as alſo of the great ſpoyle of late made by Scanderbeg, he became exceeding melancholy, as a man much troubled in minde, which dayly more and heauines and deſpaire, as if they had bin men already vanquiſhed. Neuertheleſſe, he ſpeedily took order for the leuying of a great army; fortifying his cities and ſtrong holds, leauing nothing vndone that was poſſible, for the aſſurance of his ſtate. And to repreſſe the fury of Scanderbeg, ſent Seremet Baſſa with fourteene thouſand ſouldiers to lie vpon the borders of Epirus, with charge only to attend vpon him. Who mindfull of his charge, came into Macedonia, to the city Ocrida, now called Alchria, in the very confines of Macedonia towards Epirus, and there lay with his army; ſome part thereof lodged in the city, and the reſt in places more conuenient

The comming of the Baſſa, as alſo the manner of his lying was not vnknown to Scanderbeg, B who deſired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he ſecretly in the night marched towards Ocrida with twelue thouſand ſouldiers, and being come within three miles of the towne, lay cloſe in ambuſh, & vpon the breaking of the day ſent out 500 horſemen towards the enemy, vnder the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert captains, to draw him if they could into the field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded them, that if the enemy did come forth to fight, they ſhould make but ſmall reſiſtance, but retire back as if they had fled, and ſo to traine him on to the place where the army lay. Which was ſo well performed by the two ſkilfull captaines, that the Baſſa with all his power was according as they could haue wiſhed, drawn into the field, and brought to the very place where Scanderbeg lay, who ſuddenly riſing vp with all his army, aſſailed the Turks on euery ſide, and C ſlew them as Deere incloſed in a toyle. In this battell ten thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, the Treaſurer of the army with twelue other of great mark were taken priſoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were preſently ranſomed for forty thouſand Duckats.

Ten thouſand Turks ſlaine.

Scanderbeg hauing obtained the victory, returned with triumph into Epirus, dayly expecting the comming of the great army out of Italy: But fatal Deſtiny, the mighty controller of mens higheſt deſignes, had not ſo appointed. For when Pius the great Biſhop had out of al parts of Chriſtendome aſſembled a great army (whereof the greateſt part were voluntary ſoldiers) and all things were now in ſuch readines, that he had put himſelf vpon the way, and was come to Ancona, a city vpon the ſea ſide (where Chriſtophorus Maurus duke of Venice came vnto him, with ten gallies well appointed, to haue accompanied him in thoſe wars: and all men were now in D expectation of ſome great matter to haue bin done) ſuddenly he fell ſicke of a feuer, and died in the yere 1464. Whereupon the army was forthwith diſperſed, and all that great preparation fruſtrated, to the exceeding grief of many Chriſtian Princes, and no leſſe ioy of the Turks, who now reioyced to ſee themſelues deliuered of ſo great a feare.

About this ſame time, Victor Capella chiefe perſuader of this warre betwixt the Venetians and the Turks, was by the Senat ſent general of their forces at ſea, in ſtead of Lauretanus, whoſe yeare was then expired. He hauing receiued the charge from Lauretanus, and ſayling out of Eubœa, in ſhort time tooke from the enemy the city of Aulis in Peloponeſus ouer againſt Chalcis, and alſo the city of Larſum in the gulfe of Theſſalonica, with the Iſle of Himber: afterwards landing his men by night at Pyræus, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the city of Athens (now E called Sethina) ſometime the mother of learning, and moſt noble city of Grecia; and from thence carried away with him into Eubœa all the people he there found, as his priſoners, together with the rich ſpoyle of that city. Whilſt he lay in Eubœa, he was perſuaded that the city of Patras in Peloponeſus would be deliuered to him by the Chriſtians that dwelt therein,
